Digitized by Google

Original from
PENN STATE

The Carnegie Library
of
The Pennsylvania State College

Class No. 052
Book No. Ac1 R 232
Accession No. 45638

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

Digitized by Google

Original from
PENN STATE

Digitized by Google

Original from
PENN STATE

Digitized by Google

Original from
PENN STATE

Digitized by Google

Original from
PENN STATE

LIBRARY
THE PA STATE COLLEGE

THE ACADEMY

JANUARY—JUNE

1911

VOLUME LXXX

PUBLISHING OFFICE
93, 94, LONG ACRE, W.C.

Digitized by Google
Original from
PENN STATE

LIBRARY
THE PA. STATE COLLEGE

052
Qc1
R

Digitized by Google

Original from
PENN STATE

CONTENTS OF VOL. LXXX.

ART

Art 725
Art Needlework 469
Baillie Gallery, The 113, 696
Carfax and Dowdeswell Galleries ... 113
Chenil Gallery, The 617
Connell's Gallery in Bond-street, Messrs. 757
Deceased French Artists 592
Dutch Pictures at the French Gallery 664
Early British Masters at Messrs. Shepherd's Gallery 501 Exhibition of Lithographs, An ... 401
Flower Paintings 288
Goupil Gallery, The ... 113, 617, 780
Grafton Galleries, The 112
Harmony and Proportion in Art. S. A.-B. 298
International Society, The 593
Landscape Exhibition at the Leicester Galleries, The 147
Leicester Galleries, The ... 210, 617
McLean's Gallery, Messrs. 756
Modern Gallery in Bond-street ... 780
Modern Mezzotints at the Rembrandt Gallery 695
National Gallery, The 338
New English Art Club, The ... 24
New Water-Colour Society, The ... 695
Pictures by Mr. Garnet Wolseley and Mr. Bertram Nicholls 593
Rembrandt Gallery, The 757
Rothenstein's Indian Drawings, Mr. 757
Royal Academy 556, 586
Royal Academy Winter Exhibition 82
Royal Society of British Artists ... 401
Royal Water-Colour Society, The ... 469
Salting Collection, The 436
Some Smaller Art Exhibitions ... 372
Water-Colour Drawings at Messrs. Agnew's Galleries 269
Water-Colours and Drawings ... 617

ARTICLES

Anarchist Enemy, The ... 50, 76
Anarchist Rat, The 60
Anglo-Saxon Peace, The. E. Ashmead-Bartlett 606
Ascetic Entrapped, The 657
Aspects of Tragedy. Ethel Talbot 269, 334, 400
Authorised Version, The 430
Author of the Most Famous English Joke, The. Frank Harris ... 49
Balzac. Frank Harris 613
Bavai. H. Belloc 541
Beautiful Varenna 760
Bench Trust, The 508
Bernard Shaw at Cambridge, Mr. Cecil Cowper 704
Besant at the Queen's Hall, Mrs. ... 748
Boulanger, General. Frank Harris 487
Boy in the Garden, The. Richard Middleton 692
British Museum, The... 333
Broad Back of the Income-tax Payer, The 32
Canada and Canadian Banking ... 620
Caudine Forks, The. Cecil Cowper 640
Chance or Zero 24
Charles Baudelaire. S. A.-B. ...47, 80
Charles Dilke. Frank Harris ... 144
Church Army and Boy Emigrants, The 759
Claim of Married Women under the State Insurance Bill, The. Helen Bosanquet 769
Claptrap Unlimited 111
Closing of the Scheldt. E. Ashmead-Bartlett 93
Colonial Investments... 628
Continental Rôle, The. H. Belloc 619
Coronation Exhibition 660
Coronation Numbers... 714
Cromwell's Head. Montagu Wood 526
Day Before Yesterday, The. Richard Middleton 75, 113, 146, 176
Detes'able Outrage, A. Cecil Cowper 672
Dover Straits 523
Drury Lane and the Children ... 46
Dutch Dykes in England. 691
Economics of Preference, The 284, 316
Empire Day and Empire Difficulties. Earl Winterton 605
Empire Movement, The. Earl of Meath... 625
English Goethe Society ... 85
Eugène Fromentin: The Painter-Writer. Frank Harris 286
Excellent Touchstone, An 492
Facilis Descensus 83
Fatuous Egoist, A 21
Felo-De-Se? Cecil Cowper... ... 572
Fiend Instinctive, The. Darrell Figgis... 358
Fifty Years of Modern Italy. Frank Harris... 590
Five Free Libraries, The 307
Foreign Affairs. Lancelot Lawton 241, 274, 307, 339, 371, 402, 435, 468, 499, 530, 564, 595, 626, 665, 696, 725, 757, 792.
Foreign Reviews 651
Forty Years of Contemporary History. Marc Logé 367
France Under Louis Seize. S. A.-B. 208, 234
French Reviews 529
Gabriel D'Annunzio. Frank Harris 715
George Borrow 522, 559
Government by Overstrain. Cecil Cowper 284
Great Sight, The. H. Belloc ... 125
Hercules Unwrought. Darrell Figgis 110
Hero as Baby, The. Wilfrid L. Randell 142
High Priest of Truth, A. Thomas Huxley. Frank Harris 209
History and the Hearts of Kings. Frank Harris 317
Hopes and Fears for Modern Drama. Max Plowman 365
Imperial Domesticity. W. H. Koebel 617
Income-tax Payers' Slumber. Cecil Cowper 444
India: a Series.
I. Before the Mutiny ... 77
II. Since the Mutiny 107, 301
III. Decentralisation of the Finances 143
IV. High Politics, External and Internal 177
V. Diplomacy and Extension of Territory 204
VI. Caution and Conscientious Regard for Indian Interests 235
VII. Strenuous Reform Throughout the Administration 272
India in the British Empire ... 622
Indian and Colonial Reviews ... 749
Japanese on Whistler, A. Yone Noguchi 750
Jesuit Bathing-Pool, A. W. H. Koebel 433
Jupiter Tonans. Cecil Cowper ... 736
Kyoto. Yone Noguchi 369
Last Stand of the Houndsditch Murderers. Ellis Ashmead-Bartlett 3
Late Duke of Devonshire, The. Frank Harris 264
Late Sir Alfred Lyall, The 524
Launch of H.M.S. "Monarch" ... 434
Limit, The. Hilaire Belloc ... 751
Literary Journalism? Cecil Cowper 220
Literature and Burglars 6
London Bridge 51
London Institution, The 84, 115, 147, 180
Lords and the Crown, The. Montagu Wood ... 220, 254, 336
Magazines 306, 467, 561, 755
Matter of Bluff, A. Darrell Figgis 178
Medical Practice and the State Insurance Bill. M. Milton Townsend 736
Meeting of Parliament, The ... 92
Mob Law: A Reminiscence of Forty Years Ago. By an Eye-Witness 656
Modern Artillery in the Field. Col. H. A. Bethell 497
Modern Magician, A. Frank Harris 685
Morocco - Bound. E. Ashmead-Bartlett 739
Motoring and Aviation 787
Music 81, 139, 173, 201, 231, 268, 303, 337, 364, 562, 658, 687, 724, 788
My Dictionary. Papillon 563
Mystery of Shakespeare's London Life, The. W. M. D. ... 717, 771
Name of the Ship, The. Hilaire Belloc 252
Nation as Arbiter, The. Cecil Cowper 604
Nature's Priest 463
New and Forthcoming Books 305, 403
New Philosophy, A. Marc Logé ... 104
New Year's Eve 22
New Zealand Sheep-drive, A. W. H. Koebel 754
Old Gentleman's Opinions, The. Hilaire Belloc 672
Our Pantisocrats 591
Oxford Poem by Henry Vaughan, An. L. Imogen Guincy 461, 490, 510
Paul Gauguin 20
Paul Verlaine. S. A.-B. ... 140, 174
Poem of Japan, A. A. H. F. ... 719
Poetry of Thomas Hardy, The ... 350
Poet's Holiday, The. Richard Middleton 271, 300, 331, 398, 429, 464, 494, 526, 560, 593
Poet Who Was, The. Richard Middleton 205
Police and the Citizen, The. Ellis Ashmead-Bartlett 33
Procession, The. W. H. Koebel ... 399
Proportional Representation. Hilaire Belloc 413
Provincial Performances of Wagner's "The Ring of the Nibelung" ... 525
Racial Questions: the Colonies' Last Word. H. Hobden 624
Reflections on Modernity 273
Religious Instruction in India ... 718
Retirement of Hans Richter, The... 370
Retrenchment and Reform 540

45638

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Reviews and Magazines ... 17, 179
Roman in London, A. Maximus Sabellius 689
Royal Colonial Institute 114
Royal Society of Arts ... 240, 434
Scheldt, The. H. Belloc ... 158, 189
Sense or Sensation. E. Ashmead-Bartlett 640
Shakespeare's Historical Plays ... 373
Shaw on Shakespeare. Frank Harris... 168
Sheffield Musical Festival 594
Singapura. Sydney M. English ... 527
Sir Richard Soloman on the Union of South Africa 300
Sloth of the Income-Tax Payer, The. Cecil Cowper 380
Some Characteristics of Modern Irish Poetry. R. D. ... 572, 627
Some New Features 188
Some New French Books. Marc Logé 47, 203, 304, 431, 589, 780
Some Old-Fashioned Railway Notions 83
Some Old Theatres of Paris. Marc Logé 750, 789
Some Recent French Reviews ... 18
Song of the Motor, A: A Series. Anthony Hamilton... 335, 401, 498
Special Issues 230
Spring Flowers at the Horticultural Hall 373
Spring in Japan. Yone Noguchi ... 496
State Insurance. Sir William Bull 655
Storm and Its Consequences, A. W. H. Koebel 688
Story of a Book, The. Richard Middleton 706, 753, 782
Strong Man Futile, A 238
Sweet o' the Year, The 659
Talks with Matthew Arnold. Frank Harris 106
Talks with Paul Verlaine. Frank Harris... 382
Temple Flower-Show, The ... 642, 689
Thackeray as Artist 623
Through France in a Motor. Frank Harris 790
Time-Worn Riddles 239
Togo and Nogi. E. Ashmead-Bartlett 705
Town Drama 383
Travelling Pictures. W. H. Koebel 465
True History. E. Ashmead-Bartlett 60
Twenty Favourite Books. Frank Harris... 653
Unionist Organisation. Sir Charles Walpole 232
Value and Usage of Words, The ... 477
Victoria Institute, The 52
"Vivat Crimen." Cecil Cowper ... 156
Voice on the Hill, The. Edward Thomas 331
Wagner's Autobiography. A. Kalisch 574
Wallace and Darwin. Frank Harris 78
What of the Representative System? Cecil Cowper 124
What of the Representative System? A. Wenyon-Samuel ... 157
William Howard Taft, President. Granville Fortescue 768

BOOKS RECEIVED

Pages 26, 54, 86, 118, 150, 182, 213, 246, 278, 311, 342, 375, 406, 439, 471, 503, 534, 567, 598, 634, 667, 699, 730, 763, 795

CORRESPONDENCE

Author of the Most Famous English Joke, The 117, 149
Bentley's Standard Novels 213
Bernard Shaw at Cambridge, Mr. 729, 761, 794
Carlyle and Mr. Frank Harris 245, 278, 310
Casting Vote, A 244
Coming Parliament Bill, The ... 212
Contemporary Belgian Poetry 730, 761, 794
Crystal Palace and the Festival of Empire, The... 667
Dickens' Women 117
Dr. Arnot 406
Edinburgh Vacation Courses ... 503
Expurgated Editions 762
Far Eastern Situation, The... ... 278
Felo-De-Se? 632
From Greenland's Icy Mountains 246, 278, 311
George Borrow... 729
Harrison Ainsworth 245, 277
Huxley 245
Influence of Women, The 244, 277, 310, 342
Interesting Parallel, An 149
Marriage and Common Sense 534, 567, 597
MSS. of St. Bernard 246
New Evidences in Psychical Research 342
New Methods in Teaching 471
Olive Schreiner's "Dreams" ... 439
Orchard House at Concord 632
Popular Songs 374
Post-Impressions 54
Power of Government Departments, The 533
Princess Virginia, The ... 598, 667
Public Library Reform 342
Query, A 534
Royal Mausoleum, Frogmore, The 150
Sir Isaac Newton's Assignment of Copyright in 1726 503
State Insurance Scheme, The ... 598
Summer in Mid-Winter 245
"Than Whom" 406, 438
Theosophy 182
Trio, A 213
What of Representative Government?... 243
"When Woman Loves" 406
Wholesale Manufacture of Peers ... 438
"Who" or "Whom"? 213, 245, 278, 311, 342
Wilde's "Salome" and the Critics ... 26

EMPIRE SUPPLEMENT

Articles

Australasian Literature. G. Raith Garson 3
Boiling Lake in Dominica, The. Sir Charles Walpole 5
Festival of Empire, The 2
Foreign Policy and Higher Defence of the Empire. Lancelot Lawton 6
John Bull's Lethargy. Sir William Bull 1
South Africa 5

Poems

Britannia 8
England... 8
Ireland 8
Scotland 8

FINANCE

In the Temple of Mammon 25, 53, 85, 115, 148, 181, 211, 242, 275, 309, 341, 374, 405, 437, 470, 502, 532, 566, 596, 630, 666, 698, 728, 760, 793

POETRY

Apotheosis. P. J. F. 220
Artificer, The. M. D. A. 124
Ballade of Dreams, A. W. L. R. ... 6
Birth, The. W. F. P. 284
Camp, The. B. D. R. 348
Discoverer, The. P. J. F. 63
Ebb-Tide. A. M. J. 252
Festival, The. Richard Middleton 768
Golden Birds, The. C. S. 188
Heart's Cradle Song, A. C. S. ... 380
Ingalill. F. A. J. 316
Light. The. E. T. 32
Lisabetta. Phil. J. Fisher 540
Love's Enemy. F. H. 444
Now Goes our Lady to the Woods. F. N. 156
Penance. W. L. R. 508
Poets, The. M. D. A. 640
Prima Vera. D. M. S. 412
Prisoner, The. C. M. Paine ... 672
Seventh Birthday, A. Guy Kendall 604
Song Forsaken. Ethel Talbot ... 572
South Wind, The. E. A. M. ... 92
Spells. P. J. F. 476
Stars and Earth, The. D. M. ... 704
Summer Underground. Ethel Talbot... 736
To the Months. Eden Phillpotts... 252

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

Pages 31, 59, 91, 123, 155, 187, 219, 251, 283, 315, 347, 379, 411, 443, 475, 507, 539, 571, 603, 639, 671, 703, 735, 767

REVIEWS

Abnormal Psychology. J. H. Coriat 417
Account, An. Erica Cotterill ... 327
Account of My Life, An. Nawáb Sultan Jahán Begam 197
Account Rendered. E. F. Benson 263
Across the Roof of the World. Lieut. P. T. Etherton 291
Adam Mickiewicz. Monica M. Gardner 773
Adventure. Jack London 519
Adventure, Sport and Travel on the Tibetan Steppes. W. N. Fergusson 495
Affairs of Ashleigh, The. Stephen Knott 199
Age of Folly, The. Charles J. Rolleston 40
Agonists, The. Maurice Hewlett 679
Airy Way, The. G. A. B Dewar ... 646
Alfred Trench, Mrs. By the Author of "The Views of Christopher" 611
Amazing Duchess, The. C. E. Pearce... 512
American Commercial Legislation before 1789. A. A. Giesecke ... 258
American Commonwealth, The. James Bryce 578
America—Through English Eyes. "Rita" 197
Among Indian Rajahs and Ryots. Sir Andrew H. L. Fraser 644
Amurath to Amurath. G. L. Bell 97
Ancient Lights and Certain New Reflections. Ford Madox Hueffer 709
Anglo-American Memories. G. W. Smalley 320
Annals of a Yorkshire House. A. M. W. Stirling 677
Annals of Our Parish. John Galt... 100
Annals of the Reigns of Malcolm and William, Kings of Scotland. Collected, with Notes and an Index, by Sir Archibald Campbell Lawrie 548
Aphorisms and Reflections from the Works of T. H. Huxley 742
Aphorisms and Reflections on Life and Philosophy. Martyn P. Pollack 742
Appreciations and Criticisms of the Works of Charles Dickens. G. K. Chesterton 416
Argentine Plains and Andine Glaciers. W. Larden 714
Artistic Side of Photography in Theory and Practice, The. A. J. Anderson 71
Arts and Crafts of our Teutonic Forefathers. G. Baldwin Brown 772
Art's Enigma. Frederick Jameson 319
At the Back of Things. Hugh B. Chapman 653
Attitudes and Avowals. Richard Le Gallienne 228
At Various Times. By the Author of "The Professor and Other Poems" 7
Balkan Tour, My. Roy Trevor ... 583
Beauty Doctor, The. Florence Warden 137

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

Belmont Book, The. Vados. ... 778
Beowulf and the Finnsburg Fragment. Translated by J. R. Clark Hall 225
Beyond these Seas. M. E. Braddon 104
Billy. Paul Methven 198
Black's Literary Readers. Book V. 293
Blair's Ken. W. Sylvester Walker 102
Book of Ceremonial Magic, The. A. E. Waite 609
Book of Common Prayer, The 480, 612
Book of Roses, The. Louis Durand 611
Book of Sacred Verse, A. Compiled and Edited by W. A. Knight ... 643
Book of the Seasons, The 101
Bourgeois Queen of Paris, The. Janet M. Clark 393
Brazenhead the Great. Maurice Hewlett 456
Bread upon the Waters, The. G. Agnew 613
British Isles, The. H. J. Snape ... 293
Broad Highway, The. Jeffery Farnol 328
Broad Stone of Empire, The. Sir Charles Bruce 356
Brownies and other Tales, The. J. H. Ewing 137
Bushland Stories. Amy E. Mack... 553
Call of the Snowy Hispar, The. W. H. Workman and F. B. Workman 37
Camera Fiend, The. E. W. Hornung 650
Canada and the Empire. W. R. Lawson 583
Card, The. Arnold Bennett ... 230
Catalonia and the Balearic Isles. A. F. Calvert... 294
Century and a Half of Jewish History. C. H. L. Emanuel 134
Chained Titan, The. M. G. Hole... 133
Champions of the Crown. Lucy Sealy 516
Characters in Outline. J. R. McClymont... 643
Cheapside to Arcady. Arthur Scammell 778
Chesterton Calendar, A 206
Chez les Français. Edited by H. Carter... 136
Chords of the Zither. Clinton Scollard 511
Chronicles of Pharmacy. A. C. Wootton 99
Church and the Empire, The. D. J. Medley... 262
City of Man, The. A. Scott Matheson 190
City of Shadows, The. Charles Beadle... 555
Class-book of Chemistry. G. C. Donington 293
Cloud Rifts over Cottonopolis. An Observer 553
Clyde Songs and other Verses. J. J. Bell 511
Coil of Carne. John Oxenham ... 519
Collected Poems. Alfred Noyes ... 223
Collected Poems of Maurice Baring 511
Coming Question, The. Sir Guilford Molesworth 411
Conflict of Colour, The. B. L. Putnam Weale 451
Conic Sections Made Easy. Saradakanta Gangopadhyaya 229
Contemporary Belgian Poetry. Selected and Translated by Jethro Bithell 678
Contre l'Aigle: Contre Nous. Paul Adam 260
Conversations with Napoleon at St. Helena. H. Meynell 452
Cormorant Crag. G. Manville Fenn 199
Corner of Harley-street, The. Some Familiar Correspondence of Peter Harding 611
Coronation Poem and Love Songs. K. H. D. Cecil 777
Coronation Regalia. W. H. Stacpoole 480
Coronation Service, The ... 480, 612
Coronation Souvenir, A. Rev. S. Baring-Gould 480
Correspondence of Jonathan Swift 9
Cotbank and its Folks. By the Author of "Rob Lindsay and his School" 584
Cowper and his Connection with the Law. William Willis 445, 476
Creative Evolution. Henri Bergson 545
Crown, Coronet and Clover. Caroline Corner 73
Cyclists' Touring Club. British Road Book, Vol. VI. Edited by T. B. Sandford 554
Danube with Pen and Pencil, The. Capt. B. Granville Barker... ... 454
Dartmoor Mist. A. B. Corkran ... 544
David Ricardo. Jacob H. Hollander 531
Dawn of the Health Age, The. Benjamin Moore 36
Day and Evening Schools. F. H. Hayward 95
Dead Man's Love. Tom Gallon ... 651
Death: Its Causes and Phenomena. H. Carrington and J. R. Meader 421
Debrett's Coronation Guide... ... 612
Debrett's House of Commons and the Judicial Bench, 1911 395
Declined with Thanks. Una L. Silberrad 199
Defender of the Faith. Marjorie Bowen 198
Demeter's Daughter. Eden Phillpotts 198
Denis Trench. Mrs. H. H. Penrose 168
D'Eon de Beaumont. Octave Homberg and Fernand Jousselin 582
De Profundis. Oscar Wilde ... 650
Dick Comerford's Wager. A. P. Crouch 744
Dictionary of Oriental Quotations Claud Field 294
Diminutive Dramas. Maurice Baring 167
Discovery of the Book of the Law. Professor Edouard Naville ... 69
Doctor Grey. Stephen Andrew ... 103
Doctor's Dilemma, Getting Married, and the Showing-up of Blanco Posnet, The. Bernard Shaw ... 381
Dr. Henry Coward. J. A. Rodgers 453
Drama of the Telephone, A. Richard Marsh 586
Dramatic Author's Companion, The. Theatrical Manager's Reader ... 135
Dual Resurrection, A. Bertram Mitford 74
Dupleix. Col. John Biddulph ... 196
Dweller on the Threshold, The. Robert Hichens 361
Earliest Sources for the Life of Jesus, The. F. Crawford Burkitt ... 127
East-Bourne Memories (1845 to 1901). G. F. Chambers 224
Eastern Asia. I. C. Hannah ... 552
Eastern Miscellany, An. Earl of Ronaldshay 581
Egypt. Pierre Loti 447
Egypt and Israel. Willis Brewer ... 482
Eight Centuries of Portuguese Monarchy. V. de Bragança Cunha ... 783
Elementary Algebra Exercises. Book II. A. E. Layng 293
El Greco en Toledo o' nuevas investigaciones, &c. 390
Elmsley, Mrs. Hector Munro ... 613
Emancipation of Englishwomen, The. W. Lyon Blaese 163
Encyclopædia of Sport. Vol. II.... 391
English Church in the Nineteenth Century. Francis Warre Cornish 514
English Country Life. Walter Raymond 100
English History. Sara Melhuish... 293
English Melodies from the Thirteenth to the Eighteenth Century. Edited by Vincent Jackson ... 292
English Philosophy. Thomas M. Forsyth 10
Essays on Russian Novelists. W. Lion Phelps 321
Essays on the Purpose of Art. Mrs. Russell Barrington... 98
Études d'Histoire et d'Art. E. Bertaux 422
Evolution of Plants. Dr. D. H. Scott 515
Fair Dominion, The. R. E. Vernede 610
Fair House, A, Hugh de Sélincourt 518
Falling Star, The. Phillips Oppenheim 393
Family and Heirs of Sir Francis Drake, The. Lady Eliott-Drake 711
Fancy Farm. Neil Munro 74
Fauna of British India, The. J. G. Arrow 42
Fauna of British India, The. W. L. Distant 262
Fedora of the Halls. Arthur Applin 519
Fenella. H. L. Stuart 584
Feuilles Éparses. Translated into French by Marc Logé 650
"Field" Coronation Number, The 777
Fighting Admirals. John Barnett 194
Final Faith, The. W. Douglas Mackenzie 15
First Temptation of St. Anthony, The. G. Flaubert 130
Five Hundred Miles in Somerset. B Parker Willcox 327
Flamsted Quarries. M. E. Waller 424
Footprints in the Snow, and other Tales, The. H. F. W. Tatham ... 136
Form and Order of the Coronation Service, The 777
Forms of Prayer for General Use on 22nd June, 1911 480
Forms of Prayer, with Music. Edited by Sir Frederick Bridge .. 777
Forms of Prayer with Thanksgiving to Almighty God 612
Fortuna Chance. James Prior ... 137
Foundations of the Nineteenth Century, The. Houston Stewart Chamberlain... 227
Founding of the Church, The. B. W. Bacon 256
Four Fascinating Frenchwomen. Mrs. Bearne 135
Fragrance among Odd Volumes. Basil Anderton 102
France Under the Republic. J. C. Bracq 466
Frank Brangwyn and his Work. W. Shaw-Sparrow 20
Franz Liszt and his Music. Arthur Hervey 774
French Composition. F. Guillotel and H. Proix 197
French Revolution, The. Hilaire Belloc... 515
Friends of Fate. Lucas Cleeve ... 263
From Hausaland to Egypt. H. K. W. Kumm 552
From Memory's Shrine. Translated by Edith Hopkirk 419
Garden of Resurrection, The. E. Temple Thurston 744
Gardens of Gray's Inn, and other Verses, The. Christian Tearle ... 544
Gay King Charles II., The. Dorothy Senior... 549
Générale Bonaparte, La. Joseph Turquand 164
Gentleman of Leisure, A. P. G. Wodehouse 74
George Bernard Shaw. Archibald Henderson 509
Geschichte der Malerei Neapels. W. Rolfs 389
Getting On: the Confessions of a Publisher. J. A. Thayer ... 359
Giants of the Earth, The. C. M. Salwey 517
Gilead Balm. Bernard Capes ... 168
Girl's Head, The. Edgar Jepson ... 104
Girondin, The. Hilaire Belloc ... 650
Glad Heart, The. E. M. Albanesi... 556
Glory of the Shia World, The. Translated by Major P. M. Sykes 195
Golden Silence, The. C. N. and A. M. Williamson 103
Golden Thoughts of Carmen Sylva, Queen of Roumania 742

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

Golfing Curios and "The Like." H. B. Wood 70
Gospel of Jesus the Son of God, The. G. W. Knox 127
Grandes Amoureuses, Les Gaston Derys 164
Great and Greater Britain. J. Ellis Barker 101
Great Betrayal, The. Harold Wintle 651
Great Britain and Ireland. J. B. Reynolds 293
Great Oil Octopus, The. "Truth's" Investigator 404
Green Curve, The. "Ole Luk-Oie" 779
Green Helmet, and other Poems, The. W. B. Yeats 547
Groundwork of French Composition. Ernest Weekley 779
Guide to Palestine and Syria ... 74

Handicap, The. R. E. Knowles ... 74
Harlot in Heaven, The. Sara Drew 103
Haunted. Gertrude Warden ... 612
Hawtrey's Deputy. Harold Bindloss 168
Hazell's Annual 74
Henry VIII. and his Court. H. Beerbohm Tree 680
Highways and Byways in Cambridge and Ely. E. Conybeare 580
Histoires et Leçons de Choses. Mme. Pape-Carpentier 649
Historical Atlas 74
Historical and Religious Value of the Fourth Gospel. E. F. Scott 256
Historical Manual of English Prosody, A. George Saintsbury 67
History of European Morals from Augustus to Charlemagne. W. E. H. Lecky 166
History of Rome and the Popes in the Middle Ages. Hartmann Grisar 775
History of some French Kings, A. Blanche Behm 480
History of the New England Fisheries. R. McFarland ... 478
Hope. R. B. Cunninghame Graham 103
How and Why King George will be Crowned 480
How to Write a Novel 71
Human Complex, The. Charles Granville 102
Hymns for the Coronation of King George V. 480

If Thou wert Blind. Constance Sutcliffe 7
Illustrated London News 682
Imperial Telegraphic Communication. C. Bright 681
Incas of Peru, The. Sir Clements Markham 14
India: Eight Lectures prepared for the Visual Instruction Committee of the Colonial Office. H. J. Mackinder 134
Indian Unrest. Valentine Chirol ... 12
Indian War of Independence of 1857, The. Indian Nationalist ... 783
Interludes. Horace Smith 16
International Relations of the Chinese Empire, The. Hosea Ballon Morse 324
Interpreters of Life and the Modern Spirit. A. Henderson 740
In the Land of the Pharaohs. Duse Mohamed 447
In the Net of Night. W. W. Marsh 7
Introduction to the History of the Assyrian Church. W. A. Wigram 295
Irish Affairs and the Home Rule Question. Philip G. Cambray ... 646
Irish Nationality. Mrs. J. H. Green 515
Irresistible Husband, The. V. Brown 586
Italian Poets since Dante, with Verse Translations. William Everett... 69
I Wonder: Essays for Young People. By the Writer of "Confessio Medici" 421

Jack Archer. G. A. Henty 199
Jane. Marie Corelli 650
Jane Oglander. Mrs. Belloc Lowndes 483
Japanese Letters of Lafcadio Hearn, The. Edited by Elizabeth Bisland 128
Japan for a Week. A. M. Thompson 165
Jewess, The. Mulvy Ouseley ... 780
Jews, The. Maurice Fishberg ... 67
Jours Vécus, Les. Jacques Normand 135
Juana of Castile. May Earle ... 133
Junior British History Notes. W. Edwards 293
Justice of the Peace and his Functions On and Off the Bench, The. A Middlesex Magistrate ... 357
Just to Get Married. Cicely Hamilton 424

Kestrel, The. Reginald Salwey ... 394
Kiltartan Molière, The. Translated by Lady Gregory 323
Kiltartan Wonder Book, The. Lady Gregory 136
King Philip the Gay. Reginald Turner 585
King's Letter to the Nation, The ... 612
Knight Checks Queen. Mrs. L. Lockhart Lang 482
Knight of Poland, A. M. E. Carr 99
Knox's Ceylon, with Autobiography 648

Lady Fanny. Mrs. George Norman 264
Lady Good-for-Nothing. "Q" ... 102
Lady of the Garter, A. Frank Hamel 230
L'Ame des Anglais. "Fœmina." ... 11
Land Problems and National Welfare. C. Turnor 386
Large Room, A. Mrs. Henry Dudeney 43
Lass with the Delicate Air, The. A. R. Goring-Thomas 296
Last Galley, The. A. Conan Doyle 584
Last Stuart Queen, The. H. M. Vaughan 387
Latent Force, The. Lt.-Col. E. C. Thwaytes 229
Latin-English and English-Latin Dictionary 518
Laws of Leffio, The. Author of "Miss Molly" 555
Lay Morals, and other Papers. R. L. Stevenson 579
Leaning Spire, The. G. A. B. Dewar 650
"Learn of Me What Woman Is" ... 481
Leech, The. Mrs. Harold E. Gorst 585
Legends of our Lord and the Holy Family. Mrs. Arthur Bell ... 262
Letters and Sketches from Northern Nigeria. M. S. Kisch 295
Letters from Finland. Rosalind Travers 610
Letters from Fleet-street 456
Life and Habit. Samuel Butler ... 70
Life of Field-Marshal Sir Frederick Paul Haines. R. S. Rait 450
Life of George Joachim Goschen. Hon. A. D. Elliott ... 542 and 575
Life of John Oliver Hobbes, The. Told in her Correspondence with numerous Friends 355
Life of Joseph Hart, The. Thomas Wright 136
Life of Sir William Howard Russell. John Black Atkins... 160
Life of Tolstoy: Later Years. Aylmer Maude 14
Life, Trial, and Death of Francisco Ferrer, The. W. Archer 645
Literary Lapses. Stephen Leacock 15
Literary Year-Book, The 74
Logic for the Million. Edited by T. Sharper Knowlson 35
London Clubs: their History and Treasures. Ralph Nevill... ... 385
Lonely Road, The. A. E. Jacomb 394
Lord Chancellors of Scotland, The S. Cowan 553
Lord Clive's Right-hand Man. Col. Lionel Forde... 229
Lord Dollar, The. Harper Curtis 457
Lost Endeavour. John Masefield 295
Love of Kusuma, The Bal Krishna 230
Love's Protest. Robert Calignoe 7
Mac's Adventures. Jane Barlow ... 457
Maîtres de l'Art, Les: Donatello. Prof. E. Bertaux 294
Maîtres de l'Art, Les: Le Bernin. M. Reymond... 325
Major's Niece, The. G. A. Birmingham... 683
Malta. Painted by Vittorio Boron, described by Frederick W. Ryan. 134
Manual of Library Bookbinding. H. T Coutts and G. A. Stephen 327
Manual of Occultism, A. "Sepharial" 70
Man with a Past, A. A. St. John Adcock 555
Markhor, The. Count Hans von Koenigsmarck 71
Marriage and Divorce. Cecil Chapman 446
Martin the Mummer. Dorothy M. Stuart... 73
Master of the Vineyard, The. Myrtle Reed 16
Matriculation Geometry 229
Matter and Memory. Henri Bergson 545
Maxims and Musings. Marchioness Townshend 742
Meaning of History, The. Dr. Max Nordau... 191
Medea and Circe, and other Poems. A. K. Sabin 544
Mediæval Church in Scotland, The. Rt. Rev. J. Dowden 359
Mediæval Mind, The. H. O. Taylor 708
Medley of Sport, A. J. M. M. B. Durham 581
Memorials of Old Durham. Edited by H. R. Leighton... 261
Memorials of Old Leicestershire. Edited by Alice Dryden 647
Memorials of Old Lincolnshire. Edited by E. Mansel Sympson ... 647
Memories of Eighty Years. John Beddoe 72
Men and Things of My Time. Marquis de Castellane 466
Milieu Médical, et la Question Médico-Sociale, Le. Dr. Grasset 36
Mirage: Poems. Douglas Ainslie 643
Mistress of Shenstone. F. L. Barclay 424
Modern Artillery in the Field. Col. H. A. Bethell 497
Modern Development of the Dry Fly. F. M. Halford 712
Modern Dictionary of the English Language, A... 74
Modern Geography. Dr. Marion Newbiggin 515
Mon Oncle Benjamin. Claude Tillier... 651
Montaigne Pamphlétaire. Dr. Armaingaud 420
Moonlight Sonata, The. M. A. B. Evans... 544
Mother of Goethe, The. Margaret Reeks 741
Mountain of God, The. E. S. Stevens 483
Mulberries of Daphne, The. Kate Horn 394
Muses Romaines et Florentines, Les. P. J. Jouve 612
Mysticism. Evelyn Underhill 352, 397

Naga Tribes of Manipur, The. T. C. Hodson 388
Naiad, and other Poems, The. A. D. H. Allan 544
Nelsons of Burnham Thorpe, The. M. Eyre Matcham 675
New Criticism, The. J. E. Spingarn 353
New Evidences in Psychical Research. J. A. Hill 288
New God and other Essays, The. Ralph Shirley 417
New Machiavelli, The. H. G. Wells 72
Newspaper Press Directory for 1911, The 395
New Spirit in Egypt, The. H. Hamilton Fyfe 358
Nights with an Old Lag. W. J. Wintle 588
Nina. Rosaline Masson 556
Ninon de Lenclos. Arnould Galopin 164
Nonsense Novels. Stephen Leacock 714
Norwegian and other Fish Tales. Bradnock Hall 326

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

Notes on Wiltshire Names. J. C. Longstaff 454
Nouveaux Récits des Temps Révolutionnaires. E. Daudet... 681
Œuvres en Prose de Richard Wagner, Tome VI. 648
Old Dance-Master, The. W. R. Paterson 457
Oldest Music-room in Europe, The. J. H. Mee 193
Oliver's Kind Women. Philip Gibbs 744
Olney Hymns. William Cowper 412, 445, 476
On Acute Intestinal Toxaemia in Infants. Ralph Vincent 482
One and All Gardening, 1911. Edited by Edward Owen Greening ... 197
Open Spaces. Irven 39
Oriental Cairo. Douglas Sladen ... 322
Origines Diplomatiques de la Guerre de 1870-71, Les 326
Origin of Life, The. H. C. Bastian 354
Origin of the Pentateuch, The. H. M. Wiener 423
Origins and Meanings of Popular Phrases and Names. Basil Hargrave 423
Our Village. Mary Russell Mitford 100
Out of the Dark. Countess of Cromartie 43
Overland to India. Sven Hedin ... 255
Oxford and Poetry in 1911. Professor T. H. Warren 749
Pages from the Book of Paris. Claude C. Washburn 14
Parliament. Sir C. P. Ilbert ... 515
Party System, The. Hilaire Belloc and Cecil Chesterton 193
Passers-By. A Partridge 424
Patrician, The. John Galsworthy 554
Paul and Paulinism. James Moffat 127
Paul et Virginie, suivi de la Chaumière Indienne. Bernardin de Saint-Pierre 651
Pèlerinage de Childe Harold. Gabriel Leprévost 188
People of Egypt, The. Painted by Lance Thackeray 101
Perpetua. D. C. Calthrop 423
Persia and Turkey in Revolt. D. Fraser... 418
Persian Revolution, The. E. G. Browne 418
Peter's Progress. Christopher Heath... 780
Phlox. Charles H. Curtis 229
Pictorial Key to the Tarot, The. A. E. Waite 262
Picture Printer of the Nineteenth Century, The. C. T. Lewis ... 253
"Pie Powder." A Circuit Tramp ... 391
Pitt and National Revival. Wm. J. Holland Rose 348
Plaint of the English Muse, The. J. P. Gannon 7
Plays of Thomas Love Peacock, The. Edited by A. B. Young ... 132
Pleasure Guide to Paris. 481
Poems. Emery Pottle 643
Poems and Sonnets. Percy C. Ainsworth 511
Poetical Works of Mrs. Horace Dobell... 7
Poetry of Empire. Edited by John and Jean Lang 132
Polar Exploration. Dr. W. S. Bruce 515
Police and Crime in India. Sir Edmund C. Cox 676
Portrait Book of our Kings and Queens, 1066-1911. Edited by T. Leman Hare 612
Priest's Marriage, The. Nora Vynne 586
Princess Flower Hat. Mabel Osgood Wright 16
Princess of New York, The. Cosmo Hamilton 455
Princess Virginia. C. N. and A. M. Williamson 520
Print Restoration and Picture Cleaning. Maurice James Gunn 743
Private Letters of the Marquess of Dalhousie. J. G. A. Baird ... 68
Progress Book, The. J. J. Pilley ... 779
Psaumes de Salomon, Les. J. Viteau 713
Public Schools Year-Book, 1911, The 395
"Punch" Coronation Number. ... 777
Pygmalion and the Statue. Robert Whitehouse 7
"Queen" Newspaper Book of Travel 518
Queen of Orplede, The. Charles W. Stork 7
Queen of the Fiord and other Poems, The. John Cave 39
Rachel, her Stage Life and her Real Life. Francis Gribble ... 458
Real France, The. Laurence Jerrold 324
Reaping the Whirlwind, and other Poems. G. F. Bradby 39
Reconstructed Marriage, A. A. E. Barr 484
Record of Sports 584
Rectory Governess, The. Fergus Hume... 394
Regimen Sanitatis. H. Cameron Gillies... 713
Religion of the Civilised World and Judaism. H. J. Kisch 455
Religions and Philosophies of the East. J. M. Kennedy 196
Religious Indifferentism. Ivan C. Boiatzis 422
Reminiscences. Goldwin Smith ... 64
Reminiscences and Letters of Joseph and Arnold Toynbee. Edited by Gertrude Toynbee 390
Reproof of Chance, The. E. W. Savi 104
Resurrection Narratives and Modern Criticism. T. J. Thorburn ... 167
Revelations of the Secret Service. Chronicled by William le Queux 715
Revolt at Roskelly's, The. William Caine 104
Rex et Imperator. J. H. E. While 777
River and I, The. J. G. Neihardt 131
Rogue's Heiress, The. Tom Gallon 16
Roman Britain. Edward Conybeare 293
Romance of a Great Singer, The. Mrs. Godfrey Pearse and Frank Hird 13
Romance of a Medici Warrior, The. Christopher Hare 65
Rosanne. Algernon Gissing ... 482
Ruskin: A Study in Personality. Arthur C. Benson 649
Russian Flashlights. Jaakoff Prelooker... 513
Russian Judas, A. Fred Whishaw... 263
Saito Musashi-Bo Benkei. James S. de Benneville 577
Sampson Rideout, Quaker. Una L. Silberrad 456
Sanctuaries and Sanctuary-Seekers of Mediæval England. J. Charles Cox 415
Search for Loveliness and other Verses, The. G. Rostrevor Hamilton 39
Secret Societies and the French Revolution. Una Birch 649
Sermons on the Coronation... ... 480
Shadow on the Purple, The A Peeress 264
Shâhnáma of Firdausi. Translated by A. G. Warner and E. Warner 133
Shakespeare. John Masefield ... 515
Shakespeare Biography 694
Shelburne Essays. Paul Elmer More 353
Ship of Coral, The. H. de Vere Stacpoole 682
Ships and Men. David Hannay ... 194
Short History of the Church of England, A. Rev. J. F. Kendall 100
Short History of War and Peace. G. H. Perris 515
Siberia. Samuel Turner 550
Siege of the Seven Suitors, The. Meredith Nicholson 17
Simpkins Plot, The. G. A. Birmingham 137
Sin and its Forgiveness. William de Witt Hyde 127
Siren Land. Norman Douglas ... 389
Sir William Butler's Autobiography 384
Sixtine Rome. J A. F. Orbaan ... 453
Snowshoes and Canoes. W. H. G. Kingston 199
Socialist Movement, The. Ramsay Macdonald 515
Some Neighbours. Charles Granville 479
Song of Songs. Hermann Sudermann 103
Songs of Old England, The. Selected by J. Wintle 583
Songs of the Road. A. Conan Doyle 511
Sonnets. Ferdinand Earle... ... 7
Soul of India, The. O. Schultzky 43
Souvenirs d'un Enfant de Paris. Les Années de Bohème Emile Bergerat 548
Souvenirs sur Guy de Maupassant. François 427
Spanish Journal of Elizabeth Lady Holland, The. Edited by the Earl of Ilchester 289
Speakers of the House of Commons, The. A. I. Dasent 460, 489
Stock Exchange, The. F. W. Hirst 515
Stormonth's Handy Dictionary ... 74
Storm van's Gravesande. Compiled from Despatches by C. A. Harris and J. A. J. de Villiers 361
Story of England, The. W. S. Robinson 293
Street of To-Day, The. John Masefield 391
Studies of a Biographer. Leslie Stephen 228
Study of the Development of Infantry Tactics, A. Colonel Beca 517
Tales o' Our Town Joseph Lee ... 7
Tales of the Uneasy. Violet Hunt 779
Tariff History of the United States, The. F. W. Taussig 258
Temple of Life, The. E. Newlandsmith 390
Theology for Parents. Eirene Wigram 327
Third Wife, The. Herbert Flowerdew 329
Thompson, Mrs. W. B. Maxwell ... 519
Three Plays by Brieux. English Versions 674
Through Persia in Disguise. Col. C. E. Stewart 260
Through the Alps to the Appenines. P. G. Konody 777
Through the Wildernesses of Brazil W. A. Cook 551
Tour and a Romance, A. Alice E. Robbins 391
Tragedy of St. Helena, The. Sir Walter Runciman 550
Trail of '98, The. R. W. Service ... 715
Transactions and Proceedings of the Japan Society, Vol. IX., Part 1 360
Trap, The. Dick Donovan... ... 584
Trevor Lordship. Mrs. Hubert Barclay 520
Triumphant Vulgarity. Charles J. Whitby 776
Triumph of Pan, The. Victor B. Neuburg 7
Twelve Types. G. K. Chesterton... 206
Two Russian Reformers. J. A. T. Lloyd 14
Tyranny of Speed, The. E. H. Hodgkinson 454
Uncanny Tales. F. Marion Crawford 779
Unfading Light, The. C. D. Swan 544
Unfolding of Personality as the Chief Aim in Education, The. Thiselton Mark 222
Unknown God, The. B. L. Putnam Weale 585
Unknown Lady, The. J. M. Forman 554
Vagabond in the Caucasus, A. Stephen Graham 71
Valley of Regret, The. Adelaide Holt 683
Vasco da Gama and his Successors: 1460-1580. K. G. Jayne 493
Vergil—The Georgics. Translation of Books I., II., III., and IV. ... 423
Verses. H. Belloc 39

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

Vision of Balmaine, The. G. B. Burgin 585
Vision of the King, The. Regina Miriam Bloch 777
Visitation Articles and Injunctions of the Period of the Reformation. Edited by W. H. Frere ... 448, 478
Vittoria Victrix. W. E. Norris ... 715
Voyage Romantique, Le. Ferdinand Bac 259
Waif of Destiny, A. L. G. Moberly 42
Weak Woman, A. W. H. Davies ... 362
Were-Wolf, The. W. B. Beattie ... 393
West in the East, The. Price Collier 710
When Woman Loves. Rathmell Wilson 363
White Peacock, The. D. H. Lawrence 328
William Harrison Ainsworth and his Friends. S. M. Ellis ... 63, 95
Wilson's. Desmond Coke 264
Woman and Labour. Olive Schreiner 351
Woman of the Revolution, A. Frank Hamel 682
Yellow and Dark-Skinned People of Africa South of the Zambesi. G. McCall Theal 226
Yesterday and To-day in Canada. Duke of Argyll 608
Young Gaol Birds. Charles E. B. Russell 15
Young Life. J. L. Herbertson ... 556
Young People, The. One of the Old People 41

THE THEATRE.

"All That Matters" at the Haymarket Theatre 199
"Arms and the Man" at the Criterion 663
"As You Like It" at His Majesty's 722
"Atalanta in Calydon" at the Lyceum 427
Autumn Season of 1910, The ... 18
"Baby Mine" at the Criterion ... 297
"Bardelys the Magnificent" at the Globe 267
"Beau Brocade" at the Globe ... 138
"Business" at the Aldwych ... 364
"Butterfly on the Wheel, The" at the Globe 521
"Cherry Orchard, The" at the Aldwych 684
"Crucible, The" at the Comedy ... 745
"Doll's House, A" at the Court ... 298
"Dombey and Son" at the Savoy 786
Edith Walker at the Palladium, Miss... 45
Ellen Terry at the Garrick, Miss ... 748
Ellen Terry at the Haymarket, Miss 685
"Fanny's First Play" at the Little Theatre 520
Follies at the Apollo, The 615
"Fool There Was, A" at the Queen's 425
"Ghosts" at the Ibsen Club ... 616
Granville Barker at the Palace Theatre, Mr. 268
"Hedda Gabler" at the Kingsway 683
Hippodrome, The 616
Irish Players at the Court Theatre, The... ... ... 723, 746, 785
"James and John" at the Haymarket 457
"Jarvis, Mr." at Wyndham's ... 236
"Julius Cæsar" at His Majesty's ... 661
"Just to Get Married" at the Little Theatre 81
"Kismet" at the Garrick 587
"Lady Patricia" at the Haymarket 395
"Lily, The" at the Kingsway ... 329
"Loaves and Fishes" at the Duke of York's 266
"Margaret Catchpole" at the Duke of York's 662
"Marriage of Kitty, The" at the Duke of York's 748
"Married Woman, The" at the Aldwych 747
"Master Builder, The" at the Little Theatre 426
"Master of Mrs. Chilvers, The" at the Royalty 557
"Merchant of Venice, The" at His Majesty's 721
"Midsummer Night's Dream, A"... 484
"Nan" at the Little Theatre ... 663
"Olaf Liliekrans" at the Rehearsal Theatre 787
"One of the Dukes" at the Playhouse 363
"Only Way, The" at the Lyceum ... 684
"Passers-By" at Wyndham's ... 485
"Peer Gynt" at the Rehearsal Theatre 558
Pioneer Players at the Kingsway ... 587
"Piper, The" at the St. James's ... 43
"Playing with Fire" at the Comedy 615
"Popinjay, The" at the New Theatre 330
"Preserving Mr. Panmure" at the Comedy 108
"Prisoner of Zenda, The" at the Lyceum 296
"Richard III." at His Majesty's ... 722
Royalty Theatre, The 722
"Saloon, The" at the Little Theatre 81
Stage of the Future, The 664
"Sumurun" at the Coliseum ... 172
"Taming of the Shrew, The" at His Majesty's 748
"Terrorist, The" at the Duke of York's 486
Three Plays at the Kingsway ... 616
Three Short Plays by the Stage Society 172
"Witch, The" at the Royal Court Theatre 200
"Witness for the Defence, The" at the St. James's 171

Printed and Published for the Proprietor by ODHAMS, LTD., 25, Floral Street, Covent Garden, and 93, 94, Long Acre, W.C.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE

No. 2018 [Registered as a Newspaper.] JANUARY 7, 1911 PRICE THREEPENCE

THE CARNEGIE LIBRARY, THE PENNSTATE COLLEGE, STATE COLLEGE, PA.

CONTINUOUS TESTIMONY.

The following are extracts from letters received, covering a period of two years, from an owner of a "Sheffield-Simplex" Car.—

COBHAM:

October, 1908.

"I am extremely pleased with the appearance of the car and the running of it. Everything connected with it seems to be most satisfactory. I congratulate myself on having decided to buy one of your cars."

August, 1909.

"I am sorry I cannot manage to meet you this week and discuss the merits of the 'Sheffield-Simplex' Cars with you, but I am glad to take this opportunity of letting you know that the car I had from you is going splendidly. The engine is running most smoothly and quietly; it is quite a treat to ride behind it. No change of speed is necessary for any of the hills in this part of the world, and evidently both the work and materials used in the car are of the best. I can, with the greatest confidence, say that I would not exchange my 'Sheffield-Simplex' for any of the different types of car I see on the road, and, living as I do on the main Portsmouth Road, I have plenty of opportunity of comparing them."

October 10, 1910.

"It may interest you to know that the 45 H.P. 'GEAR-BOX-LESS' Car fitted with a landaulette body which I bought of you has now run about 8,000 miles and has given me the greatest satisfaction. . . . I should like to say that I had the car in Devonshire and Cornwall this summer, and with only one or two exceptions it took every hill on top speed with six passengers and the heavy body, which speaks volumes for its hill-climbing capability; in fact, if one has to slow down for any reason going uphill it is marvellous how the engine picks up again without changing the gear. I also think the sliding pedal control on your cars is a most distinct improvement on the ordinary pedal; it is much less tiring, more easily worked and controlled, especially over rough roads, and I am convinced that any one having once tried it and experienced its advantages would never go back to the ordinary accelerator."

Catalogue post-free on application to Dept. "L."

SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX MOTOR WORKS, Ltd.

TINSLEY, SHEFFIELD, ENGLAND.

London Depôt: c/o MULLINERS, Ltd., 132-135, LONG ACRE, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE & BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC

OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO AND . . THROUGH CANADA. . .

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service vid Vancouver.

For further particulars, apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,

62-65, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON, E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street, Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE

TO

SOUTH and EAST AFRICA.

WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.

Viâ the SUEZ CANAL.

Calling at MARSEILLES and NAPLES.

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.

(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—

DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.

Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE PLEASURE CRUISES

LIVERPOOL

to the

MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC

by the

"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"

Saxonia Leaves Liverpool 9 Feb., 1911.
Carpathia " " 2 Mch., 1911.

Ports of Call . . .

CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS, MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA, ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME, PALERMO, NAPLES.

• • •

For full particulars apply—

THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

THE

"EMPIRE ILLUSTRATED."

The Tariff Reform Monthly.

40 pages.

Profusely Illustrated.

Interesting to every Unionist and Imperialist and convincing to Liberals and Little Englanders.

Price 3d.

P & O Passenger Services.

EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA, JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports

(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)

Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises

Throughout the Year, according to Season.

AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE, NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.

Programme on Application.

For Passage, Freight and all information apply—

PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,

122 Leadenhall Street, E.C., or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours

R.M.S.P. THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY.

(Royal Charter dated 1839.)

Fortnightly Sailings from Southampton to—

ARGENTINA & BRAZIL

via SPAIN, PORTUGAL & MADEIRA.

WEST INDIES, CENTRAL AMERICA, NEW YORK.

Via The Azores.

From LONDON to—

MOROCCO, CANARY ISLANDS & MADEIRA,

EGYPT, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA & JAPAN.

(By Shire Line.)

For further particulars apply to

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY

18, Moorgate Street, E.C., & 32, Cockspur Street, S.W.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

CONTENTS.

	Page
The Last Stand of the Houndsditch Murderers	3
A Ballade of Dreams ...	6
Literature and Burglars	6
Reviews :—
Current Verse and Poetry	7
Swift	9
The Philosopher's Way	10
As Others See Us	11
Indian Unrest	12
Shorter Reviews	13
Fiction	16
Reviews & Magazines	17
Reviews—Cont.
Some Recent French Reviews	18
The Theatre	18
Paul Gauguin	20
Frank Brangwyn and his Work	20
A Fatuous Egoist	21
New Year's Eve.....	22
Chance or Zero	24
New English Art Club...	24
In the Temple of Mammon	25
Correspondence.....	26
Books Received	26

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

THE ACADEMY is published by .MESSRS. ODHAMS, LIMITED, 67, Long Acre, London, W.C., to whom all letters with reference to publication must be addressed.

Applications referring to Advertisements may be addressed to MESSRS. ODHAMS, as above.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

THE ACADEMY is now obtainable at Messrs. W. H. Smith & Sons, Messrs. Wyman's, and Messrs. Willing's bookstalls and shops.

THE LAST STAND OF THE HOUNDSDITCH MURDERERS

By

ELLIS ASHMEAD-BARTLETT.

THE CALL OF THE POLICE.

AT 3 a.m. on Tuesday, January 3rd, Mrs. Fleishman, the tenant for eleven years of No. 100, Sidney Street, Stepney, was aroused from her slumbers by a gentle tapping on her window-pane. She said to her husband, who was also awake, "Oh, bother! there is the milkman; I haven't had anything like my proper sleep." Mr. Fleishman replied, "He has come too early; tell him to go away. Why do you ask him to call so early?" Mrs. Fleishman sat up in bed and said in a loud voice, "Go away; I don't want any milk this morning. I will call if I want any." Thereupon the voice outside the window answered, "I am not the milkman. We are the police. Come outside. We don't want to hurt you; we have come to save you." Mr. Fleishman replied, "I don't believe you are the police; I won't believe you until I see." Then the voice answered, "Well come to the door and we will show you; don't be afraid, we want to save you." Mr. Fleishman got up, put on his clothes, and opened the door. He found himself confronted by a man with a loaded revolver in one hand and a bludgeon in the other. By this time he was joined by his wife, and both were invited into the house next door, No. 102, where they found themselves in the presence of several police officers. The Inspector said to Mrs. Fleishman, "How many lodgers have you in your house?" She replied, "Three." "Who are they? and do you know them?" asked the chief. "Of course I know them; they are lodgers," she replied. "Well, tell me all about them." Mrs. Fleishman replied, "On the ground-floor back I have an old couple named Clements. On the first-floor there is a married couple called Sheriman and four children." "How long have you known this man Sheriman?" asked the Inspector. "Four years," she replied. "Have you a woman also living with you?" was the next question. "Yes," she answered, "Betsie Gershon, who has been with me eighteen months." "What is she like?" Mrs. Fleishman then proceeded to describe her lodger, who dwelt in a single room on the third-floor overlooking Sidney Street. The police seemed to know exactly what Betsie Gershon was like, even to the minutest details of her dress. "Now," the Inspector said to Mrs. Fleishman, "have you any other lodgers?" Mrs. Fleishman assured him that she had not. "Very well," said the Inspector. "Don't be afraid; we have come to save your lives. Now I want you, Mr. Fleishman, to go back into the house and bring down Betsie Gershon without creating any disturbance." "No," replied Mr. Fleishman, "I wont do it; I am afraid." "Very well," said the Inspector, "you must go, Mrs. Fleishman. Remember, we have come to save your lives; don't be afraid." Mrs. Fleishman, a woman of Jewish origin, of small and delicate build, but of indomitable courage, hesitated.

THE ARREST OF BETSIE GERSHON.

"I want you to go upstairs," said the Inspector, "and bring down Betsie Gershon." "But if I do that," Mrs. Fleishman replied, "I will wake the lodgers on the first-floor." "Never mind," said the Inspector. "Go upstairs and tell her your husband is ill, and you want her to go for a doctor." Mrs. Fleishman hastened into the house, went straight upstairs to the third-floor, and was about to knock on Betsie Gershon's door, when to her surprise she saw her coming out of the room opposite, which overlooks the back of the yard, and which was used by the Fleishmans as a stock and working room for their tailoring business. Mrs. Fleishman was surprised, and said, "I think it strange your being in this room; what are you doing?" Betsie Gershon, evidently taken by surprise, replied, "Oh, I went to put a penny in the slot." Mrs. Fleishman then said, "Why should you want gas at this hour in the morning?" Betsie hastened to answer, "Oh, I was feeling ill." "That is strange," answered Mrs. Fleishman, "because my husband is taken queer and I want you to go for the doctor. Do come down." Betsie Gershon consented, and came downstairs to within three steps of the door, when seeing it open, she said, "Oh, Mrs. Fleishman, the door is open; what does it mean?" "Never you mind that," the resourceful little Jewess replied; "I had to call in somebody from outside." Mrs. Gershon hesitated to proceed; but she was given no chance of retracing her steps. A police officer rushed in, seized her round the waist, and before she could utter a sound carried her into No. 102. Here the Inspector said to her, "Have you any men in your room upstairs?" "Yes," she answered, "two." "What are their names?" "One is called Yoski and the other I do not know." Mrs. Fleishman was then told by the Inspector to return home and bring out her children and the other lodgers.

She went to the back-room on the second-floor where her children slept and aroused her eldest daughter. "What is it, mummy?" the girl asked. "Sh! sh!" replied her mother. "Do not utter a sound; wake the others and bring them down into the street, when I will tell you all about it." The obedient child did as she was told. Mrs. Fleishman then went to the front room on the second-floor and awoke Mr. Sheriman and his wife. The former is a working ladies' tailor. Enjoining them to preserve absolute silence and to bring their children into the street, she once more hastened downstairs. Meanwhile Mr. Sheriman and a police officer roused the old couple, Mr. and Mrs. Clements, who slept in the back room on the ground-floor, and brought them out safely, and soon all were assembled in No. 102, next door.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Mrs. Fleishman heard no more of what passed between the police and Betsie Gershon, for she was immediately taken off to the station, while she and the other tenants of No. 100 were kept under guard in the adjoining house, where they remained throughout all the tragic events of the day.

A Lost Opportunity.

Up to this time the plans of the police had succeeded admirably. By 4.30 a.m. all the inmates of the house had been safely removed except the wanted men, Fritz and Peter the Painter, who had not been roused from their slumbers in the front room on the third-floor. But from this point it is a little difficult to understand or to explain the attitude of the police. Every avenue of escape was blocked. Hundreds of constables formed cordons across every street leading to the house, and detectives were hidden in the back yard of Mann and Crossman's Brewery, from which point they commanded the back of the house; others faced the front windows from the other side of the street; others were hidden in No. 102, the adjoining premises, and in Dr. Kristin's surgery at the corner of the street. There was nothing to prevent them from creeping upstairs and occupying the Fleishmans' stock-room, which was immediately opposite the room belonging to Betsie Gershon, occupied by the doomed men, or from remaining on the landing outside the door. But, doubtless having in mind the massacre at Houndsditch, they preferred to take no risks, and made no effort to occupy any portion of the house itself. This state of suspense lasted until 7.30 a.m., when Detective-Inspector Collison and Sergeants Boreham and Leeson crept out of the yard at the back of the house and flung bricks into the windows on the second-floor to arouse the sleeping miscreants. But Fritz and Peter the Painter were already on the qui vive, and, naturally resenting the intrusion of brickbats at this early hour of the morning, replied with four shots. One of these pierced the chest of Sergeant Leeson, who was lifted by his comrades into a place of safety under a heavy fire which fortunately did no further harm.

The Siege.

This was the commencement of the battle, for the detectives hidden about the yard and in the house opposite immediately returned the fire. From this point until one or two o'clock a desultory action continued. The fire was kept up continuously by the police on the front and back windows of the second-floor, between which the desperadoes divided their attention. Whenever one of them appeared at the window and discharged his pistol a volley was poured in from a dozen different vantage-points, but no harm seemed to be done, for the shots from the upper windows still continued to come at irregular intervals. Meanwhile, the police, feeling they could not cope with the situation single-handed, sent to the Tower for the assistance of the Scots Guards, who were on duty there. At 10 a.m. a half company arrived, and were posted in commanding positions, from which, throughout the remainder of the morning, they kept up a telling fire, which had the effect of keeping the aliens under cover and prevented them from taking aim. Just before one o'clock there was a rumour that the two men were preparing to make a dash from the house, but this proved to be groundless. Shortly after one o'clock it was seen for the first time that the house was on fire, but the firing from the upper windows still continued. But the end was near. At 1.50 the flames had made great progress, and masses of smoke were arising from the house.

About 1.30 the final shots resounded from the interior of No. 100. Whether they were aimed at the besiegers, or whether they were directed by the assassins against themselves must remain one of the unsolved mysteries of this drama. Then the flames gained full sway; columns of white smoke, wafted by no breeze, rose straight in the air. The sight delighted the vast crowds behind the police-barriers, who up to this time had been able to see nothing, and had contented themselves with listening to the rifle and revolver shots. Every minute it became more evident that, even if the miscreants remained alive in some unburned corner of the house, their power for evil was at an end. The Fire Brigade was ordered forward. Down Sidney Street went the engine and took up its place in front of the doomed house. A mass of constables, detectives in plain clothes, and a distinguished group of spectators, who for hours had been waiting for the signal to advance, surged round the engine, hopelessly intermixed, like the soldiers of many regiments in the last desperate assault on the enemy's position. Half a company of the Scots Guards, who alone preserved a semblance of order, were placed with their backs to the bullet-bespattered wall opposite, and with loaded rifles stood ready to cover the firemen as they placed their long ladder against the ruined house. Although the smoke and flames were pouring from every window, there were not a few present who, staggered by the splendid fight made by the doomed men inside, expected to hear for the last time the crack of a Colt ring out and to see the most forward of the firemen topple lifeless from the ladder.

The End.

But the spark of life no longer throbbed within those alien breasts. The flames licked upwards, devouring the woodwork, causing the three stories to topple into one charnel-house, and forming a fitting funeral pyre to the brave who were no more. Many of us forgot the sins of the assassins in our admiration for their last stand. Since seven in the morning they had withstood the besiegers, never yielding a foot, never asking for mercy, never attempting to capitulate. They had been subjected to the fire of the magazine rifles at point-blank range from the skilled marksmen of one of the finest regiments in the world; they had been exposed to the heavy bullets of hundreds of police revolvers aimed at short range by skilled detectives; they had endured the deadly discharge of double-barrelled shot-guns at a range at which the merest tyro could not have failed to tail a low pheasant; they had seen every avenue of escape gradually closed against them; they had watched great cordons of police drawn across every thoroughfare, so that, even had they succeeded in clearing the house, they could never have run the gauntlet of the solid phalanx of constables drawn up four deep. Beyond the lines of police throughout the morning they could see and hear the vast crowds drawn from the purlieus of the East-end howling for their blood. Had they escaped the police, a thousand grimy hands would have torn them to shreds. Then, at the close of the drama, almost the last sound which reached the ears of the doomed men was the roll of the wheels, the clatter of the horses' feet, and the loud cheers which greeted the arrival of the Horse Artillery. No! there was no alternative but death for Fritz and Peter the Painter. That feeble white hand showing through the window at 1.50 was the last dying effort of these desperate men. No sign of life escaped them after that; nothing more was seen of them until their charred remains were found amidst the ruins.

The Firemen.

Quickly the firemen had two hose playing on the burning building, the interior of which was completely gutted; but, thanks to their skilled and opportune intervention, the thick brick walls remained standing, and the flames were prevented from spreading to the adjoining premises, which were full of sightseers, detectives, pressmen, and refugees. As soon as the flames had been partially controlled the firemen, with extraordinary daring, entered the building, although every moment pieces of wood, plaster, and furniture were crashing from the upper stories. For some minutes they were driven back by the flames, which suddenly burst forth afresh in the back room on the ground-floor, for here the gas was escaping from a severed jet. Even now we remained in complete ignorance as to the fate of the besieged. Some still believed that they had managed to escape, but the foremost fireman reported that he could smell burning flesh. The firemen then set to work clearing out the lower rooms of smouldering window-frames and charred household goods. A Singer's sewing-machine first came hurtling through the door, its day's work done; no longer will it stitch alien clothes; it was followed by odds and ends—pieces of smouldering blankets and quilts, cracked crockery, and masses of ashes which were shovelled out of the front door until the passage leading to the back room had been sufficiently cleared to allow the firemen to enter. I followed them in, passing under a shower of cinders and blackened water, and looked into the back parlour, which was still bazing fiercely. One glance was sufficient. The remains of one of the miscreants lay near the window, burnt almost beyond recognition and half-covered with débris. His smouldering arm was stuck upwards, pointing towards the ceiling. I hastened back outside, having seen enough. But before he could be removed a tragic incident cast a gloom over the victory of the forces of law and order. Something fell from the top floor on to the firemen—either a portion of the ceiling or a piece of the mantelshelf. Three men were gently carried outside by their comrades in a state of collapse, one with his heavy bronze helmet battered almost beyond recognition. They received first aid, and were then borne away to the London Hospital on a Fire Brigade wagon, amidst the sympathetic murmurs of the vast crowds. This made the firemen more cautious. A cordon of police was drawn round the building, and no one else was allowed to enter.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The Humour of it.

Now that it was all over and the dread assassins were no more, a change came over the atmosphere and the serious air which most of the onlookers wore an hour previously gave way to a wholesome realisation of the comic side of the scene. Many, glancing round at the hundreds of soldiers, police, and detectives, all fully armed—at the Horse Artillery and maxim guns, the fire brigades and salvage corps—began to ask themselves: "Are not these forces a little out of proportion when compared with those at the disposal of the besieged? Has not a great deal of unnecessary fuss been made over a work which could just as well have been undertaken by fifty armed men who were skilled shots? Do not such numbers of police and soldiers look a little absurd? Do not the Horse Artillery seem a little incongruous with their well-filled caissons of shrapnel in the heart of the Metropolis?" There were many who felt a trifle humiliated, but who said nothing; there were others who gave way to uncontrollable mirth as the one-sidedness of the desperate battle, which had lasted the best part of eight hours, dawned upon them. The story of brave Horatius defending the bridge and another vision of the heroic defenders of Thermopylæ came into my head. Fritz and Peter the Painter will not go down to history as heroes because they lost their lives in breaking the laws of a civilised community; but when their action is judged impartially as a purely military achievement they will stand just as high in the eyes of posterity—if not higher—than brave Horatius and the three hundred of Thermopylæ. After all, brave Horatius stood in a narrow passage and kept back men only armed with swords or spears, and the same with Leonidas and his brave men. But Fritz and Peter the Painter stood up against modern rifles, shot guns, revolvers, maxims, not to mention the dreadful reserve of three Horse Artillery guns, each capable of firing a shell weighing fifteen pounds, charged with three hundred bullets at the rate of fifteen a minute. We should like to know who was the humorist who ordered the guns. We expect that he must be the same gentleman who sent the historic cable from South Africa:—"No cavalry required; only infantry needed." Infantry could be far more usefully employed in South Africa than field guns in the narrow purlieus of the East End, swarming with sight-seers, and absolutely devoid of any position from which a gun could be fired. We thank Providence for small mercies. Had those field guns been fired, every shell would have settled the last account of many peaceful citizens, for, missing No. 100, Sidney Street, they would have burst somewhere in the West End. Now we learn that a company of Engineers were ordered up from Chatham to undermine the house, but they failed to arrive in time. We should not be surprised to hear that the Army airship from Aldershot was under orders to sail across Sidney Street and drop explosives down the chimney.

We English are a strange race. We have the most perfect machine for the preservation of law and order among criminals of our own dull, uninspired intellectual calibre; but if ever it has to meet situations created by the imaginative alien it goes hopelessly to pieces, and we make ourselves ridiculous before a wondering world. But here is a simple mathematical problem for some fourth-form boy to solve. If it takes twelve hundred men and three field guns to dislodge a couple of Russian Jews, how many men would be required to dislodge a German Army Corps? I never believed that an invasion was practicable until yesterday morning. Now I tremble all over at the thought of it.

The Spoils of Victory.

When all was over, hundreds of sightseers swarmed over the battlefield to collect the spoils. Souvenir-hunters were busy after alien bullets, which quickly rose in price from sixpence to a shilling, and a little later 5s. could not purchase one. The dead and wounded had to be numbered, and, according to the most reliable accounts, eleven persons, including the two dead assassins, have been hit or injured by bullets or the falling débris. But whether they fell by the bullets of friend or foe it is impossible to say. A detective begrimed with powder and soot, who had exhausted over a hundred cartridges, said to me, "It wasn't the fire of the aliens we minded, but the ricochetting bullets of the Scots Guards!" A little later a brawny Guardsman complained to me that "It was not the bullets of the aliens which frightened us, but the infernally bad shooting of those detectives!"

At the finish there was a kind of triumphal march-past down Sidney Street. The Scots Guards, at a sharp word of command, fell in and marched off amidst loud cheers. The Horse Artillery then rolled by amidst cheers, the men a little crestfallen and scowling angrily from the virgin muzzles of their undischarged guns at the smouldering ruins, at the destruction of which they had not assisted. Then the fire-engines moved off, receiving a tremendous ovation, and the police were sorted out into their respective divisions. But the crowd in no way diminished, and had frequently to be pushed back by the police, harmless battles waging at every corner between the constables and the alien onlookers. The pressmen and distinguished strangers then passed to the back of No. 100 through No. 102, where we found, loudly lamenting their fate, Mr. Fleishman and his wife Mrs. Rebecca Fleishman, the owners of the destroyed building. They had left at 3 a.m. by the command of the police. Mrs.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Fleishman had an interesting tale to tell, but she was almost hysterical and most incoherent. Strange indeed are the methods of the police. I said to her, "If you will come with me I will take you home, find you clothes, give you a meal, put you up for the night, and when you have sufficiently recovered you can tell me your whole story." I led her out of the building from under the eyes of countless detectives, through lines of police and vast crowds without a single soul questioning my right to do so. I was followed by an excited crowd who, seeing me lead the woman by the hand, thought that she was one of the desperadoes and that I was a detective taking her to the station. In Commercial Road I found a taxi-cab and conveyed her West. This woman must be the chief witness in any legal proceedings which may follow, as the aliens were in her house. I could have taken her out of England without the slightest difficulty. Surely there is something wrong with a system which allows this laxity!

The Final Scene.

One last scene remains to be recalled. Two coffins were brought to the back of the ruined house, and in one of them the remains of one of the assassins were placed and carried to the mortuary. The body of the other was found later, and lying by its side were two revolvers.

Farewell Fritz and Peter the Painter! You were rare blackguards, but you died game, and that atones for a lot. It was a pity that you did not turn your talents to a better use. But we thank you all the same. London has not had such an exciting time for years. We owe you a debt of gratitude for providing this stirring episode in our humdrum lives. Your prowess will long remain green in the memory of all who witnessed your last stand.

A BALLADE OF DREAMS

Mournfully echoing, loud and low,
  The midnight tolling shakes the air;
Over the city the great stars glow
  Dimly, lost in the clouded glare;
  Stepping down from his golden stair
Comes the stranger, at Time's behest,
  And we, desirous, speak him fair—
"This is the Year we love the best."

Never a man has lived to know
  A heart quite hopeless; here and there
The high gods, pitiful, ease his woe,
  Make him ready to do and dare.
  Comes the pealing of bells that bear
Greeting brave to the untried guest,
  And all the world puts off its care—
"This is the Year we love the best."

Pale dreams drifting to and fro—
  A girl's last kiss, a woman's hair,
Hours of passion, a beaten foe,
  Promises broken and fierce despair;
  A mystery none could solve or share
Of love that waited, unconfessed—
  For these, did we of old declare
"This is the Year we love the best"?

  Princess, honoured and loved as ne'er
Maid was cherished in knightly quest,
  Whisper we our secret rare—
"This is the Year we love the best!"

W. L. R.

LITERATURE AND BURGLARS

In a less impatient age we should like to have reverted to an old and pleasant manner, and named this article "Some Winter Thoughts on Burglars: being a Lament for their Little Culture and an Inquiry into the Origin of Picturesque Illusions." But the day has gone when an author would reveal his soul on his title-page, adorned with a border of grapes and sprawling Cupids. Authors to-day have forgotten the little arts by means of which eighteenth-century writers made their books as intimate as conversations. Printers are no longer lavish with their capitals, and the modern journalist does not plunge into italics every time he becomes excited. Our great-grandfathers had a wonderful gift for this sort of thing, and they were sometimes most human where a modern writer would feel bound to be most matter-of-fact. Johnson contrived to give his very admirable prejudices expression in his Dictionary, and even a list of errata might be made to convey something of a man's mind to his reader's. Dreaming at a bookstall the other day, we found a little volume on the prevention of smoky chimneys, in which the list of errors bore this charming apology. "Sith Venus hath her mole and the Moon her spots, think it not strange if this little book hath its blunders." We felt as if we had shaken hands with the author.

This by way of digression, for which also there is good eighteenth-century precedent; yet our complaint against burglars can be stated quite simply. We would not be so unjust as to blame them for not fulfilling the wakeful nightmares of children. Nothing can do that, and the most conscientious burglar would weary at last of carrying a blood-stained knife between his teeth and twisting his features to a scowl of unassuageable hatred of the human race. Our grievance lies deeper. As an intellectual conception a burglar is a rather fine thing. The spectacle of the individual leading his gallant little forces to battle against the tremendous laws of his race is one that even in defeating him it becomes us to admire. But in practice they are only sordid pilferers with a soul that does not rise above teaspoons stamped with the hallmark of convention. One of those planetary visitors or Chinese philosophers of whom our ancestors were so fond would not fail to infer this from an examination of the London shops. Books, charged with the wisdom that is beyond price, stand openly on the pavement for any man to touch with his hand, but the diamonds in the windows of the jewellers' shops are guarded by little steel grilles In a world where the thieves were men of culture this would have to be reversed. The jeweller would heap his stupid wares in barrels on the pavement, and we should peer at books through iron bars, under the watchful eyes of plain-clothes detectives. In such a world the police reports would really be as interesting as the newspapers appear to think they are. Perhaps when our habitual drunkards can quote their Omar, and our professional unemployables loll starwards with Tennyson's "Lotus-eaters" on their lips, English burglars will turn their attention to libraries and convince the common mind that since books are worth stealing they must also be worth possessing.

Outside fiction the ranks of cultured cracksmen are very thinly filled. For some reason or other, men of letters have generally preferred forgery. Possibly a milder term should be found for the venial exploits of Chatterton and Macpherson, but Wainwright, to whom both Swinburne and Wilde have devoted papers, and Johnson's Dr. Dodd, the unfortunate author of the "Beauties of Shakespeare," naturally occur to the mind in this connection. Villon was rather a cut-purse than a burglar, and the evidence as to Deacon Brodie's culture is not very clear, though in Stevenson's play he is educated, if not scholarly. We do not know that he ever stole any books.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

In novels the educated burglar has become rather a nuisance, and the descendants of Raffles are as wearisome as the offspring of Sherlock Holmes. We believe that Arsène Lupin had a library of stolen books, but they were selected rather for their rarity than for the merit of their contents. This is the test that we should apply to scholar-burglars. They should select their booty for its intrinsic and not for its monetary value, and they should form their libraries with far greater care than those who pursue the ordinary cheque-book method. We have not heard of a burglar of this character, but it is possible that he exists. It is even possible that he is a regular reader of this paper, and, to be consistent, is at pains to steal his copy of THE ACADEMY every week. If this be so, we admire his discrimination, and at the same time envy him his nocturnal adventures. We sometimes feel that nowadays books are too numerous and too cheap for those who obtain them so easily to appreciate their true worth. But with what pleasure must our scholar-burglar regard his library, where every volume recalls a glorious adventure! How often he has crept by night into the libraries of other men and turned his dark lantern from shelf to shelf while making his cultured and leisurely choice! Looking at other people's books is always a pleasant way of passing time, and sometimes, one fancies, dawn must have discovered him still hesitating between the merits of two rival editions, or held spellbound by the charm of some plump old quarto into which he has dipped too far. Being one of your true scholars who love to leave their books to posterity in proper trim, he handles books tenderly, and would scorn to use his jemmy as a paper-knife after the manner of library subscribers. Nor does he rob proud old books of their plates in order to extra-illustrate volumes of no merit, and thus preserve his memory for the profanities of book-lovers yet unborn.

Probably the nearest thing to this ideal burglar of ours is the hero of Mr. Barrie's "What Every Woman Knows," who broke into a house, if our memory serves us, in order to study, but drew the line at stealing books. But the whole spirit of the devout book-lover lies in his possession of his treasures. He likes to have them about him, and to hear them and smell them at all hours of the day and night. It was for this reason that a distinguished book-collector of our acquaintance used to keep under his bed the three editions of Keats's poems that appeared during the poet's lifetime. When he could not sleep he would lean out of bed in the dark and stroke them, and be subtly comforted. It would have fared ill with the burglar who should have sought to annex these treasures; but ordinary book-lovers have no need for expensive first editions.

It is certain that the romantic burglar is almost entirely a myth, though the exploit of Colonel Thomas Blood, who nearly succeeded in getting away with the Crown jewels, and received a pension of five hundred a year from Charles II. for his pains, is romantic enough for anybody, and provided a fitting climax for a life of which a brief account is to be found in the notes to "Peveril of the Peak." As we have already implied, the life of a man who endeavours to obtain wealth dishonestly is no more romantic than that of a merchant who acquires it honestly. But it is difficult not to admire a man who makes, as Blood remarked complacently, a gallant attempt for a crown. Just as the highwayman and the pirate dwindle to insignificant and rather pitiful figures when closely examined, so, too, the average burglar is no more than the meanest and clumsiest of rogues when we put aside the splendid conceptions of imaginative writers. It is suggestive that in England we measure the relative guilt of housebreakers by the number of convictions that have been recorded against them, so that we must believe that our most dangerous criminals have spent practically all their lives in prison. The novelists will have it that the most dangerous criminals are those who habitually escape detection, a reasonable though apparently inaccurate thesis, unless it be admitted that in practice the cleverest burglars have a very short run for their money. And that is probably the truth of the matter, and, taking the personnel of our criminal classes into account, we are not sorry they fare so poorly. That a man should risk his liberty because he could live no longer without the lyrics of Herrick or the diary of Mr. Pepys would be an admirable thing; but we have no sympathy with the person who blunders into prison in a clumsy effort to steal silver teaspoons and plated vegetable-dishes.

REVIEWS

CURRENT VERSE AND POETRY

Sonnets. By FERDINAND EARLE. (Elkin Mathews. 3s. 6d. and 5s. net.)

The Poetical Works of Mrs. Horace Dobell. With a Biographical Sketch. Illustrated. (Smith, Elder and Co. 10s. 6d. net.)

The Triumph of Pan. By VICTOR B. NEUBURG. ("The Equinox" Office. 5s. net.)

The Plaint of the English Muse. By JOHN PATRICK GANNON. (Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner and Co., Ltd. 2s. 6d. net.)

At Various Times. By the Author of "The Professor and Other Poems." (Kegan Paul. 3s. 6d. net.)

Tales o' Our Town. By JOSEPH LEE. (George Montgomery, Dundee. 2s. net.)

Pygmalion and the Statue. By ROBERT WHITEHOUSE. (Simpkin, Marshall, Hamilton, Kent and Co., Ltd. 1s. net.)

The Queen of Orplede. By CHARLES W. STORK. (Elkin Mathews. 2s. 6d. net.)

If Thou wert Blind. By CONSTANCE SUTCLIFFE. (Simpkin, Marshall. 6d. net.)

In the Net of Night. By W. W. MARSH. (Elkin Mathews. 1s. net.)

Love's Protest. By ROBERT CALIGNOC. (G. Bell and Sons, Ltd. 1s. net.)

IT is a daring thing to attempt any innovation of rhyming when writing a sonnet, but the "Foreword" of Mr. Earle's volume shows that he knows his business as a poet, and we therefore approached his work with anticipations of something worth reading. Having read and enjoyed the poems, we can only say that the author might just as well have employed the accepted form. His favourite variation of the rhyme-scheme runs thus: abbb, aaab, cddccd; and the effect is not particularly pleasing. Nor is it particularly offensive; it simply seems to tease the reader occasionally as with a sense of incompleteness, that is all. The sonnets are of varying quality; one of the series on "Modern Venice" is entirely spoiled by eight consecutive rhymes on a single sound, and on page 61 the word "flight" is made to rhyme with itself—a flaw in an otherwise good poem.

No human reviewer could possibly read through the 810 crowded pages of small print which enshrine the verses of Mrs. Horace Dobell; but from the impression we obtain by inspection here and there we are bound to say that they are of a very mediocre type. Naturally, so prolific a writer—and for many years she seemed to scribble a rhyme on the slightest impulse—could not produce much poetry; some of the stanzas are pretty, others are humorous in a homely way; many are reminiscent of Mrs. Hemans. They constitute a volume, however, which in the hands of a not too critical reader might well serve to pass a quiet hour or two pleasantly.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

When, dipping into Mr. Neuberg's "Triumph of Pan," we glimpsed the word "phallic," and caught him asking a lady for "purple kisses," we began to be suspicious of him. He is far too fond of verse that is odorous of eroticism, of words such as "obscene," "slime," and of maltreated adjectives. His quotation from Eliphas Levi, by way of preface, betrays him as somewhat of a devotee of astrology and the mysteries, and we cannot say that his verses impress us at all favourably. "We will crush the dream," he sings in the opening composition, "And wallow sweating in the mountain stream:"—

> And storm the mountains; we are sick of dreaming
> Of a dim past unknown;
> Oh! for the sight once more of red blood streaming,
> Of rotting warrior-bone,
> Of eagles hovering far
> Around the field of war,
> Of lust and love and longing breaking through
> The chill grey garb of life to flame anew.

Altogether, Mr. Neuburg is hardly the sort of person we should care to meet on a dark night with a knobby stick in his hand; he is rather too explosive for our comfort. Here is another stanza from "An Origin":—

> They stanched the gaping wound with turf,
> With water slaked the burning maw;
> Rolling within the boiling surf,
> They caught the brine in eye and jaw.
> They roared and rushed with tangled mane
> To rape and ruin in the rain.

We can only trust it cooled them down a bit. A certain weird cleverness runs through all the verses in this volume; but we may remind the author that of the moderns Swinburne treated love in its more earthly aspect once and for all, and that only the greatest poets can venture to pursue that theme without offence. Two or three charming lyrics, especially one entitled "Sleep in the Hills," prove that Mr. Neuburg can do really good work when he cares to forsake the hysterical mood which spoils four-fifths of this clever book. It is a pleasant contrast to turn to Mr. Gannon's very pretty little conceit, "The Plaint of the English Muse," in which he warns us of the dangers of the commercial spirit. In answer to his voice, the Muse appears to him:—

> Thus had I said, when one before me stood
> Clad in green kirtle pranked with meadow flowers,
> Wearing a wreath of berries of the wood
> And fruits that ripen in forgotten bowers;
> Her hair, loose-hanging, framed in golden hood
> A face that glistened after summer showers,
> And from her eyes, blue as a summer sea,
> Flew shafts of light that filled the air with glee.

In about fifty stanzas of the same measure as this the dialogue is carried on, and occasionally we find an exceptionally beautiful line. "The lonely mistress of the green lagoons" is an example. There is nothing to praise extravagantly, but the "Plaint" was worth writing and worth publishing—which is more than can be said for many of the "poems" in the collection entitled "At Various Times." There is some really shocking scansion in this book, and yet the author does not hesitate to attempt the sonnet form—needless to say, with depressing results. Here are two lines from a "sonnet" on page 98, "To a Poet":—

> Ah, strenuous poet, thou flooded us with song,
> And yet you seem from us so far apart.

Most of the stanzas are mere rhyming, and on the second page occurs what is really the most unpoetic conception we have seen for a lustrum or two:—

> One silver star in heaven appears
> And drills a hole through evening's shade;
> One word, to my long waiting ears,
> Had to my night the difference made.

This is unfortunate, to put it mildly; and so is the following:—

> The tide, like door upon its hinge,
> Bulging in every creek and cove.

We give one of very many faults of scansion, and may add that this verse is a fair illustration of the quality of the work throughout the book:—

> A strong wind blew the shadows o'er the fields,
> And now and then let lucid sunshine through;
> The earth's heart to the coming warmth yields,
> And the sap rises, fountains hid from view.
> It is a hoyden spring day, bickering wind,
> But leagues of sunshine, which is warm and kind.

One or two moderately good lyrics stand out pleasantly from this slipshod style of writing, and some verses entitled "Biography" are rather neatly epigrammatic. For one other thing we thank the author—the capital suggestion that wishes are "prayers without their dresses."

It is perhaps presumptuous for a mere Southerner to pronounce a very definite opinion upon a Scotchman's verse, especially when written in dialect; but, if Mr. Joseph Lee will pardon our temerity, we like his rhymed "Tales o' Our Town" exceedingly. He has a deft manner of versifying old stories of Dundee and its inhabitants, and when he embarks on the frailer craft of an original lyric it bears him quite safely into the haven of poetry; "Largo Bay," for instance, is just in the right spirit. The humorous verses to the Fifie, a ship "that plies 'twixt Newport and Dundee," are excellent:—

> 'Twad tax a landsman to discern
> Whare lies her stem an' whare her stern,
> A thing whilk I could never learn
> Tho' sair I've tried—
> It's said that she can tak' a turn
> Wi' her broadside.

There are also several racy ballads, and altogether the verses keep to a high level, although their burden will naturally make more appeal in the Land o' Cakes than in London town.

Mr. Robert Whitehouse, in a sequence of nearly a hundred seven-line stanzas, retells the story of Pygmalion and Galatea very attractively—only we wish he had not made "Galatea" rhyme with "ear." Also he betrays inexperience by his use of "did." In three consecutive verses we find—"And his heart sank, which did so madly dance;" "And he did breathe;" "he did quake;" "oft did see;" and on the same page "I did think." Apart from these flaws, the little book is well written; the description of the awakening of the marble to life and love is accomplished without any sense of incongruity, and abounds in felicitous phrasing. "The Queen of Orplede," by Mr. C. W. Stork, is a dainty fantasy of a poet's ideal country of dreams which demands high praise for its purity. We imagine it would be quite a success as a miniature play set to music, for, although there are but two characters, the Queen and the Poet, their intercourse is full of melody and lyrical interludes. The other poems in this booklet are of a scholarly order, some of them showing the care of composition perhaps a little too plainly. Would that all who try their hands at verse suffered from so slight an imperfection!

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

Many of the poems by "Constance Sutcliffe" have been set to music, and most of them seem to have been penned with that idea before her mind; they are rather pretty, and prettiness seems to be an imperative condition for songs nowadays. Some of them are full of what is known, we believe, as "feeling," and the metres chosen are easy; the author wisely attempts no great flights in the way of ideas, and therefore succeeds in pleasing the ear.

Mr. Marsh is too modest. At the end of his little book he writes:—

> To many men of every land,
> Book sellers, buyers, readers, cranks,
> I bow, and come to join the ranks
> Of that innumerable band
> Whose books are sold at second hand—
> ("Good, sir, your 5d. change, with thanks.")

Despite this self-depreciation, the author has some good work to show: several fascinating roundels, several sonnets of worth, and a selection of various lyrics, none to be condemned. The best thing in the book is a half-humorous, half-tragic poem, "Beata," of which we give the opening:—

> I loved you for nothing at all,
> For hair like a slow-setting sun
> At the swan-song of day in a gorse-bordered way;
> I loved you, Beata, for fun.
> I loved you in reason's despite
> For pitiless flouting of clowns,
> For the warmth of your face like a star-kiss of grace
> And a passable fancy in gowns.

With "Love's Protest" we conclude our glance at current verse for the present; but though we have left this white-and-gold volume to the last, it is by no means the least. The conversation between "Ismené" and "Tremayne" which it records is modelled into eighty beautiful stanzas of admirable art, and if the theme is rather deep—Tremayne is worried as to the meaning of life, and Ismené reasons gently with him—it is exceedingly well treated. Of the many extracts which we should like to give we must content ourselves with one, the twenty-fifth stanza, to serve as an illustration of form and quality:—

> But while he doubted thus, behold it chanced
> That downward on the earth he cast his eye,
> And soon espied a little shoe that glanced
> With buckle bright, in the sun's brilliancy,
> Whose loveliness Love's self had scarce enhanced—
> Ismené's shoe, a shape of modesty;
> Clean, at the sight, all doubt and darkness fled,
> And Hope about his brows her rosy fingers spread.

The whole poem is replete with thought, and the author has relieved it by some delicate lyrics which stamp him as a poet whose future work must receive the consideration due to a careful and capable artist in words.

SWIFT

The Correspondence of Jonathan Swift, D.D. Edited by F. Elrington Ball. With an Introduction by the Very Rev. J. H. Bernard, D.D., Dean of St. Patrick's. Vol. I. (G. Bell and Sons, Ltd. 10s. 6d. net.)

To all students of English literature any words from responsible sources concerning Dean Swift must be valuable and of great interest, partly because there is always a vague hope that fresh light may be thrown on that curious, contradictory character of his. To the world he presented the spectacle of a cynical, imperious, sometimes embittered mind, and this aspect of the Dean is too often emphasised at the expense of a leaven of human kindness which was carefully concealed, or only revealed, we might say, under protest. How rarely, for instance, do we hear of his gentle words regarding his mother! "If the way to Heaven be through piety, truth, justice, charity," he wrote, "she is there." To her he seems to have been an admirable son, and however resentful we may feel at his exceeding carelessness of the feelings of others—even of his closest friends—our animosity cannot but be qualified by this memorable fact—memorable, not because men are rarely good to their mothers, but because of the peculiar and puzzling nature of this particular man. The gloomy story of his later years, again, is relieved by what we know of his charity to the poor of Dublin: in spite of his avarice he would give £5 "more easily than some richer men would bestow 5s." With the first £500 he possessed he formed a fund for granting loans to industrious tradesmen, to be repaid gradually by instalments, and it was said that by this scheme he had been the means of putting more than two hundred families inside the borderland of comfort. At one and the same time parsimonious and generous; careful in conversation, yet in his writings introducing freely the most offensive detail with a kind of insane sincerity; frank to a fault, yet philandering with "Vanessa" while "Stella" was in chains to him; in all these ways, and in others, Swift is a study of inexplicable contrasts.

The correspondence, therefore, of such a man is bound to possess unusual interest, and the volume now before us has been prepared with insight. It is a matter for regret that very many of Swift's letters must have been destroyed. "Few thought it worth while," says Dean Bernard in his capital introduction, "to preserve letters from Mr. Swift, Sir William Temple's dependant; but once he became famous every one would have been proud to number the Dean among his correspondents." Collectors of Swiftiana will find, however, several items of fresh interest here; there are two letters, for instance, which show how in his early years the young satirist leaned very strongly toward the laurels of poesy. "I esteem the time of studying poetry to be two hours in a morning," he writes to Thomas Swift (from Moor Park, May 3rd, 1692), "and that only when the humour sits, which I esteem for the flower of the whole day, and truly I make bold to employ them in that way, and yet I seldom write above two stanzas in a week—I mean such as are to any Pindaric ode:"—

> And yet I have known myself in so good a humour as to make two in a day, but it may be no more in a week after, and when all is done I alter them a hundred times; and yet I do not believe myself to be a laborious dry writer, because if the fit comes not immediately I never heed it, but think of something else. . . . I have a sort of vanity or foiblesse, I do not know what to call it, and which I would fain know if you partake of it: it is—not to be circumstantial—that I am overfond of my own writings; I would not have the world think so, for a million, but it is so, and I find when I write what pleases me I am Cowley to myself and can read it a hundred times over.

This particular "foiblesse" of Swift's is, it will be perceived, common to humanity in all ages.

For the first time the series of letters from Archbishop King to Swift are printed in full, and the relations between the two men are in some degree elucidated. They were in sympathy on many subjects, yet, "neighbours for so many years, and with so many interests in common (King had been Dean of St. Patrick's some twenty years before Swift), they never heartily liked each other. Their voluminous letters are written with a certain reserve, each being unwilling, for all his respect for his correspondent's character, fully to trust the other." We may hazard the comment that probably in this hesitancy Swift was the person to blame, if blame there be, since the Archbishop must have regarded him as rather a prickly subject to handle at all freely.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Swift's relations with Addison, which have before now been called in question, are here brought out clearly. In a letter to Robert Hunter, dated from London, March 22nd, 1708, he writes:—

> I am now with Mr. Addison, with whom I have fifty times drunk your health since you left us. He is hurrying away for Ireland, and I can at present lengthen my letter no farther; and I am not certain whether you will have any from him or not till he gets to Ireland. However, he commands me to assure you of his humble service; and I pray God too much business may not spoil le plus honnête homme du monde; for it is certain, which of a good man's talents he employs on business, must be detracted from his conversation. I cannot write longer in so good company, and therefore conclude.

Addison himself wrote to Swift in terms that can only be described as those of warm affection; for instance, in a letter from Dublin he concludes thus:—"You know I look upon everything that is like a compliment as a breach of friendship, and, therefore, shall only tell you that I long to see you, without assuring you that I love your company and value your conversation more than any man's, or that I am, with the most inviolable sincerity and esteem, dear Sir, your most faithful, most humble, and most obedient servant." Again, at about the same period (1710), he says:—"Pray, dear Doctor, continue your friendship towards one who loves and esteems you, if possible, as much as you deserve." Surely, in the man who could inspire such sentiments—which, coming from Joseph Addison, cannot be suspected of insincerity—we must admit that there was a large proportion of human kindness and human comradeship? We are aware that the course of politics brought differences between the two great men. In W. J. Courthope's "Addison" a letter from Swift to Stella is mentioned, in which the Dean says:—"Mr. Addison and I are as different as black and white, and I believe our friendship will go off by this d—— business of party. He cannot bear seeing me fall in so with the Ministry, but I love him still as much as ever, though we seldom meet." In January, 1710, he writes:—"I called at the coffee-house, where I had not been in a week, and talked coldly awhile with Mr. Addison. All our friendship and dearness are off; we are civil acquaintance, talk words of course, of when we shall meet—and that's all. Is it not odd?" But, according to the same record, the two became on intimate terms again. The point is that most critics seem to judge Swift too harshly.

In an Appendix to this volume, Swift's inveterate habit of punning is alluded to and illustrated. "Throughout his life," says the editor of the correspondence, "he had indulged in this form of wit," and gives the "Dialogue in the Castilian Language," an elaborate trifle which will probably be new to many readers. "His chief confederates," continues Mr. Ball, "were the friends of his youth—the three Ashes. Whether Swift stood to them in the relation of teacher or pupil is not known, but certainly he was the leader, and the four friends had developed together into accomplished punmakers. When Swift began to mix in other circles the pursuit, calculated as he found it was to recommend him to his fashionable friends, assumed a more serious purpose. With the Berkeleys 'to deafen them with puns and rhyme' was found a road to favour, and with the Ormonds it was probably no less successful." The Earl of Pembroke, it seems, took a fancy to Swift on the occasion of a neat bon mot:—

> As with viceregal attention Pembroke listened to the learned disquisition of a Dublin physician on the instinct of the bee, and was told how the inhabitants of the hive form themselves into nations and commonwealths, it came as an intense relief to hear Swift's voice proclaiming that the bee nation was one of extraordinary antiquity and reminding the audience that the Hivites were among the first nations which Joshua was appointed by Moses to conquer. Being a votary to the worship of genius and culture, Pembroke, who had never before heard a pun, was pleased, and perhaps also thought it his duty as Viceroy to encourage this form of Hibernian humour.

There are certainly some awful examples of this questionable form of wit in the "Castilian" dialogue and in other instances which are given; we can only express our pleasure that the pun, constructed thus laboriously, has practically vanished from intellectual circles.

We hear from the publishers of this book that several volumes are yet to come, and as they probably will contain very much that is of great interest (though we fear not much fresh light can be thrown on the relationship of Swift to Stella), students of the work and life of the sarcastic Dean will await them eagerly. The task of editing so huge a mass of correspondence must have been no light one, and we can congratulate Mr. Elrington Ball on his work most heartily.

THE PHILOSOPHER'S WAY

English Philosophy: A Study of its Method and General Development. By THOMAS M. FORSYTH, M.A., D.Phil. (Edin.). (A. and C. Black. 4s. 6d. net.)

THE wayfaring man, not always a fool, may be forgiven if at the mention of the word "philosophy" an expression comes into his face which is not far removed from contempt. He is puzzled, worthy fellow, and it is a peculiarity of human nature (of some human natures, at any rate) that it is inclined to sneer at what it cannot understand. What is the use of all this chatter? he may say. Of what avail are all these thick tomes written in a language which is certainly English, but which might almost as well be Hebrew or Basque for all the sense that he and his comrades can make of it? And why do not these men calling themselves professors, hiding away in silent studies, come out into the light and do some work? He has a case, certainly, if we exercise the virtue of charity and bear in mind his point of view, his probable chaotic surroundings; he is "cumbered with much serving," and has neither time nor inclination for the niceties of argument—nor would his patience stand the strain. But, if he knew it, he is just as keen in his way as are his disdainfully rejected philosophers in theirs about the mysteries of this world. He wonders vaguely at times over the meaning of "things;" he feels that they have some sort of a meaning, some message undecipherable to which he holds no key. As a child with a watch, he would like to take the world to pieces and find what it is made of; he wants, like the classic infant, to "see the wheels go round;" he is often possessed by an indefinite querulous sensation, embodied in the question: "What is the good of it all?" If he could be persuaded to confess, he would probably say that he would "give anything to know" what happens when he loses breath in the race of life, and death overtakes him—to know "in that sleep of death what dreams may come." And these wonderings, these shadowy desires of his, are precisely what his fellow-men who have more time, more money, and highly trained and developed brains, are trying their hardest to satisfy; for they themselves, and every one of us, suffer them likewise. "There is a curious fascination," said Professor William James, "in hearing deep things talked about, even though neither we nor the disputants understand them. We get the problematic thrill, we feel the presence of the vastness. Let a controversy begin in a smoking-room anywhere, about free-will or God's omniscience, or good and evil, and see how every one in the place pricks up his ears."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The same great writer—perhaps the most lucid and logical exponent who ever lectured, as far as a certain department of philosophy is concerned—observes in the same book: "Man is no lawgiver to nature; he is an absorber. She it is who stands firm, he it is who must accommodate himself." And in this condensed but very carefully wrought study of "English Philosophy" we have Professor Forsyth emphasising the necessity of close and unremitting observation, intent watchfulness in matters of experience: "The suggestiveness of experience is inexhaustible." Philosophy resolves itself into feeling and thinking, watching our sensations, reflecting upon them, and comparing them. "Philosophy," said Professor Adamson* (whom Professor Sorley, of Cambridge, considers "at least Hamilton's equal" in the range and accuracy of his learning), "must keep close to experience and draw its sustenance therefrom." Where these probings and questionings of experience and conception lead is shown in a fine quotation from Hodgson on page 209 of the present work:—

> In a philosophy founded simply on analysis of experience, there is no room for pantheism, since it is only as different from ourselves and the seen world that the Divine power is known to us; nor for gnosticism, since we have no speculative knowledge whatever of the unseen world, or the existents therein; nor for agnosticism, since we have and cannot but have a practical knowledge of the Divine power.

An exhaustive dissection of this well-composed résumé of the progress of English philosophy would be more suitable for the pages of a scientific journal than for the columns of this review; but we may point out that Professor Forsyth is no mere compiler. He brings to his task an original judgment and a very keen sense of the comparative values of the various systems of philosophy which have been propounded during the last few centuries. His style of summing them up, of indicating their weak points and strong points (speaking from the present-day outlook), is excellent, and cannot but prove helpful to the student. In one matter we wish he had followed Adamson's plan, and given dates more freely. For example, the very first chapter of Adamson's "Modern Philosophy" begins: "With regard to Descartes himself, the following are the requisite dates: he was born in 1596 and died in 1650." The reader gets the period and the general atmosphere at once; so also with Hume—he gives as a footnote, "Born 1711, died 1776."

From Francis Bacon, the first great English philosopher in the strict sense, spokesman of the era when the impulse toward investigation took possession of the scientific world, the author pursues his record and his commentary. Hobbes, Locke, and Hume are considered in their place, then Berkeley, with his curious declarations concerning the unreality of matter—as some of his critics have put it—which fascinate even the ordinary reader who has no special inclination towards the abstruse. "The esse of things is percipi; their existence consists in their being experienced." "All the choir of heaven and earth," said Berkeley, "in a word, all those bodies which compose the mighty frame of the world, have not any subsistence without a mind; that their being is to be perceived or known." The theories of Mill are discussed in a brief but satisfactory manner, and their failings cleverly noted:—

> He finds the explanation of our belief in an independent material world in the fact that our experience at any instant not only consists of definite impressions or ideas actually present, but also contains a reference by way of memory and expectation to an indefinite background of associated ideas, whose manner and order of occurrence are uniform and certain. . . . The question what reality underlies actual and possible sensations remains, on Mill's theory, unanswered and unanswerable.

The most interesting portion of the book, and the fullest exposition of the author's own ideas, is that entitled "Knowledge and Reality." Here we have many pregnant sentences, of which the following paragraph may be taken as an example:—

> All our experience implies a beyond—an unknown correlative to the known; but in order to have any meaning for us at all the reality must be continuous with our experience, and, indeed, constitute the very truth or reality of it. And this involves that much that is not definitely characterised may be known indefinitely in anticipation of more definite knowledge—that the unknown reality is not wholly unknown, and that it is what as knowledge advances becomes progressively known; for knowledge becomes definite only by defining what is indefinite, though none the less real. In fine, knowledge and existence, though not coincident, are of a piece with each other.

This is sound philosophy, and, therefore, sound common sense. We live in the present, contemplating a future which may hold much more in the way of surprises for the scientist and philosopher than the past gave to their predecessors; but with our present life we grip that future by a thin thread of continuity, handed to us from the past—a thread which never can break. We blaze our way, as it were, through the forests of thought which every now and then seem impassable; but at the critical moment we can return along our tracks, discover some error or some happy inspiration, and by its aid proceed upon our interminable way. Advisedly we use the word "interminable," for reality transcends knowledge. Professor James, we believe, once said—"A final philosophy, by which is meant a connected body of answers to all the issues involved in the general questions raised by reflective thinking, seems as far off as ever." Fortunately so! For were we to arrive suddenly at some magical solution of all our problems, how tame would life be, how sadly we should seek fresh difficulties, fresh worlds to conquer! Yet that far-away solution is what we ever strive for by divers roads. One science waits upon another. "By its effort to construct a system of truth," says Professor Forsyth, in an excellent passage at the end of his book, "philosophy acts both as a spur and a guide to the special inquiries, ever suggesting further goals for research, and pointing the way towards fuller knowledge. Philosophy by itself can yield no full and definite answers to problems which it raises. But it sets the problems, and so can estimate the significance of any answer that is proffered—and on the basis of results so far attained, it can at each stage indicate the forms which the problems assume and the lines of their further solution." Interdependence is the note of these investigations—each department of science, each method of thought contributes its mite towards the collective result. And some day, it may be, the work of philosophy will be finished; but that day is not yet near.

* "Modern Philosophy," Vol. II. (Inaugural Address in the University of Glasgow, on entering upon the Professorship of Logic and Rhetoric, October 21st, 1895.)

AS OTHERS SEE US

L'Âme des Anglais. Par "FOEMINA" (Jacque Vontade). (Libraire Grasset, 61, Rue Saints-Pères, Paris. 3f. 50c.)

THE double barriers of race and language, with their inevitable corollaries of temperament and outlook, set between ourselves and our genial friends across the Channel, might seem to prohibit for ever a complete comprehension of a

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Frenchman by an Englishman, or vice versâ. If for no other reason, subtleties of speech are not easily translated from one tongue to another with reasonable hope of an exact equivalence, and, as it is chiefly by means of conversational intercourse and the perusal of printed matter that opinions must be arrived at, the task appears a hard one.

Against this apparently insuperable difficulty, however, must be set the undoubted fact that occasionally each nation produces an individual of almost uncanny insight, gifted with an inexhaustible curiosity and a surprising power of "spotting" salient points in other people's business. When such a specially equipped person adds to his natural qualities the perseverance necessary to learn a strange language thoroughly, adds also to his intuition a fine faculty of criticism, and then travels in the country of his choice with a bulky notebook, the results of his investigations are bound to be worth reading, and may be worth serious consideration.

Therefore, when we find that "Foemina" has been among us "takin' notes," we are prepared to be turned inside out as politely as may be, but none the less acutely, and we are not disappointed. That placid reserve and stolidity with strangers which goes under the name of "insularity," and which has probably made for us more enemies than we deserve, was evidently of little use when pitted against this busy Gallic pen. If we never obeyed before the philosopher's injunction to "know ourselves," we must perforce do it now. With the most superb impudence—a very charming impudence, be it noted—M. Vontade entitles one of his chapters "Notre Ascétisme et Leur Sensualité," and demonstrates his point in a truly delightful manner. It is special pleading, of course; but we are bound to say that there is "something in it," although we are by no means convinced. Setting aside calmly the dictionaries, the author evolves for himself the definition that the ascetic is one "qui préfère son esprit à son corps," and that our national tendency to make ourselves "comfortable" (witness an astonishingly cosy arm-chair which he discovered at Winchester) is evidence of sensuality. It may be, according to his point of view, for, he exclaims, "I tell you that the dictionaries don't know what they are talking about!" As a specimen of the really exquisite method of reasoning, we may quote a passage which has the double merit of summing up the French way of doing things and contrasting it with the English style:—

> C'est parce que l'ancien artisan tenait pour importante la joie profondément ressentie d'être bien assis qu'il sut tailler le fauteuil de Winchester dans le vieux bois anglais. C'est le même principe qui donne lieu aujourd'hui a ces inimitables sièges, où le repos prend une telle qualité, qui, nous surprend, nous, les ascètes, et nous inquiète presque comme plaisir coupable. . . . J'ai vu de ces intérieurs, où, bien que chaque objet en soi fût laid et d'un goût fâcheux, l'ensemble restait charmant d'harmonie à cause de la parfaite concordance de tout avec un besoin, et de la possibilité qu'on y voyait de donner un agrément physique. . . .
>
> Quand un Français invente un meuble, il songe à créer une forme qui procurera du plaisir aux yeux, et partant à l'esprit. Il lui demande, à ce meuble, d'être joli, décoratif, de fournir de plaisantes sensations intellectuelles, par la manière dont ses lignes se raccordent aux lignes qui l'entourent. Les exigences matérielles de ceux auxquels il le destine ne le préoccupent pas une seconde. Il ne s'agit guère qu'on soit bien assis sur sa chaise! C'est assez qu'elle suggère avec élégance la possibilité de s'asseoir. Sa chaise est moins une chaise qu'une idée générale! Il se moque des corps qui auront à faire à elle. . . . Croyez-moi, chers amis d'Angleterre, en France le corps dédaigné n'est qu'un prétexte de l'esprit.

It will be perceived that entertainment is not lacking in this volume; but, apart from passages such as the foregoing—and there are many which seem to us to argue cleverly from false premisses—there is much genuine criticism to be found. Our behaviour in the face of grief, our horror of "gush," our charitableness, are hit off to the life. Love, says our critic, is not for us an object of philosophical curiosity, nor a theme for ingenious developments; it is the supreme affair of life. Strong passion we possess, but we do not often show it; in England love remains a secret of the soul—it does not circulate in the air. "C'est ce qui fait que l'air extérieur y est un peu froid. C'est ce qui fait aussi que les âmes closes y atteignent de si hautes températures." A very pretty compliment is paid to our steadfastness in this section, which is entitled "Quelques Rêveries à propos de l'Amour;" love, says the author, which changes with appearances, which "alters when it alteration finds," pursues a fugitive symbol, but the love of the English people pursues an incorruptible reality.

The quality of firm and calm friendship, which in a certain characteristic of mutual understanding without many words is peculiar to our race, is admirably touched upon in the same chapter; but perhaps the finest discussion in the book is that on religion. Here we feel sure that the writer has judged too conclusively from the instances which have come under his personal observation; also he quotes freely from that revealing volume by Mr. Edmund Gosse, "Father and Son," which, valuable as it is, and true withal, is certainly not to be taken as representative of English religious tendencies as a whole. It is manifest, however, that in the following acute analysis M. Vontade has us transfixed at his pen's point:—

> Within the English heart dwells an immense uneasiness. Not the nervous curiosity, the intellectual unrest, with which we are acquainted, but rather an inquietude of sensibility, an imperious need for certainty which resembles the moral extension of their need for action. They are too deeply moved by great problems to handle them freely, but neither can they rest indifferent. Too proud to bind themselves by dogma with an instinct of submission or of unreflecting imitation, too intense to live without some superhuman ideal, religion is a troublesome matter with these robust souls.

This is capitally expressed, and the whole dissection of our methods of approaching religious affairs abounds with good sense and sympathy.

We have said enough to show that this is no ordinary, superficial summary by a Frenchman who has chanced to wander among us and record his impressions. It is a book which we should like to place in the hands of every sensible English man and woman, for, with all its errors (and there are bound to be many), it mirrors us very faithfully, and is without a suspicion of offence. We congratulate the author most heartily, and shall turn to his pages again and again.

INDIAN UNREST

Indian Unrest. By Valentine Chirol. A Reprint, Revised and Enlarged, from the "Times," with an Introduction by Sir Alfred Lyall. (Macmillan. 5s. net.)

Some of the most experienced Indian officers have admitted, after a lifetime spent in the Government service, that they never acquired a complete knowledge of India and the natives, and that they were always being confronted with some novelty or surprise. A few years ago no one could have suspected the timid Bengali to be capable, even in isolated instances, of murderous outrages with bomb and pistol. All Europeans in India labour under the difficulty of getting at the true facts, partly from the separation of Eastern and Western thought, partly from the want of intimate knowledge of the languages, or, again, through the deliberate concealment of information; perhaps, also, through the complacent tendency to theorise on superficial evidence. It is, therefore, the more creditable to Mr. Valentine Chirol that he has done so much to unravel the causes of Indian unrest, and to piece them together in a form that may be accepted as generally correct. He has had a long acquaintance with the East, and spent some more months in India last year to make a special inquiry, during which time he consulted all the best authorities, both Indian and European. If his views appear to be open to doubt in some respects, he may reasonably claim to have been misinformed, or that opinions differ. He has at any rate avoided the arrogant style of Mr. Keir Hardie and Mr. Ramsay Macdonald, each of whom spent only a few weeks in India, and returned home to lay down the law, abuse all Anglo-Indians, and expose his own ignorance.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Mr. Chirol's principal conclusion is that the Brahmans—the ancient sacerdotal caste of India—are mainly responsible for the disaffection which has developed into unrest. Brahmanism, he shows, is one of the two forces which aspire to substitute themselves for British rule. Of recent years, he says, educated Brahmans "have figured prominently in the social and religious revival of Hinduism, and they have figured no less prominently, whether in the ranks of the extremists or among the moderate and advanced politicians in the political movement which has accompanied that revival." Sir Alfred Lyall, an ex-official, in an introduction to this book, writes that "it is beyond question that the promoters of disaffection on both sides of India have been making strenuous exertions to enlist in the movement the influence of Brahmanism;" his further statement to the effect that "the beliefs and practices of popular Hinduism are obviously irreconcilable with the principles of modern civilisation" shows the risk of irritating the whole body of Hindus by any precipitate action in occidentalizing the Orient. But Mr. Chirol's ideas on the Brahman conspiracy are contested by Sir Bampfylde Fuller, another retired official, and by an Indian writer on an "Analysis of Indian Unrest" in the Fortnightly Review for January. Mr. Mitra quotes Parliamentary papers to prove that of the persons accused of sedition (using the term comprehensively) "the Brahmans form but a small minority, whether among the prosecuted or among the convicted. The facts, therefore, are too strong for it to be possible to make the assertion that the so-called Brahman leading of the Hindu movement was, or is, a fact." The Indian case has some analogy in English history. In mediæval times the great English ecclesiastics held the high offices of State, and wielded power from which they have been dethroned. So in India the sacerdotal Brahmans formerly monopolised all authority; but the progress of education has given knowledge and, consequently, power to other castes also. This brings us to Mr. Chirol's second main conclusion that a modern and progressive force, generated by Western education, operating among limited numbers, has combined with the Brahman movement to develop a spirit of revolt against British rule, and that this "temporary and unnatural alliance is based on an illusory 'Nationalism,' which appeals to nothing in Indian history, but is calculated and meant to appeal with dangerous force to Western sentiment and ignorance." Mr. Chirol has much to say on education—its mistakes, results, and the remedies required—and Sir Alfred Lyall has to admit that mistakes have been made, and that the unrest is "the natural outcome of artificial culture in an educational hothouse." With the new appointment of a Member of Council for Education in India such mistakes should be avoided in future.

Mr. Chirol has also traced to their sources "some of the chief currents and cross-currents of the great confused movement which is stirring the stagnant waters of Indian life," and has performed a signal service in so thoroughly examining the subject of the unrest which at present appears to be quiescent. The recent reforms must be given time to work. Meanwhile we have to satisfy the Indians, as Mr. Chirol says, that we govern them with a genuine consideration for all their ideas, so long as those ideas are compatible with the maintenance and security of British rule.

SHORTER REVIEWS

A GREAT SINGER

The Romance of a Great Singer. A Memoir of Mario. By Mrs. Godfrey Pearse and Frank Hird. Illustrated. (Smith, Elder and Co. 7s. 6d. net.)

Thirty-nine years ago Mario said farewell to the stage which he had adorned for a little more than thirty years; eleven years later he died. In those days it was not considered necessary that a memoir of somebody or other should be published every week throughout the year; the rage for personal gossip had not reached the proportions to which it has now attained; so the glory of this great singer, this interesting and lovable man, was commemorated in no biography. The present year marks the centenary of his birth, and his daughter Cecilia, Mrs. Godfrey Pearse, has therefore put together all that she knows or can find out of her father's career, and made a very readable and interesting book. One gossiping collection of musical reminiscences is very much like another, and hardly worth reading unless the author has a special gift for describing and estimating the value of what he has seen and heard. But Mario was not only a great singer who knew other great singers and Royal persons, and who travelled here and there. The friend of Cavour and Mazzini and Garibaldi, who, in the difficult dawning days of the Risorgimento, played a part which led to exile and the Stage as a means of getting bread to eat—this was a man whose history might well be romantic and worth knowing. And so it is; a story with an interest all its own. Mario had destroyed his diaries and correspondence before his death, so that his daughter has had to rely upon her personal recollections and what she could gather from various published memoirs, such as those of Mr. Willert Beale. She spins out her tale, therefore, by the expedient of giving small biographical notices of most of the distinguished people with whom her father came much in contact. This may be useful for readers unacquainted with nineteenth-century history who have not a Dictionary of Biography at their side, but it certainly interrupts her narrative unduly. Still we learn a good deal about many remarkable people, and there is an abundance of excellent anecdote, a great deal of which is new. Copious extracts from the criticisms of Théophile Gautier make delightful reading, and, altogether, the "Romance of a Great Singer" is a book which deserves to be widely read and is sure to be enjoyed. We who knew not Mario as a singer can now make the acquaintance of Mario the high-minded gentleman, the charming companion, the devoted patriot, and it is an acquaintance well worth making. Should the book go to a second edition, the proofs should be more carefully read. It has too many misprints or mistakes. There are passages, also, where accuracy is not a strong point. One of these is the account of the murder of the Duchesse de Praslin.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

TWO RUSSIAN REFORMERS

The Life of Tolstoy: Later Years. By AYLMER MAUDE. (Constable and Co. 10s. 6d. net.)

Two Russian Reformers. By J. A. T. LLOYD. (Stanley Paul and Co.)

MR. AYLMER MAUDE'S exhaustive and intensely interesting volume on Count Tolstoy deserves far more space than we can afford at present. From about the year 1878, when Tolstoy might be said to be passing through the stage which led from an outlook which at least held something sympathetic with human frailty to an austerity which savoured of the anchorite, Mr. Maude traces the reformer's career practically to its close. He sees, it is pleasant to note, both sides of his hero's character, and, although such an admirer of Tolstoy, does not hesitate to expose the faults which abound in the severe and uncompromising later writings. The analysis of these is excellent, and shows Mr. Maude in a new light as a critic—his remarks, for example, in chapter xi., on Tolstoy's attitude to the sex question are full of good sense. Students of social problems ought to read this illuminating book, if only to note how the influence of one man can extend beyond the bounds of his own country and induce that comment and publicity which alone can ensure a true appraisal of its value.

The scheme of Mr. Lloyd's volume is less ambitious. He gives extensive outlines of the work of Turgenev, and an account of the life of the great Russian novelist which should do much to enhance his fame among English readers. Not many people, we imagine, know much of the human aspect of Turgenev, and this book is calculated to send us to the novels with a fresh zest. "To the very end Turgenev believed in the kindliness of human nature as opposed to the unseeing aloofness of Nature. Almost his last articulate words were: 'Live and love others, as I have also loved them.'" His opinion of the English seems not to have been very high; they were "a nation of originals," and Carlyle, whom he met, remained to him a problem. We cannot help thinking that Carlyle was indulging some little ironic mood at the expense of his visitor when he said that "the greatest quality in man was a blind obedience," and that every nation obeying its Sovereign blindly "is happier than free England with her Constitution."

On the theme of Tolstoy Mr. Lloyd is no less interesting. "He was to examine life under the microscope as no artist perhaps had ever examined it before. He was to reproduce the illusion of a whole lifetime from the infinitely close observation of its last few days." The author distinguishes well between Tolstoy as man and artist and Tolstoy as ascetic and reformer, and the whole book is a very genuine attempt to explain the work and character of two of the greatest literary men Russia has ever produced.

AMERICAN IMPRESSIONS OF PARIS

Pages from the Book of Paris. By CLAUDE C. WASHBURN. Etchings and Drawings by LESTER G. HORNBY. (Constable and Co. 7s. 6d. net.)

ON opening this book, which is an American production, our first impulse was to look at the pictures. They are over forty in number, and some of them are very good, though others—of the ultra-impressionist kind—do not appeal to us. We feel that Mr. Hornby does not do justice to that delightful creature the Parisienne. He has made no attempt to depict a French lady (for which we are grateful), but his efforts to pourtray the female denizens of La Bohême suggest the caricatures of those French artists who, making an absolute cult of ugliness, have been libelling all womankind, indiscriminately, for a good many years past. Probably the best of Mr. Hornby's sketches of women is the one "au Rat Mort." It is a vile face, but it is true to life. As for his "Linette," she is frankly hideous. We have nothing but praise, however, for the little etching of two old women seen at the Gaîté Theatre. They are typical of their kind, we have met them a thousand times, and we recognised them instantly. The old habitué at a café, slightly suggestive of ex-President Loubet, is also a capital "impression." Mr. Hornby's best drawings, however, are those of old streets. For instance, we like the view of the Rue de l'École Polytechnique, in spite of its rollicking little figures, which seem to belong more to Henri Murger's period than to the present day. The Passage de la Petite Boucherie, the Rue de Rennes, the Carrefour de la Croix rouge, the old court in the Rue Vercingétorix—somewhat like Vierge's work—and the Ile de la Cité—reminiscent of Gustave Doré—are also very good. With regard to the various little sketches of cafés, inside and out, Mr. Hornby might profit by inspecting the dainty etchings of similar dimensions with which those masters, Gustave Courbet, Léopold Flameng, and Félicien Rops illustrated Alfred Delvau's "Histoire des Cafés et Cabarets de Paris," forty-eight years ago. There is already a slight suggestion of Rops in some of Mr. Hornby's work.

As for the text of this volume, Mr. Washburn philosophises and moralises in an easy, jaunty, quietly humourous, and occasionally egotistical, fashion respecting his rambles through Paris, its cafés and theatres, the Bois de Boulogne, Père Lachaise cemetery, and sundry other places, besides favouring us with his views on Parisian methods of love-making, which he finds much less secretive than ours. All that our author says is put very pleasantly, and is generally true; but similar things have been said again and again by other writers, and we do not find that Mr. Washburn has discovered anything particularly new on the banks of the Seine. This may be less his fault than that of his innumerable predecessors in the same field, they having left, perhaps, very little to be discovered. His book has interested us personally less by reason of anything it contains than on account of all the recollections it has brought to mind—our own knowledge of Paris going back through five-and-forty years. Perhaps the best part of the work is its concluding section—an imaginary interview with Anatole France, written with some intuition of what the real thing might have been like.

THE INCAS

The Incas of Peru. By Sir CLEMENTS MARKHAM, K.C.B., &c. With Sixteen Illustrations and a Map. (Smith, Elder and Co. 10s. 6d.)

IN "The Incas of Peru," by Sir Clements Markham, we have a well-informed and entertaining book on a theme which the author has made his own. Sir Clements Markham is no dilettante on this deeply romantic, and withal historical, subject. He has devoted fifty years to the matter on which he writes, and the present volume has no less than eighteen predecessors dealing with the Incas and kindred topics. It was originally his intention to have written an exhaustive history of this noble race of Peruvian natives, but time had the advantage of him, and now, having passed his eightieth birthday, he has been compelled to abandon his intention and to publish this volume of essays in its stead. Sir Clements's successor in this field, whoever he may be, will be fortunate in having had such a pioneer to follow. And, notwithstanding what name may appear upon the title-page of the History of the Incas that is to be written in the minds of the readers, and let us hope of the author also, the name of Sir Clements Markham will stand forth as one to whom all future writers on the Incas will be very deeply indebted. A very long period must necessarily elapse before another will arise whose knowledge of the subject can hope to rival that of the author of the volume now before us.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Sir Clements Markham first visited Peru as a midshipman at the age of fourteen, and from that day until this his interest in the country and its people has never flagged. Every printed page that was to be found on the subject he read with avidity, and, in his hunger for still more knowledge, he ransacked libraries in his search for unpublished material. While Prescott still lived he seized the opportunity of sitting at his feet in order to imbibe still more knowledge of the subject which had become a passion for him, and when Sir Clements finally left Peru he continued a correspondence with many friends in the country so that his knowledge might be ever more extended. No surface acquaintance with his subject in any particular has ever satisfied him. Everything available must be made his own, and so long as one crumb of information remained outside his reach, he did not rest satisfied for a moment until he had assimilated it.

The present volume consists of a series of essays bound together by their common connection with the Incas. Some are historical, others legendary; one at least even bibliographical. The religion of the Incas, their language and literature, their calendar, festivals, and dress, and the condition of the people in the old Inca Empire all come in for treatment within the two covers of this volume; while the tragedy of the close of the Empire and the cruelty of the Spaniards is told in pathetic phrases. Many will be interested in the fabulous treasures which the Princes in their extremity concealed from the greedy eyes of their Spanish oppressors, and still more will be astonished to learn that the last who knew the secret hiding-place of this untold treasure died as recently as last century, and with him was buried the secret. Not the least entrancing of the romances which Sir Clements relates is how a portion of this treasure was realised to finance a rebellion against Spanish rule in the year of Waterloo. With the Indian, who was the sole repository of the secret, that secret died; and to-day, hidden somewhere within the interior of the territory of the Republic of Peru, lies untold treasure of vases, cups, plates, ingots, and great statues, all of pure gold, in incredible profusion.

Young Gaol Birds. By CHARLES E. B. RUSSELL, M.A. (Macmillan and Co. 3s. 6d. net.)

THIS is a volume of papers on young criminals, reprinted for the most part from the Manchester Guardian. When we say that it is from the pen of the author of that very thoughtful and suggestive work "The Making of a Criminal" it will be seen that the facts that underlie these little sketches are authoritative. In the present volume Mr. Russell has given us the life histories of some thirteen unhappy youths, and it may perhaps be taken as a sign of his success that the perusal of his book leaves us neither optimistic nor pessimistic with regard to the possibility of reclaiming young criminals. He tells us some remarkable instances of success, and some no less remarkable instances of failure. But the most important section of the book is certainly the Postscript, in which the author makes some acute reflections on the shortcomings of the Borstal system. It is clearly unfortunate that many young wastrels who are frequently going to prison for short periods cannot come under this reformative treatment, because up to the age of twenty-one they do not do anything sufficiently wrong. Also there is a crying need for some similar system for the medically unfit, who are at present debarred from a form of reclamation that has proved very successful. This book is a really valuable contribution to an urgent and difficult problem.

The Final Faith. By W. DOUGLAS MACKENZIE, D.D. (Andrew Melrose. 6s.)

THIS work is mainly a defence of the principle of Christian Missions, particularly to the Oriental nations. It is, as the title shows, eminently a work of deep and abiding faith. Missions cannot be upheld unless men are convinced "not that Christianity is a better religion than any other, but that it is the absolute religion, the one final way in which God Himself is concerned with the saving and perfecting of mankind." Starting with this premiss, which is expanded throughout the book, the author discusses Christian doctrines in their appeal to conscience, to the individual, and in relation to the problems of sin and death and life. So far the book is mainly theological, but it is theology with a definite purpose, and from a particular standpoint, which gives an inspiring freshness of treatment. This attitude should make Dr. Mackenzie's work valuable to missionaries, especially in dealing with the views of those who imagine that Christianity ought not to disturb the great and ancient religions of the Far East. No one could accept the view if they possessed the conviction that Chistianity was the only absolute and final faith for the human race.

Literary Lapses. By STEPHEN LEACOCK. (John Lane, 3s. 6d. net.)

WE can forgive Mr. Stephen Leacock for his "lapses" if he will give us some more of the same amusing order. It is not always possible to commend the humour that comes from America, but in this case praise—and, we trust, good sales—forms the author's merited portion. Some items of this series of collected sketches are old friends, others are new to us; but most of them are really funny and welcome. The story of "My Financial Career," with its exaggeration of the sublime serenity of the bank-clerk, is capital; so is the little satire entitled "How to Live to be 200," in which an age of fads and food-cranks is held up to gentle ridicule. "Eat what you want. Eats lots of it. The only test is, Can you pay for it? And listen, don't worry as to whether your food contains starch, or albumen, or gluten, or nitrogen. If you are fool enough to want these things, go and buy them and eat all you want of them. Go to a laundry and get a bag of starch and eat your fill of it, . . . and take a good long drink of glue after it, and a spoonful of Portland cement. If you like nitrogen, go and get a druggist to give you a canful and let you sip it with a straw." Thus Mr. Leacock; it may not be a very high form of humour, but there is some good sense underlying the sarcasm; and the remarks upon patent muscle-developers and cold baths, illustrated by "Jiggins, who got so that he could open and shut his pores at will," are equally pertinent and amusing. There are, unfortunately, several flaws in good taste in this book. It was a pity to waste a pungent wit upon Wordsworth and Tennyson by making them the centres of imaginary episodes that are by no means funny, but merely distressing. If Mr. Leacock has the good fortune to run into a second edition we trust that he will cut out these sketches; and if he writes more in the vein of "Literary Lapses"—we certainly hope he will—let him curb his sense of fun before he caricatures men whose names are dear to very many of his readers. That they have passed from our ken is no excuse; it should even be an additional reason for restraint.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Interludes. (Fifth Series.) Being Three Essays and some Verses. By HORACE SMITH. (Macmillan and Co. 5s.)

MODERATELY witty and moderately wise is this slender little book from a persevering observer of human nature. Some parts of it, such as the autobiographical sketch, will be of interest especially to personal friends and acquaintances of the writer; but it is all very readable, and there are many good anecdotes. The essay on "Selfishness" is the best, and some of our foibles are hit off very neatly. "You, my dear reader," says the author, "know very well that the trees which yield you such delightful shade in your garden darken the rooms in your neighbour's house. Do you propose to cut them down, or even to lop them? You know that your motor-car smothers with dust the whole roadside, and that people are made sick by the noxious smells which it emits. What steps are you inclined to take to mitigate the nuisance? None at all!" With gentle ironies Mr. Smith pursues his theme, and succeeds in entertaining us, if not in enthralling us. His other essays, on "Old Age and Youth" and "Growing Old," are rather too full of the ordinary platitude, such as the two following remarks:—"On the whole, I come to the conclusion that conceit is bad in old or young, and is sometimes to be found in both." "The steady and regular exercise of the brain or of the body is healthy, but an extravagant and unruly excitement is harmful; the inordinate struggle for riches, place, or power will leave its mark upon mind and body." We have been aware of these things for some time.

The verses are musical and rhythmical, with a keen sense of humour here and there. For the rest, the author has a capital eye for an apt quotation, and this Fifth Series of "Interludes" keeps worthily to the standard of its predecessors.

FICTION

Master of the Vineyard. By MYRTLE REED. (G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York and London. 6s.)

THE people who live, move, and have their very peculiar being in the pages of this novel make us impatient. The "hero"—we should prefer to call him a thorough cad—makes love to an unsophisticated country girl, and discovers directly after that a married lady who comes on a visit to his mother is his twin-soul; whereupon sweet, meek little Rosemary is forgotten, and the white arm of the lady is kissed "in the hollow of the elbow, just below the sleeve," to the accompaniment of Rossetti's sonnets—the very sonnets which the "hero" had previously been reading with Rosemary. Things progress rapidly, to say the least of it, and Rosemary, one summer day, sits unseen and watches the precious pair kissing and embracing and vowing eternal love. A really sound thrashing would have done young Marsh a power of good; but we have no patience with Rosemary, who, immediately the woman returns to her husband, accepts her former lover again, since he protests that his passion for the one who came between has in some inexplicable manner made him love her (Rosemary) all the more; and this notwithstanding the fact that he avers this "twin-soul" love of his will never die! There may be such people in the world; if so, they are anything but natural, and we have no wish to meet them.

On the other hand, we have nothing but praise for the picture of Rosemary's home life. "Grandmother" and "Aunt Matilda," with their constant squabbles and their abysmal ignorance of the outside world, are capital, and the humour with which they are set before the reader has a fine quality of spontaneity. The work in the portions of the book devoted to this lowly home is infinitely better than the false sentiment which pervades the mad love affair of Marsh and the other woman. The author writes well, and at times beautifully; but she would do better, much better, from a literary point of view, if she would resist the demands for sentimentality which her public makes, and determinedly try to look at love from a higher plane of thought.

Princess Flower Hat. By MABEL OSGOOD WRIGHT. (Macmillan and Co. 6s.)

STORIES of life in the American countryside have been many of late years, and they possess a peculiar charm of their own for English readers. The author of this idyll, who is known to some of us as the "Barbara" of that delightful book "The Open Window," takes a very high place among those who tell of the simpler life. She makes interesting the least happenings of the farm and homestead; to her the garden, the neighbours, the servants are full of charming suggestion; with her as guide the reader feels the worries of the strenuous town fall into the background, and begins to have dreams of emigrating to one of these old-world townships set in the New World. Evidently there are plenty of people in the "States" who have other ideals than the pursuit of dollars. The "Princess" of this dainty little story is a young woman who is smitten with a sudden desire to "housekeep" on her own account. She takes a cottage, and her troubles with the garden, with a pair of lovers, with a scandal-loving neighbour form the theme of the story, as related by "Barbara," who lives near by and is a kind of guardian angel. To state thus barely the central idea of the story is hardly to do it justice, but we cannot spare room for quotations, and, indeed, quotations would have to be of an inordinate length if the atmosphere of the delicate plot were to be adequately rendered. We can only say that for a quiet hour or two by a fireside this little book is an ideal companion; its humour is tender, its pathos is not mawkish, and its sentiment is altogether charming.

The Rogue's Heiress. By TOM GALLON. (Hutchinson and Co. 6s.)

WE have long realised that the code of morality for heroes in modern fiction is decidedly lax; but we had always thought that there were some crimes to which the most natural of heroes would not stoop—blackmail, for instance. Well, we were wrong. The hero of Mr. Gallon's latest novel comes out of prison, where he has been serving a sentence for forgery, and finds that an acquaintance of his has published a novel under his own name that ought by rights to have borne the hero's. Fortified by this knowledge, the hero proceeds to blackmail the villain while joining him in an infamous conspiracy against the heroine, whom they believe to be the missing heiress to half a million. We will not follow Mr. Gallon any further, but will content ourselves with remarking that, even though he wears his clothes with an air and plays the piano beautifully, the hero strikes us as being an unmitigated and irredeemable cad. The author might plead that this was his intention; but why does he allow the hero to marry the heroine, who is quite a nice girl, in the last chapter? We cannot help feeling that we were meant to be more impressed by the social merits of the liar, forger, and blackmailer whose final success brings the book to a most unhappy conclusion.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The Siege of the Seven Suitors. By MEREDITH NICHOLSON. (Constable and Co. 6s.)

IN this very amusing book the author of "The House of a Thousand Candles" has undoubtedly achieved another success. The story of the beautiful American girl who has promised the aunt who has adopted her that she will marry the seventh man who proposes to her of all her many suitors is farce if you will, but the author's tact and restraint enable him to rise often enough to pure comedy. The eccentric aunt herself is quite delightful; one of the most pleasing figures whom we have met in recent fiction. The characters of the various suitors are carefully discriminated, and the book rejoices in the presence of two girls, either of whom is nice enough to be a heroine. We need hardly say that in the end the seventh pleader of his suit proves to be the right one, and the book finishes cheerfully, as a cheerful book should. All of which goes to prove that farce in the proper hands can be a very good thing indeed.

REVIEWS AND MAGAZINES

POLITICS naturally occupy a prominent position in many of the January periodicals, but the "English Review," with its usual good taste in literary matters, resists what must have been a rather strong temptation to break through its rule, and gives the place of honour to a remarkably beautiful poem by Mr. Laurence Binyon, entitled "The Mirror." We could almost have divined the author, had it not been signed, from various polished and scholarly verses; for instance, the following:—

> In this deserted chamber, as the evening falls,
> Silent curtains move no fold;
> Long has ebbed the floor's pale gold;
> Shadows deepen down the silent walls . . .
> Infinite human solitude invades
> Forms relinquished, hues resigned.

As a whole, however, there is more warmth in the poem than is customary with Mr. Binyon's work; his colour here is vivid and tropical, not bright with that wintry illumination of his which often compels admiration without emotion. There is so much to praise in this issue of the Review that selection is difficult. Mr. Arnold Bennett continues his picturesque series of "Paris Nights" with a lively description of the announcement of the verdict "Acquittée!" upon a "popular" woman criminal, and its effect on the company assembled at a not particularly high-class restaurant; he also presents somewhat luridly an evening at the Opera with the Russian Imperial Ballet. After witnessing this latter stimulating spectacle, he glimpses on his way home the vast ground floor of the deserted "Printemps," with the night-watchman and a colleague having a comfortable little causerie in the centre. The contrast is good, and inspires the best bit of writing in the whole article.

Mr. Bernard Shaw's "Dark Lady of the Sonnets" has already been discussed in these columns; the review is well worth purchasing for that alone. "Under Western Eyes," by Mr. Joseph Conrad, maintains its author's reputation in the second instalment. Mr. Sturge Moore contributes a story—an uncanny fantasy—which at times is quite in the vein of Guy de Maupassant; its theme, the dilemma of a lover and husband whose bride is magically reduced to a height of eighteen inches! It is extraordinarily clever, but would impress the reader more could he avoid the knowledge that the hero would, like Alice, wake up to find it all a dream. Doubtless many who have suffered tribulation in tracing the difficult patterns of Mr. Moore's poetry will be agreeably surprised to find that he can handle the short story with such skill and ease. "The Referendum," a level-headed article by Mr. Harold Temperley, "The Osborne Revolution," by Mr. Sidney Webb, a curious plea for a History of England which shall also be a history of the people, by Mr. Maurice Hewlett, and "The Irish Demand," by Professor Swift MacNeill, K.C., M.P., form the political items of a number of the "English Review" which we have rarely seen excelled in interest.

With all his usual energy and a great deal of sound sense, Mr. J. L. Garvin leads off in the "Fortnightly" with an article entitled "The King, the Constitution, and the Crisis"—a dissection, as is implied, of the present serious juncture in the country's fortunes. More calmly, Mr. Hilaire Belloc presents his views on "The Change in Politics," and we do not lose hope of a change in Mr. Belloc's views sooner or later, since he utters certain pregnant sentences concerning the behaviour of those in high places:—"When men become persuaded that those who, nominally, at least, are the guardians of the public weal, and who in the eyes of the many are regarded as its only guardians, have not the dignity of their office but merit disgust or contempt, it is an evil thing for the State."

Mr. Granville Barker's account of the repertoire given at "Two German Theatres" makes the reader long to visit each for himself. For the Hon. Whitelaw Reid's article on "Byron"—in reality an address delivered at Nottingham University College—we do not care very much; it is interesting but rather weak critically; as when Byron is described as "perhaps the greatest poet of the nineteenth century," and Wordsworth is shelved with Coleridge, Pope, and Addison as "no longer an essential part of the active literary life of the time." Tolstoi's theory of life is adequately treated by Mr. Francis Gribble; the "Post-Impressionists" are briefly discussed by Mr. Walter Sickert; and other articles, with a short story by Mr. Oliver Onions, combine to form a distinctly good New Year's number.

"An indifferent, anæmic affair," is the definition of the General Election supplied by Lord Ribblesdale in his opening article in the "Nineteenth Century" on the recent contest, and Lord Dunraven follows with a finely-considered analysis of the present situation, entitled "The Moral of an Immoral Election." He indicates a point which has often been overlooked, and which must be dealt with soon—"the relief of Parliament from insufferable congestion"—and his article is notable for its insight. On less strenuous themes we may praise highly "An Outpost of Empire," by Mrs. Watherston, in which the troubles and delights of life at a West African station are excellently described, and a capital contribution on "Carillon Music," by E. B. Osborn. Other subjects too numerous to mention are treated capably and critically by well-known writers.

Mr. Henry Newbolt occupies a large share of the current "Blackwood's Magazine" with his story of "The Twymans," and finishes the instalment with a good account of a school-boy fight. A short story of the Ægean Seas in the olden times, by Mr. John Buchan, successfully renders the Greek atmosphere of classic adventure, but will be appreciated best by scholars. As a complete contrast, an anonymous tale of the "Voyage of the White Duck," a rickety stern-wheeler, on crocodile-infested African streams, will bring to many readers' minds Kipling's amusing "Judson and the Empire." Colonel Callwell, C.B., presents the case against compulsory service, and Sir H. Mortimer Durand, in his very interesting series of chapters dealing with South African affairs, has much that is very pertinent with regard to the colour question. The "Musings Without Method" are as clever and witty as ever.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

In the "Empire Review" our foreign politics are the theme of several solid and informative articles, of which the most suggestive is by Sir J. W. Taverner, on "Oversea British Enterprise and Industry." The fourth issue of "The Vineyard" induces the opinion that this little monthly has come to stay, although a stronger note of criticism in its contents would improve it considerably. The study of Tolstoi is the best contribution.

With the ever-fresh "Harper's" we must conclude our notice of the chief magazines of the month. To complain of the fare provided in this issue would be impossible. Stories, literary matter, and illustrations are of the highest quality, and the poems form a feature of special distinction.

SOME RECENT FRENCH REVIEWS

Le Mercure de France, which has just completed its twenty-first year, and therefore reached its majority, has maintained throughout 1910 its usual high standard of literary excellence. Works belonging to all branches of English literature have frequently been reviewed in its pages, which have also included translations of some of Mr. Rudyard Kipling's short stories, a selection of Lafcadio Hearn's Japanese tales, and several important passages of Carlyle's "Cromwell." In future, each fortnightly number of Le Mercure will consist of 224 pages, but we are informed that the price, which even abroad is only 1s. 2½d., will not be raised. The December issues of this enterprising periodical contain some very interesting notes on Tolstoi, his musical tastes, his last writings, and his death; and some of these particulars will be new, we think, to many English admirers of the great Russian author. In Le Mercure for December 16th M. Remy de Gourmont discusses briefly, but in his usual spirited and amusing style, the great question now agitating literary France, which is whether women ought to be eligible for membership of the French Academy. M. de Gourmont ends by pronouncing against the ladies, chiefly, it seems, because their hats are so much larger than their brains; but he makes an exception in favour of Madame Curie's claim to a seat in the Académie des Sciences, on the ground that this distinguished lady is undoubtedly a scientist of the first order. It seems, however, that the regulations of the Académie des Sciences do not even permit women to be present at the sittings of its members; and M. de Gourmont insinuates that on occasions when some question touching on radium has arisen Madame Curie has had to wait in the anteroom among the umbrellas of the gentlemen who were discussing her work. This, if true, is not as it should be, and we are tempted to ask what has become of the old French gallantry.

Some time ago that popular and ably-conducted periodical La Revue Bleue gave a summary of the study on Holman Hunt which appeared in the pages of THE ACADEMY, and it has now presented its readers with a skilful précis of another ACADEMY article—one on Shakespeare and the music-hall stage. As readers of La Revue Bleue are aware, the publication of newly discovered letters written by celebrities is one of its particular features. In this connection it has lately given us some of the correspondence of Mérimée with his Spanish friend, Estébanez Calderon. The letters are not of great importance in themselves, but they are preceded by an interesting Introduction from the pen of Señor Rafael Mitjana, who shows that Mérimée, in writing his famous story "Carmen," was largely indebted to Calderon for information and suggestions. La Revue Bleue has also lately printed a number of letters from Voltaire to his niece Marie Elisabeth, who became successively Madame de Fontaine and Marquise de Florian. These missives are in Voltaire's best epistolary style, graceful, vivacious, and at times quite witty.

A new French review has just made its bow to the public. Edited by Mlle. S. Z. Galiléah, it is entitled Les Muses, and is devoted to feminine work in poetry and art. The first number contains a most interesting article by the editor on the poetic genius of "Renée Vivien," by whose premature death, not many months ago, French literature suffered a loss which has been unanimously recognised. "Renée Vivien's" real name was Pauline Tarn. She was of Anglo-American parentage, and was born on the other side of the Atlantic in 1877. But the many extracts from her poems given in Les Muses show how thorough became her mastery of the French language, which she assimilated, indeed, as completely as did either Heredia or Anthony Hamilton. Her muse was essentially tender, tinged with longings, occasionally also with some voluptuousness, but it inclined more and more to a plaintive sorrow as she drew near to her last days. This singularly gifted woman had travelled in the East, and became enamoured for a time of ancient Greece. Some of the poems with which this love inspired her were remarkably beautiful, as may be seen by referring to Les Muses. A charming little piece of verse, "Le Livre de Cynthia," by Mme. Jane Catulle-Mendès, also appears in the first number of this new review, to which we cordially wish all success. It is priced at 1fr. 50c. per number, and the office is at 76, Rue Gay-Lussac, Paris.

Another newcomer is a little weekly periodical which, under the title of Revue Française d'Outremer, has been established by some members of the Union Française des Arts et des Lettres resident in England. The first number (issued from 39, St. James's Street, W.) contains some reminiscences by M. A. Escoffier, the well-known chef, respecting the time when he was in the service of Marshal MacMahon while the latter was a prisoner of war in Germany. There are also some sprightly verses which were addressed by M. Th. Gringoire to Mme. Sarah Bernhardt while she was performing at the Coliseum, and which she evidently appreciated, for she wrote to the author declaring that they had charmed her during two nights of insomnia! Among various announcements in the Revue Française d'Outremer we notice one respecting the organisation of a yearly Salon of French art in one or another foreign capital. It is proposed to hold the first in London during next June and July.

THE THEATRE

THE AUTUMN SEASON OF 1910

THE story of the Spring Season of the year which has just been torn from the calendar was one of failure and disappointment. Mr. Charles Frohman demonstrated the fact that panic weakened such discriminating powers as he possesses, and there was nothing in the whole of the season's output which gave rise to any enthusiasm. It was generally agreed that theatrical managers for the most part courted failure and were not intelligent enough to compete successfully with other forms of amusement. The story of the Autumn Season is much the same. Certainly it has one or two productions to its credit for which we are most grateful, and by which it will be remembered in the future. We refer to "Nobody's Daughter," which is still running at Wyndham's Theatre, and to "Pompey the Great," which is a milestone on the long and difficult road of dramatic enterprise. Among the financial successes of the Autumn Season must be placed "Inconstant George," "Count Hannibal,"

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

"Priscilla Runs Away," and "Henry VIII." Playgoers cannot be congratulated upon giving their support either to Sir Herbert Tree's production, Mr. Trench's contribution, or to the hurricane play which Mr. Oscar Asche brought to the New Theatre.

"Inconstant George" falls under the category of pieces which always make money. It belongs to the school of "Pink Dominoes." It is an adaptation from the French, in which as much as possible of the French pornography is retained. It is, however, served up with consummate cleverness, dressed beautifully, and acted to perfection, and it has the advantage of Mr. Charles Hawtrey's calm, easy, and inimitable art. Of plays which would have been highly successful had they been in the hands of intelligent managers and had the good fortune to be produced at theatres that are popular with playgoers may be mentioned "Just to Get Married" and "Mrs. Skeffington." These two plays evoked the enthusiasm of the critics, but were both withdrawn before they had time to settle down. In the case of "Mrs. Skeffington" a record was constituted in managerial inefficiency. "Just to Get Married" will, however, be seen again almost at once, and "Mrs. Skeffington" has gone on a long tour in the provinces and is to be produced in America. "A Woman's Way" suffered in much the same manner from managerial incompetence, and was moved from the Comedy Theatre, at the moment when it was just beginning to find its feet, to the Globe Theatre, where it was bound to undergo the undeserved penalty of murder. No play that we can remember was so badly cast or produced with more mechanism and old-fashioned stage management.

Mr. W. J. Locke suffered from the fact that he was produced by Mr. J. E. Vedrenne. By no means a brilliant play, being artlessly constructed and written in a too flamboyant manner, "The Man from the Sea" was for the most part brilliantly acted, and contained much that was admirable and interesting. Mr. Somerset Maugham's "Grace" might have been a success in different hands. Miss Irene Vanbrugh and Lady Tree were, however, physically and intellectually incapable of embodying the two leading parts to the liking of playgoers. The underlying cynicism and unreality of the play would have been less apparent with a more intelligent treatment. As a piece of dramatic writing it was perhaps the best thing which Mr. Somerset Maugham has hitherto done. What Mr. Maugham failed to bear in mind was that English playgoers, very rightly, detest nastiness, and do not care to spend the evening, even if it costs them nothing, with a set of people whom they would scrupulously avoid in everyday life. "The Eccentric Lord Comberdene," whose successor is already named, is too fantastic to make a wide appeal. All its wit, all its amusing situations, and all its artful characterisation are wasted upon a plot which bewilders the audience.

The plays which were marked out for instant failure and achieved their object were the "Bolt from the Blue," "Decorating Clementine," "The Crisis," and "Young Fernald." The last only was written in a sort of English—the English of America. The others were adaptations from the French. "The Bolt from the Blue," adapted from a piece called "Le Costand des Epinettes," deserved to fail. The French original was silly and superfluous. Mr. Cosmo Hamilton in his adaptation made a fatal mistake in whitewashing the "heroine." He did not realise that in trying to make the actress a good woman he unhitched the whole balance of the play. The piece was miscast in almost every instance and put on the stage with incredible unimaginativeness. The scenery of the last act itself was enough to damn the production. It was laid in the rooms of a woman who was, we were repeatedly asked to believe, a virtuous but Bohemian actress, who had only just made a beginning on the stage, and was therefore in receipt of a very small salary. Her rooms were in a house in one of the slums of Paris, and yet Mr. Dion Boucicault designed a set so elaborate, so luxurious, and so extravagant that it could only be found in one of the most fashionable of French hotels, or in a quarter inhabited by notorious women. Of "Decorating Clementine" it is almost impossible to write with decorum. Adapted by an American from a brilliant and delightful play, which, produced last spring, is still running in Paris, it was presented by Mr. Frohman in New York and intrusted to the tender mercies of such an actor as Mr. George P. Huntley, whose only place is in the pantomime at Drury Lane, where, as Widow Twankey, his conventional funniness would be wholly to the taste of the City clerk. So little does Mr. Frohman know of English audiences that he went to the enormous expense of transplanting the whole production from New York to London. To the infinite credit of the English public this indescribable concoction of banality was absolutely and utterly anathema. What, we ask ourselves, more curiously than ever, has come to Mr. Charles Frohman? He has only to produce a play here and in New York for it to be an immediate failure. He has only to pass on to another management a play which he has acquired and believed to possess none of the elements of success for it to succeed at once. "Inconstant George" is the best example, and a quite recent example was "Nobody's Daughter." If Mr. Charles Frohman were to retire to the Adirondacks, taking with him Mr. Dion Boucicault and Mr. William Lestocq, and they were to devote themselves wholly to the transatlantic pastime of whittling sticks, having placed the capital at their disposal in the hands of any one of the many hundreds of intelligent young men who come down from Oxford with nothing particular to do, it is almost certain that the Frohman theatres would be for the first time for many years the home of plays which would contain something, at any rate, that was pleasant and acceptable. It is only by accident that Mr. Frohman has produced the plays of Mr. Barrie, Mr. Galsworthy, and one or two other dramatists of literary ability.

In dealing with the acting of the Autumn Season it is pleasant to be able to point to quite a lengthy list of actors and actresses who have done admirable work. Mr. Gerald du Maurier in "Nobody's Daughter" ventured to cast himself for a part with which no manager would have had the courage and the intuition to trust him. Always an actor of originality and imagination, Mr. Du Maurier now stands head and shoulders above any man in his profession. The one hopeful thing for the future of the English stage is the fact that Mr. Du Maurier is no longer at the mercy of any manager, but is in a position to choose plays for himself and to produce them in his own inimitable manner. Mr. Robert Loraine, too, has come further to the front, and is marked out for management. Other actors who have proved themselves are Mr. Laurence Irving, Mr. Marsh Allen, Mr. Denis Eadie, Mr. Spencer Trevor, Mr. Holmes Gore, whose ability is quite remarkable, and Mr. Frederick Worlock. Among actresses, Miss Beryl Faber wins easily, and occupies a place side by side with Mr. Du Maurier. Miss Doris Lytton, whose ability Mr. Trench failed to recognise, has made a great and well-deserved success at the Prince of Wales's Theatre. Miss Rosalie Toller in "Nobody's Daughter" has confirmed the belief in her capabilities which was engendered by her performance in "Lorrimer Sabiston." In writing of the Autumn Season, it is necessary to make some reference to the rather vulgar squabble between theatre managers and the managers of music-halls in regard to the question of one-act plays upon the stages of the latter. Prima facie it seems to us that theatre managers are right, from a purely selfish point of view, to use every means in their power to prevent the production on the music-hall stage of boiled-down versions of plays recently produced by themselves. Already they are quite unable to offer any rivalry, except by accident, to the music-halls. They continue, in the face of public cold-shouldering, to charge excessive prices for very unsatisfactory fare, whereas the music-halls strive to give their ever-increasing public more and more that is interesting and excellent at prices well within their means. Conceive the futility of Sir Herbert Tree's attempt to compete with the Coliseum when he offers a production of "Henry VIII.," himself and Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Bourchier, against a Coliseum programme which includes Sarah Bernhardt and Yvette Guilbert. The proposition is reduced to an Euclidian absurdity. The lesson of the Autumn Season is obvious. Theatres are falling into disrepute, and the one chance for them to make a successful effort to compete against the variety theatres is to lower their prices and give greater value to those members of the public who can exist for three hours without smoking, and without a kaleidoscopic programme in seats which are for the most part extremely uncomfortable.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

PAUL GAUGUIN

To a student of modern thought as it swirls and eddies through the activities of the world to-day, the Exhibition of the School of Painters known as the Post-Impressionists is distinctly worth considering. What has brought about this betrayal of all the broad canons of art, which have been orthodox for centuries? It is not, however, intended now to examine the Exhibition or to criticise its contents; much heated controversy has raged about both. We shall consider only certain characteristics of Gauguin's paintings in connection with that which may be termed the thought wave of the day which has given them birth.

To understand Gauguin's artistic ancestry we may turn to the Introduction in the Catalogue of the Exhibition at the Grafton Galleries. There his artistic lineage is traced through Cézanne to Manet and the Impressionists, once so "new" and now vieux-jeu! But the writer insists on a supreme difference between the earlier and later schools. The Impressionists were always trying to record what they saw as faithfully as they could, while the Post-Impressionist's attitude to Nature is to use her to express their thought about her, and throw her over—in some cases entirely—when she is likely to interfere with the line the artist is putting round his mental conception. This leads to startling results. Sometimes the picture seems to be an attempt at art by prehistoric man, sometimes it appears the untaught but expressive efforts of a child. Gauguin's things are so, very often, but—and it is a weighty "but" in this gallery—his drawing and colour can be superb. He can deliberately choose to draw in a stiff, odd manner, reminding one of Cimabue and Giotto in line; the most impossible and perfectly delightful dogs and parrots may lurk in corners. But then the atmosphere of the wood and stream comes straight out of fairyland; they seem to be a part of Hansel and Gretel or of Pelleas and Mélisande, one never quite knows which. The little Tahitian lady is certainly wise in listening to the voices which one can almost hear calling to her out of the blue misty wood.

It is a simpler world than ours that Gauguin has caught and held; not to be led away by any prettiness, detail, or trick of modern paint, he has steadily suggested the simplicity on canvas after canvas of vivid tropical life. Did he go to Tahiti, one wonders, to search for this wonderful, direct, child-like life and world, so full of passionate imagination, mystic and yet very human? Or did he go to find the blues, and pure, plain, intense reds, yellows, and purples, the golden-brown shining bare bodies, that he paints with consummate skill? Finding them he found also something else, which made so violent an appeal that he subordinated all his power to it and became as a little child to learn its secret. The painting of the soft brown body on the bed in the picture "L'esprit veille" is simply wonderful, but the beholder was never meant to look only at that; the little negress seems to hear the same voices that she heard in the wood of Grimm's Fairy Tale, and Gauguin means us to stop and to catch their echoes. They are not always good voices though in Tahiti. "La Montagne Sacrée" has all the strange stillness and horror of a nightmare; the sunny field might have been an instant ago the scene of some secret and hideous rite or orgy; there is something unholy and fatal in the air of the place, conveyed by nothing but a little fat idol in a hilly cornfield; even "L'Esprit du Mal" cannot frighten as much, with all its suggestion of sly sensuality and sin.

Gauguin's paintings are the whole soul of this tropical island with its elements of childlike sweetness, spirituality, primitive passion, and violent emotion. They are the very truth itself; no great novelist could tell more. Take the picture "La Religieuse." It contains the whole history of Christian Missions in Tahiti. The prim little modern figure of the nun sitting on a stool looks so imported, so utterly incongruous to her surroundings; her neat little face brings a whole train of thought with it that is utterly alien to these natives. Yet see how they are listening! Even the one in the distance expresses absolute attention in every line. The story of the quiet little nun is simple yet marvellous, and these brown folk thoroughly understand that simple things are the most marvellous. Gauguin understands this also, and that is how he came to paint this picture and many others. He knows the worth of the fundamental and elemental, and their emotional power when put into gesture and movement.

This is an age when analysis and inquiry into the force of thought occupy many minds, and nowhere is this shown more vividly than in the new School of Post-Impressionism. Some of the pictures are merely hideous cacophonies of colour; some resemble posters; pavement-artists or mad children might have done others; but one spirit dominates them all—"Let my individual idea speak. Subordinate execution to conception," they say, or occasionally shriek, and the most imaginative and suggestive of them all is Paul Gauguin.

FRANK BRANGWYN AND HIS WORK*

THERE is something to be said for Mr. Shaw-Sparrow's opinion that only the critic who is able to appreciate it fully should permit himself to talk about the work of his contemporaries, and certainly, judged from this point of view, no one could be better fitted to discuss the work of Mr. Frank Brangwyn than the author of this book. Whatever individual opinions may be held as to the rightness of his judgment in giving such a high place to Mr. Brangwyn's art, it will be generally admitted that Mr. Shaw-Sparrow is an able interpreter of its many fine qualities, and this because he has been able to study it, as most people will agree with him that all such work should be studied, "from within its own emotion." He feels a reasonable impatience with the critic who, looking at Mr. Brangwyn's wall decorations in the Royal Exchange, sighed for "the undying loveliness that the personality of Botticelli, delicate

* Frank Brangwyn and his Work. By Walter Shaw-Sparrow. (Kegan Paul and Co. 10s. 6d. net.)

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

as a bed of wet violets in the Springtime, conveys to us." Mr. Shaw-Sparrow does not say he considers Botticelli insipid, though he implies something of the sort in speaking of Burne-Jones and the English Pre-Raphaelites. All that is necessary here, however, is that he should appreciate the character and enter into the spirit of Mr. Brangwyn's paintings, and that he does this there can be little question. One cannot help feeling what a very real and valuable service—and we think a sufficient one at this stage—he might have rendered at once to Mr. Brangwyn and to the reader had he been content with interpreting this spirit; but Mr. Shaw-Sparrow sometimes allows his enthusiasm to run away with him. We may quote, for instance, his criticism of Whistler, when, in praising Mr. Brangwyn's manipulation and powerful treatment of a crowd, he says that "Whistler achieved much with little because he had not enough emotional endurance to do much with more." He even goes so far as to quote with approbation Mr. Macfall's pronouncement that in the pictures of Mr. Brangwyn there is "a largeness, an inimitable sense of grandeur" which has been granted to no other British painter save Turner! Mr. Shaw-Sparrow falls into a habit common to writers of books of this sort, and almost kills with kindness. His praise would have been much more impressive had it been less lavish.

A great deal is said on the subject of art criticism. The author devotes, we think, an unnecessary amount of space to quotations from the art notices which have appeared in various newspapers and periodicals since the time when Mr. Brangwyn exhibited his first picture, some of which contain little more than mere description, and are far from being really interesting. With Mr. Shaw-Sparrow's views on the morals of art criticism most people will probably agree; but he surely attaches undue importance to the writings of certain of the newspaper critics and their permanent value. On the other hand, he seems to argue that because, in spite of unfavourable reviews, Mr. Brangwyn's work has already attained a degree of success and recognition to which comparatively few now deny its right, his immortality is therefore assured, and that for the sceptics of the part there can be nothing but scorn. Only Time can prove whether or not such a view is extravagant.

A FATUOUS EGOIST

THE essential theme of the wide earth is surely Egoism. Her musics are constructed out of it, in varying assonance and dissonance, melody or cacophony. Her great and august children step to this theme set in splendour. Even those whom she would fain deny, but cannot, her bent and crooked, her dark and distempered—even to these the musics have but gone awry, being broken and no longer mellifluous. For to the denial of self there must first be possession of self. Unselfishness is not emptiness, but Egoism triumphant, sung in pure melody.

Nevertheless, be this as it may, if the essential theme of the earth be Egoism, the perennial theme of laughter is the Egoist turned fatuous. Malvolio was even such an Egoist. Strutting the earth with pride, he preened himself in the everlasting mirrors of self-contentment. Sublimely content, he read beauty and perfection in the very terms of himself, scorning as unworthy all that bore no resemblance to the fashion of himself. "Dost thou think, because thou art virtuous, there shall be no more cakes and ale?" It was just what he did think. The figure he saw yonder in the mirrors was the very expression of beauty. Who could deny it? Therefore, by inevitable logic, figures dissimilar to it could only be disfigurements, to be set aside and forgotten. Thus he turned away from the world of importunate fact, and lived within the world whose law was himself.

Yet sometimes his course of duty compelled him to face the world of importunate fact, when he is bewildered, and the spirits of laughter hang over the scene and make merry at him. It was so when he faced Viola. He swept her aside; and she would not be swept aside. He bade her depart, erased her from knowledge; she would neither go nor be erased. Was ever such a problem? He returns to Olivia, and says, with perplexity and injury in every note of his voice, "Madam, yond young fellow swears he will speak with you. I told him you were sick; he takes on him to understand so much, and therefore comes to speak with you. I told him you were asleep; he seems to have a foreknowledge of that too, and therefore comes to speak with you. What is to be said to him, lady? He's fortified against any denial." What, indeed? He even defied being ignored. "What manner of man is he?" asks Olivia. "Of very ill manner," replies he, with considerable injury.

"Sick of self-love" he truly was, seen from without; but not so from within his own world self-entire and self-complete; for there he is the pattern and the rule of health. "An affectioned ass," Maria, his subsequent undoer, calls him, "that cons state without book, and utters it by great swaths." Wherein she was very true, but something short of just. Being complete in himself, what needs he of book? He is his own book. "Great swaths" are merely for the compelling of others; if they will not be compelled, good! for so they approve their own worthlessness.

His was no propagandist zeal. No reformer, he. Too delicately poised was his perfect world of self to bear the jolt and tussle of propaganda and conflict. Indeed, what need was there? The contemplation of virtue is its own reward. To such contemplation he himself turned, and found the occupation gratifying and consolatory. Ambition he eschewed, for not only was he supremely satisfied with the figure his surrounding mirrors portrayed; he had, further, small reason for discontent. Was he not the only man of consequence in Olivia's household? Portly Sir Toby, singing uproarious catches at the dead of night, was already negligible—even the lady Olivia was irked by his raucous hilarity. His tool Aguecheek counted for nothing; and the fool was only an allowed intrusion. So he moved in circles of peace and self-contentment.

As long as he did so he was impervious. But could he once be tempted to essay an attack on the world without himself, then light of a different hue would break past into his world, and bring with it incongruity, that fount of humour. Let him quit the pirouetting before his eternal mirrors to venture the heights of ambition, and discomfiture would follow swiftly and inevitably. They all felt this; but who was to do it? Not Sir Toby, for this buxom yet somewhat choleric knight was eaten with anger at the bare sight of the man, and could but wrathfully bid him to "Snick up!" It was not he who could "gull him into a nayword" or "make him a common recreation."

Yet, though Sir Toby, Aguecheek, and the fool were so helpless, there was another who could bring pride to a fall. Maria, Sir Toby's valiant Penthesilia of subtle warfare, has her plan; she will so expose Malvolio to the cross-lights playing athwart his central self-content that he shall be seen for ever as the incarnation of fatuity. "It is his ground of faith that all who look on him love him," says she; "and on that vice in him will my revenge find notable cause to work." "I will drop in his way some obscure epistles of love; wherein, by the colour of his beard, the shape of his leg, the manner of his gait, the expressure of his eye, forehead, and complexion, he shall find himself most feelingly personated. I can write very like my lady," she adds; and so will tempt him to fall headlong in love with Olivia; or, rather, will tempt him to believe that Olivia has indeed fallen headlong in love with him—a truer perception of hers!

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

So she weaves her plot; and for its better success lets fall innocent observations in his hearing that shall prime him the more readily to stumble into the snare set for him. Thus, wondering nothing that others should perceive the excellence he had so long known for irrefragable fact, he advances on the letter that lies in his path like a dire engine of destruction. Little he perceives Sir Toby, Sir Andrew Aguecheek, and Fabian lurking behind the boxwood hedge to see the woodcock snared in the gin; little he knows that innumerable spirits of mirth throng the air waiting to explode into delicate and silvery laughter of the mind. The letter opened, its contents touched in his mind its central theme.

It is as clear as daylight to him. Its very aloof suggestion and far innuendo are only matters of further conviction; for is it not thus it should be couched, bearing so delicate a burthen? "Daylight and champagne discovers not more," he cries exultantly; "this is open. I will be proud, I will read politic authors, I will baffle Sir Toby, I will wash off gross acquaintances, I will be point-de-vise the very man. I thank my stars I am happy." The letter bids him who commended his yellow stockings, and wished to see him ever cross-gartered! "I will be strange," says he, "stout, in yellow stockings, and cross-gartered, even with the swiftness of putting on." It adds, "If thou entertainest my love, let it appear in thy smiling: thy smiles becomes thee well; therefore in my presence still smile, dear, my sweet, I prythee." "God," he says, "I thank thee—I will smile."

As he goes off, with the poison working furiously in his blood, Maria appears and gaily informs the company that as for Olivia yellow is "a colour she abhors," and cross-gartering "a fashion she detests." The spirits of laughter are alive in the air; presently she returns, saying, "If you desire the spleen, and will laugh yourselves into stitches, follow me. Yond gull, Malvolio, is turned heathen; a very renegade; for there is no Christian, that means to be saved by believing rightly, can ever believe such impossible passages of grossness." "He's in yellow stockings!" "And cross-gartered?" asks Sir Toby. "Most villainously," she replies, "he does obey every point of the letter that I dropped to betray him; he does smile his face into more lines than are in the new map, with the augmentation of the Indies; you have not seen such a thing as 'tis; I can hardly forbear hurling things at him. I know my lady will strike him."

Thus they troop off to the climax of quintessential humour. For herself, Maria goes off to her mistress's ear, and informs her that Malvolio is indeed coming as he has been bidden to, "but in very strange manner." "Madam, he does nothing but smile." And Olivia, as Malvolio floats towards her, blowing kisses at her, is aghast at her steward, lately so grave, and now so strangely bedizened. She is amazed; but he is elate. She asks him the cause of his unwonted smiling, telling him she sent for him "upon a sad occasion." "Sad, lady?" "I could be sad; this does make some obstruction in the blood, this cross-gartering; but what of that?"

The height of humour is reached, and the deeps are beyond. All heights have their deeps. Falstaff died of a broken heart; the famous and immaculate knight awoke to find himself plain Alonzo Quixano. And Malvolio shut in darkness for a hopeless lunatic is a subject of pity. But light has been broken on him. Egoism laments its hopelessness; fatuity begs for release. When release comes he spurns them all to rebuild his broken structure of self; but in different wise shall he build it. Yet is humour vindicated, for he mocked at mirth, mirth ends in mocking at him, and thus the whirligig of Time brings its revenges.

NEW YEAR'S EVE

THERE is no particular reason, save the convenience and stability of a convention, why the night of December 31st should differ from the other three hundred and sixty-four nights of the year; and yet, unless we are really exhausted of all sentiment whatever, a certain feeling of finality and of possible fresh beginnings attaches to that date. We cast up accounts other than those in ledgers and balance-sheets; we glance back over the period which we term "the past year," and exult or grieve, according to our disposition and the successes or lapses which we see written in its heterogeneous columns. We look forward with inevitable curiosity, with a rather weird, "spooky" sensation, and wonder what that hypothetical personage the New Year will bring—whether he will be merry or glum, kind or harsh, generous with his favours or close-fisted. It may even be that in secret we revert to the old custom of framing a good resolution or two—knowing all the time that in three days we shall have forgotten all about them and shall be just our old selves again. In any case, we "keep up" New Year's Eve in some fashion or other. Perhaps we only sit by the fire alone, yet we close the book and surrender ourselves to the sad, reflective mood which invariably drifts over us during the last half-hour before midnight chimes; and when the bells ring out their "music nighest bordering upon heaven" over the city, we sigh. Another year has gone, for better or for worse; we have made new friends, lost old ones; love has come, love has passed, and the pattern of our puzzling lives is still unfinished. Better, perhaps, is the way of those who drown the voices of the past by mirth and jollity, who gather at the feast, drinking a health to the new-comer and speeding the parting guest with a hearty cheer.

"No one (wrote Elia) ever regarded the First of January with indifference. The birth of a new year is of an interest too wide to be pretermitted by king or cobbler. It is that from which all date their time, and count upon what is left. It is the nativity of our common Adam. . . . The elders with whom I was brought up were of a character not likely to let slip the sacred observance of any old institution, and the ringing out of the Old Year was kept by them with circumstances of peculiar ceremony."

Throughout many centuries the festival of the New Year has been observed by gifts or rejoicings. The Druids used on certain days to cut the sacred mistletoe with a golden knife, and at the New Year its branches were distributed among the people. On this day the Romans were accustomed to congratulate their friends and to give presents: these often took the form of figs and dates wrapped in gold-leaf, accompanied by monetary gifts, and were supposed to propitiate the deities. According to an old "Encyclopedia of Antiquities," such gifts were continued under the Roman Emperors until they were prohibited by Claudius; "nor," says the writer, "did they wholly cease, although condemned by ecclesiastical Councils on account of the pagan ceremonies at their presentation." Among the Saxons the period was observed with "more than ordinary jollity and feasting."

Customs of such ancient origin die hard, and this one in particular has been preserved by ceaseless observance, at any rate in European countries. In a public record of the reign of Edward VI. occurs an entry of sundry "rewards given on New Year's Day to the King's officers and servants in ordinary, £155 5s., and to their servants that present the king's majestie with New Year's gifts." The English version of a Latin poem written in 1553 runs thus, referring to the festival:—

The next to this is Newe yeares day whereon to every frende,
They costly presents in do bring,
and Newe yeares giftes do sende;

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

These giftes the husband gives his wife,
and father eke the childe,
And maister on his men bestowes
the like, with favour milde.

It is curious and amusing to read the account summarised by the indefatigable Hone of the presents showered on Queen Elizabeth at the beginning of the year. "All the bishops, the chief officers of state, and several of the queen's household servants, even down to her apothecaries, master cook, serjeant of the pastry, etc., gave new year's gifts to her majesty; consisting, in general, either of a sum of money, or jewels, trinkets, wearing apparel, etc." To modern readers it almost seems as though the Queen must have been fully provided for the whole year to come, so numerous and various is the category. "Many of the temporal lords and great officers, and most of the peeresses, gave rich gowns, petticoats, shifts, silk stockings, garters, sweet-bags, doublets, mantles embroidered with precious stones, looking-glasses, fans, bracelets, caskets studded with jewels, and other costly trinkets." The Master of the Savoy gave her a Bible, richly ornamented; her physician proffered a box of foreign sweetmeats—dare we entertain a suspicion of an ulterior motive here? Ginger candy, probably home-made, came from the apothecaries; "a pair of sweet gloves" was the choice of some Italian courtiers; and one "Smyth, the dustman"—good fellow!—presented her Majesty with "two bolts of cambrick." He deserves, this gallant dustman, to have his name spelt with a "y." But a pretty sidelight is thrown on the business-like Queen when we read that "though Elizabeth made returns to the New Year's gifts, in plate and other articles, yet she took sufficient care that the balance should be in her own favour."

In the North of England and in Scotland it has for long been the custom to end the old year merrily and to begin the new one with laughter. At one time the maidens of the villages carried round from door to door a bowl of "wassail," or spiced ale, chanting as they did so various crude rhymes, hopeful of small recognitions, somewhat after the style of our youngsters who parade the side-streets with an effigy of Guy Fawkes on the Fifth of November. In Shakespearean days the mummers perambulated the district—often merely the youths and girls dressed up in each others' clothes—singing and dancing, stopping here and there to partake of the good cheer provided for them.

The "Candlemas Bull" is a superstition which used to be common in the Highlands; a passing cloud on New Year's Eve took the imaginary shape of the animal, and by its movements or changes good or bad weather was prognosticated. The most peculiar performances, however, were those which attached to water-drawing. The Highlanders on New Year's Eve formed themselves into bands and collected juniper-bushes; "a certain discreet person" was sent to the ford to draw a vessel of water in silence, without permitting the pitcher to touch the earth. Early on New Year's morning this magical water was drunk, and was supposed to be a charm against witchcraft and the evil eye. Then the master of the ceremonies splashed everybody in the room with water, and, as generally the hour for rising had not arrived, it was not unusual, says the chronicler quaintly, "for him to receive ungrateful remonstrances against ablution." But worse is to follow. Closing all the doors and windows, he proceeded to kindle the pungent juniper-bushes in each apartment, until the whole household was fairly near to suffocation. The operator disregards the chorus of coughs, sneezes, and groans, because the more perfect the "smeech" the more potent the spell; he "continues, with streaming eyes and averted head, to increase the fumigation, until in his own defence he admits the air to recover the exhausted household and himself. He then treats the horses, cattle, and other stock with the same smothering to keep them from harm throughout the year. When the gudewife gets up, and, having ceased from coughing, has gained sufficient strength to reach the bottle, she administers its comfort to the relief of the sufferers; laughter takes place of complaint, all the family get up, wash their faces, and receive the visits of their neighbours, who arrive full of gratulations peculiar to the day." Breakfast was then served, and we can imagine that the poor victims needed it; but we are conscious of a distinct sensation of gratitude that their faces had been washed first.

So, for many pages, we might go on recounting curious customs and New Year's celebrations. In a few distant parts of the country some faint reminiscences of the old-time superstitions are still obtainable, but the spirit of the town is shown more in the good wishes and good fare which seem to belong particularly to the opening days of a fresh year. We cast behind us, as out of tune with the hopeful nature of the hours, the sense of sadness, the vain regrets. How finely Elia broke through the bars of lugubrious memories in his "New Year's Eve"! "Every dead man must take upon himself to be lecturing me with his odious truism that 'Such as he now is I must shortly be.' Not so shortly, friend, perhaps, as thou imaginest. In the meantime, I am alive. I move about. I am worth twenty of thee. Know thy betters! Thy New Year's Days are past." We lean to the creed of the optimist during these festivals, in spite of the fog and frost of our uncomfortable winters; we are inclined to echo the words of Walter Savage Landor:—

Each year bears something from us as it flies,
We only blow it farther with our sighs.

To analyse this curious feeling of high spirits which so often takes possession of us after we have once crossed the mysterious line of midnight on December 31st would lead us into the realms of psychology and metaphysics. There is no real reason for it, as far as we can see. The weather, which influences us to so great an extent, is usually atrocious; the days are dark and depressing, the nights are damp and clammy. Perhaps in the impression that old errors can be retrieved, old mistakes avoided in the future, that we can actually "make a fresh start" lies the secret of our sudden cheer. We realise with Thoreau that "heaven is under our feet as well as over our heads." Janus, the god of gates and avenues, is holding open for a little while the portals of a land unknown, wherein may chance many great adventures. Not until we have come off second best in some of those adventures of soul or body shall we begin to think that this year is much about the same as its predecessors. However, at present we address ourselves to the conquest of the very New Year 1911, and may well take Herrick's advice:—

Then, as ye sit about your embers,
Call not to mind the fled Decembers;
But think on these, that are to appear,
As daughters to the instant year.

And another stanza, most happy in its metaphor, from the poet Cowper is extremely apt at the present time:—

If hindrances obstruct thy way,
Thy magnanimity display,
And let thy strength be seen;
But O! if fortune fill thy sail
With more than a propitious gale,
Take half thy canvas in.

So, while "that turncoat bell, that just now mournfully chanted the obsequies of 1910 departed" (let the shade of Elia pardon us the paraphrase) still echoes in our ears, let us take another glass to the coming year. We survive, "jolly candidates for 1911," at any rate. "Where be those puling fears just now expressed or affected? Passed like a cloud—clean washed away by a wave of genuine Helicon, your only Spa for hypochondriacs. And now another cup of the generous! and a Merry New Year, and many of them to you all, my masters!"

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

CHANCE OR ZERO

In London it was raining, raining; all things were plunged in a sepia mist as the train drew out of Victoria. At Dover, too, it rained, and in Calais; but soon after the lamps were lighted, the curtains in our "sleeper" drawn, and the rain shut out. When we awoke in Marseilles the sun was shining as if we had swung back into August, and our clothes were unpleasantly heavy. Ruskin stormed against railways, but Turner's vision of them as magical was truer; they are the veritable necromancers of modern times, and transport you from winter to summer while you sleep. I prefer the P.L.M. to Aladdin's carpet. The rug must have been alarmingly unstable at best, and sleep on it or rest quite impossible.

Monte Carlo is at once the most fairylike place and the most materially real—like a flower on a dunghill. On the terrace in the morning crowds of well-dressed persons were to be seen in a setting of perfect scenery, looking as if they had not a care in the world; at night the glory of the Casino gardens, lit with topazes and diamonds, the palm-fronds showing grey green against the purple velvet sky, and about one the scent of flowers. Nowhere a sign of poverty or labour or care; pretty villas on every side, flowers on every wall, exotic strange plants in every garden, silent motor-cars sliding about, furs and laces in juxtaposition, signs of luxury everywhere, and all the well-being, all the comfort built on one passion.

The Casino last year made over two millions of money, it is said, half of which it is estimated comes out of English pockets. The Casino spends over a quarter of a million a year in subsidies to foreign newspapers to prevent attack and to ensure favourable notices. Consequently the Casino managers can reckon at least on their benevolent gratuitous goodwill. Not a day passes but some newspaper publishes without invitation a puff of the Casino. I take up the ——— of to-day, December 13th, and find a paragraph headed—

"Lucky Monte Carlo Visitor.

"Helped by No. 29, Mr. Darnborough wins £6,400 in day's play."

Now that may or may not be a fact; in any case, the paragraph is a puff of the gambling-rooms, and it is not paid for.

The general truth about Monte Carlo, however, is never seen in any English paper; the common experience to the effect that every one who gambles at roulette loses is never even hinted at; yet this is the truth, the almost universal experience. It would be safe to say, without knowing the facts, that if Mr. Darnborough won £6,400 in a day at Monte Carlo, he had previously lost more than £20,000 there, probably more than £30,000. For no one wins £6,400 without playing very high and very persistently, and whoever plays high and often is sure to lose very large sums before he carries off £6,000. It is heavy loss usually that makes one gamble boldly and persistently.

I have tested this theory a hundred times. At one time Monsieur S——, the head of one of the greatest steel-works in France, was a heavy gambler. He used to play three maximums a day of £480 each at Trente-et-Quarante, and for two or three weeks he won very often. It was therefore rumoured that he had won £10,000. The usual paragraphs began to appear in the London papers. A day or two later I happened to be introduced to Monsieur S——, and in time came to know him pretty well. One of these paragraphs gave me the cue, and I asked him whether it was true he had won £10,000?

"Strange to say," he said, "I am business-like even in my gambling, and for the last twenty years at Monte Carlo I have kept a book of my gains and losses. . . . I gamble in maximums because that gives one some slight chance of avoiding the refait—the odd chance that falls in favour of the bank about once in fifty times. Naturally, if you play often the refait is sure to come against you, but if you play only three times a day you have some chance of avoiding it. Of course, that's only a superstition," he added, smilingly; "I have found that the refait falls on me with almost mathematical precision. Every forty or fifty coups—that is, about once a fortnight—I lose half my stake." After lunch he took up a little red morocco book, and said:—

"Now I can answer any of your questions."

"The chief question is," I said, "Have you lost or won in the twenty years?"

"That is easily answered," he replied. "I have lost every year. My worst year was in 1888, when I lost £19,000; my best year 1892, when I lost only £6,000. But then in the bad year I played considerably longer than in the good year. The thing that astonishes me in the results is the almost mathematical accuracy of them. People talk of the Goddess of Chance; 'tis the Goddess of Certainty that reigns at Monte Carlo. . . . I am a shareholder in the Casino, and we notice exactly the same thing about our profits. They increase year after year, but they vary a little according to the number of visitors. Again, in this respect it is the mathematical certainty of the result which is surprising."

"Then," I said, "you agree with me that any one who comes to Monte Carlo and plays for any length of time is certain to lose?"

"Absolutely certain!" was the reply of Monsieur S——, who was one of the richest and one of the best business men in France.

"Tell me," I went on probing, "is it worse for the punter than horse-racing?"

"Distinctly worse," he replied, "from my point of view. You see there are only twenty or thirty men in France who have large studs of racehorses, and they all know one another more or less. There is a certain esprit de corps amongst them. Accordingly, when they know a very good thing they tell it to their friends, and this small coterie have a far better chance of winning than they have at Monte Carlo; but the average punter, who knows nobody, and who bets at races, is, I imagine, just as sure to lose as when he bets at Monte Carlo. 'Tis impossible to protect a fool from his folly."

"Why, then, do you play at Monte Carlo?" I asked, smiling.

"It amuses me," he said, "to see how relentless chance is—or rather, what one calls chance."

It is not chance that has built up Monte Carlo and made M. Camille Blanc one of the richest men in Europe, it is certainty; and the name of the certainty is Zero. Monte Carlo is built on Zero, and Zero is as certain as the British taxgatherer—as certain as death itself.

THE NEW ENGLISH ART CLUB

The Exhibition of the New English Art Club at the well-known galleries in Suffolk Street is always interesting, irrespective of its actual merits. It may be supposed to represent the younger blood and the more ardent spirits in the art world, and it should be possible to forecast from its works more readily than from the staid and sober exhibits at Burlington House the coming developments which will result from the tendencies which may here be seen at work. We must confess to a sense of disappointment. The general impression left upon our mind is that of a want of balance. A painter gets hold forcibly of some one truth or fact in Nature, and to bring it out he will sacrifice ruthlessly a thousand subsidiary features which are indispensable to a satisfactory interpretation of the subject. Many fine effects can be produced with the palette-knife, but several of the pictures in this Exhibition have been ruined by its excessive use. Constable marred not a few of his great landscapes by his multiplication of broken lights which his rivals either did not see or deliberately disregarded. Now that Constable is more rightly appreciated this faulty multiplication of such lights is still more in evidence, and his disciples seem eager to emulate his deficiencies to the comparative disregard of his transcendent merits. There is, in short, a craving after originality, which more often takes the form of mere eccentricity, without waiting to acquire that mastery of technique through which alone any adequate self-expression—artistic or otherwise—is possible.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

For sheer easy and almost contemptuous mastery of his technique the two water-colour sketches by Mr. Sargent stand alone. In a few bold washes and sweeping strokes he expresses perfectly the essential features of difficult subjects—subjects wholly uninteresting save for the technical difficulties which they present. Everything is there—rounded outlines, perfect foreshortening, light falling direct, light reflected, light shining through a semi-transparent screen, colour richly and easily handled, and all with that seeming simplicity and inevitability that indicate the hand of a master. Cleverness could scarcely be carried further. The expression of light and shadow is the aim of Mr. Connard in his pictures of Castleacre Castle and Priory; his method is bold even to roughness, but it is eminently expressive. Mr. William Orpen's pictures are a striking feature of the Exhibition. He, too, aims at rendering sunlight in its fullest and most vivid intensity, and he succeeds by daring methods which come nigh to failure and whose only justification is success—which is, after all, the best excuse that can be offered for anything. In sharp contrast is Mr. F. V. Poole's quiet painting of "The Creek," which adjoins it—a conscientious piece of work, and faithful and true withal, if not strikingly original. Mr. Maclaren has, to our mind, succeeded in marring—if not actually spoiling—his promising group of three children by the use of the palette-knife, which makes their faces look coarse and dirty, when smoother handling would have saved the situation. Mr. Walter Bayes' "Harbour Scene" and Mr. McEvoy's "Dieppe Harbour" are both charming and skilful pieces of work; so, too, is "The Rocky Portal," by Mr. W. Russell.

A picture which leaves an abiding memory is Mr. Wilson Steer's "Girl in Blue"—a beautiful half-length portrait, which succeeds, in spite of the almost garish tint of the dress, in virtue of the delicacy and character of the portrait and the clever and beautiful painting of the hands. Gentleness and sweetness and "the long, long thoughts" of youth have been expressed without degenerating into anything like cheap sentiment, and the technique is free from any eccentricities of handling which distract attention from the message of the picture itself—a point that our young painters do not always bear in mind. A fine landscape, bathed in clear light, is Mr. Hayward's "Landslip near Lyme Regis," and there is more than ordinary merit, too, in Professor Brown's "Glimpse of the Severn." Mr. Orpen is again at his best in the picture which he calls "Afternoon on the Cliff," another charming portrayal of a summer effect. Mr. Spencer Gore's "Taunton Vale" is also a landscape to recall with pleasure. There is no little feeling, too, in Mr. Talmage's "Blue and Silver"—a delightful glimpse of sea touched by the sun into a streak of silver. Among portraits we recall with pleasure that of "Gillian," by Mr. W. Russell, and two by Miss Ethel Walker and Miss Margaret Gere.

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

THE public appears to be asleep; at any rate, it is not sufficiently wide awake to buy even bargains like Home Rails, Unions, Russians. Every one is apathetic. We are convinced that 1911 will prove a prosperous year; but our convictions are not strong enough to force us to buy stocks and shares. We do not even gamble. Investment brokers report dull days, and speculative brokers don't find enough business to pay expenses. But I think we shall soon see a change, for money is going to be cheap.

Money is the real ruler of our markets. No depression can stand up against cheap money. We must pay back a certain amount of gold to Paris, for the Bank of France holds a large parcel of our bills. But Egypt will soon be returning the gold we lent her for the cotton crop. She has taken nearly eleven millions. We must not forget that the Rand will send us well over £600,000 a week. This huge output, so steady and so certain to continue, must produce a great effect on prices.

Consols are strong, and appear certain to rise; the Government must reduce the Debt, and will probably buy Consols. The bankers do not like the Floating Debt reduced beyond a certain limit, and they are most anxious to see Consols back at 90. It may take a year to effect this—a year of peace and cheap money; yet it will come about. Consols are the barometer of our credit. I do not suggest that they should be purchased for mere market purposes, but I do think some effort should be made to popularise them. They should be easily transferable. They should be sold as Rentes are sold—in small lots either registered or to bearer, and the interest should be payable at any post-office. The Bonds should also be purchasable at any post-office. If Consols were made attractive the price would soon rise. The popularisation of Consols would increase the saving power of the nation. There are no real difficulties in the way, only the innate dislike of the banking world to any innovation.

The Foreign Market is idle, but dealers have been much amused at Sir Edward Holden's attack upon Japanese. His arguments are unanswerable, but they are the arguments of a Tariff Reformer, and Sir Edward is popularly supposed to be the faithful adviser of Mr. Lloyd George! Sir Edward Grey should insist upon six millions being spent in England. The last Manchurian Loan was spent in the United States. It was a failure, but the underwriters made a good market, and soon unloaded. The South Manchurian Railway is managed in the interests of Japanese traders; and the ports, wharves, warehouses are not exactly the "open doors" the Japanese would have us believe. I see signs of a great reaction in this market. My urgent advice is, therefore, to leave all Japanese stocks severely alone.

Americans are cheerful, but there is no business. Nevertheless, I see every sign of a good market in a few weeks. I attach very little importance to the poor returns on the Railways. The managers are determined to obtain higher rates, and they wish to make a bad showing. They tell me that Morgans have decided to help the Copper people, and that Smelters are to be put on the London market. My New York friends advise the purchase of the 6 per cent. convertible bonds now round about par. The interest is safe enough, and the option to exchange makes the speculation attractive. I have before advised the purchase of Union Convertibles. Indeed all these convertible bonds are admirable investments for those who have money to lock up. Buyers get a safe return, and the certainty that when a boom comes along they will be able to sell out and net from 20 to 25 per cent. on their capital investment.

Canadian Pacifics have risen in sympathy with Yankees. The bulls talk of melon-cutting, but this seems unlikely. The Railway will want all its funds. "Can Pacs" are an excellent investment, but I do not regard them as an equally good speculation. Grand Trunks are out of favour—the gamble is dead. An effort is being made to interest the English public in Canadian Northern, the Mackenzie and Mann line. But though this line has been cleverly managed and cleverly financed, and though both partners have appeared in the New Year's Honours list, I see no reason why investors should signalise their approval of Mr. Asquith's selection by buying Canadian Northerns. They might pause until they have perused an article on the line that appeared in a recent issue of the Economist.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Mexican Rails are, I am assured by all the jobbers, to be put up again. The reason being a good harvest and some wonderful traffics. I have a great respect for the jobber in Mexican Rails. He is as bright a man as any in the House—he has to be, or he could not live—but his tips are not always to be followed. There is a bull account. Can it be that the jobbers themselves are bulls?

I am somewhat weary of always advising a purchase of Home Rails. When the dividends are declared my optimism will be justified. I repeat—and I shall not have many more chances before the reports are out—that Great Northern Deferred, South Western Deferred, Great Westerns, Great Centrals, Great Easterns are good to buy. I say again that those who want a long shot should buy Great Central Deferred. I said "buy" when they were 11½. They are now 13. They will soon be 20, and in two years' time 35 to 40.

The Rubber auctions are not encouraging. But there is so small a market in Rubber to-day that the dealers have not the heart to sell a bear. Hardly a week passes but shareholders receive some painful surprise. The latest fiasco was Rangoon Para, floated by Guthrie and Company, who are respectable enough to have known better. Yet so intense was the excitement during the boom that the Board went to allotment upon a report procured by the vendors which valued the estates at £205,000. When the awakening came, Mr. A. B. Lake made a valuation of £35,250! Yet all parties have met and agreed to attempt to continue the Company. The Messrs. Guthrie—worthy optimists—helped the Board over an awkward fence by joining in a guarantee of 6 per cent. until 1913. But how can Rangoon Para pay upon a capital of £205,000, which may possibly be increased? No rubber-estate can hope for success if it is over-capitalised. That is why I advise those who must buy Rubber shares to buy only into companies who purchased their rubber at £50 an acre or less. You can buy land to-day and clear and plant, and bring to the producing stage at £32 an acre. Why then pay £75 to £100 for land that will not pay any dividend for three or four years?

The Spies meeting has been held, and the Board will now build their refinery. I hope that long ere it is finished the oil war will have ended. I do not understand why any shareholders should have grumbled at the arrangement for financing the new issue. It appears to me the only sound policy. I think the refinery a mistake, but once it was decided to build, it was the bounden duty of the Board to assure themselves that the cash was there. It would have been silly to rely upon the shareholders, especially as many are French, hold bearer scrip, and cannot be reached.

Kaffirs continue dull, very dull indeed. The reduction in the Crown Mines dividend was foreseen. But it is only temporary, for the new battery of 160 head will be at work by June. There is much talk of what City Deep will do when the mill cleans up at the end of this month, but the first clean up is always a disappointment. Central Randfontein will start its huge 600-head battery shortly. The new mills will increase the Rand output, but we must not forget that the older mines are daily finding some difficulty in keeping down working costs. Labour may be obtained in larger quantities, and there is much talk of the heavier stope-drills doing away with a great portion of the labour trouble; but, as I have said, the market is dull. Paris does not now buy Kaffirs, and the British public finds no incitement to purchase into the older mines. Their lives are rapidly coming to a close.

Rhodesians are written up in all the newspapers. Every man in the House says that we must see a boom. But the public resolutely stands aside. The plain truth is that most people realise that all the finance companies have huge blocks of shares they desire to sell, and everybody is afraid to buy. Again, it can hardly be said that the Rhodesian magnates are a happy family. They watch each other cautiously. There is no cohesion; there are too many trusts and too many managers. They are all too anxious to make money out of each other. Sir Abe Bailey is acute, Dr. Sauer is not an infant in arms, Mr. Latilla was not born yesterday, Mr. Sear is supposed to know his way about, and the Weil family, though full of enthusiasm for the land out of which they have made their fortunes, are not averse from taking a profit when they see it. I think that the mines are many of them phenomenally rich. They are managed by good men, but the public wants a run for its money, and it doesn't quite see how it can get it. The best thing the magnates can do is to pool all their shares and appoint one of their number to manage the pool.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

WILDE'S "SALOMÉ" AND THE CRITICS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—It would be hard to find a work that has provoked more unverified and unverifiable assertions than Oscar Wilde's "Salomé." From Mr. Chesterton downwards, almost every journalist has contrived to add something to the legend already surrounding the play. I had expected better things from your musical critic, whose accuracy is usually unimpeachable. But even he appears to have taken his courage in both hands, and risked an assertion without looking at either the French original or the translation of the play. He speaks of Wilde's "imaginative verses," when he must surely know that the play was first written in French prose.

Will you also allow me to object to his unfortunate comparison of the play to a "beautiful courtesan"? I am ready enough to admit that it has grave faults. It wants atmosphere and human interest, and is too literary, too cold and brilliant. I deny that it is meretricious, that its appeal is in any way to the lower instincts. Any pornographic associations are due to the lamentably corrupt decorations by Beardsley, which are not so much illustrations as frankly cynical comments on the text.—I am, etc.,

HESTER BRAYNE.

BOOKS RECEIVED

FICTION

The Mountain of God. By E S. Stevens. Illustrated. Mills and Boon. 6s.

Gilead Balm. Knight Errant: his Adventures in Search of the Truth. By Bernard Capes. Illustrated. T. Fisher Unwin. 6s.

The Simpkins Plot. By George A. Birmingham. With Coloured Frontispiece. Thomas Nelson and Sons. 2s. net.

Dennis Trench: a Plotless History of how he followed the Gleam and worked out his own Salvation. By Mrs. H. H. Penrose. Alston Rivers. 6s.

Pam the Fiddler: a Tale of the Rising Brooks. By Halliwell Sutcliffe. T. Werner Laurie. 6s.

The Love of Kusuma: an Eastern Love-Story. By Bal Krishna. With an Introduction by Victoria Cross. T. Werner Laurie. 6s.

Doctor Grey. By Stephen Andrew. Greening and Co. 6s.

The First Temptation of St. Anthony by Gustave Flaubert. Being a Translation into English by René Francis from the 1849-1856 Manuscripts edited by Louis Bertrand. Duckworth and Co. 7s. 6d. net.

Priest and Layman. By Ada Carter. T. Werner Laurie. 6s.

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS

The Spanish Journal of Elizabeth Lady Holland. Edited by the Earl of Ilchester. With Portrait and Map. Longmans, Green and Co. 15s. net.

The Beaux and the Dandies: Nash, Brummell, and D'Orsay, with their Courts. By Clare Jerrold. Illustrated. Stanley Paul and Co. 16s. net.

The Church and the Empire, being an Outline of the History of the Church from A.D. 1003 to A.D. 1304. By D. J. Medley, M.A. Rivingtons. 4s. 6d. net.

The Arts and Crafts of our Teutonic Forefathers, being the Substance of the Rhind Lectures for 1909. By G. Baldwin Brown, M.A. Illustrated. T. N. Foulis. 5s. net.

Visitation Articles and Injunctions of the Period of the Reformation. Edited by Walter Howard Frere, D.D. 3 vols. Longmans, Green and Co. £4.

VERSE

The Saviour of the World (Vol. IV.), The Bread of Life. By Charlotte M. Mason. With Frontispiece. Kegan Paul and Co. 2s. 6d. net.

Autumn Voices: Poems and Sonnets of the Wolds. By Cecil Hayhurst. Lynwood and Co. 3s. 6d. net.

The Shâhnâma of Firdausí. Done into English by Arthur George Warner, M.A., and Edmond Warner, B.A. Vol. V. Kegan Paul and Co. 10s. 6d.

Clyde Songs, and other Verses. By J. J. Bell. 2nd Edition. Gowans and Gray. 2s. 6d. net.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

A Book of Sacred Verse. Compiled and Edited by William A. Knight. The Religious Tract Society. 3s. 6d. net.

Ground Flowers: Ventures in Verse. By John Hogben. Elkin Mathews. 2s. 6d. net.

Our Beloved King Edward. Poems by Various Authors. Collected by Elizabeth Woodruff. Elkin Mathews. 1s. 6d. net.

Flashes from the Orient, or a Thousand and One Mornings with Poesy. Book Third—Autumn. By John Hazelhurst. Hazell, Watson and Viney. 1s. 6d. net.

Poems and Sonnets. By Percy C. Ainsworth. Charles H. Kelly. 2s. 6d. net.

Lays of Old Goa, and Other Verses on Goan Themes. A Souvenir of the Fourth Centenary of the Conquest of Goa. By Joseph Furtado. British India Press, Byculla, Bombay. 8 annas.

PERIODICALS

The Tramp; The Moslem World; Ulula; Modern Language Teaching; Peru To-day; The Bodleian; The Literary Digest, N.Y.; Bulletin of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, N.Y.; The Sunday at Home; Everybody's Story Magazine; Friendly Greetings; The Boy's Own; The Girl's Own Paper and Woman's Magazine; Mercure de France; Revue Bleue; Bookseller; Publishers' Circular; Almanack Hachette; Antiquary; Japan Magazine, Tokyo; Empire Review; Bird Notes and News; Harper's Monthly Magazine; Nineteenth Century and After; Blackwood's Magazine; Fortnightly Review; English Review; Good Health; The Author; Educational Times; Cambridge University Reporter; Le Français fonétique; St. Nicholas; The Papyrus; Propos; Constitution Papers; The Conservator, Philadelphia.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.
KING'S COLLEGE.

DEPARTMENT FOR TRAINING TEACHERS FOR SECONDARY SCHOOLS.

Theory, Practice, and History of Education:
J. W. ADAMSON, B.A., Professor of Education (Head of the Department).

Psychology:
Dr. W. BROWN, M.A., Lecturer.

The Course, which includes practical work in Secondary Schools, extends over one academical year, beginning in October or January. It is suitable for those who are preparing to take the Teachers' Diploma of the University of London.

The fee is £20 for the year, if paid in advance, or 8 guineas per term (three terms in the year).

TWO SCHOLARSHIPS of £20 each for one year, tenable from October 1, 1911, are offered to suitable candidates (men) who are Graduates of a British University.

Application should be made to Prof. ADAMSON, King's College, Strand, W.C.

Book Bargains.
DECEMBER SUPPLEMENTARY CATALOGUE
(Post free) of
Publishers' Remainders
Books new as PUBLISHED, but offered at considerably reduced prices.
HENRY W. GLOVER, BOOKSELLER,
114, Leadenhall Street, E.C.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, LTD.,
30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET, W.C.
Only Branches } 48, Queen Victoria Street, E.C. 132, Kensington High Street, W.

NEW BOOKS LESS THAN HALF-PRICE.

	Offered at s.	d.	Published at s.	d.
CRISPI, FRANCESCO, Italian Insurgent	1	0	7	6
GRAFTON, THIRD DUKE, AUTO. AND LETTERS	3	6	18	0
HARVARD, JOHN, AND HIS TIMES	3	3	7	6 net.
STEPHEN, SIR JAMES FITZJAMES, LIFE by his brother Leslie Stephen	5	0	16	0
THIEBAULT, BARON, MEMOIRS OF, 2 Vols. trans.	7	6	28	0
YOUNG, ARTHUR, AUTO. OF, Ed. M. Betham Edwards	4	9	12	6

Full List Free on Application.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references.—Address Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

BOOKS, Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold, and Exchanged. Monthly Catalogues Free. Libraries purchased, catalogued, arranged, or valued.—Thomas Thorp, 98, St. Martin's Lane, W.C. (and at Reading).

BOOKS.—ALL OUT-OF-PRINT and RARE BOOKS on any subject SUPPLIED. The most expert bookfinder extant. Please state wants and ask for CATALOGUE. I make a special feature of exchanging any Saleable Books for others selected from my various Lists. Special List of 2,000 Books I particularly want post free.—EDW. BAKER'S Great Bookshop, 14-16, John Bright St., Birmingham. Lord Leighton's Life, Work, Letters, 2 vols., 42s. for 18s. 6d.; Dewhurst Impressionist Painting, 25s. for 8s.; George Eliot's Works, 21 vols., 52s. 6d. for 35s.; Vernon Lee's 18th Century in Italy, 21s. for 9s.

Now on Sale. 6d. net. The January
BOOK MONTHLY.

Contents:

PERSONAL AND PARTICULAR. The Gossip of the Hour in the Republic of Authors.
A PARIS LUCKY-BAG. Book-Hunting on the Grey Banks of the Seine.—By Frederic Lees.
WHAT'S IN A WORD! Why Some English Sounds are a Delight to Hear.—By F. M. Wells.
THE SPINSTER HEROINE. Or a Poetic Quest for the Woman of Sweet-and-Forty-Five.
A LONDON LETTER. Touching the Book Effects of a General Election.—By the Editor.
SHAKSPERE, A.B. Was the Poet Seven Years Afloat on the Ocean Wave?—By J. E. Patterson.
NEW YEAR READING. The People and Plots of Seven of the Winter Novels.—By C. E. Lawrence.
A STATE OF THE REALM. The Craft of Bookselling and its Story in England.
LIVES OF GREAT MEN. Why Some of the Winter Memoirs have been Successful.
NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY. Particulars of Interesting Volumes likely to be Published this Month.
BOOKS OF THE MONTH. A Chronicle of the Noteworthy Publications of December. With a Reviewing Commentary.
THE PERIODICALS. Contents of some January Reviews and Magazines.
Illustrated Supplement: BOOKS OF THE DAY IN PORTRAIT AND PICTURE.

Publishers: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO., Stationers' Hall Court, London,
Who, on receipt of 6d., will send, post-free, a Specimen of the Current Number.

Edward Whistler,
II, Strand, Charing Cross, London.
DIAMOND MERCHANT :: :: JEWELLER & SILVERSMITH.

A large stock of New and Second-hand Diamond and Gem Jewellery, Antique and Modern Silver Plate, always on hand, at bargain prices, for cash.

Fine Pearls, Emeralds, Diamonds, and early specimens of Antique Silver Plate wanted. High Prices given in Cash. Full Value allowed in Exchange.

Valuations made for Probate and other purposes.

GUN DEPARTMENT.
HAMMERLESS SECOND-HAND GUNS,
British Made, from £6 10s.
Nitro Proof. The Cheapest Gun in the Market combined with Quality.
ALSO
HAMMERLESS EJECTORS,
By Best London Makers, at Greatly Reduced Prices.
CORDITE RIFLES, ·400, ·500, ·600 Bores.
Catalogue and Price List on Application Gratis.
Telephone No.: 2033 GERRARD.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

THE SPECTATOR says you

"could not do better than read this book."

THE PASSING OF THE SHEREEFIAN EMPIRE.

By ELLIS ASHMEAD-BARTLETT,

Author of "Port Arthur: The Siege and Capitulation."

Illustrated. 15s. net.

"Of particular interest to Service men are the description and analysis of the French troops engaged in the Chaouia campaign and of the Spanish force in the Riff campaign, and the well thought-out deductions drawn therefrom. Apart from its value in these directions—and it is literally crammed with useful facts—the book reads as thrillingly as any novel, with tenfold more interest than the ordinary run of that class of fiction."—War Office Times.

"It is very full and interesting work that the author has given us, and one that will probably make many readers desirous of visiting the land which he finds so exhilarating."—The Daily Telegraph.

"Of all books about Morocco, this one is quite the best."—The Observer.

"Those who remember Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett's book upon the Siege of Port Arthur will welcome this new volume from so enterprising and brilliant a war correspondent."—Daily Graphic.

"This thoughtful, entertaining, and valuable book."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"The book is an interesting study of the condition of affairs in Morocco, and as a record of adventure it makes excellent reading."—Morning Post.

"The writer of this most interesting and instructive volume is already favourably known to fame as the author of the best English book on the Siege of Port Arthur, and now he may be congratulated on having produced an equally pre-eminent account of recent events in Morocco."—Daily Chronicle.

"No book written about Morocco in recent years has shown a better grasp of facts or a sounder judgment of the forces at work in what was down to a few years ago Africa's last great independent Empire."—The Illustrated London News.

"One reads this really vivid book by Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett as much as one reads the narratives of the Conquistadores."—The Nation.

"An excellent book, to the great interest and variety of which it is impossible to do justice here."—Glasgow News.

"A valuable and fascinating volume."—Sunday Chronicle.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, Edinburgh and London.

At all Booksellers and Libraries.

Printed and Published for the Proprietor by ODHAMS, LTD., 25, Floral Street, Covent Garden, and 67, Long Acre, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE

THE CARNEGIE LIBRARY,
THE PA. STATE COLLEGE,
STATE COLLEGE, PA.

No. 2019 [Registered as a Newspaper.] JANUARY 14, 1911 PRICE THREEPENCE

Sheffield Simplex

CONTINUOUS TESTIMONY.

The following are extracts from letters received, covering a period of two years, from an owner of a "Sheffield-Simplex" Car.—

COBHAM:
October, 1908.

"I am extremely pleased with the appearance of the car and the running of it. Everything connected with it seems to be most satisfactory. I congratulate myself on having decided to buy one of your cars."

August, 1909.

"I am sorry I cannot manage to meet you this week and discuss the merits of the 'Sheffield-Simplex' Cars with you, but I am glad to take this opportunity of letting you know that the car I had from you is going splendidly. The engine is running most smoothly and quietly; it is quite a treat to ride behind it. No change of speed is necessary for any of the hills in this part of the world, and evidently both the work and materials used in the car are of the best. I can, with the greatest confidence, say that I would not exchange my 'Sheffield-Simplex' for any of the different types of car I see on the road, and, living as I do on the main Portsmouth Road, I have plenty of opportunity of comparing them."

October 10, 1910.

"It may interest you to know that the 45 H.P. 'GEAR-BOX-LESS' Car fitted with a landaulette body which I bought of you has now run about 8,000 miles and has given me the greatest satisfaction. . . . I should like to say that I had the car in Devonshire and Cornwall this summer, and with only one or two exceptions it took every hill on top speed with six passengers and the heavy body, which speaks volumes for its hill-climbing capability; in fact, if one has to slow down for any reason going uphill it is marvellous how the engine picks up again without changing the gear. I also think the sliding pedal control on your cars is a most distinct improvement on the ordinary pedal; it is much less tiring, more easily worked and controlled, especially over rough roads, and I am convinced that any one having once tried it and experienced its advantages would never go back to the ordinary accelerator."

Catalogue post-free on application to Dept. "L."

SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX MOTOR WORKS, Ltd.
TINSLEY, SHEFFIELD, ENGLAND.

London Depôt: c/o MULLINERS, Ltd., 132-135, LONG ACRE, W.C.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

MR. LANE'S FORM FOUR

Mr. JOHN LANE begs to announce (with apologies to Mr. Lloyd George) that he has prepared a new Form Four for a Referendum. The new Form Four is essentially a simple affair: the introduction of four new writers to the country. Every reader of these works is entitled publicly to record his opinion on any and every occasion. There are no perplexing conditions; and the prices as stated below will be scrupulously adhered to.

I. A New Thinker	...	FREDERICK JAMESON	...	ART'S ENIGMA
II. A New Novelist	...	IDA WILD	...	ZOË, THE DANCER
III. A New Satirist	...	DANIEL CHAUCER	...	THE SIMPLE LIFE, LIMITED
IV. A New Religion of Nature	...	HENRY LAW WEBB	...	THE SILENCES OF THE MOON

ART'S ENIGMA, by FREDERICK JAMESON, with 8 full-page Illustrations.

Demy 8vo. Price 6s. net. [January 17th.

The overflowing wisdom of this book is the accumulation of a long life of keen observation and wide experience. Its author, to judge from internal evidence, has been the friend of Ruskin, Watts, Whistler, and Meredith; indeed, it was to him that Meredith dedicated "The Amazing Marriage." "Art's Enigma" is a plea for the definition of Art, and the essential unity of all those divine mysteries which are comprised under that term. Mr. Jameson's chapters entitled Music, Poetry, Novel-writing, Painting, Landscape-painting, and Architecture will prove illuminating and inspiring alike to the student and the general reader.

ZOË, THE DANCER, by IDA WILD. Crown 8vo. 6s. [January 24th.

The scene of the story is laid in Brussels, where Zoë, little more than a child, shows her remarkable aptitude for dancing. Her wonderful yellow hair secures for her a position in a hairdresser's window, to the constant delight of the good citizens. Chance leads to her adoption of dancing as a profession. The book is full of comedy and tragedy, and yet it is the charm and originality of the telling which holds the reader throughout.

THE SIMPLE LIFE, LIMITED, by DANIEL CHAUCER. Crown 8vo. 6s.

[January 31st.

This novel has a very decided quality of satire which is inspired by the conventions of the unconventional. Evidently Mr. Chaucer knows the Simple Life from the inside, and his reflections will both amuse and amaze those who know it only from casual allusions. Many well-known figures will be recognised, though not in all cases under their proper names, and, as in the case of Mr. Mallock's "New Republic," Society will be busy dotting the "i's" and crossing the "t's."

THE SILENCES OF THE MOON, by HENRY LAW WEBB.

Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d. net. [February 7th.

The author, a Shopshire lad, has only recently left Cambridge, and his book contains the wisdom of the intuitions of youth. The Publisher without hesitation claims that this book will be hailed as a modern classic. There has been no such fine piece of writing since "Apologia Diffidentis," but its purpose is deeper than that of Mr. Compton Leith's book, for many will accept the author's communion with Nature in the "Silences of the Moon" as a new religion, indeed no one can read this little book without feeling that death has been robbed of some of its sting. Mr. Webb is an interesting link with the past, for he is the nephew of the famous Captain Webb, the Channel swimmer, who never took a voyage without a copy of Butler's "Analogy" in his pocket. Is this another instance of casting bread upon the waters?

N.B.—The Publisher feels apologetic towards his Authors and the sensitive critics for the unusual form of his announcement, but an eminent Divine in the XVIIIth Century protested against the Devil having all the best tunes in his Service, and we in the XXth Century see no reason why costly and cunning advertising should be sacred to Pills and Soap. The very nature of these books is such that without the publisher's "knavish tricks" these works might only be known to the fitful few.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

MR. LANE will publish on January 17th the great political novel of the century, THE NEW MACHIAVELLI, by Mr. H. G. WELLS. Crown 8vo. 6s. 528 pages.

This, by common consent, is considered to be MR. WELLS' masterpiece; and there is reason for assuming this, for the story has been widely read in the pages of "The English Review." The hero, Richard Remington, in some respects resembles M. Briand, as both started their careers as Socialists. Briand has become Prime Minister of France, while Remington's brilliancy should have achieved for him a like position in this country but for his unfortunate intrigue with a woman, the result of which was disastrous to the evil-doers. For in this country public life and private virtue have ever been inseparable.

JOHN LANE, LONDON AND NEW YORK.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

CONTENTS.

	Page
Review of the Week	31
The Broad Back of the Income-tax Payer	32
The Light	32
The Police and the Citizen	33
Reviews :—
The Age of Unreason	35
Social and Physical Health: A French and English View	36
An Expedition in the Himalayas	37
Mr. Belloc as Poet : with some Others	39
A Friendly Warning	40
Shorter Reviews	41
Fiction	42
The Theatre:—
"The Piper" at the St. James's	43
Miss Edyth Walker at the "Palladium"	45
Drury Lane and the Children	46
Some New French Books	47
Charles Baudelaire	47
The Author of the Most Famous English Joke	49
The Anarchist Enemy—I.	50
London Bridge	51
The Victoria Institute	52
In the Temple of Mammon	53
Correspondence	54
Books Received	54

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage. Subscriptions : Inland 15s. ; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

THE ACADEMY is published by MESSRS. ODHAMS, LIMITED, 67, Long Acre, London, W.C., to whom all letters with reference to publication must be addressed.

Applications referring to Advertisements may be addressed to MESSRS. ODHAMS, as above.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

THE ACADEMY is now obtainable at Messrs. W. H. Smith & Sons, Messrs. Wyman's, and Messrs. Willing's bookstalls and shops.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

AMIDST the excitement of the Stepney affray recent developments in foreign politics have passed almost unnoticed by the large majority of the followers of current events in the Press ; but now that the East End is happily returning to its normal state we hope some attention will be paid to the recent developments in the Near East. The great event of the week has been the Russo-German Agreement in regard to the Balkans and Persia. When we consider that less than two years ago Russia and Germany were on the verge of war over the question of Austria's annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, this is a great triumph for diplomacy. It was only Germany's direct threat to Russia to stand by Austria which caused the Russian Government to withdraw its support from Servia and thus avert war. It was thought at the time that Russia would never forgive the pressure brought to bear on her at a time when she was weak from her struggle with Japan, and that she would not rest content until the insult had been wiped out in blood. But the memory of nations is proverbially short in these days. It really seems much easier for victor and vanquished to come to an agreement with one another before either has sustained defeat and humiliation. Witness the South African settlement after a war which lasted three years ; witness the Russo-Japanese Agreement over Korea and Manchuria within four years of that deadly struggle in the Far East ; and now we have Germany and Russia smoking the pipe of peace together within eighteen months of the time when they were ready to spring at each other's throats.

This understanding over the Balkans and Persia has been well received in France, and it should cause satisfaction amongst ourselves—except for the fact that the feeling against Germany is so strong that we dislike to see any Power coquetting with her, even though it goes far to ensure a continuance of European peace. But it has not given unmixed satisfaction in Constantinople. Turkey, it appears, has not been consulted over the terms of the Agreement, and is naturally alarmed at this unexpected slight from the "Protector of the Mohammedan Peoples of the World," as they were gratefully calling the Kaiser two months ago. The German Ambassador has found it necessary to furnish explanations and assurances to the Grand Vizier, but we doubt whether these will go far to heal the breach. When old lovers quarrel no explanations will set the matter right, because love can never thrive when it has to be watered by explanations. The whole essence of love between nations, as between individuals, is a union of hearts which places misunderstandings outside the pale of possibility. We doubt very much whether the Agreement will strengthen Germany's position in Constantinople, and surely the time is ripe for a renewal of the traditional friendship between ourselves and the Ottoman Turks, which of late years has been seriously impaired by Germany's more skilful diplomacy.

Germany's diplomatic activities seem inexhaustible at the present time. There are persistent rumours of a rapprochement with the Celestial Empire. China feels herself very isolated at the present day. England is allied with Japan, and now she sees those two former enemies Russia and Japan working in perfect harmony with one another at her expense. In despair, it appears, she turned towards the United States and sought an alliance in that quarter, but the United States Government, true to the spirit of its Constitution, which forbids alliances with foreign Powers, was unable to give her any encouragement beyond expressions of goodwill. This is not enough for China, and she is now said to be seeking an alliance with Germany as the only disinterested and unattached friend she has left in Europe. How much truth there is in the report it is difficult to say, but preparations are being made to receive the Crown Prince on a scale of unprecedented magnitude. Here, again, we have another excellent example of the unstability of European and Asiatic politics. Fifteen years ago Prince Henry set out on his famous "Mailed Fist" expedition to annex portions of the Celestial Empire for the Fatherland, and now the robbed are anxious to lie down with the robbers in the same fold.

But what effect will a German-Chinese Alliance have on the recently concluded Russo-German Agreement ? Surely both cannot give satisfaction. Have the rivals settled their disputes in the Near East in order that they may quarrel with the hope of greater commercial advantage in the Far East ? Truly world politics are difficult to follow in days of such kaleidoscopic changes ! On the outward surface only the old rivalries between ourselves and Germany seem likely to disturb the peace of Europe, but if these agreements and rapprochements are entered into so suddenly and unexpectedly, cannot they be broken with equal facility ?

Captain Swinton's idea that the somewhat dreary district which we synthesise under the name of "South London" should become fashionable, is rather apt to inspire a smile. "There is something wrong," he says in a recent article. "Why are the palatial buildings all on the one bank ? What is the matter with the other ?" We fear that nothing short of a wholesale reconstruction of the congested locality could remedy the general atmosphere of dull poverty and depression which prevails on the southern side from Bermondsey to Lambeth. It would be of little avail to erect a line of important and beautiful architectural triumphs (supposing that we are capable of doing this) along that bank where now black barges swarm and dingy factories stand; for behind the new would still remain the reeking streets and squalid tenements which poison the air and make the heart of the sociologist or philanthropist ache. No amount of official glory will bring the folk who carry fashion with them into such a quarter, save on urgent and brief business visits; for its Piccadilly, its Regent Street, its Mayfair, we fear that South London must wait many a weary lustrum. To re-plan a crowded area as large as a provincial city is not a task to be undertaken without much conflict of opinions and battling of interests. "If only the gospel of 'space' had been preached earlier!" exclaims Captain Swinton, sorrowfully; and any one who will trouble to spend a couple of hours wandering on the Surrey side of the river within the neighbourhoods of Bermondsey, Southwark, and Waterloo will echo that lament very genuinely.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

THE BROAD BACK OF THE INCOME-TAX PAYER

It is interesting to observe how amateur financiers who are permitted to don the robes of Chancellor of the Exchequer proceed on lines which would rapidly ensure the collapse of any commercial enterprise. Statesmen of both parties have been, in varying degree, open to such criticism.

In no case have unbusinesslike methods been adopted in a more aggravated form than in the case of Income-tax. It is extraordinary to observe the history of a tax which is thoroughly illogical as a permanent impost, and in reality has only one advantage—ease of collection—to recommend it.

First devised during the Napoleonic era, the tax was so unpopular that it had to be abolished in 1816, even though the stress of the aftermath of war expenditure of the previous years drove Ministers to their wits' ends to meet the financial necessities of the period. It is curious to notice that the tax was revived by a Conservative statesman, Peel, in 1842, to aid him in carrying through his Free Trade policy. In 1874 Mr. Gladstone, who constantly inveighed against the maintenance of the tax in time of peace, actually made its abolition a chief item of his appeal to the country. Mr. Disraeli was returned to power, and his Administration continued the tax at the rate of 2d. in the pound.

The harm was done. The tax which, until Peel's time, was viewed simply as an impost to meet the necessities of war—a position strongly maintained by its founder, Pitt—was permanently established as a revenue-producing tax in time of peace.

As the tax was re-imposed by Peel to enable him to institute Free Trade, so it is now the indispensable adjunct and mainstay of a Free Trade Budget. Income-tax pushed up to a monstrous figure is the item which balances the Chancellor's Budgets and enables him to boast of an approaching surplus.

Is that surplus to be devoted to the relief of those who have produced it? So far, no such hint has fallen from the Chancellor. The crippling effect on trade and property of all kinds—and consequently employment—of a huge tax on industry and success is calmly ignored, whilst Socialistic proposals involving still further inroads on the resources of the same taxpayer are preached by the leading apostle of humanity at other people's expense.

It is time that a protest is entered against the imposition of bloated taxation as the means of launching and supporting Socialist schemes, even though in this connection the word "Socialist" be not employed as a term of reproach. In a period of broadened taxation, of increased production, and of consequently augmented prosperity it would be just and commendable to devote a portion of the national resources to the improvement of the lot of the least fortunate sections of the population. Such a time is not now, when Income-tax yields 17s. 10d. per head, as against 8s. 2d. in 1895-6.

The Income-tax payer has shown extraordinary laxness in protesting against being regarded as a milch-cow to provide sustenance to support Radical-Socialistic legislation. A body which is now called on to provide one-quarter of the total revenue derived from taxation is strong enough if rallied and efficiently organised to command attention to its protest.

We hear now of National Invalidity Insurance. Where are the funds, so far as the State contribution is concerned, to come from if not out of the pockets of the payers of Income-tax—either in the form of denial of just remissions out of the surplus which they have largely contributed to create, or in the form of a further impost on a class of taxpayer who utters no audible protest against the inequitable exactions of which he is now almost habitually the victim? We trust that payers of this particular tax will find their voices and speak to the Chancellor in tones which he will be bound to respect.

THE LIGHT

Put out the light; no longer let it burn,
Let night again upon herself return,
In the long revolution of the dark,
That groping man may have a time to mark
The morning stars singing in unison
Laments and monodies for the dead sun,
And the Beloved, even the pale moon,
Putting off her white robes, her silver shoon,
And fleeing frail and naked down the sky
In the vast fields of the Eastern seas to die.
Then for an hour let a torch re-illume
The blindness of man's tomb.
If he have left his feast,
His dancing and his praying and his games,
And all his toils and shames,
And all the golden garments of the beast:
If he have yet a little while delayed
To heed the glory of which the world is made,
Poets and flowers, singers and the stars—
If he have burst his bars,
And learned one word from the scripture of the night,
He hath redeemed himself from vain delight;
Then, to man's chastened soul, give back the light.

E. T.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

THE POLICE AND THE CITIZEN

BY ELLIS ASHMEAD-BARTLETT

THE aftermath of the melodrama of Stepney is the furious controversy which has arisen over the conduct of the police on that now historic occasion. Scathing criticisms have been passed not only by Germany and other foreign countries, from where one would naturally expect them to emanate, but also from even more vehement critics at home, as to the absurdity of calling out 1,200 men, a company of the Scots Guards, and the Horse Artillery for the purpose of capturing two men. We ventured in our description of the affair last week to point out some of the errors and the ridiculous situation thus created; but our strictures were of the mildest when compared with the letters which have since appeared in the Press. Herr von Jagow, the German Chief of Police, who, by the way, was over here a few weeks ago studying our system of handling the traffic, has been the most unsparing of all in his attacks. He is reported as saying that the arrest of the wanted men would have been accomplished in Germany by three armed detectives—two covering their comrade with their revolvers whilst the third effected the desired purpose; and another critic has used the expressive phrase "shooting sparrows with cannon." In the United States the Press has also been equally funny at our expense.

The whole comedy has been caricatured in a thousand ways, and more especially are the writers amused by the spectacle of those two life-long friends and inseparable companions Mr. Winston Churchill and the cinematograph arriving at precisely the same moment, and taking up a strategical position out of range of the enemy's bullets, where they could enjoy uninterrupted communication with one another throughout the remainder of the operations. But we wish to be fair to Mr. Churchill. In the first place, it would be impossible for him, and contrary to the spirit of his whole career, to throw away this priceless chance for self-advertisement. His opportunities for sensationalism have been sadly curtailed of late, and, overshadowed as he is in political life by the superior attraction of Lloyd George, he has fallen somewhat out of the public eye. As Home Secretary, his presence on the scene was typical of the day's absurdities, and, as no pantomime is complete without a clown, so also would the Stepney Battle, as it has come to be called, have been incomplete without this prince of adventurers. But we would rather believe that he was not present in his capacity as Home Secretary. Perhaps his sporting instincts got the better of him, and, scenting the battle from afar, he could not sit quietly at his table in the Home Office while such untoward incidents were taking place a few miles from his door.

But whilst the antics of Mr. Churchill have been universally condemned, the police have found many defenders, and it is only fair to examine both sides of the case before passing a hasty judgment on their conduct. The gravamen of the charge is that: (1) the police made a bungle of the whole affair; (2) they allowed the two desperadoes to slip out of their hands when they might have surprised them in their sleep; (3) they employed too large a force, and called out the troops in an unnecessary manner; and (4) in spite of all the fuss, the net result was a burnt and ruined house, the escape of the assassins from justice, and injuries to ten police, firemen, soldiers, and citizens.

Now let us examine these charges in detail. As we pointed out last week, the whole of the inmates, including Betsie Gershon, were removed from No. 100, Sidney Street by 4 a.m. without disturbing the two men sleeping upstairs. Now, with all the facts before us, we must severely criticise the manner in which Betsie Gershon was enticed from the top floor. The police admit that it was a difficult and dangerous task. They never attempted to do it themselves, and, having failed to induce Mr. Fleishman to take the risk, they persuaded the fearless Mrs. Fleishman to do so. Undoubtedly she ran a great risk of her life, because if the ruffians had been aroused by the noise and talking downstairs, as well as the footsteps on the stairs, and, unable to see who was coming up, had opened fire on Mrs. Fleishman, she might well have paid for her temerity with her life. The police deserve no credit for clearing the innocent out of danger's way. It is Mrs. Fleishman to whom the credit is due. All that the detectives attempted was to go up three stairs, seize Betsie Gershon and carry her next door, and also to accompany Mr. Sheriman when he went to rouse the aged couple, Mr. and Mrs. Clements, who slept in the back room on the ground-floor. Apart from that, they never set foot in the house again, although all the evidence goes to show that the assassins had not been disturbed.

At the adjourned inquest on the two men Mr. Bodkin, the counsel for the Treasury, made a long statement in defence of the police, and Superintendent Mulvaney was called as evidence. But the police stand condemned out of his mouth, although there are mitigating circumstances which must not be overlooked. The interesting fact, for instance, was brought to light that the police were only warned of the presence of the two men at No. 100 Sydney Street at midnight on Monday, and therefore this only left three hours in which to make their plans and to become acquainted with the interior of the building and its occupants—a very important factor in the situation. Inspector Mulvaney admits that they knew the men were armed and likely to die fighting rather than surrender, and also that the authorities were determined at all costs to avoid any further loss of life amongst the police engaged in the case. But in the face of these facts the Inspector and his colleagues deliberately induced an innocent woman to risk her life in an undertaking which they were not prepared to face themselves. This at once opens up the whole question of the relationship in which the police stand towards the public; but we maintain that under no possible combination of circumstances was it right for the police to induce a woman to do something which entailed the gravest risk to her life.

We do not for one moment wish to insinuate any cowardice on the part of the officers engaged in the case. The bravery of the London police is beyond question. It has been proved a hundred times in a hundred different ways; but we do maintain that a very grave error of judgment was committed, and one which needs probing to the bottom, and which is deserving, if proved to be true—and of this there can be no possible doubt—of the severest condemnation. The police are the paid guardians of the public. They possess certain powers and privileges which are denied to the lay citizen, and occupy a position of responsibility and trust which entails certain obligations to the public whom they serve. In times of grave danger or emergency they stand in exactly the same position as the soldier on the battlefield, and must be prepared to take the risks inseparable from the nature of their calling. Therefore we insist that, even had such an action resulted in loss of life amongst those engaged in the case, it was their bounden duty to try and arrest, not only Betsie Gershon, but also the two wanted men, by creeping upstairs and surprising them in their sleep. Better far that some should have perished, or have received injuries in the discharge of their duties, than that we should have made ourselves the laughing-stock of the world, and that ten persons should have received wounds, with the net result that the assassins escaped the gallows by immolating themselves in the ruins of another man's property.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

We now pass on to the second charge—namely, the futile calling in of troops to assist the police. Both Mr. Bodkin in his speech, and Superintendent Mulvaney in his evidence, defended this on the ground that the obsolete revolvers of the police were totally inadequate to cope with the high-power automatic Mauser pistols with which the assassins were armed. This is largely a technical point, but it is hardly borne out by the facts. When the assassins opened fire at 7.30 a.m. and wounded Sergeant Leeson the detectives had completely surrounded the building, and were in possession of every vantage point from which a fire could be brought to bear on the windows, at a range which would completely neutralise the superior carrying power of the aliens' pistols. There were other police present armed with shot-guns and rifles, and throughout the morning, even after the arrival of the troops, every man who carried a weapon continued to blaze away at the windows. But surely the police could have borrowed a few rifles from the soldiers if necessary. The fact of the matter seems to be that after the first shots were fired and Sergeant Leeson fell wounded the police authorities completely lost their heads, the old fear of sacrificing the life of a single constable reasserted itself, and rather than run any risk the soldiers were invited to share the dangers of the siege. And yet even after the arrival of the troops the firing never ceased until the building burst into flames; there is no certain proof that either of the men perished from the bullets of the besiegers, and, even though there is some shadowy evidence to this effect, there is absolutely none to show whether it was by rifle or revolver shot. These facts disprove absolutely the police contention that their weapons were inadequate to cope with the situation.

But here a very serious consideration arises. Is it not high time that our police were put on a level with the police of all other nations and trained in the use of firearms? Also, is it not high time that a reserve of up-to-date military rifles was acquired by the police authorities, so that each man could, if the necessity arose, be adequately armed? We do not mean to imply that the necessity follows as a natural corrollary to the Stepney fiasco, but there are fifteen thousand constables in the Metropolitan area alone—the finest body of men in the country—who could form a priceless reserve in time of war, should that contingency unhappily arise. During the siege of Paris the whole of the civil police were called out to serve with the Army, and Committees of the inhabitants of the various arrondissements took their place in preserving law and order in the city. Can we afford, with our meagre military forces, deliberately to throw away the services of such a picked body of men? And yet this force would be useless to-morrow, should it be required, because the men have never been trained in the use of arms, and there are no rifles ready at hand with which to arm them.

The lessons of the Houndsditch murders and the Stepney Battle can be rendered salutary if only we learn wisdom from experience, which is unhappily a rare occurrence in official circles in this country. But at the same time let us avoid flying to extremes. Something like a panic has seized a section of the community. A cry of indignation went up all over the country after Superintendent Mulvaney unfolded the story of how he and his brother-officers, armed with obsolete weapons, went to arrest desperadoes carrying pistols sighted up to a thousand yards. Yet the very rarity of occurrences such as we have just witnessed is conclusive proof that the old system has worked well in the past. Now there is a raging agitation that the police should be armed, and that their weapons should be of similar power and carrying capacity to those of their prospective opponents. Not a few responsible journals, whose duty it is to guide public opinion into sane paths, have advocated arming them with Mauser pistols similar to those found amidst the ruins of No. 100, Sydney Street. Could there be a more impractical or mischievous suggestion? Do these critics realise the nature of the weapon? Imagine each of our constables carrying a loaded pistol which will discharge ten shots in ten seconds to a distance of over a mile simply by keeping the forefinger pressed on the trigger! Why, a young and inexperienced police-officer, surprised by some burglar who might not even be armed, would very likely inflict mortal injuries on a number of guiltless citizens in the neighbourhood.

We maintain that there is absolutely no need for the mass of our police to carry firearms. It would be creating a dangerous precedent. It would cause each constable to rely less and less on his own judgment, tact, and acumen in meeting unexpected situations, and more and more on the fear inspired by his weapon. Situations will arise from time to time when it is imperative that a section of the police should be armed—always, for instance, when detectives have a definite mission to effect the arrest of a dangerous individual or gang; also, perhaps, in certain districts in the East-end where the Englishman's native inborn respect for the law is unknown amongst an alien population which comes from countries disturbed by revolutions and where authority is only maintained by the revolver and the sword. But to the mass of Englishmen the mere presence of "the man in blue" is a sufficient deterrent from crime, and more especially violence. He is the outward symbol of the faults and virtues of our national character. He is big and burly, he is good-natured and tolerant, he has all the wisdom in handling disturbances and unexpected situations which springs from self-reliance, a natural kindness of heart, and sympathy with those who do not see eye to eye with the masters for whom he works; and he is intimately acquainted with the character of those with whom he has to deal. He does not lurk in hidden corners, disguised and fully-armed, ready to trap the wrong-doer. The peculiar genius of the administration of the law in England is to prevent crime, not encourage it first and then arrest it. The agent provocateur is, happily, unknown amongst us. The outward appearance of the constables denotes the manner in which they are expected to discharge their duties. They are dressed in the most unwieldy of uniforms. Their measured tramp can be heard streets away. Their heavy boots and ponderous equipment render it easy for the light-footed miscreant to escape. But we do not mind this. The English constable inspires respect by the dignity of his deportment and the very solidity of his outward form. He is the visible symbol of the law and the constant reminder to evildoers that those laws must be obeyed, and, as in the past, so also in the future, he will prove the most efficient guardian which the citizens of any nation can claim.

A generation ago we were cast into a panic by the dynamitards, and the police were blamed. A few years later Jack the Ripper caused another panic, and the police were again severely criticised, but the dynamitards and Jack the Ripper have long since been forgotten. In like manner, in a few months' time the panic of the Houndsditch murders will have passed into oblivion. Such occurrences are happily rare, and if we are going to profit by our lesson, the remedy of prevention will be found, not in departing from our old traditions and arming the police, but in the proper supervision and, if necessary, the deportation of those alien criminals who, under the plea of escaping from political persecution, abuse the generous hospitality of our shores.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

REVIEWS

THE AGE OF UNREASON

Logic for the Million. Edited by T. Sharper Knowlson. (T. Werner Laurie. 6s. net.)

All credit is due to Mr. Knowlson for this ably written and clearly expressed text-book. It might have as a sub-heading the description "Logic Without Tears." It is an attempt to teach a technical art with as little technicality as possible, to induct the world into a knowledge of the laws of ratiocination without the world being unpleasantly aware that it is being taught to think correctly. It is doubtful perhaps whether the avoidance of technique is not in the long run a more laborious path, but if the author succeeds in his endeavour to interest people in the logical art, to make them understand that the great analysis of Aristotle is not a mere conjuring trick fit to amuse children at Christmas parties, he will have achieved a great deal. It is difficult to deal with "the million," who are otherwise known as "the mob," for this creature is partly composed of men who belong to it by nature, and partly of those whom circumstance has treated ill. People talk nonsense with a difference; some, one feels, are born to eat nonsense, to drink nonsense, to live in nonsense, and to eject nonsense; nonsense is their vital air. And of others one says "they are ridiculous, but one can see that if they had had any chance they would have been sensible folks." There are doubtless many cannibals to whom cannibalism is wholly natural; while others eat of the horrid banquet, but with qualms and misgivings. So with the million whom Mr. Knowlson addresses; he will save those who are to be saved, the rest—the naturally unreasonable—will continue to wallow in their irrational stye.

It is interesting to consider the history of logic. Note in the first place that the logical faculty is innate in man. The rudest and the roughest age could not have existed without it; rather we may say by the logical art alone did man survive in the contest with the monsters of the slime and of the caves—survive, that is, as an animal, as a comparatively weak beast fighting for his life against much stronger creatures. "Barbara, Celarent" were latent in every action of the Old Stone and the New Stone savage; otherwise the wild beasts would have had the best of it, possessing, as they did, many physical advantages for the contest. It would be rash to say that the ratiocinative faculty is wholly absent from all animals; there are instances in the history of bees and ants which forbid the acceptance of such a dogma; but man alone, having a portion of instinct comparatively small, learned to supply his want by systematic logic. By a series of propositions he fought the monsters, by seduction he won his dinner, by chains of syllogisms he conquered the external world. Animals, though they are helped by instinct, are hampered by it, for it fails to rise to new emergencies; they are hampered, too, by lack of memory. The instinct of the dodo, admirable no doubt under a certain set of circumstances, was helpless to suggest any way of dealing with a totally new set of circumstances—the arrival of European sailors in Dodoland; and the unhappy bird who saw a number of relatives knocked on the head by the European sailor on Sunday could not deduce, for the service of Monday, the conclusion that sailormen were to be avoided. By consequence the dodo is extinct, while sailors survive.

Man, then, has always had within him the potency of logic, as he had the potency of other things unknown to the other animals—such things as poetry and religion. But—here is the curiosity—his logic was itself almost an instinct. His daily and vital decisions were all based on the knowledge of "Barbara, Celarent," and yet he could not have explained to you the simplest process; he could not have pointed out that his successful choice of a dinner or a dwelling was to be defended by a series of valid syllogisms, while his neighbour's early death was the result of an illicit process, the presence of a fourth term, or an undistributed middle. The prosperous Neolithic man syllogised naturally and validly, just as many men can play correct chords without the slightest knowledge of the laws of harmony.

Then, late in the history of the human race, came the Greek Aristotle, who analysed the process, who showed its principles and its laws, who pointed out—the example is Mr. Knowlson's—that I must not say that you are a goose because you are an animal and a goose is an animal. Perhaps it may be objected that the possession of a little common sense, without any logical technique, is amply sufficient to defend one from talking such arrant rubbish. Yes; when the terms are clearly known, when the absurdity of the conclusion is self-evident; but let the subject-matter be concerned with free-will and cause and effect, and mere common sense will leave the fallacy undetected. Within the last three years there was an argument between two distinguished men on a highly obscure question; and the chief conclusion of the one was derived from an exact replica of the "goose" syllogism; while the other, denying the conclusion, was unable to find any fault with his opponent's logic. It was Aristotle who taught us that the validity of argument depends on certain immutable laws; that for "goose," and "you," and "animal" we can substitute A, B, C, or whatever symbols we please; that the syllogism

All A is B,
All C is B,
Therefore all A is C

is invalid, because the middle term B is not "distributed." Our knowledge of the subject-matter teaches us that "therefore you are a goose" is nonsense; logic teaches us that a conclusion from such premises is invalid whatever the terms may be. And the laws of logic are necessary and eternal; they cannot be changed by any imaginable discovery. Up to twenty years ago many people were, probably, of the opinion that by no method was it possible to discern a bullet embedded in a man's leg without first removing the flesh; many people no doubt thought that this was an eternal law of the universe. They were mistaken; for the "X-rays" were discovered, and the "law" ceased to exist. But no such misadventure can befall the laws of ratiocinative thought; and when the syllogism of A and B and C cited above becomes valid, triangles will have two sides, or twenty; two and two will make thirteen; clocks will strike less than one; and uphills without downhills will be as plentiful as blackberries. Or, to put the case in proper form: A will be at one and the same time B and not B.

Now it would be a very astonishing thing if a sect arose denying the truth of any of the laws that have been mentioned. If large numbers of men said that the rules of arithmetic or geometry were nonsense and useless pedantry we should be amazed. If, for example, two men in a train were arguing about some question of figures, and one pointed out that as two and two made four, he was certainly right; the passengers would surely be amazed if the other replied, "Yes, I know the old arithmetic-books say that two and two make four; but what have we to do with a lot of mediæval stuff like that. They used to quote those old rules and say that two and two made four in the Dark Ages; and a pretty lot they knew about science, didn't they? Why, they used to say that. . . . ," &c.

And this astonishing state of things is exactly what has come upon us. So far as the writer is aware, no advanced thinker has formally and in so many words denied the proposition that if you have twopence and somebody gives you twopence you will then have fourpence, but the laws of logic, which are as true and immutable and eternal as the laws of arithmetic, are constantly being denied. Here is an instance, quoted by the author of "Logic for the Million" in his Introduction:—

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

> Herbert Spencer, in a letter to Professor Brough, said:—"I have at no time paid the least attention to formal logic, and hold for all practical purposes it is useless."

Now Herbert Spencer's business was, briefly, to put two and two together in matter of philosophy; the whole of his life's work depended on his capacity for reasoning justly from premises to conclusions. And this remark of his is precisely and exactly as if a chartered accountant should say, "I have at no time paid the least attention to the rules of arithmetic, and hold that for all practical purposes the multiplication table is useless."

It may be said, in parentheses, that Mr. Spencer need not have troubled to announce his contempt for the laws of formal logic. The murderer caught in the fact might as well point out to the police that there was blood on his hands. Any one who will trouble himself to look into the works of the "great thinker" of the nineteenth century will find proofs of Spencer's utter ignorance of the laws of ratiocination on every page; he commits, again and again, absurdities, any one of which would have earned the dunce of a thirteenth-century booby class the soundest of whippings. Indeed, Mr. Knowlson takes the sentence quoted, and shows that the implied argument runs as follows:—Formal logic is useless to me; that which is useless to me is useless to the whole human race; therefore formal logic is useless to the whole human race.

It would be interesting to know the arguments on which the second premise is based; Mr. Knowlson says, gently, that it is a case of arguing from the particular to the universal: "as I find toasted cheese unwholesome, it must be unwholesome for everybody."

But all this matter of Herbert Spencer's personal disabilities apart, you have here the case of a distinguished man, who is supposed to have influenced the thought of the whole world, saying deliberately that the eternal laws of thought are not of the slightest consequence to thinkers; that whether the two and two of ratiocination make four, or five, or six hundred and sixty and six is not of the slightest consequence.

This is a feat that one would have pronounced to be incredible. But it has been done; and if it has been accomplished in the green tree of eminence, what marvels of unreason and absurdity may be expected from the dry wood of obscurity, from the millions who are now the rulers of England!

SOCIAL AND PHYSICAL HEALTH: A FRENCH AND ENGLISH VIEW

The Dawn of the Health Age. By Benjamin Moore, M.R.C.S. L.R.C.P. (J. and A. Churchill. 3s. 6d. net.)

Le Milieu médical, et la Question Médico-sociale. By Doctor Grasset. Fourth Edition. (Bernard Grasset, Paris. 2f.)

The success of a nation, commercially and socially, in the arts as well as in less academic spheres, may be said to depend to a great extent upon the physical fitness of its individuals. An unhealthy body induces a mind out of harmony with its environment, a brain sapped of its finest powers; the work produced by the weakling, whether he be engaged in manual labour or in artistic endeavour, is, speaking generally and making due allowance for notable exceptions, of less value than the work of a man "in good form." Every effort to emphasise this fact, therefore, is welcome, and Dr. Moore's two hundred pages of enthusiastic argument cannot be passed over with a mere hasty glance.

If anything, Dr. Moore is a little too emphatic and dogmatic; his enthusiasm leads him now and then into an unguarded statement. "It is not the slightest exaggeration," he writes on page 3, "to say that our present methods of attacking disease are mediæval in their antiquity and their ignorance." On the contrary, it is a serious exaggeration, obvious even to the ordinary layman, and had the author carefully considered his words he would not have proceeded, we think, to assert that "the labour of the thirty-two thousand medical men at present practising in this country is almost wasted as far as the health of the community which they serve is concerned. Anything more futile, less scientific, more hopelessly absurd than the present method of dealing with disease can scarcely be conceived." Not, shall we say, the indiscriminate blood-letting of a hundred years ago? Although we are aware that Dr. Moore is referring more especially to disease in the bulk and the organisation of our efforts to combat it, such incautious statements as those we have quoted are calculated to weaken his argument, not to strengthen it. Alluding to infantile mortality, he says: "Latin names figure in the returns of the Registrar-General as the cause of death, but in plain English the children die from dirt, ignorance, carelessness, and starvation. Also, sad to relate, there has not been the slightest improvement in this respect within the past forty years." "It is a peculiar irony of fate," we read in another place, "that the very name of 'doctor' means a teacher, and yet he never, or very rarely, teaches nowadays, but earns his living chiefly by pouring medicines into people who would in most cases be better without them."

While protesting against this wholesale incrimination of the profession, however, we are perfectly sure that below it all runs a deep feeling for the welfare of humanity. Many good items of advice are to be found scattered through the pages, apart from the author's eager advocacy of a State Medical Service—the great theme of the book. "Let us start to teach some practical hygiene in our schools as a compulsory and important subject," is excellent counsel; already, we believe, there is a strong tendency to adopt it. On the subject of our hospitals we can also quote a pertinent remark or two:—

> In spite of all its lofty sentiments of voluntary charity and benevolence, the curse of the voluntary hospital system is that it is blinding the eyes of those who could most help social reform to the fact that we possess no national hospital system. The voluntary system is utterly inadequate; it is strained to its utmost limit and almost bankrupt, and yet it cannot attend to more than about fifteen to twenty per cent. of the cases requiring attention. By its very excellence in attending to this small proportion of the deserving poor, it blinds our eyes and blunts our perceptions in regard to the eighty per cent. which it does not touch at all.

Following this, however, we find the extreme statement that "any person who contributes towards or endows voluntary hospitals, however good his or her intentions, is contributing to the perpetuation of a great national nuisance and great national wrong which calls aloud for redress." Then, a few pages later, comes the remark: "By all means let us keep our voluntary hospitals for the present, if only we can remember that they are not solving a great national question which is pressing urgently for solution." The arguments are comprehensible, but not logical. Even if we admit, for instance, that the "distinguished hospital surgeon is often a man of very mediocre attainments, who has "shown keenness and patience, and trained his hands well to manipulation, but often has not added one line, or precept, or practical application to the craft of which he is an exponent," is it not a good thing that such men are to be found, and do they not by their skill save thousands of lives?

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Dr. Moore disregards too much, we think, the work accomplished by our great consumption hospitals and sanatoria. During one year, in connection with a certain hospital where we have made inquiries, over fifteen hundred patients' homes were watched for a protracted period; 2,468 patients were treated as "special cases"—i.e., received individual attention or special correspondence; 288 patients were examined by the Röntgen rays—some, of course, more than once; 208 patients were discharged with the disease completely arrested. Surely, even though such work may not be organised by State officers and carried on as a national affair, it hardly merits such severe language as the author uses; rather does it merit high praise.

The true solution, advocated in this book, is "one national service for the whole country, under a Minister of Public Health of Cabinet rank":—

> Local conditions for hospitals and administration may be left in the hands of local authorities, but the medical officers must be appointed to a national service and be transferable from one local centre to another, and open to promotion from one place to another. . . . How much better for the doctor to get his quarterly cheque from Government, and spend his time in being a doctor and looking after questions of health and disease, leaving bill-posting and fee-squeezing to those whose business it is!

We can easily believe that the poorly-paid medical man would see no objection to this, but what would the princely practitioners of Harley Street say to an offer of salaried posts under Government? However, the principle is sound, and Dr. Moore disposes of the difficulties in a clever and thoughtful manner. The advantages of a post-graduate course of lectures are obvious; too often the average doctor has little chance of keeping up to date save by reading his professional journals; here we are in complete agreement with the scheme. Dr. Moore's essay is full of sentences which make the reader think, and if it is at present too Utopian in its ideas to precipitate or to crystallise into fact, we can yet recommend it heartily to the careful consideration of everyone interested in the important question of our national health and physique; and especially, we should add, ought every doctor to read it.

Dr. Grasset's clever study of "Le Milieu médical" in the series of "Études Contemporaines" is in its fourth edition, and may be briefly considered here, as it deals with a problem which has recently arisen in France, not altogether unallied with the subject of the previous book. Social inequality, Dr. Grasset finds, has its analogue in the medical profession of his country, which appears to be going through a grave crisis. "Le nombre des médecins augmente constamment," says the author; "l'exercise loyal de la profession est gêné par les charlatans, les illégaux, les rebouteux, les irréguliers et les forbans de la médecine." So far, we in England are in somewhat similar plight; but Dr. Grasset emphasises difficulties which have reached a more acute stage across the Channel. "Les relations avec les clients deviennent plus difficiles par suite d'une mauvaise compréhension du rôle des consultants et des spécialistes; l'administration, les associations, les sociétés de secours mutuels aggravent la situation en faisant le bien aux dépens et aux frais des médecins." The result is a sort of professional battle, and with the details of the problem—which include, for instance, the question of surgical and medical teaching in hospitals—the author deals cogently and at some length.

His most interesting passages, to English readers at any rate, are those which treat of the Socialistic point of view. Very neatly does he show that a democracy cannot exist without an aristocracy, even though it be only an aristocracy "des aptitudes et des compétences"—of ability, in short. "Inequality between men is an implacable biologic law; men differ in intelligence, in health, in nature, in the tendency of their faculties, in capacity for work, and in adaptation. . . . In a well-organised society there must be inequality:"—

> Tous les hommes sont égaux en droit d'accéder à toutes les positions; mais cela ne veut pas dire qu'ils sont égaux en droit d'occuper, tous, la même position. . . . Il y a égalité des droits, mais pas égalité des fonctions. Les hommes sont nativement et biologiquement inégaux. Si donc ils sont égaux en droit aux fonctions, ils ne sont pas égaux en capacité pour les obtenir et les occuper dignement.

In a digression, which is, however, exceedingly pertinent to his theme, Dr. Grasset discusses the confused meanings which the public attaches to the word "art." Art, he considers, is the manifestation and realisation of the beautiful; it provokes the æsthetic emotions; but when the term is applied to the profession of which he is so distinguished a member, it has another significance—it means the manifestation and application of truth; hence he concludes that "la médecine pratique est un art scientifique, ou, pour mieux dire, une science appliquée; donc, non seulement il n'y a pas opposition entre la science et la pratique médicales, mais il y a corrélation et parallélisme entre ces deux éléments." It follows—and this is his point—that it is absurd to separate doctors into the two categories of "savants" and "praticiens."

Farther than this we need not proceed, since the main subject of this interesting little volume is concerned with the affairs of our neighbours and friends; but it has been a pleasure to follow out Dr. Grasset's arguments. France, on occasion, can produce experts in logic and lucid reasoning not a whit behind the somewhat less sprightly professors of Germany and England, and we imagine that "Le Milieu Médical" will accomplish much towards smoothing out the difficulties which threaten to disunite the members of a profession which, above all others, should "work together in unity."

AN EXPEDITION IN THE HIMALAYAS

The Call of the Snowy Hispar. By WILLIAM HUNTER WORKMAN, M.A., M.D., and FANNY BULLOCK WORKMAN. (Constable and Co. 21s. net.)

A BOOK from the pen of those intrepid explorers Dr. and Mrs. Bullock Workman is always welcome; doubly so when presented to us in the attractive form of the handsome volume before us. The authors have, as is probably already well known to the majority of our readers, made a number of expeditions in the Himalayas, needless to say fraught in every instance with results of no mean scientific value; but the region which includes the scenes described in this the latest record of their endeavours they have made so peculiarly their own that one is almost tempted to say of them, in the words of Tennyson, "their name and glory cling to all high places like a golden cloud for ever."

Many of us have felt and known the fascination of the Alps. The call of those mountains is one that carries far and is not lost upon receptive ears. We can therefore readily appreciate the imperative nature of such a call coming from their greater sisters to such well-tried devotees as the authors. No words could describe the sensations upon such an occasion so aptly as their own. "But we had breathed the atmosphere of that great mountain-world, had drunk of the swirling waters of its glaciers, and feasted our eyes on the incomparable beauty and majesty of its towering peaks, and, as time passed on, its charms asserted their power anew and called to us with irresistible siren strains to return yet once again to those regions, the grandeur of which satisfies so fully the sense of the beautiful and sublime." By means of simple, and for that very reason effective, language, as well as by a profusion of photographs, in themselves a joy to look upon, we are enabled to enter in large measure into the spirit of the enterprise.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Readers will be well advised to preface their perusal of the book by a reference to the eleventh chapter and to the appended maps in order to obtain a clear and comprehensive idea of the extent and nature of the regions traversed. It will be observed that the Hispar glacier is the most northerly of a great group of four main and many subsidiary glaciers lying within a parallelogram bounded by 35° 40′ and 36° 20′ lat. N. and 74° 50′ and 76° 40′ E, the waters from which all eventually find their way into that great river aptly described here as "remarkable"—namely, the Indus. Dr. Workman's careful and repeated observations give the Hispar a length of 36·63 miles and an average width of about two miles. If the Hispar be taken together with the Biafao glacier, into which it almost imperceptibly fades at the summit of the Hispar pass, which forms its eastern extremity, the lotal length of the ice-band will be about seventy-three and a half miles, which is the longest extent of glacier outside the Polar regions. On its south side the Hispar receives six and on the north side nine branches. Many of these are in themselves glaciers of great size.

As to the southern barrier of the glacier, the authors remark that in their six expeditions in Himalaya they have seen no ice-expanse which approaches it in extent, complexity, and grandeur. Since it is continuous with the west wall of the Biafao glacier, it forms a solid barrier of forty miles in length. It is also a noteworthy fact that while its northern face "runs for twenty-four miles in a straight line, unbroken by a single deep indentation, its southern face gives off spur after spur, enclosing important glaciers."

An interesting problem is presented by the fact that, although the bed of the Hispar is almost certainly smooth, as is proved by the absence of crevasses, its gentle gradient, and other features, its surface is in general broken up into "high hillocks separated by deep depressions." The answer to this problem is to be found in the enormous pressure exerted upon the main glacier stream by its tributaries, as is most lucidly and adequately explained in the eleventh chapter. The same phenomenon was observed by the authors in the Nun Kun in 1906.

One of the most notable peculiarities of the Hispar is the almost complete absence of median moraines, but this is amply compensated for by the abundance and size of the lateral moraines which the glacier is actively engaged in building up. The ridges of the highest of these, found on the north bank, are 394ft. above the present surface. The mountains rise too abruptly from the glacier to afford any room for the maidans clothed with vegetation which were met with on previous expeditions in the Himalayas. So much for the character of the Hispar.

The expedition in question consisted of the authors; Count Dr. Cesare Calciati and Dr. Mathias Koncza, who made a complete topographical survey of the whole of the Hispar region, the results of which are summarised in the admirable Appendix written by them and in the detailed map; the Italian guide, Cyprien Savoye, who had already participated in two of the previous expeditions (he does not figure largely in these pages, but the occasions in which he does appear are momentous); three of the porters who accompanied the expedition of 1906, and a variable quantity of Nagar coolies, about whom the less said the better. Mr. Hogg performed valuable services as agent. The route traversed was, roughly, triangular—Srinagar, Gilghit, Chalt, Hispar, Hispar Pass, Askole, Shigar, Skardo, Gurais, and Srinagar. A short distance beyond Chalt lies that stupendous and glorious mountain Rakaposhi, 25,550 feet in height, the photographs of which are among the most beautiful in the book.

It is curious and distressing to notice that the villagers of Hispar, though starving by reason of a long succession of bad harvests, were just as averse from honest and well-paid labour as are the unemployed of our own long-suffering country.

The mountains of the Hispar region do not lend themselves to climbing, but are "characterised by their extreme steepness and greatly broken surfaces, being seamed by gorges and ravines at all altitudes. In addition, their higher parts and the entire slopes of those on the south-east side of the Haigatum and south side of the Hispar are heavily coated with ice and snow, which settle into hanging glaciers and séracked ice-falls on their flanks, and festoon their ridges and apices with great stratified cornices, sometimes even double and triple in character. These, breaking away, frequently give rise to avalanches, which sweep the whole mountain-flanks down to and over a considerable portion of the glaciers." Hence the mountains are not only difficult, in most cases impossible, but also very dangerous to climb, or even to approach.

One of the most important results, from a commercial point of view, is the demonstration of the present impracticability of the Nushik La as a pass for the traveller, or even for the mountaineer, this being one of many examples of changes which take place in the Himalayas during a decade or two.

The culminating point of interest is reached at the ascent by Mrs. Bullock Workman of Biafao Hispar Watershed Peak. The view from the summit she describes as "perhaps the most comprehensive and beautiful I have seen in Himalaya." The most fitting comment one can make upon this great climb is to repeat the remark of one of the porters upon the return of the little party to camp—"C'était quelque chose à voir, cette ascension, Madame." After reading the thrilling account of such an ascent—21,350ft.—we are pleased to have proved to us by the twelfth chapter that Mrs. Bullock Workman's title to the record altitude reached by a lady-mountaineer cannot now be questioned.

As to the topographical results of the expedition, readers may remember that Sir Martin Conway made a somewhat rapid ascent of the Hispar in the year 1892. The present was the first complete survey. Drs. Calciati and Koncza set out their conclusions in a separate portion of the book, entitled "The Basin of the Hispar Glacier." The map published by the Trigonometrical Survey of India is, according to them, completely valueless as regards the topography of the Hispar district.

Geologists will probably find this Appendix the most interesting portion of the whole work. Indeed, having regard to the existing state of our knowledge of glacial phenomena, information such as that acquired by the learned doctors upon this expedition is of the highest possible interest and scientific value. It is satisfactory to learn that they went to considerable lengths in setting up in situ various indications available for future explorers, a comparison of which after the lapse of many years will probably afford valuable data. Those who are desirous of studying the scientific results of the expedition further will find the necessary references given in the Appendices.

But for the general reader the pleasure afforded by this book is that of being enabled to participate spiritually in the glorious scenes described by those who understand and appreciate the splendours of the high places of the world. "Dawn is beautiful in the plains when heralded by the swish and twitter of innumerable song-birds; lovelier still at the bases of the hills, when shafts of dark violet flare up the spurs, turning to pale mauve and pink as they dart upward into the advancing light; most beautiful of all, higher yet above the abodes of man, beyond even the voice of the high-flying chough, where, as the curtain of darkness which has held the upper world in its inky grip is uplifted, glaciers, arêtes, and peaks, hitherto unseen, are revealed, spreading out on all sides in the calm, simple magnificence of ante-sunrise lighting." We wish we also could see that magnificent spectacle of the East.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

MR. BELLOC AS POET: WITH SOME OTHERS

Verses. By H. Belloc. (Duckworth and Co. 5s. net.)
The Search for Loveliness, and other Verses. By G. Rostrevor Hamilton. (John Long. 2s. 6d. net.)
Reaping the Whirlwind, and other Poems. By G. F. Bradby. (Smith, Elder, and Co. 3s. 6d. net.)
Open Spaces. By Irven. (John Long. 2s. 6d. net.)
The Queen of the Fiord, and other Poems. By John Cave. (Kegan, Paul, Trench, Trübner, and Co. 5s. net.)

Place of honour in this list must be given to Mr. Hilaire Belloc, not only because of his fine sense of rhyme and rhythm, but because to these qualities he adds a very neat irony and his characteristic shafts of incisive wit. Those who are familiar with his prose-work know well how aptly he will drop into verse when the mood takes him; we have here, for example, that splendid, swinging song "Heretics All," from "The Path to Rome." Very glad we are, too, to find it; but does it not add immensely to our pleasure to turn to the account of its inception? On the road to Moutier, we are told, Mr. Belloc asks "a young man chopping wood" for coffee:—

> And as he refused it I took him to be a heretic and went down the road making up verses against all such, and singing them loudly through the forest that now arched over me and grew deeper as I descended. And my first verse was:—
>
> Heretics all, whoever you be,
> In Tarbes or Nimes, or over the sea,
> You never shall have good words from me.
> Caritas non conturbat me.
>
> I sang it to a lively hymn-tune that I had invented for the occasion. I then thought what a fine fellow I was, and how pleasant were my friends when I agreed with them. I made up this second verse . . .

But we must resist the temptation to quote, or we shall do the author an injustice and reproduce, in our enthusiasm, all the poem and half the "Path to Rome."

Some of these poems (for half the contents of this beautiful book are true poetry, in spite of the modest title) are bright and keen as a sword-blade; others are as tender as a mother's whisper to her drowsy child. When, as often happens, the verses are in a martial spirit, how well Mr. Belloc understands the power of resonant words and the effect of a choice distribution of vowel-sounds! In "The Leader" the lines thud and resound as the tramp of a distant battalion, and we seem to hear the heavy artillery booming in the mist:—

> I hear them all, my fathers call,
> I see them how they ride,
> And where had been the rout obscene
> Was an army straight with pride.
> A hundred thousand marching men,
> Of squadrons twenty score;
> And after them all the guns, the guns,
> But she went on before.

On the page facing this is a lovely lyric entitled "A Bivouac," which introduces several place-names in a most musical manner. We may give the opening stanza:—

> You came without a human sound,
> You came and brought my soul to me:
> I only woke, and all around
> They slumbered on the firelit ground.
> Beside the guns in Burgundy.

Towards the end of the book there are several feats of accurate rhyming, combined with an irony that can be very biting. A mock "Newdigate Poem" is simply irresistible, and the "Ballad of Consols" shows how acutely Mr. Belloc studies the times. His postscript runs thus:—

> Permit me—if you do not mind—
> To add, it would be screaming fun
> If, after printing this, I find
> Them after all at 81.

The refrain of the ballad is that "Consols are at 82;" alas! they are now at 79, and Mr. Belloc must try again. Those who do not know Mr. Belloc as a poet should get this volume at once, for they have indeed a treat in store. Many other exquisite songs and ballads, which we should like to mention if space availed, hide within its pages.

Mr. Hamilton's title-poem, "The Search for Loveliness," contains a pretty idea prettily carried out; many of his lines are of quite haunting beauty, and the whole effect is satisfactory from a poetical point of view. The warmth of a vivid imagination pervades all his poems, and, as we expect from one who owes much inspiration to Greek sources, his technique is as a rule impeccable. A fair example of his style will be conveyed by the last stanza of the opening poem:—

> The lights of Loveliness, like scattered stars
> Hung in the canopy of darkness, shine.
> Still it is Night. Still with her prison-bars
> She hems the fire, whose burning shall refine
> The dross of Earth. Then Loveliness divine
> To them who seek her shall be manifest.
> Yet may we now, now at her earthly shrine,
> With perfect vision of her light be blest
> A moment—ere it rise and shine from East to West.

A charming little New Year's lyric, some Greek translations, and a small collection of verse in humorously satirical mood are worthy of notice as completing a clever little book.

The French Revolution is the somewhat sanguinary theme of a great part of "Reaping the Whirlwind," and we may say at once that the author gives some uncommonly fine pictures of the period, which he has evidently studied closely. The verses entitled "The Connoisseur" are as gruesome as any we have read for a long time, but they are restrained judiciously, though the description of the eager crowd round the tragedies of execution induces uneasy thrills :—

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

> For they push you and they jostle all around the guillotine,
> And the riders on their horses come and thrust themselves between,
> And the killing's done so quickly that there's nothing to be seen.

The most powerful thing in the book, in our judgment, is a blank-verse poem of seven or eight pages concerning Robespierre, glimpsed with a sheaf of wild flowers in his hand, talking to a country girl. For some mysterious reason the wrath of the onlooker, who was about to murder him, is stayed. The impression is conveyed in a masterly fashion, and this poem alone stamps the writer as worthy of a high place. Considerable pathos is shown in a rhymed musing on the theme of the little Dauphin, but nothing in the book is better than the "Robespierre." Some melodious lyrics and some quite smart "Lay Sermons" show the author in another attractive, but less powerful, mood.

With "Irven," who appears to greet us from Australia, we have to find a few preliminary faults. The didactic method, and the too frequent use of the vocative, mar much of his work; lucidity, too, is sacrificed to a curiously complicated construction. Very few of the poems read naturally or smoothly; the desire for an exotic word, or a familiar word employed in strange company, has proved a pitfall, and the author exploits his mysterious fancy for the capital letter in a way that puzzles the reader who wants to penetrate his meaning. One or two passages will exemplify this. In a sonnet addressed, rather unfortunately, "To Lucid Burns," he writes :—

> . . . he caught
> The glorious Truths wherewith the Heights are fraught,
> And spent his life for Fusion, where earth-qualms
> Forget the Unity that God has taught
> Through Love. This is the goal all Life has sought.

In some verses entitled "Sleep's Servitors" the following cryptic stanza occurs :—

> Lead they through purple-tinctured phantasy
> Visioned with joy,
> And veined with pulseful throbbing ecstasy,
> Which they employ
> As flowers their petals, so that garnering bee
> Life's seeds alloy.

On page 55 we find another curious piece of writing :—

> Thy Secret Thoughts are guiding hands, that lead
> By their own nature. They spill fruitful seed,
> And Body grows them, be they flower or weed!

This has a somewhat comic effect, as though "Body" were a rather independent sort of gardener. Why truncate so many phrases by dropping the defiuing article? The fault occurs time after time, and gives rise to a sensation of accumulating irritability:—"Haste we on long road;" "Bearing its standard to nearer hour;" "Started from Womb of Thought" are three more instances of this blemish. There is also more than a suspicion of the "New Thought" jargon in many of these verses. But, despite the necessity for complaint which we have indicated, the author proves himself a true poet by three or four lyrics, such as a delightful "Ode to the Wattle Bloom," sheer music, and a fine little song entitled "Enigma." These two stand from the rest of his work in surprising contrast, and we can only wish he had written more in the same vein, leaving his advice to "Be Thyself" and to "Think Noble Thoughts" to those who occupy pulpits and have small need for rhyme.

Not often do we find an idyll of modern love related with the grace and taste which Mr. John Cave brings to his "Queen of the Fiord," a story of love at first sight and its tragic ending. Truth to tell, we like the work best when the author leaves his rather jerky rhyming for the more stately measure of blank verse; he is rather too fond of the anapaestic rhythm, which is a trap for unwary feet in more senses than one. Here and there we seem to catch clear echoes of other poets, as in the verses on page 16 :—

> Such men leave footsteps on the sands of Time,
> And carve their names upon the solid rocks,
> And live in legends and make others great,
> And where they lead a host of lesser men
> Follow, and creep a little nearer God.

This, after reminding us of Longfellow, glides into a very Tennysonian measure. A sequence of short poems, under the title of "Two Locks of Hair," deals with a problem which Meredith treated in "Modern Love." The plot is very well thought out and exhibited, and some of the lyrical portions show Mr. Cave at his best, although they are strangely unequal. It was hardly wise, perhaps, to attempt so grave a theme in such light stanzas, but in justice we must say that the whole effect is remarkably good. We cannot spare more space over this volume of two hundred pages, save to note that the remainder of its contents, chiefly lyrical, keep to a high level of accomplishment, and in a few instances rise to real poetry of a distinguished order.

A FRIENDLY WARNING

The Age of Folly: a Study of Imperial Needs, Duties, and Warnings. By CHARLES J. ROLLESTON. (John Milne. 5s. net.)

DURING the last few years all responsible people of well-informed and rightly-balanced minds have been conscious of a vague feeling that a critical period is approaching in the political, social, and economic status of our land. Especially has this haunting, uneasy sensation of impending national ill-health developed among true lovers of England in the last twelve or eighteen months. Socialism, the noxious weed that is ready to blossom at any hour into the poisonous nightshade, to bear its corrupt fruit of anarchy and misrule, has spread its rank growth in the most unexpected quarters, and threatens to choke and stifle the finest flowers of wise counsel and thoughtful endeavour. To the Governments of other countries who have keenly studied our history and watched our rise to the splendid position of premier world-Power, we present a problem for serious consideration; we suffer tactless legislators to chatter where they will; allow the human refuse of other capitals to settle in our very midst without the slightest attempt at control or registration, and proceed generally as though the stability of a mighty realm were a perfectly natural and permanent result of its greatness, instead of an attribute which requires the most vigilant care and the most skilful guardianship to preserve intact. It is no cause for wonder if to many acute minds the thought has occurred, as they read of the decline and fall of other historic empires, that unless some drastic reforms of our present "popular" legislative methods can be secured, the country will soon be at a crisis in her fortunes such as she has never been confronted with before.

With the praiseworthy object of emphasising this danger Mr. Charles J. Rolleston has written his critical study of our time, entitled "The Age of Folly," and at the outset we may remark that it is a book which deserves the earnest consideration of all politicians; for, although occasionally he is inclined to employ gloomy colours too freely, his common sense is notable, and his figures, we imagine, cannot be challenged. Proceeding from introductory chapters on the lesson of Rome, of Spain, and of the Netherlands, to sketch the state of affairs in England, he paints a sad picture, part of which we may reproduce:—

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

> Agriculture is becoming a bankrupt industry; others are vanishing or departing for foreign lands; the middle and lower classes complain of shrinking incomes, bad trade, want of employment; tens of thousands of intelligent artisans and workers are emigrating to Protectionist countries, while tens of thousands of aliens, often of a very low type, are crowding into England, taking the place of emigrants of English stock. Suicide is increasing in proportion to the population; insanity is also increasing rapidly. The birth-rate is decreasing. The virile peasantry of other days, leading a healthy country life, are rapidly diminishing in numbers, and masses of the modern English, huddled together in town purlieus, are producing a race of physical degenerates and mental defectives.

This is a lurid, and perhaps an extreme presentation; but it is perfectly true that "the Tariff Reformers can hardly adduce a better object-lesson in defence of their views than by comparing the glowing forecasts [of Cobden] with the conditions of English life after his theories have been accepted for sixty years." Where the author errs, however, is in suggesting, or rather seeming to suggest, that no other influence has been at work to produce this sorry condition of affairs. Later on in the volume he, of course, corrects himself automatically, bringing forward many flaws in public administration, and instancing various faults in our system of party Government. It is unfortunately true that while the electorate is composed of seven and a half millions of voters, in round numbers, three-fourths of these have not studied the contemporary history of their country from an Imperial standpoint, or, we might almost say, from any standpoint at all.

Turning for a moment from politics to the sphere of internal economics, a lengthy and very striking section of Mr. Rolleston's book is devoted to the enormous wastage in England of public and private moneys in more or less indiscriminate charity. Here, again, we fancy that some of the statements are rather too sweeping—as when the author says that after careful inquiries he "was completely satisfied that gross deception plays a large part in the solicitation for charitable subscriptions, and that in many cases benevolent institutions are carried on very largely for the benefit of employees connected with them; also that in the administration money is often misapplied, wasted, or even embezzled." Nevertheless, his warnings and his advice are opportune, for England is indeed the paradise of the wastrel, of the man who desires to live without working; and our present lawgivers seem intent upon making things still more comfortable for him.

With regard to the question of Socialism, there are many pertinent remarks, although the author does not definitely treat it as a burning problem of the day. His views, however, are sound, for he indicates the dangers which would overtake the country if the noisy clamouring of the agitators ever brought them their much-desired boon—the distribution of wealth: of other people's wealth, of course. If our "spending classes" were ruined, "the ruin would fall with terrific force on the masses of working men whose very maintenance must necessarily depend on those moneyed classes. The disappearance of capital would mean the wholesale disappearance of employment." This is so obviously true that it seems to demonstrate itself; and yet it is the very fact which thousands of working men cannot, or will not, see. The point is emphasised:—

> Those composing the British proletariat might look with indifference on the extinction of income pertaining to those occupying other and higher social positions. They would, however, evince less indifference if they understood the real truth, that . . . the ruin of the classes would also bring ruin to the homes of the working men themselves. There ought to be no difficulty in demonstrating this, yet, unfortunately, the working men whose votes now represent the governing force of our country do not generally understand it.

The important questions of afforestation, the revival of agriculture, the Army and the Navy, are all dealt with in due course, but it is impossible here to discuss all Mr. Rolleston's ideas at any great length. If we do not invariably agree with him, he none the less gives us food for much close thought, and as far as we can see in an attentive perusal has made few errors either in fact or deduction. One slight slip we may point out in his figures as to the importation of eggs from Denmark. "Half a billion" is the number given on p. 242, whereas it should be 500,000,000—unless, as may be the case, the word "billion" is used in the French significance. We recommend the book as a very thoughtful and timely discussion of problems which in the near future threaten to take upon themselves a vital importance in the history of our land and its empire.

SHORTER REVIEWS

The Young People. By One of the Old People. Second Edition. (Macmillan and Co. 3s. 6d. net.)

VARIOUS items of internal evidence, such as a smart slap at the "Christian Scientists" and a certain neat facility in reasoning, gave us hints as to the authorship of this very delightful little volume, although not until the colophon was reached did a list of books "by the same writer" divulge the secret. For the book chanced to be new to us in both senses, and most pleased we have been to wander through the digressive essays which it embodies. The hand that wrote "Confessio Medici" might be expected to provide something good in the way of gentle and pertinent philosophising, and in these chapters—written primarily for lovers of young people rather than for the young folks themselves—there are many points which appeal to us very strongly.

The sections entitled "London," "Sunday Out," and "The Run of the Streets," all of which deal with aspects of the great city or its surroundings, contain more humour and good sense with regard to the treatment of the growing boy and girl than are to be found in a dozen ordinary books of cut-and-dried instruction and "advice to parents." In the guise of one who resides with a happy family where are certain healthy, inquisitive youngsters who "want to know" all about things in general, the author distributes so many excellent musings that we are at a loss to select any for special reference. Those who think they know their London should read this book, and find how well and sympathetically it can be known, and, possibly, feel abased. "I long to be able to see London for the first time," says the author. "To come as a tourist—to see London in that spirit!"—

> To find my way to Westminster Bridge, and stand amazed at the sudden beauty of the Embankment. To enter, for the first time, the Abbey. I would not lose my head and rush into the Abbey: I would compel myself to study its exterior majesty, and the cloisters, and Dean's Yard, and the little cloister, and I would read my guide-book over the grave-stones of the Norman Abbots, and where the brethren are buried who died of the Black Death. The Abbey would be calling me, drawing me to itself, till I could no longer bear to wait. Then I would take a deep breath, and say Now, and go inside.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

There is no lack of comprehension of that delicate mystery, the heart of a child, in these pages. "Decent liberty is good for children" runs the friendly counsel in chapter thirteen. "Streets are places where things happen which cannot happen at home: processions, open-air services, Saturday markets, queues outside theatres, special editions, electric sky-signs, pavement toys, shop-windows, obstructions of traffic, and all adjustments of differences between the police and the public." "I should be suspicious of any child who professed to care for the Elgin Marbles." "If I had to choose, for a child who was musical, and even for one who was not, the wisest of all music-teachers, I should choose a Promenade Concert twice a week, and St. Paul's on Sunday afternoon, with leave to come out before the sermon." That last happy touch is just the thing; no one can possibly question the author's wisdom after so acute a remark. We wish heartily that every one who has ever repulsed a child's questionings, or sent it off as a "troublesome brat" or a "little nuisance," could read this series of essays; he or she would receive lessons in tact and management which could not by any chance be tedious or give offence, since the grace of a ready pen and the relief of a genuinely humorous and tender outlook on life informs it from cover to cover.

The Fauna of British India: Coleoptera Lamellicornia. By J. G. Arrow. (Taylor and Francis.)

Most people have no knowledge of beetles, except of the common or kitchen variety, on which they wage war ruthlessly. To such persons this book will not appeal. It is a volume of the fauna of British India, published under the authority of the Secretary of State. The fact that it is edited by Dr. A. E. Shipley, Fellow and Lecturer of Christ's College, Cambridge, joint-editor and part author of the Cambridge Natural History, &c. &c., is a guarantee of its scientific value. Mr. J. G. Arrow is the author, and Mr. Marshall has assisted in its production. It deals with the Lamellicornia, one of the best defined and most readily recognisable of the primary divisions of Coleoptera. Of the 15,000 known species about 1,300 belong to the Indian fauna; but the collections are very incomplete. The beetles of this super-family are of a primitively fossorial type, their fundamental structure has been determined by burrowing habits which more or less still persist in the majority. Their chief distinctive feature is in the antenna. These Lamellicorn beetles are remarkable for the variety of stridulating organs to be found amongst them and still more for the occurrence of these structures in the larvæ. A special characteristic is the tendency of the sexes to differ markedly in their external features. They are by no means prolific. In this work methods of classification somewhat varying from those hitherto adopted have been introduced, and it is anticipated that some of the change may not find approval. The illustrations appear to be excellent, especially two-coloured plates of the Scarabeidæ at the end. The glossary of fifty-two words might well have been amplified. To appreciate the nomenclature a knowledge of Latin and Greek is required. Does not this justify their compulsory study by scientific students?

FICTION

ESPIONAGE BY HYPNOTISM

A Waif of Destiny. By L. G. Moberly. (Ward, Lock, and Co. 6s.)

The plot of this story is obvious from almost the first chapter, and it affords nothing new for the delectation of admirers of sensational fiction. Nevertheless, the interest is strongly sustained throughout, and it is probable that the book, once taken up, will not be put down again until the end is reached. It is crammed with exploits calculated to take the reader's breath away, especially those affecting the heroine, and as these generally culminate at the end of each chapter, it would seem that the story was originally written for serial publication. This heroine, the "Waif of Destiny," is a young woman of extraordinary vitality, for in the course of the narrative she is entrapped and compelled to stay a night alone with an unknown corpse, is injured in a railroad collision, and assumes the personality of a fellow-passenger who is killed, escapes from a house by climbing down a wall by the aid of a water-pipe, and is run over whilst under hypnotic influence, besides being twice an in-patient at a hospital.

The adventuress, Madame von Hagen, "so fairy-like, so dainty, so charming in her delicate fairness," is a spy in the pay of a certain foreign Power whom it is needless to mention. Though small in person, she is none the less formidable through the hypnotic power she possesses, as the following quotations will show:—

> At the same moment she looked straight into his eyes with her innocent blue ones, leaning a little towards him once more as she did so. Her eyes dilated and darkened as they gazed at him, and a strange, dreamy expression slowly crept over the man's face, whilst in total silence she looked, and looked, deep into his eyes. "It—is—imperative," she repeated very slowly, after that long, long look; "you—have—the—papers—there—give—them—to—me;" each word was uttered separately, with curious emphasis, and never, for a single second, did her unflinching gaze leave his eyes. Almost mechanically, and looking at her all the time, he put his hand into his breast-pocket, and drew from it a sealed packet, which, with the same mechanical movement, he put into her hands.
>
> Brian found himself looking into her blue eyes, which suddenly dilated and changed in a most extraordinary fashion. An odd feeling came over him that he must continue to look into her eyes, that in them he would find—something, something . . . A strange sense of being opposed by a personality, as strong as, if not stronger than, his own nearly overwhelmed him. . . . And for one long, strange moment he realised acutely that their two personalities were grappling together in a silent fight.

But, unlike the shady, unscrupulous Sir Matthew Barnes, to whom our first quotation refers, Brian Merivale successfully resists the adventuress. He is everything that an English gentleman should be, and we think the best-drawn character in the book, which, with the additional aid of a kind aunt, a stagey villain, a bloodthirsty, murderous dwarf, and a host of other characters, provides sufficient material for half a dozen stories. Strange to relate, the ubiquitous detective does not once put in an appearance. In her usual able style, Miss Moberly has made use of most of the stock phrases which are recognised as the peculiar property of the sensational novelist. We quote a few:—

> "He paused and glanced before and behind him with a swift, searching look." "Again came that chuckling sinister laugh." "For the electric light shone full upon a dark, deep stain." "A man who . . . paused for a moment almost as if he were listening to the silence."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

A feat which we venture to suggest achieves the impossible. For those who relish this sort of fare Miss Moberly's book is the very thing.

A Large Room. By Mrs. Henry Dudeney. (Heinemann. 6s.)

In "A Large Room" Mrs. Henry Dudeney has given us a very able book, but a very bitter one. There is no joy in it, no divine carelessness, and very little faith in the value of everyday human nature. The story tells of a very innocent poetical and friendless girl, and her trials at the successive hands of a stepmother, a blasé and despicable man of the world, who betrays her by a mock marriage, and a stupid and fleshy husband, with whom she thinks to find peace. Amaza Meeks is first shown to us as a queer, precocious child, who walks daily with her nurse in the gardens of the square where she lives, and talks with other children of her class without much liking them or being liked by them. She has one friend—Sebastien Gooch—a very wise youngster; in after years he becomes a High Church Rector, and stifles his love for Amaza by his belief in celibacy for his Order. The children in the gardens, with their snobbish talk, are splendid, and, despite an occasional unnatural cleverness in the conversations of Amaza and Sebastien, we think the long and full prologue the most enjoyable part of the book. Afterwards, when Amaza is grown up and her father is dead, the story becomes sad and bitter, and remains so to the end, with but short interludes of comedy.

The mere recital of the plot of this book would give a melodramatic impression which the reader will not derive from it. Mrs. Dudeney is a very subtle artist; so finely does she handle the most familiar incident that, while one is reading her book, originality seems a very small virtue. Her comedy is better than her tragedy, which is apt to be feverish. The servants, the second Mrs. Meeks—a fine example of the female philistine—her two athletic and otherwise lifeless daughters, Marcia, the priggish young widow, lately bereaved, and many sketches by the way, are all creations of pure and delightful humour. Mrs. Dudeney's male characters are like those of other women writers; one sees only the outside of them, and the best fall short of the least of her women. Nevertheless, they live, and one at least, Amaza's Nonconformist father, who appears only in the prologue, is a very convincing portrait. He is also one of the few lovable people in the book. If we might make a criticism of Mrs. Dudeney's style, we would say that it is too abrupt. Her use of the general "you" is excessive also, and there are a few touches of downright bad grammar which might have been avoided. "Such a much finer specimen," and "wouldn't have dared left" are bad. But these things do not seriously detract from the merits of a very clever book. The meaning of the title, by the way, is a mystery beyond our understanding.

The Soul of India: an Eastern Romance. By O. Schultzky. (Wm. Süsserott, Berlin. 3 marks 50.)

This little brochure—evidently a translation from the German—is such a mixture of fiction and politics, of mystery and molecules, that it is difficult to give any brief and intelligible account of it. Under the strange designation of "The Soul of India," a silver monkey idol, which had descended from an Indian race of higher culture more than twenty thousand years ago, belongs to Champa, an Oodeypore Princess (educated incognito at Girton); it climbs up the mizzen-mast of a steamer, jumps into the brine under hypnotic hallucination, travels to Trikasht, the "Indian Rome," and is restored in gold to its owner by Mom, the arch-plotter, though no one could elucidate the marvellous metamorphosis. But it has no connection with the story, which describes a plot worked by a few conspirators, including Champa, Merlin, Mom, and others. They entrap the Viceroy and the principal officials to a party on a steamer at Calcutta, where Mom and his assistants hypnotise them all, carry them off to sea, and make them commit many absurdities. The sea voyage takes them to Rangoon and Colombo, where the plot fizzles out rather tamely, and India goes on much as before. But the conversations between the dramatis personæ turn on many psychological and speculative questions, such as Germans and Indians love. For example, "India must be governed ethically," explained Mom. "Whatever that may mean," said a British Colonel. There is much about mentality, hallucination, telepathy, hypnosis, occult licence, sublimation, which finds expression in this romantic garb, but can only convey an erroneous notion of India as it exists, or of the problems to be solved. The writer has ideas and some power of thought, but they require reduction to practical standards of existence.

Out of the Dark. By the Countess of Cromartie. (Elkin Mathews. 3s. 6d. net.)

This fantastic story, quite incredible, but written as a record of actual occurrences, leaves a rather unsatisfactory impression on the reader's mind. The heroine falls in love with a very mysterious personage whom she encounters in a rock chamber below the earth's surface—"Arâs, the King;" her love, it seems, will redeem him from the doom of misery which has hung over him since his exploits in long-dead ages. They live together in a very sentimental atmosphere, travel, and incur the suspicions of the conventional world. Much of the writing of the story is pretty, but the infatuation of the girl expresses itself constantly in the exclamation "My King!" while her frequent references to the slender, steely hands of her lover and to his embraces become very tiring. Orient and Occident, with an added element of confusion in the "past" from which Arâs suffers, do not commingle at all well in these pages, and the book disappoints in another way, for the reader continually expects a climax which never arrives.

THE THEATRE

"THE PIPER" AT THE ST. JAMES'S

If we had witnessed a performance of Mr. F. R. Benson's Christmas production of "The Piper" at the St. James's Theatre in the last days of the old year there would have been an addition to the pathetically short list of autumn plays which mattered. The order in which this list would have run in our article in last week's number would have been thus:—"Pompey the Great," "Nobody's Daughter," and "The Piper." We saw the last-named play this week. We hope to see it again before it is withdrawn from the St. James's Theatre, and every Christmas for many years. It is a play which, like "Peter Pan," should be a perennial. Parents should be privileged to take their children to see it every Christmas. Among the list of Christmas productions—a list which goes back for twenty years—it stands out alone. It is infinitely more poetical, immeasurably more beautiful, and very much more moving than its only rival, "Peter Pan." "The Piper" does not belong to the same school as

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Mr. Barrie's inimitable play written by a child for children. We mention it in the same breath with "Peter Pan" because it is the only Christmas play which is worthy of the honour. "The Piper" is written by a poet for children, and both "Peter Pan" and "The Piper" should belong annually not only to children, but to grown-up children. In a word, they are unique. Mr. George Alexander and Mr. F. R. Benson deserve well of the British public. "The Piper" confers honour upon the St. James's Theatre, and Miss Josephine Preston Peabody shares with "George Paston" and John Masefield the dramatic laurels of 1910.

"The Piper," Michael the Sword-eater, and Cheat-the-Devil are strolling players who wander from village to village with a sort of caravan. It is their mission in life to awaken children's laughter. They worship the sun and all the other wonders of Nature, but the Piper—an everlasting child himself—worships children more than all. It happens that he has arrived at Hamelin when it is at the mercy of a plague of rats. All the devices of the Burgomeister, of Kurt the syndic, Peter the cobbler, Hans the butcher, Axel the smith, Martin the watch, Peter the sacristan, Anselm the young priest, Old Claus the miser, and Old Ursula have been unable to prevent the storming of their houses by this great army of destroyers. Suddenly into their midst stroll the three mountebanks, oddly garbed, the Piper in a sort of motley, Cheat-the-Devil hiding his round and beardless face beneath the mask of Mephistopheles, and Michael, the perfect man—young, handsome, and honest—who pretends to eat swords. Jacobus the Burgomeister, of the wine-flushed face and mighty body, and his mercenary collection of leading townsmen eye these strangers askance. To them they are gipsies, pretenders, mere creatures whose lives are spent in amusing noisy children for pence. They button their pockets and look sharply after their goods until the Piper, who has no name, but who remembers with reverence his mother's face, hears of the town's great trouble, and offers for a thousand guelders to rid the place of all its rats. Incredulous but hopeless, Jacobus accepts the offer, and the Piper, putting his pipe to his lips, sends his quaint, alluring melody into the air and charms the rats away. He leads them to their death by drowning and returns to the town, whose cathedral bells chime thankfully, to claim his reward. With his return the curtain rises. In his absence Michael has fallen in love with Babara, daughter of Jacobus, and he finds, without astonishment, that the men of Hamelin, now untroubled by the plague, regard the stipulated reward as altogether out of proportion to the deed performed. But the Piper insists upon the reward in full, and when he is finally offered fifteen guelders in all he is so hurt at the dishonesty, meanness, and treachery of the townsmen whom he has rescued that he waits until they and their wives have gone into the Cathedral to kneel in thanksgiving, and then puts his pipe to his lips. From all parts of the town, from houses big and small, from supper-table and from bed, child after child, girl and boy, come creeping on tip-toe to the irresistible call, until there is not one, however small, that is not dancing beneath the pipe. And then, as mothers and fathers kneel before the altar and the organ of the Cathedral swells in thanksgiving, the quaint melody of the wooden pipe passes from the market-place into the open country and is heard no more, and with it have gone the children. Before its appeal has died away the acolytes are caught by it, and fly from the church to follow, pursued by the outraged sacristan, and when the sound has faded into the distance the square fills with distraught fathers and mothers, whose cries of terror and despair drown the chiming bells.

The children are led to a beautiful cave inside the Hollow Hill, and here, with all their feeling for adventure alive, the Piper, a great child among children, works his charm upon them, a charm as simple as it is irresistible. He makes himself young again. He pipes and dances and tells stories until sleep puts dust into all their eyes, and in their sleep awful dreams come to them. Their fathers assume horrible personalities and threaten; their mothers are forgotten. They wake gladly enough to find themselves in what appears to be fairyland, ruled over by their friend the Piper, whom they love and trust. For all that he pipes and laughs, tells stories, and doles out food, the fatherless Piper is on tenterhooks of anxiety. Where are Michael and Cheat-the-Devil—Michael, who is held to Hamelin by the eyelashes of Babara, and Cheat-the-Devil, who is a timid and nervous youth? They may betray his hiding-place and bring down upon Hollow Hill all the angry parents of the children he has won. Cheat-the-Devil comes, but Michael lags behind, so the Piper goes forth to find him, leaving his beloved little ones in the care of the man who wears the purple of the enemy of mankind. It is on the crossways where silver birch-trees try to shelter with their delicate limbs the outstretched figure of Christ from sun and rain that the Piper finds Michael. The sword-eater has a breaking heart, for Babara, who has captured it, is to be sacrificed by all the mothers and fathers of Hamelin as an offering. In order that God may restore their children, the beautiful girl, ripe for motherhood, is even at that moment being led to a convent in the valley, there to be hidden from the world, and left to eke out her life behind the grill. Michael implores the Piper to charm the children back to Hamelin so that Babara may be saved. The Piper refuses. "Those Hamelin mothers and fathers," he says, "do not understand the very rudiments of parenthood. To them children are not the living rays of the sun, but are merely instruments to provide them with roof and meat in old age." He will keep the children, lead them to the place, through all the beauties of Nature, where the rainbow touches the earth. They are his children. He is their father and mother. He loves them all, especially Jan, the lame boy, the only son of Veronica, wife of Kurt the syndic, whom he wishes to carry upon his shoulders for ever. Up the winding path through the forest of firs, with their shadows flung behind them, chanting and priest-led come Babara, dressed as a bride, and all the weeping parents and grown-up children. The Piper and Michael hide behind the Calvary, the Piper having undertaken to rescue the girl. High above the chanting sounds the thin, alluring note of the pipe. The priest and acolytes, men, women and maidens, still chanting, dance to the air, bewildered, almost blinded. So long as the pipe plays, on they go dancing, down the hill to the convent. But Babara remains. The Piper, laughing and triumphant, stands in front of them, Michael trembling with love. It is, however, the Piper to whom Babara turns with outstretched arms, the Piper to whom she murmurs loving words. Laughter dies from the Piper's lips and passionate anger blazes in the eyes of Michael. "No, no!" cries the man without a name, the fatherless man; "not for me your loving words." Amazed and disconcerted, smarting under the accusations of treachery from Michael, the Piper then fills a horn cup with water from the well, makes it into a love potion, and gives it to Babara. She drinks, and, seeing Michael for the first time, goes into his arms. The Piper with a smile blesses them and watches them as they disappear together lost to everything, even to the beauty of the setting sun, but themselves. Just as he is about to return eagerly to his children the tinkle of a cow-bell holds his steps. Weeping and calling for Jan, comes Veronica, wife of Kurt. She sees the Piper as he is slipping away behind the figure of the Lonely Man upon Whose face Jan was so anxious to see a smile. The broken-hearted woman flings herself at the Piper's feet and begs for her little boy. The Piper is adamant. The broken-hearted mother's appeal stirs him and pains him, but how can he make an exception? How, in any case, can he give up the best loved of all his stolen family? He tells her that Jan, like the rest, is happy and crutchless, and never once has spoken the word mother, and at last, utterly broken, the woman goes back to Hamelin to her empty nest. The Piper turns gleefully, and is once more about to rush back to his children when his eyes fall upon the figure of the Lonely Man, Who wears no smile upon His face. He stops and argues with Him. He pleads that he may retain the children. The light has faded. The moon comes up and a beam finds its way through the sheltering arms of the silver birches to the Saviour's face. The Piper looks into it, draws back, receives His command for the restoration of the little ones, his love for whom the Lonely Man shares, and bows in obedience.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Back in Hamelin Old Ursula is croaking that there will never again be young life in the market-place. One by one fathers and mothers come out with hanging heads and quivering voices. The priest leaves the Cathedral to give the last rites to the dying Veronica. Old Jacobus, whose daughter has been charmed away, comes for sympathy, and it is into the midst of these people that Michael and Babara suddenly appear hand in hand. Babara had been conducted forth as a bride. She returns a wife. The angry fathers and mothers surround the friend of the man who stole their children. Violence is about to be used, when silence falls upon them all. An unexpected sound has reached their ears. It is the shrill laughter of boys and girls. Nearer and nearer it comes, mixed with the pattering of feet. Trembling, and hardly able to believe their ears, men and women fall back and wait. Into the square, running, laughing, gambolling, troop the children of Hamelin, aud spring into their parents' arms. Finally comes the Piper with little Jan upon his shoulders. After relief comes anger. He is buffeted and pushed from man to woman. He asks for Veronica. He is told by the priest that her soul is passing, and rushes to her window to implore her to stay. He has brought back Jan. He cannot believe that it is too late. He will not believe it. And then to the window all in white comes Veronica. She opens it, and the Piper catches up the crippled boy and places him into her eager arms. Once more she hears the word mother, and is asked to admire the winged slippers which the Piper placed upon his crippled feet in fairyland, the slippers which had rendered the crutch unnecessary, Where is the Piper going? Back to the road, the long, winding road. He has piping to do. But before he goes Jan has a request. Will the Piper place the winged slippers at the feet of the Lonely Man, so that His face may wear a smile at last? The Piper does so, stands facing the children, who are his no longer, and without a smile passes on his way.

From so inadequate a description as this it will be impossible to gather more than the faintest indication of the beauty, the charm, the humour, the irresistible and exquisite poetry of this play. We do not ever remember to have seen anything upon the stage in this country or the Continent so deserving of preservation as "The Piper." It is beautifully mounted and played to perfection. In the hands of Mr. F. R. Benson the nameless man lives and breathes. This actor, so rarely seen in London, from whose company the London stage has been recruited for many years with all its most intelligent actors and actresses, and whose whole life has been devoted to providing provincial playgoers with admirable representations of Shakespeare's masterpieces, brought to bear upon his part a personality and a refinement of elocution, an elusive and indescribable sense of beauty and poetry, second only to that of Mr. Forbes Robertson. From a long cast, every member of which was excellent, we must select Mr. Eric Maxon, Mr. Alfred Wild, Mr. Alfred Brydone, Mr. J. M. Johnston, Mr. Nigel Barrie, Mr. Murray Carrington, Miss Hetty Kenyon, Miss Violet Fairbrother, Miss Ellen Aickin, and Miss Marion Terry, whose performance of Veronica was very beautiful indeed. Mr. Christopher Wilson's overture and incidental music were quite worthy of the play. We offer our sincere congraulations to Mr. F. R. Benson for having provided London with such a gem, and we trust that playgoers generally, and all who can appreciate what is best and most beautiful in the drama, will give him their support.

MISS EDYTH WALKER AT THE "PALLADIUM"

To Charles Lamb the giving of oratorios in a theatre was a "profanation of the purposes of the cheerful playhouse," and to such fogeys as look back with something of regret to the old-time music-hall with its wealth of tumblers and conjurors and tricksters, its merry comicalities and its refreshing freedom from the pretence of being anything but what it was—a place to be amused in—to such fogeys the new type of entertainment to which we are invited, instead of the old music-hall, may not improbably give an Elian feeling of disappointment. For the thrilling wizard who brought many more rabbits out of his pocket-handkerchief than the lady in Hogarth's picture did out of her petticoats, we have a popular actor and "his full company;" for the Frères Zemganno we have a prima-donna of the first rank in selections from Wagner. It is all a little mixed and disturbing, for we are constrained to admit that some of the more inane and unamusing features of the old music-halls are still to be found flourishing in the most modern of our Variety Palaces. "La variété, c'est le poivre de la vie," said the shrewd old philosopher; and we used to think it an admirably true saying. But as to the bewildering variety of these up-to-date programmes we begin to have our doubts, and will frankly confess that we should have better enjoyed our evening at the "Palladium" if Miss Walker had not been there. She is now one of our finest singers, and her performances given with the proper environment of Covent Garden opera, when our minds were attuned to sympathy with the joys of Elizabeth, and to respectful consideration for the woes of Elektra, were undoubtedly very striking. But no, we were not transported out of ourselves into the magic land of Wagner by Elizabeth's entry into a hall of song tenanted but a moment previously by the "greatest Lady Trick Cyclist in the world" (she was indeed a wonderful cyclist), nor yet by her appearance—after a Fregoli-like "quick-change"—as Adrian in the scena from "Rienzi." We tried to concentrate our attention on music and singer, to forget all that had gone before; but in vain. The remembrance of the lady cyclist's convolutions, and of the queerest little trot who had played an "Impertinente" in the ballet (she was the first portrait of Thackeray's Betsinda to the life) prevented us from taking our Wagner with the high seriousness which he requires of his listeners. It may have been our own fault; our hearing may have been dimmed; but it certainly seemed that Miss Walker was not as happy on the stage of the "Palladium" as she is on that of Covent Garden. She sang with a feverish earnestness; she was unsparing of her voice; yet it all left us cold. Elizabeth at the "Palladium" could not persuade us that she was a Princess, and no belief could be conjured up as to the mental exultation of Adrian. We speak, however, only for ourselves. The majority of the audience, more finely sensitive perhaps to operatic emotions, seemed vastly well pleased, and Miss Walker was called many times before the curtain, amid lusty cries of "Encore!" Yet had Dr. Johnson been musical and present at this entertainment he might have addressed the audience with his celebrated "You are to consider what your flattery is worth before you bestow it." For it was hardly half an hour since this same audience had wished to "encore" a young person who had sung two verses of Tosti's "Good-bye," and in this performance all possible faults of misplaced sentiment, misused rhythm, and dragged tempo had been apparent. But these crimes are held to be virtues by the uncritical. That the introduction of great music, performed by great artists, on to the "Variety Stage" may encourage a healthy taste for what is great and good we must all hope. But we fear it will take some time.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

DRURY LANE AND THE CHILDREN

We have noticed that, in writing about pantomimes, the critics of our contemporaries usually make two rather serious mistakes. The first is the assumption that pantomime is really intended for the amusement of children, and the second (which to a certain extent is implicit in the first) is the conclusion that most pantomimes are unsatisfactory because they fail to provide the children with suitable fare. A glance at any pantomime audience should dispel the first illusion. Even at matinées the children are in the minority, while at night the disproportion is quite startling. As we remarked a few weeks ago, the real purpose of modern pantomime appears to be to give conscientious objectors to music-halls an opportunity of witnessing a music-hall entertainment without shame. It follows that, even if the second criticism were just, it would not be very important; but though we agree that the average pantomime is far removed from the ideal entertainment for children, it is at all events quite harmless, and contains a number of elements that children like. They appreciate the colour of the pageant, the papier-mâché treasures, the gilt moons and ultramarine sunsets, the jewelled and gilt scenery; they like the funny clothes and red noses and boisterous horseplay of the low comedians; they like the "little girls" in short skirts, in whom the sophisticated recognise the tired ladies of the ballet; they like, in fact, nearly all the things which writers with sentimental views on children think it necessary to condemn. As a general rule they do not care for the love-making or the singing; after a long experience of pantomimes we are prepared to say that they are right, though our reasons are not perhaps theirs. The singing in pantomimes is nearly always extremely bad, and the fact that the principal boy is always the principal girl makes the love-scenes ridiculous. The wonder is that in an entertainment that must at all costs be made attractive to adults there should be so much that gives genuine pleasure to young people.

From the days of our youth we have always had a kindness for Drury Lane Theatre, and above all for Drury Lane pantomime. The theatre has an individual atmosphere, the pantomime is not like the pantomime one sees anywhere else. In order to appreciate the size of the place it is necessary to put on a very small pair of knickerbockers and gaze upwards from the stalls between the chocolates and the ices. It is like looking into the deeps of heaven, though here the gods suck oranges and make catcalls—those fascinating sounds that our youthful lips would never achieve. Drury Lane is the only theatre that preserves the old glamour. We never enter its doors without thinking of Charles Lamb, and it would hardly astonish us if Mistress Nell Gwynn came to greet us with her basket of China oranges, wearing that famous pair of thick worsted stockings that the little link-boy gave her to save her pretty feet from the chilblains. Outside, the image of Shakespeare leans on its pedestal, sadly contemplative of the grey roofs of Covent Garden. The porters who carry about bunches of bananas, unconsciously reproducing the pictures of Mr. Frank Brangwyn, do not concern themselves with the poet's passionate dreams of the whitely wanton, wherein they show more discretion than Mr. Andrew Lang. If Shakespeare ever slips down from his perch to watch a scene or two of the pantomime from the shadows of the auditorium, he must wonder a little at our twentieth-century masques. Like the children, he would probably appreciate the splendid colour and brightness of the spectacle, and, having been an actor himself, he would perhaps pardon the actors' cheerful neglect of the rights of the dramatist. For modern pantomime is a business of strongly contrasted individualities rather than the product of blended and related effort. This is especially true of Drury Lane, whose stage at this season of the year is always crowded with vaudeville Napoleons and musical-comedy Cleopatras. In detail the pantomime is excellent; as an artistic entity it does not exist.

At first sight this seems rather a pity. Given a wonderfully appointed stage, gorgeous mounting, a fine orchestra, and a number of gifted performers, it is natural to expect that the result should be more than the mere sum of these units. But, as a matter of fact, pantomime is essentially formless. Those critics who clamour for straightforward versions of the old nursery stories would be vastly disappointed if they got what they wanted. The old stories are well enough when told by firelight in the nursery after tea of a winter's evening. But they lack humour, and are not, as a rule, dramatic. ("Bluebeard," of course, is a striking exception.) When a story lasting twenty minutes must be expanded to last four hours the story is bound to suffer. When, in addition, all the characters are played by performers whose strength lies in their individuality, it will be surprising if any part of the illusion created by the original fable survives at all.

"Jack and the Beanstalk" is a very good story, capable, like most good stories, of treatment in many different ways. We imagine that if Mr. Barrie had chosen to prepare it for the stage we should have had a tearful picture of Jack's mother mourning at the root of the Bean. The author of the "Blue Bird" would have pointed out to us that the Bean grew upwards and not downwards, and thereby compelled us to realise the significance of Jack with his climbing-irons. At Drury Lane they avoided the sentimental though not wholly the symbolic aspect of the legend. There was a magic harp that puzzled us dreadfully, even though it was no more than a part of a Boy-Scout's dream. We do not believe that Boy-Scouts ever dream of magic harps. But this and a bunch of fairies out of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" apart, we found the new version very satisfactory. There were plenty of moments in it to please a child, especially the boots and hand of the giant, and there was nothing really fatuous like the enormous crystal slipper they have provided for poor Cinderella at the Lyceum. Then for adults there are the subtle humours of Mr. George Graves, who may, if you will, speak the words of Mr. Arthur Roberts with the voice of Mr. Dan Leno, but seems to us extremely original and extremely amusing nevertheless. There are other clever comedians; there are comely females; there is an admirable cow. The scenery, especially the growing beans, is as good as it can be. What more can anybody want? We shall go again next year.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

SOME NEW FRENCH BOOKS

THE Académie Goncourt has just awarded its annual prize. This year the fortunate laureate is M. Louis Pergaud, who certainly deserves the honour that has been conferred upon him, as his book "De Goupil à Margot: Histoires de Bêtes" ranks among the best animal stories ever written, and contains some very exact observation and delicate pathos. M. Pergaud has devoted his attention to the study of the wild beasts of the woods, and all the tales contained in "De Goupil à Margot" are delightful. We are alternately amused and saddened by the adventures they record. The book might appropriately bear as sub-title "The Animals' Martyrology." Man, as seen from the point of view of the author's furry and feathery heroes and heroines, certainly appears the most despicable animal in creation.

Of course, English readers of this book must not search for any affinity—except that of a deep love for our dumb brothers—between M. Louis Pergaud and some of the great English or American writers on animals—such as, for instance, Ernest Seton-Thompson or Rudyard Kipling. M. Pergaud's work is thoroughly French; it differs in thought, conception, and style from the English. It is, perhaps, less true to nature than Seton-Thompson's creations, but it is infinitely more tender; it is far less virile or beautiful than Kipling's Jungle-books, but in certain aspects is much more graceful. It is very personal, and for that reason interesting.

It is generally exceedingly painful to hear French or Continental people criticise England, and it occasionally becomes a positive suffering when they venture to publish a book containing the results of their misleading observations. It is, therefore, specially interesting to note M. André Chevrillon's last work, "Nouvelles Études Anglaises," which contains some of the best critical essays on England and English-speaking countries that we have seen. They are, moreover, expressed in beautiful French, and written in a sober and faultless style. That M. Chevrillon should thus understand and depict English life, thought, and psychology is not astonishing when we remember that he is the nephew of Taine—Taine who applied the positive method to literary criticism and history, and who also wrote that wonderful "Histoire de la Littérature Anglaise" and "Notes sur l'Angleterre," and in whom we find the strength, imagination, and humour which are also characteristic, though in a lesser degree, of M. Chevrillon's prose.

One of the finest of these "Nouvelles Études Anglaises" is that entitled "La Psychologie d'un Couronnement," written in 1902—a Frenchman's analysis of the various states of the English mind during the festivities of the Coronation of the late King. "La Jeunesse de Ruskin" is also another intensely interesting article, in which the author retraces with great conscientiousness and evident care for precision of detail the youth of the great critic. It is a delightful study, written with an undercurrent of complete sympathy with and understanding of the great man's personality and genius which considerably add to its charm. M. Chevrillon's serious but withal exceedingly captivating work contains several other essays; all are equally imbued with penetration and observation. In short, "Nouvelles Études Anglaises" should have a real success in England.

"La Vagabonde" is Mme. Colette Willy's latest novel, and was even proposed for the Prix Goncourt, which fell to Louis Pergaud. In it the author describes the tribulations of a young woman who, having divorced a most despicable husband, becomes a music-hall dancer and mime. The heroine, Renée Néré, manages to retain a certain distinction, and does not become encanaillée, though she affects no prudery, which, be it said, would be sadly out of place in the smoky, dingy coulisses of the fourth-rate music-hall in which she dances. One night a rich young man, a cercleux as is styled that particular kind of Parisian idler, presents himself at the door of her loge, after a representation during which she has mimicked a most violent and suggestive dance, and gives her to understand with a most brutal frankness the passionate admiration he feels for her, and the very unplatonic nature of his desires. Renée has him put out; but ultimately they meet again, and even become friends. Max, the young man, nearly succeeds in making himself loved. He ventures to propose marriage to Renée, who will not hear of it. She starts on a professional tour in the provinces, the last she will ever take before going to live with Max, but while travelling thus finds herself removed from the influence of her would-be lover. She realises that she is a vagabond, a stray, and the prospect of the comfortable, settled, and quiet life her existence with Max, even if irregular, would be, fills her with distress. This repulsion grows on her so that at the end of her tour, instead of returning to the man who is confidently waiting for her, she hides in a village, with Fossette, her dog, and Blondine, her maid, before starting on a long journey in South America. "La Vagabonde" is well written, and is flavoured with a certain ironical humour. There are some exquisite sketches of scenery, some amusing paintings of life behind the scenes of a popular Parisian café-concert; scattered here and there are some very true analyses of the sort of defiance and disdain the heroine feels for those belonging to the class of society she has voluntarily abandoned. "La Vagabonde" would have gained greatly however, if the author had shortened or even omitted some of the love-scenes, which are repeated rather too often in the course of the work.

M. Maurice de Waleffe, in his last study, "Héloïse, Amante et Dupe d'Abélard," has declared that his work constitutes the "end of a legend." Abélard is rather brutally deposed from the pedestal he occupied until now as type of the long-suffering lover. Héloïse, on the contrary, benefits by the author's deepest sympathy; she is presented to us as a beautiful, cultivated, and naïve damsel of seventeen, who fell an innocent prey to the machinations of a selfish, sensual pedant. If the affirmation made by M. de Waleffe is correct—and it is probably so, as it is based on the many documents of the time, such as, for example, some of Abélard's own letters—then Abélard's memory is in great danger of being regarded with something closely approaching to disgust! M. de Waleffe's book is written in the bright, clever style which characterises some of his earlier works, as "Les Paradis de l'Amérique Centrale"—which, by the way, is soon going to be published in an English translation. Though "Héloïse, Amante et Dupe d'Abélard" may not be precisely a book for young girls, it is almost certain that those who take an interest in medieval questions will read this captivating study with great pleasure, as it contains some exceedingly curious descriptions of the life, thought, morals, customs, and dress of the France of the moyen-âge.

MARC LOGÉ.

CHARLES BAUDELAIRE

CHARLES BAUDELAIRE was born in Paris in the year 1821. He has often been called the poet of decadence. If by this vague and much misused term we understand that instinct which leads men to wander into the realms of the artificial and the morbid, towards the antithesis of the simplicity and almost crude brutality of classical ideals, or to contemplate the beauties of a decaying civilisation for their inspiration, then Baudelaire has merited the title. For he took as his doctrine that the development of human intelligence and the constant wandering of man farther and farther from the primitive sources of nature, together with the complexity of his insatiable desires, have rendered the naïve simplicity of classic art unsuitable to express his present sentiments and sense of beauty. Baudelaire has known how to penetrate ever deeper and deeper into the muddy, obscure haunts of modern life, and from the refuse-heap of humanity has picked a wonderful poetry of vice, crime, and decay. His style is complicated and ornamental, while his vocabulary is rich and varied. This is but a corollary of what we have already pointed out. For how could he paint, with the simple style and vocabulary of a classic poet, the mysterious complexity of the modern character, those poisoned cankers which eat into the virgin freshness of an over-civilised mind, or sound the multi-coloured chords of human fantasy raised by centuries of luxury and indulgence? It is this necessity which drove him to search among the unplucked blossoms of his language for fit words to express the paradoxical sentiments which he paints. He has himself declared that he preferred the florid Latin of the decaying Roman Empire and the wild adornments of the Byzantine Empire to the simplicity of the times of Greek and Roman greatness.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Now as to Baudelaire himself, this great landmark on the threshold of modern art. His outward appearance was almost English in its pleasing simplicity; his mind never lost its mathematical balance even in its wildest wanderings among the tortuous paths of perverted human sentiments, and his poems are perfect in their form. He was in a sense the disciple of Théophile Gautier, the great founder of the doctrine of "l'art pour l'art," or Art for art's sake. Gautier had started life as a painter and afterwards became a poet. But the painter's instinct never deserted him, and he strove to make of poetry a plastic art. For Gautier and his disciples a poem which was written with a moral or doctrinal end in view lost its position as a work of art, as the one object of the poet should be the almost plastic portrayal of pure beauty. Baudelaire was in fact a disciple of Gautier, but his poems have a depth of feeling and analysis which is altogether lacking in the essentially superficial beauties of Théophile Gautier's creations. The great service which this school rendered to French poetry was the perfection of its form, and this is particularly noticeable in the works of Baudelaire. Baudelaire's was a great mind, which scorned the petty commonplaces and platitudes of every-day life. In an age of action his restless, ever-penetrating genius would have driven him to conquer continents and rush him ultimately to Napoleonic ruin. Forced to inaction, his mind wandered away from the trivial and the apparent to explore the dangerous channels of perverted human passions. He penetrated beyond the veil of hypocrisy, and dissected the human mind before an astonished world, laying bare all the sores and cankers of corruption which eat in to the soul of over-civilised man. He scorned the smiling bourgeois landscapes of Parisian suburbs; the homely gardens filled with the simple violet and forget-me-nots and conventional rows of trees. His spirit longed for great tropical landscapes; for forests strewn with rich-scented orchids, and hung with crimson, juice-filled fruit; for suns which burnt in cloudless, amethyst skies; for the long, oily swell of equatorial oceans, where no breath of wind disturbed the virgin freshness of the deep blue waters; for stretches of sand where the humming of countless insects and the monotonous boom of the ever-breaking waves served to lull the languorous repose of this dreamer of wild dreams. He loved those dark beauties who scarcely veiled their athletic charms beneath the folds of some brilliant-coloured cashmere. He loved those richly-scented Southern landscapes where the sun sets in a glorious blaze of crimson, copper, and gold, and where its last rays draw a trail of blood across the ever-deepening blue of the ocean.

His wild fantasy, with its grim, despairing reactions, drove his great mind to seek for satisfaction in that "artificial Paradise" which the fumes of hashish call up in the imagination. His poems themselves are like some wild mysterious, and fever-haunted dream. Baudelaire's predominating sense was that of smell. He said of himself:—"Mon âme voltige sur les parfums comme l'âme des autres voltige sur la musique." But here again to the delicate scent of the violet and the rose he preferred dangerous, feverish perfumes such as oliban, myrrh, and even the sickly, voluptuous musk—the perfume of crime and prostitution. He also had a great affection for cats. Their gentle, quiet mystery charmed him. He wondered at the calm, intelligent scorn in their eyes, and at the mysteries of their nightly roamings among the dim and horrible shades which haunt the dark. Of the poet's love affairs we know little, for he seldom talked about his feelings, and never of his life. But from his poems and the nature of his mind we can infer that the woman he loved must always have been an ideal—a vague and beautiful figure which floated in the ever-changing mists of his fantasy. Personal and individual love was hardly possible for this great searcher towards the mysterious and the vague. It savours too much of brutal definition. The atmosphere of mystery which he loved would have vanished had he concentrated all the rays of his affection and analysis on one living object. Paul Verlaine has expressed this type of idealistic, never-satisfied love in his poem which begins:—

> Je fais souvent ce rêve étrange et pénétrant
> D'une femme inconnue, et que j'aime, et qui m'aime,
> Et qui n'est, chaque fois, ni tout à fait la même
> Ni tout à fait une autre, et m'aime et me comprend.

Baudelaire in his tropical voyages had loved some dark Beatrice of the forests, and in his poems he constantly refers to this dark vision of his dreams.

When Baudelaire published his collection of poems entitled "Les Fleurs du Mal," they created little short of a sensation in the Parisian literary world. The poet introduces his bouquet of wild poisonous blossoms with a poem to the reader in which he penetrates into his inmost soul, and lays bare the wild, insatiable desires and hectic dreams which lie hidden beneath a veneer of hypocrisy and dissimulation. And then we enter on this wonderful collection of poetic gems. At one moment Baudelaire leads us through the mud and prostitution of a great city, and the next soars with us far above the clouds towards the realms of joy and light. Now he paints some woman full of beauty and life, and the next some poor, lost soul lying dead among the tawdry ruins of her splendour. Now he sees some poor forsaken, ill-fed beggar-maid, wandering among the haunts of drunkenness and vice; then in his imagination he clothes her in the silk of prosperity, and covers her with the kisses of admiring Paris. He describes in "Les petites vieilles" how he used to follow poorly-clad and wasted old women through the dusk of the streets, and used to mark the soul which still lived within these dilapidated forms; and how as he watched them he would weave beautiful dreams of the splendours which had once been theirs. In his poem "Le Masque" he paints a lovely woman, before whose beauty all the world bows down; then snatches from her face the disguise of smiles, and finds a visage bathed in tears beneath. He ends with the beautiful lines:—

> Mais pourquoi pleure-t-elle? Elle, beauté parfaite
> Qui mettrait à ses pieds le genre humain vaincu,
> Quel mal mystérieux ronge son flanc d'athlète?
> Elle pleure, insensée, parce qu'elle a vécu!
> Et parce qu'elle vit! Mais ce qu'elle déplore
> Surtout, ce qui la fait frêmir jusqu'aux genoux,
> C'est que demain, hélas! il faundra vivre encore!
> Demain, après-demain et toujours!—Comme nous!

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

No poet has ever known better than Baudelaire how to sum up a whole age, a whole life and world of feeling, in a few lines. In his poem "L'homme et la Mer" he epitomises the relations of man and the ocean in the lines:—

> Et cependant voilà des siècles innombrables
> Que vous vous combattez sans pitié ni remords,
> Tellement vous aimez le carnage et la mort,
> O lutteurs éternels, ô frères implacables.

His "Don Juan aux Enfers" is one of the finest poems of all times. In five short verses he sums up all the figures in that great tragedy of almost superhuman cynicism. The sombre and proud beggars grip with joy the oars to row Don Juan towards the shades. The unhappy victims of his promises raise a cry of despair as he passes, and bare their breasts as if to show the life-blood flowing from their pierced hearts. Then comes the verse:—

> Sganarelle en riant lui rêclamait ses gages,
> Tandis que Don Luis avec un doigt tremblant
> Montrait à tous les morts en haut sur les rivages
> Le fils audacieux qui railla son front blanc.

Doña Elvira seems even in death to smile with hopeful love at her destroyer:—

> Frisonnant sous son deuil, la chaste et maigre Elvire,
> Près de l'époux perfide et qui fut son amant
> Semblait lui réclamer un suprême sourire
> Où brillât la douceur de son premier serment.

But Don Juan preserves his cynical indifference even on his journey across the Styx, and the poem ends with the two lines:

> Mais le calme héros, courbé sur sa rapière,
> Regardait le sillage et ne daignait rien voir.

And now the varied genius of the poet shows a scene of modern life and crime. In "Une Martyre" he leads us to a haunt of luxury, where a table is spread with flowers and rich wine, and the air is filled with dangerous heavy perfumes which oppress. We penetrate beyond the arras, and there, decked out in all her splendour, the mistress of the feast lies dead in careless pose—the murdered victim of unquenchable desire.

S. A.-B.

(To be continued.)

THE AUTHOR OF THE MOST FAMOUS ENGLISH JOKE

By Frank Harris.

Every one admits that Punch's advice to those about to be married is probably the most famous joke in English, and certainly the best known. It is quoted almost every day as the best joke that has appeared in Punch, and in some degree has made that paper's reputation for humour.

Again and again when I have asked who was the author of the mot, I obtained no satisfactory answer. It is a tradition of the Punch office, it appears, that some one on the staff sent in the joke; it was not accepted for some time, and then was inserted long after every one had forgotten who coined it. This story seemed incredible. I have always held the belief that the great phrases all come from great men, that all the beautiful images of our language, all the beautiful words in it, were made at some time or other by men of genius. And the other day I discovered that the author of this memorable joke was Charles Reade, the writer of "The Cloister and the Hearth."

I do not know when the word first appeared in Punch, but a comedy by Charles Reade in which the phrase occurs was published in Paris in 1859. I feel certain that Punch borrowed without acknowledgment from Charles Reade, not Charles Reade from Punch.

Of course, if the joke had appeared in an English book of Reade's, in any of his novels or plays, it would be certain that he was the author of it. But it has not adorned any of his English works; it is to be found in a comedy written in French entitled "Le Faubourg Saint-Germain," a little piece in two acts which I have only just seen, through the courtesy of Charles Reade's niece; she is now in possession of all his famous note-books, and is perhaps the only person living who knew him intimately.

Very few people know that Reade was a first-rate French scholar. His style in French resembles his style in English, is excellently lucid and idiomatic, pointed with wit and epigram. In his lifetime Charles Reade admired the French even more than Meredith did. In spite of the brilliant language in which it is written, this little comedy could never be a success on the stage. The action is worse than slight; it is far-fetched and improbable.

The time is in 1792; the persons of the piece are the Duke de Lanzac and the Duchess de Lanzac; they live their lives in different apartments in the same house. The Duke is bored with everything, and the Duchess is unhappy because she loves her lord and master, who seeks to relieve his ennui by running after other women. The action of the piece is concerned with a M. Poitevin, a lawyer of Tours, cousin to the Duchess, who seeks to effect a reconciliation between the pair with the aid of a clever valet. M. Poitevin, who is not known to the Duchess, wins her confidence by feigning interest in her flowers, and then kisses her. She tells the Duke and asks him to turn the insolent visitor out of the house; jealousy lights up the dormant passion of the Duke, and brings about a reconciliation.

The whole comedy leads up to, and is indeed written for, the famous joke at the end. M. Poitevin comes down to the footlights with an air of profound reflection and announces: "Advice to those who are going to be married: Don't!"

I give the exact French words:—

> "Avis à ceux qui vont se marier." (Pause.) "Ne le faites pas." (Il se retourne et remonte la scène, la Duchesse le suit, le reprend et le fait redescendre.)
>
> La Duchesse—Ah! traître! (Au public). Ne l'écoutez pas, au moins!
>
> Poitevin (s'avançant encore)—Avis à ceux qui se sont mariés!
>
> La Duchesse—A la bonne heure!
>
> Poitevin—Ne soyez qu'un. (Il joint leurs mains derrière son dos, puis avance deux pas.) C'est ce qu'il vous reste de mieux à faire, je vous le jure! (Il se retire auprès de la Duchesse.)

It is evident from the way it is put that Reade appreciated the whole force of the joke. He either took it from Punch and wrote his comedy on purpose to set it forth in French, or else his comedy was read by some one who took his joke and put it in Punch. I believe that Punch is the plagiarist and not Charles Reade. A comparison of dates will settle the matter. Reade's comedy was published in 1859; when did the famous joke appear in Punch? Perhaps the editor will supply that piece of information.

The whole question is one of interest, for Reade, in my opinion, was the greatest of English novelists, and the joke in Punch is perhaps the most famous jeux d'esprit in the language.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

THE ANARCHIST ENEMY—I.

It was perhaps only natural that the Houndsditch murders and their remarkable sequel in Sidney Street should have been followed by a revival of some of the fallacies respecting Anarchism which have been current ever since that movement declared itself. Some journalists still seem to imagine that it has a real organisation with a governing body, which is supposed to meet in London, whence orders, it is said, are issued for one or another outrage in different parts of the world. It has also been asserted yet once again that the assassinations both of the Empress Elizabeth of Austria and of President Carnot were planned in London, though the evidence respecting those crimes fully shows that such was not the case. At the same time, however, the presence of so many Anarchist refugees in our midst undoubtedly constitutes a real and very serious danger in regard both to ourselves and to foreign nations also.

Nihilism and Anarchism are virtually synonymous terms. The former originated in Russia, the latter in France, where it was made familiar some sixty years ago by the writings of Proudhon, the Socialist. But the sect may claim a much earlier origin. Its views found exponents during the risings in England in the fourteenth century, and among the German Anabaptists two hundred years later. The nineteenth and twentieth century Anarchist is, however, more particularly the offspring of some of the "philosophy" current during the French Revolution. Jean Jacques Rousseau, Abbé Meslier, and Diderot may be counted among the modern Anarchist's progenitors. Indeed, his belief is almost summed up in these two lines which fell from Diderot's pen :—

> La nature n'a fait ni serviteurs ni maîtres,
> Je ne veux ni donner ni recevoir des lois.

Those were doctrines favoured by the Hébertists and Babouvists of the Reign of Terror. Subsequently Anarchism found French exponents in Bellegarrigue and Claude Pelletier, but the movement of our own times undoubtedly proceeded from the teachings of Michael Bakúnin, the Russian Revolutionist, who, after escaping from Siberia to Japan and thence to England, there became one of the promoters of the notorious International Society of Workers founded some fifty years ago. Bakúnin's ambition clashed with that of Karl Marx, and at a Congress of the "International" held at the Hague in 1872 a split occurred between their respective followers, and Bakúnin, turning his back on Socialism, ended by evolving the theories on which the present-day Anarchist still claims to act. We admit that there are degrees of Anarchism, but beside the mere theorists there are all the more fanatical sectarians, who are associated with what is called the Propaganda by Deeds.

This has been attempted in several countries—Russia, Spain, Italy, France. In Russia, perhaps, it has only been a phase, though an extremely prominent one, in a general revolutionary movement; and in Spain it has been chiefly associated with the discontent prevailing in Catalonia. The Barcelona Revolutionaries are not all Anarchists, but belong to three parties—first, the Anarchists proper; secondly, a party which, largely for economical reasons, wishes to secure the autonomy, perhaps independence, of Catalonia; and finally, a party which desires to be united to France. This last is more numerous than some people imagine, and has representatives both in Paris and in London. However, both the party which favours autonomy and that which desires incorporation in the French Republic have joined hands with the Anarchists in more than one of the risings by which Barcelona has been given over to bloodshed, conflagration, and pillage.

It was in 1882 that the French Anarchists first began to practise the so-called Propaganda by Deeds. The great coal-mining district of Montceau-les-Mines in Saône-et-Loire was the scene of the first outrages, which were followed by others at Lyons. The rising at Fourmies on May Day, 1890, when several people were shot down by the military, had little if any connection with Anarchism, but a petty disturbance which occurred on the very same day in the outskirts of Paris led to the memorable Anarchist Terror which lasted in France until the end of 1894. It so happened that a procession of a small party of men, carrying a red flag, came into conflict with the police. There was no great affray, but several arrests were made, and two of the men, known to be Anarchists, were sentenced to long terms of hard labour. From that one affair proceeded a score of outrages. A man called Ravachol undertook to "avenge" the two imprisoned Anarchists. His real name was Koenigstein, his father being a German who had married a demoiselle Ravachol belonging to that department of the Loire where the country is so often wild and rugged, and life so hard. Ravachol was a journeyman dyer with some little knowledge of chemistry, sufficient at all events to compound nitro-glycerine and prepare dynamite cartridges. His wages not sufficing for his extravagant habits, he took to a career of crime, and it is certain that he committed several murders with the object of possessing himself of money. He butchered an old rentier named Rivollier and the latter's servant, he rifled the grave of the Countess de Rochetaillée, he strangled Brunel, the so-called Hermit of Chambles, and was perhaps guilty also of the murder of an old woman named Marcon and her daughter, who kept a small ironmongery business at St. Etienne. At one moment Ravachol was arrested, but he escaped from the gendarmes, and, reaching the neighbourhood of Paris, he joined some other Anarchists in stealing a large number of dynamite cartridges at Soisy-sous-Etiolles. Those cartridges helped him to perpetrate the outrages which soon afterwards threw all Paris into a state of alarm. No actual loss of life occurred, but several people were injured and considerable damage was done to property. For those affairs Ravachol was sentenced to hard labour for life, but some of the murders he had previously perpetrated being proved against him, a sentence to death ensued, and he was guillotined at Montbrison in July, 1892.

The idea, as we have said, had been to "avenge" two imprisoned Anarchists. No sooner had he been executed than there arose a succession of miscreants bent on "avenging" his death. There was Meunier, who perpetrated the tragical outrage at the Café Very; Emile Henry, who was responsible for the terrible affair of the Rue des Bons Enfants; Léauthier, who murdered the ex-Servian Minister in the Avenue de l'Opéra; and Vaillant, who flung a bomb into the midst of the Chamber of Deputies. Meunier and Léauthier escaped with sentences of transportation for life, Henry momentarily remained at large, but Vaillant was guillotined. Neither that act of vigour, however, nor the issue of three thousand perquisition warrants and the arrest of several hundred suspicious characters sufficed to stop the outrages. On February 7th, 1894, two days after the execution of Vaillant, a large branch of palm was found lying on his grave in the coin des supplicés at the Ivry Cemetery, and attached to the branch was a card bearing these threatening lines :—

> Sous les feuilles de cette palme
> Que t'offre le Droit outragé,
> Tu peux dormir d'un sommeil calme,
> O martyr, tu seras vengé!

Those were no vain words, for on February 12th there was a terrible explosion at the Café Terminus, followed in March by the bomb of the Rue St. Jacques, the bomb of the

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

Faubourg St. Martin, and the bomb of the Madeleine. Then, in April, there was the affair of the Foyot Restaurant, and in June came the assassination of President Carnot. Of that abominable crime (which we witnessed personally) we propose to speak in a second article, when we shall also explain why it was that the authorities so long failed to stamp out the Anarchist Terror in spite of their many strenuous efforts to do so. This point is the more important as the difficulties with which they had to contend confront us in England at the present time.

LONDON BRIDGE

THERE are certain places in this English "hub of the universe" which never fail to bring a thrill to the true lover of London; history or situation or associations have given them a glamour and a peculiar charm. The open space by the Bank is one, with its marvellous surge of traffic, and to see it nearly empty, at three o'clock on a summer morning, is to realise a new aspect of the city. Trafalgar Square is another—viewed, preferably, from the portico of the National Gallery, with a vista of Whitehall in the distance. The Tower, again—stolid, strong, very British-looking and imperturbable—impresses us in its own rather solemn way; but perhaps of all that could be mentioned London Bridge is the finest.

At any hour of day or night London Bridge is good to behold—or possibly we should say the prospect from the bridge. Sunset time, in summer, brings over the Pool atmospheric changes which are the despair and the joy of all artists; the smoky vapours are charged with heavy, velvety colours towards the east, while on the western side wreaths of steam trail from the black cavern of Cannon Street Station and take to themselves the purest tints of amber, grey, and gold above the shimmering water. Autumn darkens the scene with a sombre, sadder touch, as though the harmonies of colour were being played on muted strings; and often in winter it seems that only echoes remain—a rift of pale blue here, a flush of deep crimson there, a veil of purple and brown over all; the orchestra drones in the distance, out of sight.

Winter, however, brings hours after dark when a different quality enters into our thoughts as we stand to gaze, entranced, from the low stone parapet. No rays from the clearest star can pierce that thickened gloom, but high in the east rides a moon of burnished gold, like a shield hung on the far wall of heaven; now and then her glow is tarnished by wisps of dun smoke from the funnels of the noisy steamers that lie close to those long, busy wharves. From the southern side of the bridge her pale, wavering track can be seen thrown across the river as a rival bridge for other folk than mortals—a bridge broken and refashioned ceaselessly as the little panting tugs swing lustily down with their burdens of dull barges and their glimmering red and green lights. Over by those tramp-steamers the spidery arms of the cranes wave and sink as though making some magical incantation; the buzzing flares show spots of yellow radiance through the thick, cold air, and shouts from unseen men come faintly across the river. All the year round, at evening, a line of fascinated people stands to watch silently, spellbound at the weird effect.

From the opposite edge the lights stretch up the long, serrated banks until they deepen and are lost in hazy obscurities of smoke and vapour; for here the great stations come into the scene and contribute to the general murk. Cannon Street's cave of mystery is invisible, save perhaps for a slight intensification of the pall of night; but from it the ghostly mists from stertorous engines still emerge, sway, and vanish on the cloudy bosom of the night. Ever and anon a line of faint gleams traverses the river—the "moving street of lighted windows" which denotes a train speeding upon its way. Below it all, pervading it all as the murmurous pedal notes of an organ in some mighty symphony, the watcher is conscious of the presence of that darkly moving water, heavy with mystery, slipping and sliding past the piles, clasping the motionless shipping in its smooth embrace, gurgling into crannies and swishing into silvery webs of light, ever hastening towards its ocean home.

For many centuries there has been a bridge of some sort at or near this spot, though of very different quality from the handsome structure which now spans the Thames. It is supposed that about the year 994 A.D. the priests of St. Mary Overies built the first bridge of timber. This was washed away by floods in 1090; the second was burned in 1137. The earliest stone bridge was erected at the beginning of the thirteenth century by Peter of Colechurch, who died before it was completed, and left it to be finished by the merchants of London. It had nineteen stone arches, a gate-house at each end, and a chapel in the centre, and must have been a triumph of engineering for those days. From this time to the early eighteenth century houses lined the bridge, which, indeed, looked more like an ordinary street. In 1756 an Act of Parliament was obtained in order that the Corporation of London might make the necessary alterations in the cause of safety. The Observer for December 2nd, 1810, contained an advertisement of a "proposed New Bridge from Bankside, Southwark, to Queen Street, Cheapside," in which the public is "respectfully informed that Books for receiving Subscriptions for this undertaking are open at the Banking Houses of Messrs. Smith, Payne, and Smith's, Mansion House Street, and Messrs. Ramsbottom, Newman, Ramsbottom and Co., Lombard Street, to whom a deposit of £2 10s. per share must be paid at the time of subscribing." On the fifteenth of June, in the year 1825, the first stone of "New London Bridge" was well and truly laid amidst a great ceremonial gathering. It was quite time that something was done. Many of the arches of the previous bridge—which, as we have noted, was crazy with age—were too narrow for the passage of boats of any kind, and the resistance thus caused to the waters of the Thames produced a fall, or rapid, which rendered river-traffic dangerous—as can easily be perceived in any print of the period. Even at ebb-tide prudent passengers landed at the Old Swan Stairs, and walked to some wharf below to continue their journey.

In 1820, in consequence of protests from barge-owners and proprietors of other craft, a Committee of the House of Commons was appointed to consider the problem, and it finally recommended the construction of a new bridge. Preparations were hastened on, and the notable day arrived when the stone called by courtesy the first was in position, slung from chains, ready to repose in its bed.

At a very early hour of the morning the neighbourhood was alive with people; every point of vantage, high and low, was occupied by noon; the roofs of Fishmongers' Hall, of St. Saviour's Church, and of all warehouses within sight carried their quota of eager spectators; while, of course, wooden stages had been erected in advantageous positions, seats on which were sold at prices varying between half-a-crown and fifteen shillings. "Southwark Bridge itself," writes an eye-witness of the affair, "was clustered over like a beehive, and the river from thence to London Bridge presented the appearance of an immense dock covered with vessels of various descriptions, or perhaps it more closely resembled a vast country fair, so completely was the water concealed by multitudes of boats and barges, and the latter again hidden by thousands of spectators and canvas awnings, which, with the gay holiday company within, made them not unlike booths and tents, and contributed to strengthen the fanciful similitude." "Worthy of Venice at her best of times," he concludes, in quite a modern strain. The coffer-dam for the building of the first pier was utilised cleverly as a select enclosure for the élite, decorated, divided into four tiers of galleries, and covered with an awning.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

After a long wait the procession of State arrived, announced by the reports of two six-pounder guns at the Old Swan Stairs; it was then about four o'clock. The cavalcade was a most distinguished one, including the City Marshal, the Barge-Masters, the City Watermen, the Water-Bailiff, members of the Royal Society, members of the Goldsmiths' Company, the Under-Sheriffs, and various other officials; lastly came the Duke of York and the Lord Mayor, riding in the State coach. Opposite the stone a seat had been constructed. "His Lordship, who was in his full robes, offered the chair to his Royal Highness, which was positively declined on his part. The Mayor, therefore, seated himself; the Lady Mayoress, with her daughters in elegant dresses, sat near his Lordship, accompanied by two fine-looking, intelligent boys, her sons; near them were the two lovely daughters of Lord Suffolk, and many other fashionable ladies."

A cut-glass bottle containing the coins of the reign was presented, and in the presence of John Rennie, Esq.. F.R.S., the engineer and builder of the bridge (jointly with his father) the ceremony began. A copper plate, engraved with a lengthy Latin inscription, was placed beneath the stone—the inscription having been first read aloud; then came the speech of the Lord Mayor (less dry than the majority of official outpourings), and the lowering of the granite block on to the mortar. "The City sword and mace were placed on it crossways, the foundation of the new bridge was declared to be laid, the music struck up 'God save the King,' and three times three excessive cheers broke forth from the company, the guns of the Honourable Artillery Company on the Old Swan Wharf fired a salute, and every face wore smiles of gratulation. Three cheers were afterwards given for the Duke of York; three for Old England; and three for the architect, Mr. Rennie." During the ceremony it was observed as a good omen that "a splendid sunbeam, which had penetrated through an accidental space in the awning above, gradually approached the stone as the hour for laying it advanced, and shone upon it with dazzling lustre."

After the proceedings were over, a journalist of a lively turn of mind created a diversion by leaping on the stone and dancing on it until the onlookers cheered him. Several ladies were allowed to walk across it, and all who were so indulged, says the chronicler quaintly, "departed with the satisfaction of being enabled to relate an achievement honourable to their feelings."

So began that fine span of stone across London's river which we admire to-day, and which within the memory of boys was found to be too narrow for the tremendous traffic of the district. It has been compared to the British merchant, uniting plainness with strength and capacity; and the comparison is not inapt. The surprising part about our bridges, to those unfamiliar with London's enormous needs, is that even now, with London Bridge, Southwark, Blackfriars, and the other bridges so near together, and so splendidly wide that they seem adequate to any demand, London city clamours for still another road across the river. It is almost as though every fresh means of transport and access doubled the traffic, and brought with it, in the course of a few years, fresh problems with which to deal. Whether or no that high-sounding Bridge of St. Paul's will ever be built is as yet not certainly known; but, if so, it is curious to let the mind run on and to wonder what will be the state of our traffic when its hundredth anniversary arrives. Perhaps by then the river will flow under a tunnel of bridges; perhaps by then we shall have solved the difficulty in another way—that of flight.

THE VICTORIA INSTITUTE

OWING, doubtless, to the wretched weather which prevailed, the attendance at the Royal Society of Arts last Monday afternoon to hear the Rev. J. J. B. Coles, M.A., F.R.G.S., lecture on "Theosophy" was not so large as could have been desired; those, however, who braved the constant downfall enjoyed a most interesting session, for both lecture and discussion were exceptionally good.

The lecturer opened by noting the striking reaction from materialism which has taken place during the last ten years, and, remarking that a well-balanced mind was neither too prejudiced nor too sceptical, observed that he could put forward his ideas at the present time with less danger of opposition than would have been possible some years ago, Strong opposition came, however, in the course of the discussion, which we shall allude to later on.

The word Theosophy, said the speaker, means not the "Wisdom of God," but the "wisdom of the gods," of Universal Wisdom. This wisdom is the inner, hidden. spiritual truth which underlies all the outward forms or religion, and its central thought is the belief that the Universe is in its essence spiritual, that man is a spiritual being in a state of evolution and development, and by proper physical, mental, and spiritual training humanity can so progress on this path of evolution as to develop faculties and powers which will enable it to get behind the outward veil of what we call matter and to enter into conscious relations with the underlying Reality. The whole Universe is in a continual state of progression; the spiritual, having descended into matter, is ever and always working its way upwards, and the duty of man is to assist this upward evolution by every means in his power. So far as regards himself, this evolution cannot be completed in one lifetime, and the Theosophist therefore believes in Reincarnation. That part of man's intelligent nature which reincarnates in successive personalities and lives is called the Reincarnating Ego. In man, self-consciousness and moral responsibility are attained, and the duty then at once arises to subordinate the animal and passional part of the nature and to develop the spiritual, so as to prepare for the next incarnation. At the change which is called death the Reincarnating Ego passes, not into any particular place, like heaven or hell, but into a state of subjective consciousness, remaining thus for a longer or shorter period according to the way in which the earth-life has been passed. When the time comes for it to take up another body the Ego again incarnates, and this goes on until all experience has been gained, and until, by spiritual advancement, the necessity for reincarnation ceases, the ultimate destiny of the higher spiritual principle in man being its conscious union with the Absolute, the Universal All. The whole of this evolution and reincarnation is governed by law, for the Theosophist does not believe in anything miraculous or supernatural.

With excellent impartiality the lecturer treated his subject, and quoted the words of Sir William Crookes, who, in a recent address on "New Elements in Chemistry," said:—

> It must never be forgotten that theories were more than mutable; they were only useful so long as they admitted of the harmonious correlation of facts into a reasonable system. Directly a fact refused to be pigeon-holed, and would not be explained on theoretic grounds, the theory must go, or it must be revised to admit the new fact. The nineteenth century saw the birth of new views of atoms, electricity, and ether. Our twentieth-century views of the constitution of matter might appear satisfactory to us, but how would it be at the close of the present century? Were we not incessantly learning the lesson that our researches had only a provisional value? A hundred years hence should we ℮ acquiesce in the resolution of the material universe into a swarm of rushing electrons?

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

From this point the Rev. Coles took the field against Theosophy, and, adducing some mystical sentences from one of the text-books, asked, "Is it possible to believe that there are professing Christians who have exchanged the 'living oracles of God' for such profane and ludicrous theosophical teaching as this? The true and all-powerful answer to Modern Theosophy is the fuller and deeper teaching of the Epistles of St. Paul to the Ephesians, Philippians and Colossians."

The chairman, Dr. A. T. Schofield, remarking that the subject presented "the most notable phenomenon ever discussed in the Victoria Institute—the juxtaposition of two rival inspired theories or religions"—then threw the meeting open. Mr. E. W. Maunder, F.R.A.S., author of "The Astronomy of the Bible," led with a short speech. "There are two things worth serious consideration in this life," he observed, "religion and science, both eminently clean and sane; but we have seen abroad of late years many things that are un-clean and in-sane, and Theosophy, I think, is one of them." Mr. Howard followed in a masterly little address, alluding to the wonderful manner in which the ancient philosophers—Lucretius, Plato, and others—sought for truth, and he labelled the Theosophists as "muddle-headed mystics." Both these speeches brought forth strong condemnation from a lady, Mrs. Sharp, who professed herself a Theosophist of many years' standing. Such remarks, she protested, should not be made hastily, since, after all, Theosophy, putting it at its lowest, was a real system of thought which had occupied the energies of many fine intellects. Mr. Weir, a visitor from Ireland, supported her, inferring that our modern materialistic tendency is merely the accentuation of the scientific side of things, while the East over-emphasised the introspective side. Another speaker inquired what Theosophy had done to help the degraded, and a brief reply came from Mr. Wedgwood, who stated that he had just returned from a stay at the headquarters of the Theosophical Society in India, and recounted an anecdote which seemed to prove his contention that the instruction of Theosophy led to a more hopeful attitude on the part of the lower strata of humanity.

The lecturer, in his answer, defined rather neatly, at the request of the Chairman, the difference between reincarnation and resurrection—the one being more a bodily change, the other having spiritual aspects and significations. The usual remarks concluded a lively and interesting session, which we were sorry to see so scantily attended.

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

"THE sentiment is good." This is an old-fashioned cliché, and, like all such phrases, has no more dynamic power than the "Here we are again" of the clown in the pantomime. We keep on saying how satisfied we are. But, candidly, there is very little business. I hope and believe that we are going to have a good time—that is to say, the punters and the promoters. It would appear that prices must rise, mainly because there is no bull account in any market. The most minute order has an effect quite out of proportion to its size. When the public regains its strength and begins gambling we might then see a new boom. Each clique hopes that the boom will attack its particular market. The tin people—Bastard and his followers—point to £183 a ton for the metal and declare that Nigerian tin shows will earn prodigious profits. The rubber people have dozens of unfloated properties they wish to sell, and if they can only persuade Heilbut, Symons, and Co. to put up Fine Hard Cured Para they assert that they can make a new rubber boom. Rhodesia blazes—in the Press; the public appears chilly, notwithstanding the heated puffs. Yet they may melt in time. Never was there so much optimism.

There are great arguments going on in Lombard Street about the Money Market. A big division laugh at the idea of cheap money. They say that India wants more gold, that Brazil must have gold, and that the Argentine will also ask for one or two millions; they point out that Paris must be repaid; that the Government taxes will take a great deal. In short, their arguments are numerous and widely spread. But the people who support the "dear money" cry forget that the Transvaal is sending us over £600,000 a week; that Egypt may pay back half of the ten millions, and that Paris has abundant supplies, Russia more than she wants. Holland has reduced her Bank Rate to 3½ per cent.—an excellent sign, for Amsterdam has been in trouble all the autumn. The country will be returning the money it absorbed before Christmas, six months' Bank bills are due at 3½ and any trader can get his bill done at 4. Thus the talk and the practice do not fit.

In the Foreign Market the gossips still discuss Sir Edward Holden's attack upon Japan; and the South Manchurian Railway Loan was done at a discount. Why investors should rate good sound English railway stocks at less value than speculative Japanese bonds is one of those anomalies the House so often supplies. We have not heard the end of the Japanese Loan story. Russian Fours are gradually creeping up; they will touch par. Turkish are still bought, the excuse being that the agreement between Russia and Germany makes for peace. The real truth is that the Deutsche Orient Bank will make an issue in the Spring, and is steadying the market as a preliminary.

We now await the dividend declaration in the Home Rail market, and prices are firm. They must continue hard, for few of the companies can fail to increase their distribution. L. & N.W.R. and Great Western are the soundest investments. There is no bull account in the Heavies, but I should not be surprised to see a small reaction after the dividend declarations in such stocks as Hull and Barnsley, Great Eastern, Little Chats, Dover A's. Great Easterns are a stock that must go to par sooner or later, but as they are gambled in occasionally they will fluctuate. I again say that the junior stocks of the Great Central are an excellent lock-up for the man who can wait a few years.

Yankees are weak in London, but no one does any business. In New York the whole of the banking circle consider Unions, Chesapeakes, Steels, Southern Pacifics, and Atchisons as good, sound purchases. I take no heed of London or her views. Berlin, through her great banks, always receives admirable information. The Wall Street bankers rely upon the Deutsche, Dresdener, and Disconto when it is necessary to finance, and they never play false to the houses in Berlin. New York uses London to build up the indispensable bear account. Beyond placing gold bonds, this is the only use the Yankee has for the Britisher.

Canadian Pacifics have been the one talk of the week. It has long been known that the 1 per cent. dividend they have been paying out of their land department was paid from the interest received, and that the sum obtained for interest was more than sufficient to pay a much larger dividend. This larger dividend has now been paid. There is a saying in Canada that there are only two ways of ruining yourself—getting drunk and going a bear of Can. Pacs. This would seem to be true, for the net earnings of the Canadian Pacific during the past four months show a 17 per cent. increase, notwithstanding the poor crop. Shareholders must not, however, expect to get more than their present 10 per cent., which is surely magnificent enough for any one, since within another year both the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Mackenzie and Mann Line will be competing strongly with the Canadian Pacific. Sir Thomas Shaughnessy, the President, has often warned people not to expect too much from the C.P.R. But the plain truth is that the line has run away from him, and not even those who are the most closely responsible for the working of the company ever anticipated such magnificent results. The stock is mainly held in England, not 10 per cent. being in the names of Canadian shareholders and Wall Street, although the nominal market home of Can. Pacs. is financially but little interested.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

So many people have lost money in rubber, and so few made any, that most City people consider the present dyspeptic conditions of the speculator entirely due to an overdose of rubber. It is quite certain that there is no business done; prices fall not because they are attacked but because they are too weak to stand up against even the slight trickle of genuine selling-orders. If the big Trusts could engineer a bear account they might dash in and raise values. But the bears have no heart, and the Trusts are not really clever speculators. They buy with the faith of the believer. We want pessimism in the rubber market. The Kaffir jobbers who used to dash in and bang prices are sadly missed. A Stock Exchange has been opened in Singapore, but it is the day after the fair—not an exhilarating hour in which to start a new speculative movement.

The bears are buying back their Shells—that is the only point worth recording. Promoters who are choke-full of oil shares would like to see a boom, but the Standard Oil declines to end the war. It must end soon, because none of the business people who sell oil are filled with joy at the present price of kerosene. Russian petroleums are to try and increase their output; but I have no confidence in the management of any of the Baku companies. I hear bad reports of the oil trade in Russia, and there is talk of further trouble amongst the Russian companies.

Waihis look like going higher. A new lode has been cut at the 1,000ft. level. It is said to be 7ft. and worth 63s. a ton. Waihi is a most extraordinary mine—a mass of reefs, some hardly payable, others rich. The shares fell from 10 to $4\frac{3}{4}$, and most of us thought that the rich shoots had come to an end. To-day the Waihi people are buying, and good judges place the profit value of the ore reserves at three millions, which should make Waihi worth six millions. They are vigorously working in the lower levels of the mine, and may conceivably find more lodes; many are known to exist.

Kaffirs do not move much, and the only excitement last week was the Robinson coup, by which the great J. B. decreed that Randfontein Central and Randfonteins South should be amalgamated. As the first were quoted last Thursday at 2 11-16, and the latter $2\frac{1}{8}$, any one who sold the one and bought the other would have made money on each deal; yet no one either bought or sold. This speaks well for Robinson's honesty and also that of his employees. There was no leakage, although, had any one known, a large sum of money might have been made without risk. I never abuse Robinson, for I see no reason why the Stock Exchange should dislike him as it does. To me he appears a man who has always gone his own way regardless of markets and market-manipulators. He will make a fine mine, and the Souths are cheap to-day. They should pay 25 per cent. dividend on a forty years' life.

Rhodesian bulls might cry, "Cut the cackle and come to the 'osses." They say that all the magnates have now agreed upon a definite plan of operations. I am glad of it; but will they stick to the plan, and will they forego the pleasure of unloading upon each other's markets? I am not saying anything against the mines. They are good enough to gamble in, but the public has never had a chance in Rhodesians. Willoughby's Matabele Queen met with an icy reception. These market deals are not popular to-day. The shares are decidedly not worth 12s. Rhodesia Consolidated are one of the best buys in the market. They are much sounder than Matabele Queens and 25 per cent. cheaper. This is a Tilden Smith deal; it may come off.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

POST-IMPRESSIONS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Can you allow space for one word more anent the Post-Impressionists?

The avowed aim of this school is, by extreme simplification, to bring back into modern painting the significance and gesture of primitive art.

I have not seen it noted in the various discussions on the subject that the same endeavour may be seen in Chinese art. Among the Chinese paintings at the British Museum, No. 106—which represents a sage in a pavilion on a lake, with a waterfall dashing over boulders in the background—is a striking example of this. The painting is of the seventeenth century, and the artist is Shih T'Ien. There is also among the collection of Chinese illustrated books in the King's Library of the British Museum a small portfolio of landscape-sketches, some of which—notably that of "A Cliff and Water," by Peen Yuen Foo—show the same tendency. These signs of desire to return to primitive devices as a new means of expression appear to me to be very interesting at this moment, and a further proof of the astonishing modernity of the older Oriental art. Perhaps it is not too out of place to note here that in this same collection of books the drawings of animals by Yasunobu of the early eighteenth century recall the best manner of Fauré. "Nil novi sub sole."—I am, Sir, yours, etc.,

G. M.

Hampstead.
January 7th, 1911.

BOOKS RECEIVED

FICTION

Hawtrey's Deputy. By Harold Bindloss. Illustrated. Ward, Lock and Co. 6s.

Young Life. By Jessie Leckie Herbertson. William Heinemann. 6s.

The House of Horror. By Robert Halifax. With Frontispiece Digby, Long and Co. 6s.

A Drama of the Telephone. By Richard Marsh. With Frontispiece. Digby, Long and Co. 6s.

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS

A Short History of the Church of England. By the Rev. J. F. Kendal, M.A. Illustrated. A. and C. Black. 7s. 6d. net.

The Glenbervie Journals. Edited and Arranged by Walter Sichel. Illustrated. Constable and Co. 10s. 6d. net.

Pioneer Church Work in British Columbia, being a Memoir of the Episcopate of Acton Windeyer Sillitoe, D.D., D.C.L., First Bishop of New Westminster. By the Rev. Herbert H. Gowen, F.R.G.S. Illustrated. A. R. Mowbray and Co. 3s. 6d. net.

Histoire de France, depuis les Origines jusqu' à la Révolution. Tome Neuvième I.: Le Règne de Louis XVI. (1774-1789). By H. Carré, P. Sagnac, and E. Lavisse. Hachette and Co., Paris and London.

Les Origines Diplomatiques de la Guerre de 1870-1871. Recueil de Documents publié par le Ministère des Affaires Etrangères. Tome III.: 10 Mai, 1864—31 Juillet, 1864. Gustave Ficker, Paris.

A Century and a Half of Jewish History, Extracted from the Minute-books of the London Committee of Deputies of the British Jews. By C. H. L. Emanuel, M.A. G. Routledge and Sons. 5s. net.

The International Relations of the Chinese Empire: The Period of Conflict, 1834-1860. By Hosea Ballon Morse. Illustrated. Longmans, Green and Co. 20s. net.

Reminiscences. By Goldwin Smith, D.C.L. Edited by Arnold Haultain, M.A. Illustrated. Macmillan and Co. 10s. net.

The American Commonwealth. By James Bryce. New Edition, completely revised throughout, with additional chapters. Two Vols. Macmillan and Co. 21s. net.

Memorials of Old Lincolnshire. Edited by E. Mansel Sympson, M.A., M.D. Illustrated. George Allen and Sons. 15s. net.

Memorials of Leicestershire. Edited by Alice Dryden. Illustrated. George Allen and Sons. 15s. net.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

THEOLOGY

The Historical and Religious Value of the Fourth Gospel. By Ernest F. Scott, D.D. Constable and Co. 1s. net.

Theology for Parents. By Eirene Wigram. A. R. Mowbray and Co. 3s. 6d. net.

Spiritual Letters of Edward King, D.D., late Lord Bishop of Lincoln. Edited by the Rev. B. W. Randolph, D.D. A. R. Mowbray and Co. 2s. net.

The Daily Walk. By the Rev. Alexander Smellie, D.D. Andrew Melrose. 6d. net.

The Origin of the Pentateuch. By Harold M. Wiener, M.A., LL.B. Elliot Stock. 1s. net.

MISCELLANEOUS

The Source of Wolfram's Willehalm. By Susan Almira Bacon. J. C. B. Mohr, Tübingen, Würtemberg. 5 marks.

From Hausaland to Egypt Through the Sudan. By H. Karl W. Kumm, Ph.D. Illustrated. Constable and Co. 16s. net.

On Acute Intestinal Toxæmia in Infants. By Ralph Vincent, M.D. Illustrated. Baillière, Tindall and Co. 3s. 6d. net.

The Young People. By One of the Old People. Second Edition. Macmillan and Co. 3s. 6d. net.

Discours sur les Passions de l'Amour. Attribué à Pascal, avec un Commentaire de Emile Faguet de l'Académie française. Bernard Grasset, Paris. 3f. 50c.

JEWS' COLLEGE PUBLICATIONS.

No. I.—The Political and the Social Leaders of the Jewish Community of Seppholis in the Second and Third Centuries, by A. Buchler, Ph.D.

No. II.—The Jews in Babylonia in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah according to Babylonian Inscriptions, by Samuel Daiches, Ph.D.

Price 2s. 6d. each.

To be obtained of the Secretary, Jews' College, Queen Square House, Guilford Street, London, W.C.

LITTLE SALON—SOCIAL LITERARY CIRCLES. At S. Kensington. Debates, Discussions, Music. Letters only. Secretary, 15, Rectory Chambers, Church Street, Chelsea.

AUTHORS wanted, known and unknown, to communicate. Every description of LITERARY WORK required. No fees whatever.—Write for particulars, in first instance, to "Publishers," 1425, Sell's Advertising Offices, London, E.C. Special attention to new writers.

Book Bargains.

DECEMBER SUPPLEMENTARY CATALOGUE (Post free) of

Publishers' Remainders

Books new as PUBLISHED, but offered at considerably reduced prices.

HENRY W. GLOVER, BOOKSELLER,
114, Leadenhall Street, E.C.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, LTD.,

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET, W.C.

Only Branches } 48, Queen Victoria Street, E.C. 132, Kensington High Street, W.

NEW BOOKS LESS THAN HALF-PRICE.

	Offered at s.	d.	Published at s.	d.
CRISPI, FRANCESCO, Italian Insurgent	1	9	7	6
GRAFTON, THIRD DUKE, AUTO. AND LETTERS	3	6	18	0
HARVARD, JOHN, AND HIS TIMES	3	3	7	6 net.
STEPHEN, SIR JAMES FITZJAMES, LIFE by his brother Leslie Stephen	5	0	16	0
THIEBAULT, BARON, MEMOIRS OF, 2 Vols. trans.	7	6	28	0
YOUNG, ARTHUR, AUTO. OF, Ed. M. Betham Edwards	4	9	12	6

Full List Free on Application.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references.—Address Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

BOOKS, Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold, and Exchanged. Monthly Catalogues Free. Libraries purchased, catalogued, arranged, or valued.—Thomas Thorp, 93, St. Martin's Lane, W.C. (and at Reading).

BOOKS.—ALL OUT-OF-PRINT and RARE BOOKS on any subject SUPPLIED. The most expert bookfinder extant. Please state wants and ask for CATALOGUE. I make a special feature of exchanging any Saleable Books for others selected from my various Lists. Special List of 2,000 Books I particularly want post free.—EDW. BAKER'S Great Bookshop, 14-16, John Bright St., Birmingham. Lord Leighton's Life, Work, Letters, 2 vols., 42s. for 18s. 6d.; Dewhurst Impressionist Painting, 25s. for 8s.; George Eliot's Works, 21 vols., 52s. 6d. for 35s.; Vernon Lee's 18th Century in Italy, 21s. for 9s.

Now on Sale. 6d. net. The January

BOOK MONTHLY.

Contents:

PERSONAL AND PARTICULAR. The Gossip of the Hour in the Republic of Authors.

A PARIS LUCKY-BAG. Book-Hunting on the Grey Banks of the Seine.—By Frederic Lees.

WHAT'S IN A WORD! Why Some English Sounds are a Delight to Hear.—By F. M. Wells.

THE SPINSTER HEROINE. Or a Poetic Quest for the Woman of Sweet-and-Forty-Five.

A LONDON LETTER. Touching the Book Effects of a General Election.—By the Editor.

SHAKSPERE, A.B. Was the Poet Seven Years Afloat on the Ocean Wave?—By J. E. Patterson.

NEW YEAR READING. The People and Plots of Seven of the Winter Novels.—By C. E. Lawrence.

A STATE OF THE REALM. The Craft of Bookselling and its Story in England.

LIVES OF GREAT MEN. Why Some of the Winter Memoirs have been Successful.

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY. Particulars of Interesting Volumes likely to be Published this Month.

BOOKS OF THE MONTH. A Chronicle of the Noteworthy Publications of December. With a Reviewing Commentary.

THE PERIODICALS. Contents of some January Reviews and Magazines.

Illustrated Supplement: BOOKS OF THE DAY IN PORTRAIT AND PICTURE.

Publishers: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO., Stationers' Hall Court, London,

Who, on receipt of 6d., will send, post-free, a Specimen of the Current Number.

Edward Whistler,

II, Strand, Charing Cross, London.

DIAMOND MERCHANT :: :: JEWELLER & SILVERSMITH.

A large stock of New and Second-hand Diamond and Gem Jewellery, Antique and Modern Silver Plate, always on hand, at bargain prices, for cash.

Fine Pearls, Emeralds, Diamonds, and early specimens of Antique Silver Plate wanted. High Prices given in Cash. Full Value allowed in Exchange.

Valuations made for Probate and other purposes.

GUN DEPARTMENT.

HAMMERLESS SECOND-HAND GUNS,

British Made, from £6 10s.

Nitro Proof. The Cheapest Gun in the Market combined with Quality.

ALSO

HAMMERLESS EJECTORS,

By Best London Makers, at Greatly Reduced Prices.

CORDITE RIFLES, ·400, ·500, ·600 Bores.

Catalogue and Price List on Application Gratis.

Telephone No.: 2033 GERRARD.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE & BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC

OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO AND . . THROUGH CANADA. . .

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service vid Vancouver.

For further particulars, apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,

62-65, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON, E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street, Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE

TO

SOUTH and EAST AFRICA.

WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.

Viâ the SUEZ CANAL.

Calling at MARSEILLES and NAPLES.

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.

(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—

DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.

Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE PLEASURE CRUISES

LIVERPOOL

to the

MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC

by the

"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"

Saxonia Leaves Liverpool 9 Feb., 1911.
Carpathia " " 2 Mch., 1911.

. . . Ports of Call . . .

CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS, MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA, ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME, PALERMO, NAPLES.

For full particulars apply—

THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

THE

"EMPIRE ILLUSTRATED."

The Tariff Reform Monthly.

40 pages.

Profusely Illustrated.

Interesting to every Unionist and Imperialist and convincing to Liberals and Little Englanders.

Price 3d.

P & O Passenger Services.

EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA, JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports

(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)

Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises

Throughout the Year, according to Season.

AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE, NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.

Programme on Application.

For Passage, Freight and all information apply—

PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,

122 Leadenhall Street, E.C., or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours

R.M.S.P.

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY.

(Royal Charter dated 1839.)

Fortnightly Sailings from Southampton to—

ARGENTINA & BRAZIL

via SPAIN, PORTUGAL & MADEIRA.

WEST INDIES, CENTRAL AMERICA, NEW YORK.

Via The Azores.

From LONDON to—

MOROCCO, CANARY ISLANDS & MADEIRA,

EGYPT, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA & JAPAN.

(By Shire Line.)

For further particulars apply to

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY

18, Moorgate Street, E.C., & 32, Cockspur Street, S.W.

Printed and Published for the Proprietor by ODHAMS, LTD., 25, Floral Street, Covent Garden, and 67, Long Acre, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE

No. 2020 [Registered as a Newspaper.] JANUARY 21, 1911 PRICE THREEPENCE

THE CARNEGIE LIBRARY, THE PA. STATE COLLEGE, STATE COLLEGE, PA.

Sheffield Simplex

INDEPENDENT TESTIMONY.

The following query was published in the "Autocar," December 17th, 1910:—

No. 1593.—45 H.P. "SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX."

"Will any private reader kindly give their experiences with above cars as to reliability, upkeep, &c.?—J. C. S." And elicited the following replies:—

December 31st, 1910.

"I have had a 45 H.P. 'Sheffield-Simplex' of the GEAR-BOX-LESS type in my possession for two years, and, apart from one or two trifling mishaps to start with, I have always found the car most reliable. If 'J. C. S.' wants a six-cylinder car in which power is not sacrificed for quite unnecessary silence, he could not do better than get a 'Sheffield-Simplex.' The car is as silent as any reasonable man who is not suffering from 'Silent-Knightis' can want, the engine being scarcely audible when the car is in motion. The GEAR-BOX-LESS system works perfectly, the emergency gear never being required except for starting and hills of about 1 in 8 or steeper gradient. Hills like Reigate, which cannot be rushed, offer no obstacle with a car weighing 34 cwt. and four passengers. The upkeep for a car of its size is most reasonable. I have done 6,000 miles on one pair of tyres, and 7,000 miles on another. The petrol consumption works out at about 15 miles to the gallon on a journey of over 100 miles give-and-take roads in the summer. I have always found the Company most obliging in every way. In conclusion, I am certain that there is no car on the road at present of the same cylinder capacity that can better it over a give-and-take road."—R. H. T.

December 31st, 1910.

"As an owner of a 45 H.P. 'GEAR-BOX-LESS' 'Sheffield-Simplex' Car, I can honestly do nothing but praise the car. The petrol consumption on a fair run is thirteen or fourteen miles per gallon. On tyres the car is extremely light. I have done 3,000 miles on driving wheels with grooved Dunlops, and the tyres are not ready for retreading yet. The throttle arrangement is very convenient, and every part of the car is splendidly made and finished. For running-power I do not think the 'Sheffield-Simplex' can be beaten, and hills make very little difference to it; it is very rarely that the emergency gear is required. I really think this is a beautifully made car, and a treat to drive, and whoever buys one cannot fail to be pleased with the results, if my experience can be taken as a criterion."—DERBYSHIRE.

Catalogue post-free on application to Dept. "L."

SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX MOTOR WORKS, Ltd.

TINSLEY, SHEFFIELD, ENGLAND.

London Depôt: c/o MULLINERS, Ltd., 132-135, LONG ACRE, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE & BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC

OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO AND . . THROUGH CANADA. . .

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service vid Vancouver.

For further particulars, apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,

62-65, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON, E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street, Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE

TO

SOUTH and EAST AFRICA.

WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.

Viâ the SUEZ CANAL.

Calling at MARSEILLES and NAPLES.

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.

(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—

DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.

Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE PLEASURE CRUISES

LIVERPOOL

to the

MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC

by the

"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"

Saxonia Leaves Liverpool 9 Feb., 1911.
Carpathia " " 2 Mch., 1911.

Ports of Call . . .

CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS, MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA, ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME, PALERMO, NAPLES.

For full particulars apply—

THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

THE

"EMPIRE ILLUSTRATED."

The Tariff Reform Monthly.

40 pages.

Profusely Illustrated.

Interesting to every Unionist and Imperialist and convincing to Liberals and Little Englanders.

Price 3d.

P & O Passenger Services.

EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA, JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports

(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)

Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises

Throughout the Year, according to Season.

AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE, NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.

Programme on Application.

For Passage, Freight and all information apply—

PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,

122 Leadenhall Street, E.C., or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours

R.M.S.P.

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY.

(Royal Charter dated 1839.)

Fortnightly Sailings from Southampton to—

ARGENTINA & BRAZIL

via SPAIN & PORTUGAL.

WEST INDIES, BRITISH GUIANA, SPANISH MAIN, CENTRAL AMERICA, NEW YORK.

From LONDON to—

MOROCCO & CANARY ISLANDS,

EGYPT, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA & JAPAN.

(By Shire Line.)

For further particulars apply to

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY

18, Moorgate Street, E.C., & 32, Cockspur Street, S.W.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

CONTENTS.

	Page
Review of the Week	59
The Anarchist Rat	60
True History	60
The Discoverer	63
Reviews:—
Ainsworth and his Friends	63
Goldwin Smith	64
Two Famous Medici	65
The Laws of Poesy	67
The Jews	67
A Governor-General of India	68
Shorter Reviews	69
Fiction	72
Books of Reference	74
Day Before Yesterday—I.	75
The Anarchist Enemy—II.	76
India Before the Mutiny—I.	77
Wallace and Darwin	78
Charles Baudelaire—II.	80
The Theatre	81
Music	81
Royal Academy: Winter Exhibition	82
Facilis Descensus	83
Some Old-fashioned Railway Notions	83
The London Institution	84
English Goethe Society	85
In the Temple of Mammon	85
Books Received	86

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

THE ACADEMY is published by MESSRS. ODHAMS, LIMITED, 67, Long Acre, London, W.C., to whom all letters with reference to publication must be addressed.

Applications referring to Advertisements may be addressed to MESSRS. ODHAMS, as above.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

THE ACADEMY is now obtainable at Messrs. W. H. Smith & Sons, Messrs. Wyman's, and Messrs. Willing's bookstalls and shops.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

THE narrow escape of M. Briand, the French Premier, from the revolver of an assassin on Tuesday last reminds us that there are some dangers due to publicity which no care can possibly avert, unless, as a matter of precaution, all "persons of weak intellect" are permanently incarcerated. The plea of incomplete mental equipment has been used before, and seems hardly solid enough to bear the blame which must attach to such deliberate attempts at the taking of human life; the criminal was sufficiently sensible, at any rate, to obtain a good vantage-point for his operations, to bring his revolver, and to select his man. It seems that he had previously attacked a public functionary, yet was allowed to go free, and to obtain firearms. Here, however, we must not throw stones, since, in the light of recent events, our glass houses are none too safe on this side of the Channel. We may note, however, while congratulating M. Briand upon his fortunate escape, and expressing our pleasure that no serious injuries resulted to his confrères, that of late a much stronger tone has prevailed in French politics. Not so very long ago it was customary to quote France to all students of national and social affairs as a reprehensible "moral example," an object-lesson of retrogression; her influence was supposed to be nearing a stage when it would become practically negligible. Now all that talk is out of date. France, under the more vigorous tutelage of M. Briand and M. Pichon, can claim that the dangerous period of her decline—which undoubtedly existed—is arrested; she takes her place once again in spheres more robust than those of literature and art. The Chamber of Deputies may still on occasion be lively with the light-heartedness which to our somewhat serious minds is hardly compatible with the gravity of large issues, but the work there accomplished is of a firmer and more lasting texture and of greater national value than has appeared for sometime. With a good Army and a smartly-organised Navy France has little to fear from the developments of European international politics which may occur during the next few years.

It is high time that a word of protest be entered against the impertinent details—devoid of any attribute except that of imagination—which are set forth, with a great show of authority, in the "Society" columns of various newspapers. The journalist—often lady-journalist—whose metier it is to supply "facts" relating to noble or prominent families is no doubt often hard pushed for material for copy. Peerages and various handbooks are the common property of the fraternity. Where then is new ground to be broken? Clearly the realm of imagination must be drawn upon. Various details as to pedigrees of the most inaccurate and impertinent character are dogmatically set out. Estimates of incomes or of acreage, the figures differing to a ludicrous extent according as the particular contributor is of a lavish or a parsimonious disposition, are laid down as if they were derived from a secret view of Income-tax returns, or confidences exchanged with the Yorkshire blacksmith on the returns made to him under Form 4, or a vision of what may some day be recorded in the New Domesday Book. The person whose family and private affairs are thus handled at so much a line is, in all probability, the only person who could furnish accurate information, and he is the person who is never, by any chance, consulted. A request for his permission to allow intrusion into his private relations is never made. Journalism of this description has nothing to recommend it. It is usually supplied by persons who pretend to inner knowledge of great houses, when their entrance has, no doubt, been barred on the front-door step, leaving no alternative but the area. Editors would, we think, render their productions far more popular if they would cease to be, by special appointment, purveyors to the Snobocracy.

We refer in another column to methods of excluding Anarchists from our shores. The power of expulsion is somewhat more in doubt, doubt which we hope will be dispelled, if necessary, by an amendment of the law. The interesting letter of a high authority on the possibility of using sulphurous fumes to dislodge desperadoes such as those of Sidney Street deserves careful attention. If some such method had been adopted most valuable documents might now be in the hands of the police, and the criminals on conviction would have graced the gallows. There is nothing ludicrous in the suggestion that sulphurous fumes might have been used in the recent siege. Naval officers who have served in the China Seas are well acquainted with the efficacy of the "stinkpot." The Chinese pirate, who is not usually an over-sensitive person, and who is not habitually accustomed to live in an atmosphere sweetened by all the perfumes of Arabia, metaphorically throws up the sponge, and actually flings himself into the sea as soon as the "stinkpot" arrives on board. This admirable engine for enforcing surrender might, it is contended, have been introduced into the Sidney Street room propelled from an air-gun, or in the shape of a grenade either through the window or through an aperture in the door. Its effect would have been instantaneous. If in any quarter such a suggestion is thought to be incongruous, it must be remembered that chemicals play a prominent part in modern warfare, and it is quite reasonable to meet picric with sulphur.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

THE ANARCHIST RAT

THE graphic articles which we have published during the last fortnight dealing with the incidents of the Sidney Street siege, and many of the lessons to be drawn from that occurrence, will have attracted much attention. The whole subject will doubtless engage the attention of the House of Commons when Parliament meets, and many gladiatorial contests will be fought. The heavy ordnance of debate will be requisitioned, and tongues equalling long service rifles in their power to wound will pour forth an incessant fusillade. The net result will probably be as unsatisfactory as the cremation of the anarchist miscreants, and, what is much more important, the loss—the preventable loss—of the incriminating documents which would have laid bare the springs of their foul intrigues. The right of asylum will be freely insisted on. Mr. Churchill will explode a carefully prepared impromptu joke, and extol by implication his own heroism, coupled with the hint of a lament that there is no special decoration for valour which can be bestowed upon Home Secretaries, even when they fail to get captured.

The incidents of the siege have been ably and exhaustively dealt with. Whether illegality will be found to be branded on the measures adopted will be closely probed; whether method and knowledge would have obviated the ridicule of the world will doubtless emerge into the light of day. Meanwhile, a travesty of "Peterloo" has been enacted. It is true that the parallel is not exact; that Hunt's meeting was—at least in semblance—a meeting to advocate constitutional reform; and it is doubtful whether in these days the magisterial prohibition which was then held to render the meeting illegal, would now be upheld. The action adopted in summoning soldiers and the Manchester and Cheshire Yeomanry to suppress the meeting was at least adopted under magisterial authority. Under whose authority was military force employed in Sidney Street?

The affairs of Tottenham and Houndsditch and their sequels have disturbed the smug complacency which was wont to lull this country into apathy in the belief that the nation which afforded asylum to murderous wretches who masquerade as the exponents of a political faith would secure immunity for itself from their diabolical designs. It is now seen that such a belief is a profound delusion. It will have to be realised here, as it is clearly realised in the countries in which this anti-human species can be observed in its lairs, that humane methods are entirely unsuited to, and will always fail in grappling with, a species of criminal who, owing to congenital insanity—whether partaking of the attributes of homicidal tendency or abnormal egotism—is the permanent pest of society and the sworn enemy of the human race.

If such a view comes at length to be grasped, Great Britain, instead of being a byword among the nations, will attract to herself far more sympathy and goodwill than hitherto and wield extended influence for good in the councils of the world.

How then is it possible to cope with the question of refusing shelter and asylum to the criminal off-scourings of Continental nations? One or two possible answers to this inquiry present features of interest.

In our view the main essential and efficient weapon is that England shall at last join hands with Continental Governments, and that a highly organised system of international police, in which England would participate, shall be instituted. By such a method murderous miscreants would be known and hounded down throughout the world. They would fail to secure a foothold of sufficient permanence, or to shroud themselves in sufficient obscurity, to be able to bring to fruition their schemes. If these persons are unable to escape from the surveillance of skilled police their power for mischief is largely neutralised.

We have not much faith in the efficiency of legislation for the exclusion of the worst type of alien criminal. Such legislation is useful—if it is efficiently administered—in limiting the immigration of an undesirable class of alien, whose circumstances and attributes render him a potential criminal, and who is in any case a set-back to civilised progress and an element of danger to the public health. Legislation is also useful in so far as it places in the hands of judicial authorities the power to recommend for deportation aliens convicted of ordinary crime and who are an undesirable addition to our population. Here again, however, an apparently salutary provision is often valueless, because as England does not participate in such a system of police as we have mentioned above, the deported alien frequently returns.

It is not generally known that, given the indispensable knowledge and information which would be in the possession of our branch of an International police, we already possess the power to exclude dangerous criminals from our shores. Such action can be taken as an "Act of State." The Executive, making use of the prerogative right of the Crown, may legally refuse to admit aliens to land on British shores. The necessary element to enable action is knowledge, and that element will never be forthcoming until Continental and British police are closely federated for the purpose of the suppression of Anarchist crime.

TRUE HISTORY

BY E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT

THE average reader who has made a complete study of a particular epoch in the history of a nation knows little or nothing of the domestic life of those whose political fortunes, or misfortunes, he has examined with such infinite care. Yet true history is surely that which brings before our mental vision a clear picture of the manner in which the average citizen spent his time when at work and when at play; how his home was organised; the position occupied by his wife and family in the home; and all that appertains to their happiness, troubles, education, religion, and occupations. With this knowledge in our possession we can estimate how the social life of various classes was affected by the laws, the administration of those laws, and by the domestic and foreign policy of the government of the day. But how little has the average historian to tell us of the inner life of a bygone age! History usually consists of an endless recital of the fortunes of the opposing parties who make up the body politic in a constitutional monarchy or republican government—or in the case of an autocratic monarchy, or dictatorship—of the fortunes of kings and queens, of rival houses to the same throne, of court favourites, of rebellions successful or crushed, of all those who happened to compose that little coterie who surround the despot's throne, and on whom the sun of the historian's researches alone deigns to shine.

The most elaborate descriptions will be given of any sudden change in the government of a country. If an absolute monarchy gives place to a constitutional, if a republic is swept away and a monarchy substituted, if a worn-out and discredited dynasty is driven from the throne by another of younger stock and stronger vitality, the causes which led up to the change will be most carefully examined and analysed. Such events will share equal honour with the recital, so beloved by the historian, of wars waged against other States, of battles lost and won, and endless time and endless trouble will be devoted to reading contemporary accounts and searching contemporary archives in order that the exact numbers of those who were slain or maimed may be accurately known. Yet these things are but the externals in the life of a nation, and possess little or no value except as an academic chronological record unless, contemporaneously parallel with them, we have a complete and accurate picture of the daily domestic life of the masses who, taking no part in politics themselves, have to abide by the laws and actions of the particular régime with which the historian happens to be dealing. These two branches of history, the national and the domestic, are inseparable the one from the other, and almost all historians make the mistake of devoting their study and research to the former and in leaving the reader to draw, in his imagination, already dulled or atrophied by countless unimportant dates and facts, a mental picture of the latter, which is usually hopelessly wrong.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

It is not difficult to see the reason for this. It is always a temptation to the historical writer to deal with events for which the largest amount of contemporary data is available, and the stories of the varying fortunes of kings, of administrations, of favourites, of statesmen, and of wars are to be found in abundance in State archives, contemporary books, in letters, and private journals; whereas he who would write the story of the domestic life of a family or of an individual finds no such records available, and scant facts must be culled from any available source, however indirect. No State archives, as far as I know, contain any official records of the social life of the people, and therefore the historian must turn to three unofficial sources if he wishes to add to our feeble stream of knowledge. These are (1) the poetical, (2) the architectural and plastic, (3) the private record. With the relative value of the three I will deal in detail.

In almost all ages the poet has left a reliable picture of contemporary rural and urban life. Material poetry, as distinct from mythical or philosophical, has risen to its greatest heights when employed to describe the haunts and occupations of the humble, and it has usually sunk to its lowest rhetorical depths when employed to record history or to commemorate the deeds of heroes. The true poet is usually inspired with a love of Nature and with sympathy for the humble and oppressed, and where these traits are found there follows, as a natural corollary, simplicity, and where there is simplicity there is truth. Thus the poet gives us a picture of domestic life, idealised, it may be, by the imagination of genius and by a desire to eliminate the sordid but of priceless value, once allowances are made for these natural weaknesses. True poetry can only deal with the immutable; human nature and character alone remain unchanged. When poetry is employed to read the deeds of kings or governments, or to glorify victories and other transitory phantoms, it leaves its proper sphere of activity and becomes artificial, and bears a false ring. All systems of government, whether autocratic, constitutional, or republican, are but transitory, therefore artificial, and the great poets of antiquity have seldom wasted their efforts on building on a foundation which at any moment may be swept away by the substitution of another edifice equally fragile. They have naturally turned to the solid rock of the immutable, which is human nature as displayed in the domestic life of a nation, and to descriptions of the localities amongst which those lives have been passed. Thus the poet is of far more value to us than the mere historian.

The second source of our knowledge is derived from the architectural and plastic remains which have survived the call of time. The occupations, taste, and in a lesser degree the character of a person or of a family, can be gauged with fair accuracy by even a cursory examination of their homes and surroundings. In like manner the habits, customs, and daily existence of a decayed civilisation can be deduced from its architectural ruins, plastic art, and household utensils which have survived. Painting would naturally be a valuable auxiliary, but except in rare instances this branch of art, fragile and perishable as it is, is seldom available beyond the Middle Ages. Archæology is, therefore, an essential and integral branch of the domestic history of a people as distinguished from the mere academic record of things, governments, and wars.

The third, and by far the most valuable, although the rarest, record of the commonplace life of a people is contained in those private diaries, books, and letters in which the writers reveal their everyday doings and their real outlook on contemporary affairs,—not perhaps as they desired the world of their day to believe they saw it, but as they honestly saw it for themselves—works in which the writer, generally with no intention of doing so, but in spite of himself, has left a priceless word-picture of the age in which he lived. But such books are rare for the simple reason that few people are born so constituted as to be able to place on record the daily, almost hourly story, of an existence which may never have risen above the commonplace and which possibly passed unnoticed and unhonoured by their fellow citizens. Yet it is just this picture of the commonplace which is of such supreme value to a proper understanding and appreciation of a former age. We want to study a sample of the lives of the majority, not of that small minority who appear in the limelight throughout all ages.

An unusual combination of qualities, good and bad, are required to produce such a work. There must be a great and sustained egotism which sees importance in trivials because these trivials happen to revolve in the same orbit with the writer; a keen sense of proportion must be wanting, and also the lack of a keen sense of humour; a certain naïveté is usually found, often priggishness, and considerable powers of observation and industry are essential. The writer's life must be removed from public activities, or at least they must not be the all-absorbing interest in his life, because once he is drawn into the vortex of affairs he is almost certain to leave a record of events, which, although they may be of some value to the chronicler of the history of governments, kings, and parties, will be useless in portraying the domesticity of his age.

It is for this reason that we attach such consummate value to books of the type of the "Meditations of Marcus Aurelius," to the writings of St. Paul, to Chaucer's "Tales of the Canterbury Pilgrims," to "Pepys' Diary," to Boswell's "Life of Johnson," and, in a lesser degree, to Eckermann's "Conversations with Goethe." Many others might be mentioned, such as Plutarch's "Lives" or Suetonius' "Lives of the Caesars;" but in the latter class of work we are dealing more with hearsay than with direct evidence, because the writers were not contemporary with the personalities they are portraying. Thus we are not treading on such good ground, and there is something open to doubt. We cannot be sure whether the author's picture is a true, or a false one which his imagination has created. But in the other works which I have mentioned at random we have the most valuable examples—in Marcus Aurelius' "Meditations" of self-revelation; in the writings of St. Paul, setting aside the theology—of travel and the administration of the law and of the men who administered it, throughout the various provinces of the Roman Empire; in Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales" of the poet leaving a unique picture of contemporary life; in "Pepys' Diary" the most perfect example extant of an author revealing himself and his age without having the faintest idea that he is handing down a masterpiece to posterity; in Boswell's "Life of Johnson," not only a first-class study of contemporary England, but also the revelation of the workings of a great mind when applied to the little ups and downs of everyday life as seen by a constant companion; and in a lesser degree this applies to Eckermann's "Goethe's Conversations."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

But, looking back down the tide of time, works of this class which give an insight of real human interest into the daily lives of our progenitors are lamentably rare. We are fairly well supplied with memoirs of Kings, of Courts, of various statesmen upon whom fortune has placed the stamp of distinction and prosperity. During the last four centuries printing has become cheap, and since education has spread, we have become the heirs to a plethora of such works. But these intimate revelations have seldom percolated beyond the favoured class who throughout all ages cluster round the courts of kings. Of the lives of the middle classes and of the masses we know next to nothing, and more often than not the perusal of stereotyped history leaves an absolutely misleading impression on our minds. What, for instance, were the feelings of the primitive Britons when the Roman Eagle first appeared in their midst? We know the details of the Norman Conquest; but how did the Saxon serf and the Saxon landowner regard their change of masters? How did the peasants of Italy regard the invasions of Attalia, and what difference did they make in their daily lives? How did the man in the street fare when Constantinople was captured by the Ottoman Turks?

Of these events we have no true picture to guide us. By reading history and Court memoirs one would believe that every person throughout England carried a Psalter under the Protectorate of Cromwell, and that later on every man was a dissipated roué during the reign of Charles II., unless we had Pepys' inimitable Diary to give us a true insight into the lives of the middle classes and the masses. Our knowledge of the life led by the literary giants of the eighteenth century is chiefly derived from Boswell's "Life of Johnson;" history does not help us there. But for his "Meditations" we would probably believe that Marcus Aurelius, when not actually fighting the Germanic tribes, spent his leisure hours in camp, not in silent meditation, but in drunken orgies and in the rough horseplay of the Legionaries.

No doubt an ideal state of society would be that where the mass of the population of a country lived their lives peacefully, oblivious to dynastic changes and to the varying fortunes of parties. If the majority of the inhabitants of a country had it in their power to stand aside and regard with indifference Kings and professional politicians struggling for the mastery, toppling one another over, carrying on wars with other nations without feeling the effects, they would probably choose to do so. The average man wishes to live and to let live, and to go through life peacefully, duly observing those social codes for the regulation of his dealings with his fellow-men, which the common-sense and the experience of ages, not Kings and parties, have prescribed as essential.

When we have little or no direct knowledge extant of a nation's domestic life we owe a debt of gratitude to the historian who, after long research amongst all the available contemporary material, by dissecting the works of the authors of the period for light on abstruse and doubtful points and by a careful examination of its archæological and plastic remains, is able to rebuild the whole edifice of the social world so that we can mentally travel over the same ground and lead the same life as the Roman citizen of 1900 years ago. Such a work Professor Tucker has produced in his "Life in the Roman World of Nero and St. Paul."* It is a book of inestimable value to those who wish to correct the mistaken impressions, or to clear away the miasma of uncertainty, which have arisen in their minds after a perusal of commonplace history.

Professor Tucker takes the year 64 A.D. He conducts us through the Roman Empire from Chester in the north to Syene, the modern Assouan, in the south. He tells us of the roads to take, and provides us with suitable escorts over those on which we may expect to be waylaid by robbers or footpads; he gives us necessary information as to suitable hostelries at which we may put up for the night, and warns us of the bad food and lack of cleanliness of the majority. He informs us of the ships, of the accommodation we may reasonably expect to find on board and of the chances of shipwreck or piratical attack. On the way he points out historic sights, temples, shrines, and battlefields. He takes us in turn to the principal cities of the Empire, and we go the round of their theatres, circuses, museums, libraries, public buildings, and waterworks.

We then find ourselves in the Rome of the year 64 A.D., before its destruction by fire; he rebuilds the city for our edification, and after a careful examination of its public buildings, temples, and palaces we are conducted to the house of Quintus Silius Bassus, a typical senator and aristocrat of the period, whose home is on the Caelian Hill, facing the Palatine, near the modern church of SS. Giovanni e Paolo. We spend one day in the company of Silius, from the very early hour at which his valet calls him to trim his beard. After his early breakfast we watch him hold his levée, at which his friends, followers, and satellites attend; then we are conducted over his house, and peep into every room, examining the furniture, nick-nacks, pictures, and sculpture; we follow his litter to the Imperial Palace on the Palatine, which he enters to attend the levée of the Emperor Nero. This function quickly at an end, we return to his house and sit down to a light mid-day repast, which is followed by the customary siesta. On awakening we repair to the Forum and listen to Silius's address on behalf of the suit of a friend, whilst the hired claque, whom he has taken the precaution to bring with him, keep up a vigorous round of applause. Then we are free to share his sports and amusements throughout the afternoon. We are included amongst his guests at dinner and listen with interest to their conversation, reclining on heavily becushioned couches, and sipping his excellent wine from the vineyards of Tuscany. Now we must leave him for the night, and our last glance shows the benevolent senator in bed engaged in reading the current news of the day, and the Imperial Decrees—one of which, by the way, may contain the disagreeable surprise of an order for his immediate suicide—out of the official "Court Circular."

Having bid a reluctant farewell to Silius, until, indeed, we accompany him to his country residence when the heat of Rome becomes intolerable, we are chaperoned on the following morning to the chamber of his wife Marcia, and are permitted to see that worthy dame arrange her toilet and have her hair dressed. We follow her movements throughout the day, which apparently was passed in much the same manner as that of any modern up-to-date society lady—in shopping, gossiping, visiting, intriguing, and in hastening from point to point to escape from the ennui of luxurious ease. But Marcia possessed one inestimable advantage. If in the course of her idle peregrinations she meets some one whom she likes better than her husband, all she has to do is to walk home, pack up her belongings, and scratch on a wax tablet with the homely "stylo" the laconic message—unless indeed she is saved the trouble by finding one to the same effect from Silius: "Dear Silius—I am not coming back, because I have found some one I like better—your affectionate Marcia;" and the marriage at once came to a summary end. Marriage in those days was but a civil

* "Life in the Roman World of Nero and St. Paul." By Professor T. G. Tucker, Litt.D. Camb., Hon. Litt.D. Dublin. (Macmillan & Co.)

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

tie, and could be broken at any time by either party; but nevertheless the system seems to have worked very well. Subsequently we learn all about the lives, childhood, education, and periodic castigations of young Silius and his sister, and of the ceremonies attendant on their coming-of-age and marriage. The season at an end, we follow the family to the country, and pass a few pleasant days at their villa.

But Professor Tucker does not only deal with the life of the Senators who formed the cream of the Roman aristocracy. He tells us with lucidity and wealth of detail how the Knights, the commercial money-making class, accumulated their fortunes; of the houses and flats of the townspeople, of their trades and wages. Then he deals with the rabble who thrived on Saturnalias, free corn, occasional doles of wine, and the bright sunshine of Southern Italy. Neither is the poor peasant neglected, and his humble homestead is duly visited. We are next taken to the camp of the hardy legionary, and follow his fortunes as he resists the encroachments of the Barbarian in return for inadequate pay and the eventual hope of a small pension or free grant of land. We learn of the laws, and ofthose who administered them; of the tax-collector and his methods, and of the religion of the period. Rome is rebuilt before our eyes, and the domestic life of the Roman is painted with a sure hand and delightful charm.

Many illusions will be shattered. Those who believe that under Nero every Roman went in hourly terror of his life or of having his property confiscated, will be agreeably surprised. Nero, a man of besotted sensuality, was by no means a bad Emperor, though recklessly extravagant. He was beloved by the masses, and the Provinces were excellently administered during his reign. Only on very rare occasions did he illuminate his garden with torches made out of primitive Christians, and his cruelty was confined almost entirely to the aristocracy of Rome, whom he seems to have hated almost with the vehemence of a Lloyd George; and if his language when speaking of them was more moderate, it was only out of respect to his own exalted position.

The spread of humane ideas and the less summary usages of modern society do not permit the approaches to the Chancellor's house in Downing Street to be illuminated by inflammable dukes and smouldering earls; but, except for this comparatively unimportant distinction, the aristocracy of present-day England seem to suffer from much the same troubles as did the Patricians in the age of Nero.

THE DISCOVERER

You lured me, Dearest, with those veilèd eyes—
  Eyes that half speak and half conceal the deeps
  That in your bosom lie—to scale the steeps
Of lofty Love, if haply I might be wise
To unlock such cloistral secrets; yet surmise
  Whispered but thinly of the abyss that leaps
  Now to my awed regard—a world where sleeps
Heaven germinal, and Pain in Love's disguise!

So the old venturous shipman laid in store
  That breathless moment by the virgin sea,
On heights unscaled by Latin feet before,
When in the drowsy, far Castilian lands
  He heard, and answered unresistingly,
The importunate call of undiscovered strands.

P. J. F.

REVIEWS

AINSWORTH AND HIS FRIENDS

[First Notice.]

William Harrison Ainsworth and his Friends. By S. M. Ellis. Two Vols. (John Lane. 32s. net.)

In one of his least-inspired moments of talk with Eckermann, Goethe declared with customary autocratism that a character develops by contact with the world, talent by an environment of calm and quiet, contrasting thus absolutely "Welt" and "Stille." The dictum does not even present one of those half-truths in which the great German was so astoundingly prolific. It is barely a quarter-truth. A few moments' thought at once recalls to the mind the names of ten or twenty men of letters of the first rank, well known throughout the world, about whom it can be most emphatically said that they owed at least as much to the "Welt" as to the "Stille." As to England, Chaucer, Milton, Shakespeare, Sheridan immediately occur to one, together the numerous and distinguished band, which includes men like Browning and Thackeray, who have found frequent inspiration in the whirl and frivolities of London society. Abroad, we reflect on the careers of artists like Rubens, Cervantes, Dante, Velasquez, and Goethe himself, about none of whom it can be affirmed, without an amount of "hedging" that practically invalidates the Goethean maxim, that they owe the growth of their talent mainly to calm and quiet. Character and talent grow indeed most often together.

Yet there are cases, especially those of the smaller-gifted writers and artists, of which it may at any rate be argued that, in all probability, a life in the world of action spoilt their abilities in the realm of art and the imagination. William Harrison Ainsworth appears to have been one of these unlucky mortals. Extraordinarily precocious and creative, at an age when most boys are hardly able to write two consecutive sentences, of unusually handsome face and physique, with a rich father who humoured all his whims and caprices, free-handed, generous, impulsive, rather hot-headed, serenely audacious and a trifle inclined to be masterful in disposition, an interesting and fluent talker, always fond of society and of conviviality, friendly to every one and eager to make friends, with above all an undoubted natural talent if not for pure literature, at any rate for the writing of breathless "Rides to York" and such-like romances, this fine, dashing Ainsworth, coming up to town from his native and much-beloved Manchester, quickly found himself to be one of the most sought-after men in London society.

D'Orsay and he were considered in their day the handsomest and best-dressed "bucks" in London. They would sit one on each side of the throne on which Lady Blessington held her Court. "Venus between the two Graces," observed an Irishman, "only there were three of them!" Ainsworth and Dizzy became intimate; their first novels appeared almost simultaneously; they were born within a few months of each other (but not, as Mr. Ellis erroneously states, in the same year); and Ainsworth was probably correct when he sadly wrote, amid the ruins of his brief fame and fortune, to his bosom friend, William Crossley:—

> It was a great misfortune to me that Disraeli went out. He would have given me something better than a pension.

In the years that ushered in the triumphs of "Jack Sheppard" and "Rookwood," with its Turpinian hero and Black Bessian heroine, there was hardly a more popular man in England than Ainsworth, from the racecourses and pugilistic meetings, where the crowds sang rapturously his slang verses beginning "Nix my dolly, pals, fake away," to the great London salons and the theatres and Opera House, where he was everywhere recognised as "the darling of the ladies" and "the lion of the season."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

A jovially happy life followed for the next twenty-five years. Ainsworth made for himself a large circle of friends and many intimates, among the latter being Dickens and his biographer Forster, and the inimitable Cruikshank, among the former being numbered nearly all his contemporaries who had any claim to literary or artistic renown. Thackeray, Maclise, Father Prout, Tom Hood, Douglas Jerrold, Lemon, Blanchard—Lamb and Sir Walter Scott he had long before known—Mrs. Norton, the Countess of Blessington and her daughter were all among our author's friends, though some of them, like Thackeray, Father Prout, and Forster, had a curious way of doing him bad turns—in order to prove the sincerity of their loyalty, no doubt. Whether such a mode of life was really suitable to the development of Ainsworth's special talent may well be questioned. If, like his intimate friend "Dizzy," or like Dickens or Thackeray, he had been able to assimilate and utilise in his art his observations of contemporary men and things, he would have benefited by the tense and bracing atmosphere in which he spent most of his time. But his gift lay quite another way. It was of a romantic, antiquarian order, like Scott's, but limited by a lack of the highest culture, an apparent inability to grasp the widest views of men and circumstances, and a quite extraordinary incapacity or distaste for characterisation.

This latter was the most serious of his deficiencies, and condemned him throughout life to write romances, which had, it is true, a great temporary, almost accidental, vogue, and have since permanently sunk to the level of books which can hardly be greatly enjoyed by any but boys and youths. It is most probable that had he withdrawn from London and its lures, and quietly devoted himself to the serious pursuit of his art, he might not only have conquered his want of quick adaptability to the fluctuations of taste in fiction, but also have produced in his own particular historical-romantic line some works of permanent literary value.

As it was, he wrote story after story with conspicuous success—for a time; "Old St. Paul's," "Windsor Castle," "The Tower of London"—to name a few of the best known; he turned publisher and editor, in both cases without success, except in giving a helpful start to new writers, such as Mrs. Lynn Linton, Mrs. Henry Wood, and a number of others; on and on he went, not recking of his gradual but sure eclipse by the ever-growing reputations of Dickens, Thackeray, George Eliot, the Brontës, Trollope, Charles Reade, until one day, in the prime of his manhood, he suddenly awoke from his dreamer's life to find himself out of fashion, gradually dropped by former friends, reduced to writing for comparatively obscure publications, compelled to live a life of poverty and self-denial.

Throughout his life, however, Ainsworth rarely or never showed himself in the light of complaining or self-pity. He manfully accepted his banishment from further literary success. Certainly his character was much truer and stronger than his work.

Ainsworth as a character is seen at his best in his letters, his conversation, and actions. The man who, in his gay and brilliant youth, was described by Crabb Robinson, after a visit to the Lambs at Islington, as "a forward, talking young man, a Mr. Ainsworth," was one of the most interesting of talkers and letter-writers. He shows himself a keen observer, self-confident, frank, generous, and cheerful.

GOLDWIN SMITH

Reminiscences. By Goldwin Smith, D.C.L. Edited by Arnold Haultain, M.A. (Macmillan and Co. 10s. net.)

Probably few people of the younger generation realise what a tremendous alteration the last seventy or eighty years have brought about in our mode of life, our trend of thought, our social and political worlds, our methods of communication between both individuals and countries. It is very difficult, for example, to conceive of a London without its District Railway, its tubes, and its motor-driven vehicles—difficult even for those who knew the City before the present swiftly-moving panorama of the streets took the place of the comparatively sedate horse-traffic. It is even more difficult to imagine England without her magnificent railway-systems, by the aid of which we can lunch in bonnie Devon and take early afternoon tea in town, or breakfast in town and dine in Scotland, or in other ways approach the modern ideal of being in two places at once. Therefore the memories of a man who was well acquainted with the days of stage-coach and tinder-box, of high-backed pews and charity-boys, of beadles and the stocks, impress us as a voice recounting events and travels in a strange country, and we are driven to consider the contrast between the calm, unhurrying life of those exceptionally contented times and the atmosphere of ceaseless change, of rush and jostle, which characterises our own period.

Professor Goldwin Smith was born at Reading in the year 1823, and in his opening chapter paints very clearly the conditions which then prevailed. "The mail-coaches travelling on the Bath Road at the marvellous rate of twelve miles an hour, change horses at the Crown and Bear. The watchman calls the hour of the night. The Quaker dress abounds. It is worn by Huntley and Palmer, who keep a little biscuit-shop in London Street, where a little boy buys cakes, and from which has sprung the biscuit-factory of the universe. The shop of the principal draper is the ladies' Club." In some respects this part of the book is the most interesting, short though it is, so vividly is the reader confronted with the complete revolution in ideas and opinions which has since taken place. As the author observes:—

> From this state of things I have lived into an age of express trains, ocean greyhounds, electricity, bicycles, globe-trotting, evolution, the Higher Criticism, and general excitement and restlessness. The Reading of my boyhood has almost disappeared over the horizon of memory. Whither is the train rushing, and where will the terminus be? . . . Between that state of things and the present there is only a single lifetime; yet I feel as if I were writing of antiquity.

For readers who are students of social and political history, however, the chief interest will lie in Goldwin Smith's intercourse with the men who have made the nineteenth century so extraordinarily dominant a term in the equation of progress. Among his schoolmates at Eton were the future Lord Chief Justice Coleridge, Lord Farrar, and Henry Hallam (brother of the Arthur Hallam immortalised by Tennyson); but before we leave Eton days, we may picture mentally the young historian-in-embryo running among a crowd of boys "behind Queen Victoria's carriage from Eton to Windsor on the night of her marriage." Oxford, with which city so large a portion of his future career was to be bound up, claimed the youth at the age of eighteen, and there Matthew Arnold was one of his contemporaries. The criticism of Arnold, who was "outwardly a singular contrast to his almost terribly earnest sire," seems very reasonable, if not particularly original:—

> He exerted unquestionably an elevating and liberalising influence on a large class of minds. He pierced the hide > of Philistinism with the silvery shafts from his bow, though his idea of Philistinism may not always have been perfectly just. But in all fields, social or theological as well as literary, taste was supreme in his mind. If there is nothing disparaging in the phrase, I should say that he was the prince of connoisseurs.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

It is rather hard on A. H. Clough, however, to say that "some short poems and a translation of Plutarch were the only products of a great intellectual power;" but we have to bear in mind that the fervour of the poetic spirit was not part of the Professor's equipment; controversy, history, and a rather cold, solemn outlook seem his predominant traits as revealed in this autobiography.

Many anecdotes are here preserved of the days when Goldwin Smith lived in London. He met Macaulay at the house of Sir R. H. Inglis, and criticises him freely, with the suspicion of acidity which tinctures so many of his remarks:—

> Macaulay did talk essays and engross the talking—conversation it could not be called. One could understand how he was a bore to other talkers. He would seize upon a theme and dilate, with copious illustrations, from a marvellous memory. Mention of the exclusive respect of the Ritualists for churches in the Gothic style led to an enumeration of the Fathers of the early Church who had ministered in churches which were not Gothic. A question about the rules of equestrian statuary led to a copious dissertation proving that nature was the only rule. I have seen a whole evening party kept listening in a ring to an essay on final causes and the limits of their recognition, with numerous illustrations. But it seemed to me all exuberance, not assumption or ostentation.

The debates of the House of Commons strongly attracted Goldwin Smith, and, through his friendship with the Speaker (J. E. Denison, afterwards Lord Ossington), he frequently attended them; he gives an amusing account of the poor acoustic qualities of the House. "It seems," he writes, "that architectural science has not yet learned to produce with certainty a room in which you can be heard, a place in which you can breathe, or a chimney which will not smoke. It was said that the Leader of the Opposition went out and bought an evening paper to learn what the head of the Government was talking about." The author's memories of Gladstone have been given in another volume; he adds here a few paragraphs which show his critical turn of mind to advantage:—

> Archbishop Tait told me that what he most feared in Gladstone was his levity. This may seem paradoxical: yet I believe the Archbishop was right. That Gladstone's moral aspirations were high cannot be doubted. It is more than doubtful whether his sense of responsibility was very strong. At a dinner-party at which I was present he came late from the House. He was in the best of spirits, and seemed to have nothing on his mind. At last he spoke of the motion of which he had just given notice in the House. The motion, as afterwards appeared, was one which would have brought the two Houses into collision with each other, and the notice had been given amidst extreme excitement. When his love of power and his pugnacity were excited, it is questionable whether he thought much of anything but victory. . . . That Gladstone was a statesman of the very highest order I should find it difficult to believe. His moves always seemed to be impulses rather than parts of a settled plan . . . If he attacked the Lords, it was not that he had deliberately made up his mind in favour of a change, but that they came in his way at the moment. . . . As a speaker he was in the highest degree effective, but the effect was produced by his command of the subject, by the ascendancy of his character, by the impressiveness of his manner, and an admirable voice, rather than by any grace or force of language.

B

The great speeches of John Bright, on the contrary, are described as "literature, first-rate of its kind." On the debated point as to whether his orations were prepared, Goldwin Smith remarks that there can be no doubt. "I have stood by him when he was speaking, and seen the little sheaf of notepapers, on each of which probably his sentence or his catchword was written, and which dropped into his hat as he went on."

Professor Goldwin Smith was at one time (about 1855) on the staff of the "Saturday Review," contributing political articles; but his appointment as Regius Professor of History at Oxford in the year 1858 ended this connection with journalism. This position, which he retained for eight years, was the height of his desire. Under the impression that he was settled in it for life, he built a "little house," planted a garden, and entered upon some of his happiest days. Fate, however, intervened later on most curiously to take him across the seas to the Cornell University as exponent of history, and from that time Canadian and American affairs became his special study. During the Civil War he visited General Butler, and gives his own personal view of certain incidents which have been alluded to in these columns comparatively recently.* The war at times had a Gilbertian aspect, as on the occasion when a Federal commander found himself in difficulties, and had to choose between wasting his force by fighting, and surrender. Under the protection of a flag of truce he paid a visit to the Confederate lines, explained matters to his enemy, and asked for a candid opinion, as he did not wish to sacrifice life in vain. The Confederate, a true gentleman, showed him round the position, and said that "if his command formed part of a general plan of operations, he was bound to fight; otherwise he might with propriety surrender!"

We might go on selecting items of interest from this record of a remarkable career; but we must pause, and conclude by inquiring why, after the perusal, we are haunted by a lingering sense of dissatisfaction, and a feeling which may almost be termed sorrow. It arises, we think, from the impression of an outlook on life which on the whole was inclined to be gloomy. Intensely stern and humourless is the face of Goldwin Smith, as here reproduced from several photographs, and in the progression of his pages we miss the quality of geniality, of sympathy with the views of other men, which would have brought that personal touch between author and reader indispensable to thorough pleasure in a volume of this character. The book owes very much to Mr. Arnold Haultain, the editor, who receives high praise in the closing sentences—"Without the aid of a first-rate Secretary I could not have stumbled on as I have done." There are repetitions which might have been avoided—we are twice told, for instance, that Coleridge was "the Arnold of Eton;" but they are slight flaws, and the editor to some extent explains them in his prefatory note. The reader will not easily forsake the book until he has finished it; but he will feel probably that it needs a little more of life's sunshine for its full enjoyment.

TWO FAMOUS MEDICI.

The Romance of a Medici Warrior: Being the True Story of Giovanni delle Bande Nere; to which is added the Life of his Son, Cosimo I. A Study in Heredity. By CHRISTOPHER HARE. Illustrated. (Stanley Paul and Co. 10s. 6d. net.)

IN the life story of "The Fighting Medici," as one may well call "John of the Black Bands," for he was pre-eminently the soldier of his race, Mr. Christopher Hare has

* THE ACADEMY, No. 2001, September 10th, 1910.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

found a very congenial subject, one lending itself to that picturesqueness of treatment and style which usually characterises his writings. The first part of this book is brimful of romance, such as would have appealed strongly to the elder Dumas, and we can imagine the creator of D'Artagnan evolving a masterpiece from the stirring adventures of Condottiere Giovanni, or those of his remarkable mother, that Caterina Sforza, who, as Mr. Hare rightly says, stands forth supreme among the warrior-women that Italy delights to honour.

She it was who, when a rebellion broke out one night while her first husband was lying dangerously ill, galloped sixteen miles in order to suppress it, rode back with the subdued leader of the revolt in her charge, and two hours after sunrise gave birth to a son. She it was also who, after her aforementioned husband had been assassinated, refused to surrender her citadel even under the threat of seeing her captive children butchered before her eyes. She dared her enemies to do their worst, and told them plainly that she would find it easier to replace her offspring than her fortress. Again, it was Caterina who fought like a lioness against the combined hosts of Cæsar Borgia and the French King, Louis XII., winning in that unequal contest the admiration of all her enemies save the Borgias themselves, who, directly she had been captured, threw her into the castle of Sant' Angelo, where they would have kept her till she died had not D'Allègre, the French General, eventually insisted on her release, declaring, with the characteristic gallantry of his race, "On n'emprisonne pas les dames!"

It was by her third husband, Giovanni dei Medici, the only member of his family ever surnamed the Popular, that Caterina became the mother of the future commander of those Black Bands who fought now for the Pope, now for the Emperor, and now for the King of France, in the many contests which desolated Italy during the earlier years of the sixteenth century. The Lady of Forli's son inherited her vigorous, pugnacious nature. He was far more a Sforza than a Medici. Impulsive, passionate, delighting in the rush of battle, glorying in personal feats of arms, a strong man among the strongest, contemptuous of those improvements in artillery which were increasingly modifying the character of warfare, Giovanni delle Bande Nere stepped into the Renascence like a reincarnation of some doughty knight of the Middle Ages fresh from such fields as Bouvines and Poitiers. In a sense, of course, he was a mercenary, but a mercenary who was paid but seldom, and never in proportion to his services. Moreover, Giovanni's solicitude was chiefly for his followers, on whom he spent almost his entire means. Personally he was lavishly generous, and at times even ridiculously disinterested. When Francis I., at the outset of the siege of Pavia, wished to shower honours and wealth on him he refused the offer, as is shown by one of his letters to his friend Aretino:—

> My brave Pietro. . . . I have been treated like a brother by the King of France. . . . I sent back the Order of St. Michael to that great Prince, and I tore up the treaties which contained the provision for my salary and an income for my wife . . . telling him that he should bestow such a dignity on one who has served him longer than I have, while, as for the pay, that should be in proportion to the service.

It must be said also that Giovanni enforced strict discipline among his men whenever he was with them, and that the excesses which they now and again committed occurred during his absence from his command, being generally due to some remissness in paying them. Their colours were originally purple and white, and it was only on the death of Pope Leo X. that their commander, as a sign of mourning for his kinsman the Pontiff, provided them with the black banners and shoulder-belts which they ever afterwards retained, and whence they derived the appellation by which they are known in history.

It is with the help of numerous letters written by Giovanni, his wife, their relations and friends, that Mr. Hare narrates his hero's brief but strenuous career. We follow the young Condottiere through the turbulent violence of his youth to his deeds of daring on the stricken field; we see him leap on his horse with a wounded soldier in his arms, we see him lead a forlorn hope to victory, and hold a candle to light the surgeon who is amputating his limb. A ball, had severely wounded the reckless young warrior in the leg whilst he was guarding the Po against some of the forces which, under the Constable de Bourbon, were advancing through Italy to the sack of Rome. Amputation, as it happened, came too late to save Giovanni's life, and he passed away when he was only twenty-eight years old. Yet such had been his prowess that he was already renowned as one of the foremost captains of Europe.

He had married Maria Maddalena Salviati—a granddaughter of Lorenzo dei Medici, "il Magnifico"—who was deeply attached to him and devoted to his interests. Mr. Hare seems to be quite in love with Madonna Maria, so tenderly and attractively does he pourtray her. She gave Giovanni a son, Cosimo dei Medici, who was destined to become the ruler of Florence and the first Grand Duke of Tuscany. He differed greatly from his father. Mr. Hare likens him to a fox coming after a lion, and there were certainly some unpleasant vulpine traits in Cosimo's character. Perhaps, however, our author is not quite fair to him. Politically, he simply followed the tendency towards absolutism which was general among the rulers of his age. In many respects he was a very able Prince, and even Mr. Hare is obliged to say something, though by no means everything, about the draining of marshes, the digging of canals and artificial lakes, the building of aqueducts, bridges and palaces, and the patronage of art, associated with Cosimo's name. His services to letters and learning might also have been mentioned. With respect to Cosimo's beautiful wife, Eleonora de Toledo, our author seems to have been somewhat carried away by Florentine feeling and prejudice. He repeatedly calls Eleonora proud and cold; but her portrait by Bronzino leaves a different impression, and, besides, she gave her husband ten children, and was devoted to them. When her sons, Giovanni and Garzia, died under distressing circumstances—pointing, some writers think, to crime—Eleonora, overcome by grief, speedily followed them to the grave. The Florentines certainly disliked her—they were good haters, and often fierce, unreasoning ones—but this, we believe, was more particularly because she was a Spaniard, a race which they detested.

We could have wished that Mr. Hare had given us a rather more explicit account of Alessandro, the bastard Medici who preceded Cosimo at Florence, and particularly of his assassination, which inspired one of the most remarkable tales in "The Heptameron," as well as the stirring "Lorenzaccio" of Alfred de Musset. On the other hand, we are glad to see that our author does not blindly accept all the stories of poisonings associated with Cosimo and others of his race. During recent years various able works dealing with that subject have appeared in Italy, where, indeed, attempts have even been made to whitewash the Medici of virtually all the crimes imputed to them. That, no doubt, is going too far; but we believe there has been much exaggeration respecting the criminality of the Medici generally.

Besides recounting the careers of Giovanni and Cosimo, Mr. Hare's narrative abounds in touches illustrating Italian manners and customs in the sixteenth century. The book is not quite free from misprints, and we find such variations as "Po" and "Pŏ," "Cibo" and "Cibò," "di Toledo" and "de Toledo," whereas uniformity would have been preferable. There are sixteen illustrations, chiefly portraits, including a photogravure frontispiece which shows Giovanni delle Bande Nere as Titian pourtrayed him. This must be a somewhat idealised presentment of the gallant condottiere if San Gallo's famous bust of him (also depicted in this volume) is true to life.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

THE LAWS OF POESY

A Historical Manual of English Prosody. By GEORGE SAINTSBURY, M.A., &c. (Macmillan and Co. 5s. net.)

THE task which Professor Saintsbury set himself when he conceived the idea of concentrating all the best part of his great work on English Prosody into the comparatively small space of a handy manual of single-volume form could not have been an easy one; but, as is usual when he determines to enlighten us on literary themes, he has made a splendid success of it. Many readers who admired the learning and taste displayed in the larger books must have wished for something more convenient in shape and size. Here they have it, and nothing could be better in its way than the method of treatment which the author has adopted.

From the outset serious difficulties hinder the progress of any one, however thoroughly equipped he may be, who attempts close and lucid definitions in the sphere of prosody. "The subject," says the author in his Preface, "is one not very well suited for elementary instruction, and in endeavouring to shape it for that use there is a particular danger of too positive and peremptory statement in reference to matters of the most contentious kind, and the danger of unhesitating adoption of positive statements on doubtful points must have been found to be only too real by any one who has had to do with education." To take a single problem—that of terminology; the unending, recurrent bother between "accent" and "stress," and the disputes over scansion which inevitably result: this alone is enough to daunt any man who wishes to disentangle from the mixture of theories some distinct thread of his own, and to follow it consistently. A most amusing note of pugnacity steals into Professor Saintsbury's conclusions more than once; for instance, at the head of an invaluable chapter on the "Rules of the Foot System" he places this remark:—"These rules are not imperative or compulsory precepts, but observed inductions from the practice of English poets. He that can break them with success, let him." A whole volume could be written on the subject of these forty-two precepts; but we must pass on to notice briefly the major portion of the book.

For nearly a hundred pages continuous illustrations of English scansion according to the foot system are given, ranging in period from the Old English examples—unreadable without special study—to the poems of Ernest Dowson. Book II. is devoted to a Historical Sketch of English Prosody, and for the student who wishes to grasp the fundamental principles which have gradually come into being bearing on the poetry of to-day this part of the treatise is the most important. In such a closely-woven sequence of deductions the selection of a passage for quotation is not easy, but we may give a few sentences from the "Halt and Retrospect," in which section the author pauses at the Caroline period to survey the position:—

> In Shakespeare first the whole freedom as well as nearly the whole order of English prosody discovers itself. But this freedom is pushed by others to licence, and blank verse becomes practically as ruinous a heap as the rhyme-royal of the fifteenth century, with one form of decasyllabic couplet keeping it company, if not quite in actual cacophony, at any rate in disorderly slackness. Then Milton restores blank verse to almost all the freedom and more than the order of Shakespeare, infusing also into all the other metres that he touches this same combination, so that in these two practically everything is reached. But poetic fervour dies down; blank verse for a time becomes unpopular; the age calls for the more prosaic subject-kinds of verse—satire, didactics, &c.; prevailing standards of prosody are strictly regulated to an accomplished but decidedly limited "smoothness."

Then came the "Romantic Revival," ushered in by Gray, Chatterton, Burns, Blake, and continued by Wordsworth, Coleridge, and the great names which are reverenced by all lovers of our literature. In tracing the technical development of poetry through these masters of the art Professor Saintsbury is particularly happy.

After a very necessary and exceedingly useful glossary, an alphabetical list of poets is given, with special reference to their prosodic quality and influence; and here we note again the fighting spirit which we alluded to previously, in the paragraph on Robert Browning:—

> BROWNING, ROBERT (1812-1889).—Often described as a loose and rugged metrist, and a licentious, if not criminal, rhymester. Nothing of the sort. Extraordinarily bold in both capacities, and sometimes, perhaps, as usually happens in these cases, a little too bold; but in metre practically never, in rhyme very seldom (and then only for purposes of designed contrast, like the farce in tragedy), overstepping actual bounds.

This is one of the few points in which we disagree with the author. Some of Browning's rhymes were simply atrocious, and no amount of special pleading from his admirers—among whom we count ourselves—will persuade us to the contrary. If he deliberately chose such contortions of language as "fabric" and "dab brick," "failure" and "pale lure," and many others which will occur to our readers, we venture to say that it was in direct opposition to good taste and art; and if he wrote them in that divine hurry of his which at times produced his most magnificent effects, it is a pity that in calmer moments he did not revise and eliminate them, since they give the reader a most uncomfortable shock. No one cares to be pulled up short in a serious poem by a method of rhyming which has been relegated to the province of the scribbler of topical or humorous verses.

With an excellent little dissertation on the origins of lines and forms of stanzas, which is really an amplification of the glossary, Professor Saintsbury brings his book to a close. To read it is a work of many hours—we say "work" advisedly, since every page requires the exercise of thought; but it is, at the same time, a great pleasure and profit to any one who is interested in the wonderful manner in which our poetry has reached its present stage from the crudest beginnings. To the author as a literary critic and essayist we owe many a delightful hour, and corresponding debts of gratitude; by issuing this condensed edition of his standard work on English Prosody he has placed us under fresh obligations for rendering the results of his learning and indefatigable investigations so accessible and so inexpensive.

THE JEWS

The Jews: a Study of Race and Environment. By MAURICE FISHBERG. (The Walter Scott Publishing Co. 6s.)

FOR two thousand years and more the Jewish Question has persisted wherever in the civilised world a community of Jews has been found, and from Biblical times until to-day men have set themselves the task, hitherto quite fruitlessly, of finding a solution to that problem. All who have hitherto endeavoured to ameliorate the condition of the Jewish people or to effect an assimilation between them and the nations in whose midst they dwell, in short all who have turned their attention to the Jewish Question in any of its aspects, have found themselves faced by an insuperable difficulty. Apart from vague generalisations, the ignorance of all relating to Jews as a race was appalling. Their number, their distribution, the rates and causes of increase and decrease in different countries could only be guessed. No data existed on which any reliable estimate could be based. Some said that Jews were immune from certain diseases; others gave the reasons for this alleged immunity. The homogeneity of the Jewish race was spoken of as if it were a cardinal principle. "As rich as a Jew" became a proverb. Certain trades and occupations were termed Jewish. It was firmly believed, and probably still is, that at least half of the bankers, financiers, stockbrokers, &c., of the world are of the Jewish race. Even a specific Jewish physical type was depicted and described, and having been avidly appropriated by the comic paper and the popular stage, it will need acres of cold, hard facts and centuries of time to eradicate the superstition into which it has developed, and the Jewish race will probably have ceased to exist before the caricature of a Jew created by popular fancy passes into oblivion.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Serious students of the Jewish Question have at length lost their excuse for adopting, without test, any of the many popular beliefs current regarding the Jews. Despite innumerable difficulties due to the varying practice in different States regarding official statistics concerning the Jews and even the varying interpretations given to the term Jew, Dr. Fishberg, in his book, the latest volume of the Contemporary Science Series, has collected, sifted, and co-ordinated a mass of material relating to the Jews in all States and in most periods of history, and has presented them lucidly and attractively to his readers, so as to place all who have any serious interest in Jews or Jewry under obligations to him, which in the case of students, at any rate, it would be difficult to measure or to appraise. Dr. Fishberg must have spent years in preparing the present volume; in it he has done a work which has been overdue for a century.

The number of fallacies, hallowed by the acceptance of centuries, which Dr. Fishberg exposes in this volume is astonishing. The cold blasts of reality disperse one cloud after the other in the pages of his book, until at length it is found that, given similar conditions, the Jew would in a generation or two be indistinguishable from the Gentiles who surround him. In his earliest chapters Dr. Fishberg demolishes the superstition—for it proves to be nothing else—of the purity of the Jewish race. He shows and brings forward a mass of evidence in support of his contention that during Bible times, and ever since until to-day, there has been a continual, considerable admixture of alien elements. The very fact that almost every physical type is to be found among the Jews of Europe and America proves his argument, for physical characteristics, such as complexion, shape of the head, and features are never changed by environment, but are always due to heredity. It will come as a surprise to many that almost half of the Jews of the world are fair-skinned or blue-eyed, and that a relatively small proportion possess the supposed typical feature, the so-called "Jewish" nose.

Another current fallacy is the supposed rapid rate of increase of the Jews. Upon investigation this is also found to be baseless. It is a rule, with few exceptions, for the birth-rate among Jews to be less than among the non-Jewish surrounding populations. It is true that the infantile death-rate, in consequence of the greater care given by Jewish mothers to their children, is also lower; but even the natural increase, the number of births less the number of deaths, falls often below the corresponding rate among non-Jews, and in consequence in many Jewish centres, apart from the loss, which is considerable, caused by baptisms and other secessions, the Jewish population is stationary. If it were not for the vast reservoir of Jewry in the East of Europe, where assimilation is forcibly and artificially prevented, a century hence Jewry and Judaism would be little beyond a memory and an archæological survival. Three chapters are devoted by Dr. Fishberg to pathological characteristics, and the conclusion at which he arrives is that wherever the Jew is relieved of all disabilities, and anti-Jewish discrimination, social as well as economic and political, has entirely disappeared, pathologically there is no difference whatsoever between Jew and non-Jew. The same is said regarding the so-called Jewish occupations. Set him free to engage in any occupation, and after the passing of a generation or two the Jew wille b found in every calling and no disproportionate number will be found in any.

Dr. Fishberg has for the most part devoted himself to the collection of material concerning the Jews, and to its scientific arrangement, so that it may be utilised by those who come after him. One polemical subject, however, he discusses at some length—Assimilation versus Zionism—and decides definitely against the latter or anything resembling it as a solution of the Jewish Question. In assimilation he sees the inevitable solution, a solution which is only retarded by the persecution—physical, economic, and social—which the Jews are continually suffering in one part of the world or another.

A GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF INDIA.

Private Letters of the Marquess of Dalhousie. By J. G. A. Baird. (Wm. Blackwood and Sons. 15s. net.)

The publication of these private letters until fifty years after his death was prohibited by Lord Dalhousie's will. Even after this interval they are of great interest, not only to all concerned with Indian affairs, but also to any one who cares for good literature and real knowledge of public men and events. They are the spontaneous outpourings of a mind of singular vigour and strength, and deal with important and personal matters of which most people like to read. They were addressed to Sir George Couper, the writer's oldest and dearest friend, though twenty-four years his senior. In the splendid isolation of his position as Governor-General of India Dalhousie could unburden himself to nobody but his wife and his intimate friend. The letters display, as is the intention of their publication, the real nature and true character of the man who, during eight laborious years, though generally worn by maladies tempered only by intervals of good health, and overwhelmed for a time by bereavement, sustained the burden of his high office with courage, conscientiousness, industry, and genius. He was incapable of any exertion after leaving India, and died within five years at the age of forty-eight.

His name is writ large in Indian history as the Great Proconsul. His official acts are studied by his successors and other statesmen. His merits as an administrator were long since delineated by a contemporary observer. He was credited with firmness, penetration, decision, capacity for command, a power of grappling with tough and intricate problems, but his chief characteristic, which tradition has embalmed, was masterfulness. These letters corroborate the tradition. He would not brook a rival or allow his authority to be challenged; he was fearless in rebuking. His troubles, it appears, were chiefly with the Military Commanders. He complained of Lord Gough's want of generalship at Chillianwallah, feeling in him "no confidence against disaster." With Gough's impulsive successor (Sir Charles Napier) Dalhousie's quarrel was very serious, though they had started as friends. He was "obliged to give the Commander-in-Chief a punch in the head at last." Napier had issued the famous batta order, sanctioning on his own authority a higher rate of compensation for the native troops in the Panjab than the latest Government ruling allowed. Practically, Dalhousie could not withdraw the sanction; but he was greatly displeased with Napier, who behaved badly, and finally resigned his appointment without bidding farewell to the Governor-General. Dalhousie was annoyed also with Sir William Gomm, Napier's successor; also with General Godwin, commanding in the Burmese War. He reprimanded, too, Sir Colin Campbell (afterwards Lord Clyde, of Mutiny fame), when in command on the frontier. Among the civilians and politicals he showed his dislike for Sir Henry Lawrence, for his want of method, for being "such a harum-scarum worker," so he transferred Henry from the Panjab to Rajputana, and gave his full confidence to John Lawrence.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The reader will not find in these letters any elaborate defence of Lord Dalhousie's acts of annexation, which have been so often wrongly attacked. He carried out the "doctrine of lapse" with the sanction of the home authorities; the annexation of Oudh for misgovernment was not his policy, but when authorised he gave effect to it thoroughly. Sir William Lee-Warner's biography of Dalhousie has fully explained his share in these matters. In his retirement at Malta, Dalhousie admitted that he did not foresee the Mutiny, and boldly averred that no other human being foresaw it. This volume of letters will certainly enhance Lord Dalhousie's already great reputation.

SHORTER REVIEWS

The Italian Poets Since Dante, with Verse Translations. By WILLIAM EVERETT. (Duckworth and Co. 2s. 6d. net.)

To those who have already made acquaintance with these pleasantly critical studies in Italian literature their reissue in a handy form will be a welcome event. Having been delivered originally as lectures at the Lowell Institute, Boston, they are free from all stiffness and pedantry, and contain almost a personal note at times which is by no means disagreeable. The difficulties which beset the way of one who desires to investigate the recesses of Italian lore are fully appreciated by the author. "Everything Italian is fascinating," he writes, "but its charm is like a tropical forest—its luxuriance is almost deadly; its very beauties will strangle and poison an incautious explorer. There is no moment in the ages at which we can gaze on Italy that she does not overwhelm us by her countless treasures of beauty and sadness, and defy us to exhaust them."

In several passages in the volume Professor Everett discovers himself as no servile imitator of other men, and his work gains piquancy thereby, even although we may not invariably agree with him. He is rather sweeping in his remarks when dealing with Ariosto of Modena, the author of the famous "Orlando Furioso," and need not have gone out of his way to depreciate Wordsworth:—

> His fields, his forests, his mountains, his rivers are merely the background to his men and women, affording them difficulties to surmount or retreats to enjoy. The prying and poking into the details of clouds, brooks, hill-sides, weeds, insects—the botanical, anatomical, and physiological poetry of Wordsworth and his successors, where everything inanimate thinks and feels, and only man is dumb while celandines and beetles talk—would be far too profound for such a simple, untrained soul as the author of the "Orlando Furioso." A primrose by the river's brim a yellow primrose would have been to him—and, candidly, is it anything more?

This simply shows how many leagues of thought separate the writer and our loved English poet of Nature. It would be hopeless, of course, to argue with anybody who can seriously put that last question—"Is it anything more?" However, such a sudden access of innocent cynicism does not prevent Professor Everett from being an exceedingly good companion through the poesy of his chosen country. His brief biographies of Tasso, Alfieri, and many others are well written, and the translations, as far as we have been able to ascertain, express the originals excellently. For many readers the chapter on Petrarch and his wonderful sonnets will be the most interesting portion of the book; but the whole course of the essays presents a very luminous exposition of the progress—with periods of degeneracy—of Italian poetry from the time of Dante to that of Manzoni, who died as recently as the year 1873.

The Discovery of the Book of the Law. By Professor EDOUARD NAVILLE. Translated by M. L. MCCLURE. With an Introduction by PROFESSOR SAYCE. (S.P.C.K. 1s. 6d.)

THE talented author of this clever monograph very justly claims that the development of archæological research is gradually throwing an entirely new light upon Biblical criticism, which must tend to alter the theories which have been so elaborately built on merely textual criticism. For example, "the discovery of the Tel-el-Amarna Tablets and of the Code of Khammurabi has shown how profoundly erroneous it was to call post-Exilic everything that bore a Babylonian character, especially in legislation." Professor Naville advances an entirely novel and remarkable theory concerning the discovery of the Law under King Josiah mentioned in 2 Kings xxii., a theory which, if upheld, would quite upset the conclusions of the most eminent modern critics, Maspero, Cheyne, Driver, and others.

Starting from the analogy of Egyptian custom by which certain famous chapters of the Book of the Dead were buried in the foundations of the temples, Professor Naville concludes that the Book of the Law, part of Deuteronomy, was concealed in the walls or foundations of the Temple of Solomon, circa 1000 B.C., and that this MS. was the book found by Hilkiah when workmen were carrying out repairs in the reign of Josiah, 623 B.C. Hitherto most critics have assigned the Book Deuteronomy to this seventh century B.C. regarding this very chapter of 2 Kings as the key to the whole problem. Some, indeed, have gone so far as to say that Deuteronomy is a forgery, of which Hilkiah, for his own ends, was the author. It is to be noted that, according to the account in 2 Kings, Hilkiah himself was unable to read the document discovery. This astonishing fact is accounted for by Professor Naville by a most interesting theory, that the MS. was written in cuneiform characters. He brings forward a number of reasons deduced from archæological research, that the "most ancient books of the Hebrews" were originally written, not in Hebrew, but in Babylonian cuneiform. This view opens out a very wide field of inquiry, and one result would be a considerable modification of the present theories and late dates of "established" Biblical criticism. At the same time, it must be admitted that Professor Naville's ingenious theory as to the Book of the Law overlooks the fact that the later part of the Book of Deuteronomy deals with abuses which crept in for the most part during the centuries immediately following the reign of Solomon, unless his view is accepted that this code of laws existed in only one copy, and was lost and buried for four hundred years. Even then many difficulties of internal evidence remain.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Life and Habit. By Samuel Butler. With Author's Addenda. (A. C. Fifield. 5s. net.)

Between the formidable tomes which deal in recondite language with the themes of heredity, evolution, memory, personality, and similar problems of the scientist and psychologist, and the popular primers which seek to introduce the inquisitive mind of youth to these tremendous subjects in a manner more or less genial, a great gulf was at one time fixed. Of late years, however, men have written in a style which is lucid without being childish, simple without conceding too much to the disabilities of the busy reader; and among these we may place the name of Samuel Butler. It has always seemed to us a matter for regret that Butler's works are so neglected by the young people of the present generation, for no author precisely takes his position in the world of thought, and few who deal with parallel subjects can be read with so much pleasure. How many persons, we wonder, who pride themselves upon the extent and versatility of their reading have experienced the charm of "Erewhon," or pondered the irony and wisdom of that penetrating novel "The Way of All Flesh"?

The present new edition of "Life and Habit," therefore, we are glad to see, since it will probably gain for this philosopher of thirty years ago a fresh circle of readers. A great part of Butler's fascination arises from his unequalled power of metaphor and illustration, as when, discussing the mystery of life, he imagines some supernatural being who needs a microscope to perceive the inhabitants of the earth and to learn their ways. "He would put Covent Garden Market on the field of his microscope, and would perhaps write a great deal of nonsense about the unerring 'instinct' which taught each costermonger to recognise his own basket or his own donkey-cart." This gives the reader a little shiver of appreciation as to what may be happening when he examines a colony of lively animalculæ beneath his own powerful lenses. There is no need to review Butler at this time of day; some of his opinions need qualifying, and many of the questions which he treated have had fresh light thrown upon them by subsequent discoveries, but his work is always eminently readable because of his extremely individual method of dealing with intricate matters which are usually somewhat above the head of the ordinary well-educated man. We wish this excellent reissue all the success it deserves.

Golfing Curios and "The Like." By Harry B. Wood. (Sherratt and Hughes. 7s. 6d. net.)

Considering the wonderful popularity of golf at the present day, and the enormous numbers of its devotees all over the world, the literature of the game is by no means large. Old records are scarce, modern publications deal chiefly with hints on the game and the laying-out of golf-courses and suchlike subjects; but in the interesting publication before us we find something quite new that should appeal to every enthusiast, for it deals very thoroughly with the history and the development of golf. The author has evidently formed a most interesting collection of curios connected with the game from very early days, both in the way of implements and literature, and, with this rich fund of material to work upon he has evolved a really valuable contribution to the modern literature of the golfer.

A review of the immense variety of clubs and their development is equally interesting, and from the praise that the old makers received—makers of clubs whose names have been handed down to the present generation—it is evident that the old players worshipped their favourite clubs in just the same way as the modern enthusiast. It is interesting to note the names of clubs that have fallen into disuse—notably the "track-iron," which was evidently the forerunner of the niblick. It was a weighty and somewhat unwieldy implement with a small face, specially designed to extricate balls from cart-ruts and tracks, for the links in those days were on the more open ways where vehicles possessed a right to pass. The chapters and plates that deal with games very akin to golf that were played in Holland and France open out quite a field of speculation as to the origin of golf, for the rules in force and some of the technical terms used, evidently as far back as the very early part of the seventeenth century, suggest a common inception. There are two reproductions of Jan Steen, 1626-1679, "The Eve of St. Nicholas," in which golf-clubs play a part, and there is a delightful plate of a "Young Dutch Golfer of the Seventeenth Century." "Kolf" and "Het Kolfen," as it was played in Holland, and "Jeu de Mail," as the game was called in France as early as 1717, certainly differed from our modern game, but the similarities are wonderful to note. The instructions for "Jeu de Mail," published in 1717, contain much that would apply to the modern player of golf, and the following extract is worthy of attention by many a player of the present day:—"We do not like to see people standing in public with vest, jerkin, or wig. It is quite easy to be lightly dressed without wearing motley or odd costumes in ill-matched materials."

This interesting publication finishes up with a Bibliography of Golf that makes it well worth while, on that account alone, to add the volume to one's library.

A Manual of Occultism. By "Sepharial." (William Rider and Son. 6s. net.)

It would not be wise for any nervous person to read this book too attentively, even in broad daylight, for it has produced quite a few shivers in the soul of at least one reviewer. What with references to the "astral" life, the "sidereal" man, visions, dreams, and their interpretations, the uncanny art of crystal-gazing and the science of divination, the accomplished writer succeeded in giving us a dose of the "creeps" that made us desire fervently the dawn, in order that all morbid fancies might be blown from us by the nearest approach to "a wind on the heath" that was obtainable near London. Almost every department of the secret arts is touched upon in this manual, and, for those who are interested in such things and have the time to study them, it is a mine of information. Whether it is worth while to endeavour to pierce the mysteries which surround us by the methods of astrology and kindred means is questionable; the labour of drawing up a correct horoscope would seem to be rather a formidable affair, and in any case the astrologists leave themselves so many loopholes for escape if the "indications" fail to come true that we should prefer some more definite form of prophecy than the arrangement of the planets.

Palmistry and "fortune-telling" by cards, talismans, the magical properties of numbers, psychometry—all these subjects are dealt with seriously by the author, and many others which we have not space to mention. The average man has no time to spare for investigating these things, but he may well be astonished, should he chance to read this thick treatise, at the amount of material that can be accumulated regarding matters which are in the nature of a sealed universe to him. Whether he will try his fate with the next pack of cards he comes across, or will look up the hour of his birth and seek to know his prospects, or examine his hands to discover that he ought to have died some years ago, is an open question. At any rate he cannot fail to be interested, although he may possibly become so scared that he will consult the configuration of the planets before he dares to cross the street. If so, he has our deepest sympathy, for we shuddered for an hour over the awful idea of going to bed.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

A Vagabond in the Caucasus. By STEPHEN GRAHAM. (John Lane. 12s. 6d. net.)

THERE is something attractive about a man who can write in the prologue to his book of travels that Thomas Carlyle, "who died three years before I was born, was a friend closer to me than a lover, one to whom I longed to say caressing words, one whom I longed to embrace and fondle—to kiss even," and we think that most readers by the time they have finished "A Vagabond in the Caucasus" will be even more interested in the author's personality than in the Caucasus. Mr. Graham writes with the intimate personal touch that gives distinction to Stevenson's "Travels with a Donkey" and Mr. Belloc's "Path to Rome," and with an experience of many books of travel, we believe that this is a rarer gift than that of picturesque description. Moreover, Mr. Graham's adventures among the snows and wild flowers, and the "many hundred tribes" of the Caucasus are interesting enough in themselves. We like his meeting with a wild Ossetine, a man who could not understand any sentence in which the word wine did not occur, who started by lending him a mount and ended by shooting at him with a revolver. We like, too, the account of his arrest as a spy, and of his being waylaid by four roughs. There is an agreeable kind of vanity in his description of these things—as if, doubting his own courage, he was pleased to find himself doing courageous things. Best of all we like the girl who threw a handful of confetti in his face on Easter Day, though we blame Mr. Graham for not ending his chapter then and there. There are some little mistakes that might be corrected in the next edition. A line has been dropped in quoting one of the most famous of Mr. Gilbert's songs; Dorando's Marathon Race finished at Shepherd's Bush and not at Earl's Court, and on page 135 the sun is made to rise fairly and squarely in the west.

How to Write a Novel. (The De La More Press. 3s. 6d.)

"IF he liked," said Mr. Thomas Hardy, "a man could go on writing till his physical strength gave out." Sincerely thankful must the reviewer be that most men are too busy about other affairs to test the truth of this statement, but there are some who feel the need of expressing themselves or their experiences by the medium of fiction, and to these the instructions contained in this handy little book will be very useful. We may say frankly that it seems to us a superfluous task to tell a man how to write a novel—in the sense that it is impossible to give a man the power to compose poetry by imparting the technical details of the work. Nevertheless the output of wretched fiction—wretched in grammar, style, and plot—has become so great that any attempt to set inexperienced writers on the right track is to be welcomed.

The author of this text-book gives much information gathered from many sources—from successful novelists both living and dead—and the advice which he adds on his own account is nearly always good, though in some instances it is so obvious that it seems unnecessary, as when he says: "Perhaps your novel will take the reader into aristocratic circles. Pray do not make the attempt if you are not thoroughly acquainted with the manners and customs of such circles." The chapter entitled "How to Begin" is excellent, as also is the section on "Pitfalls." But after reading the volume through we remain firm in our belief that no amount of instruction and information will make a good novelist. If a man must write he will, and if his impulse is so strong as to prove irresistible he will probably write well. "Out of the fulness of the heart the mouth speaketh," and it is the same with the pen; inspired by the full heart, the story that must be told, its sentences will reach the reader more surely than any that have been shaped by the careful coaching of a school.

The Markhor: Sport in Cashmere. By COUNT HANS VON KOENIGSMARCK. Translated from the German by NORAH BASHFORD. (Kegan Paul and Co.)

A MARKHOR'S horns are a testamur of sportsmanship, as an undergraduate's oar, or bat, or racquet, is of his athletic prowess. The creature is scarce and difficult to find; he lives at great heights, accessible only by arduous climbing, in certain ranges of mountains in Cashmere and Baluchistan: he may be viewed through a telescope across a deep ravine, but he has vanished before he can be brought within range! Cold and severe camping, perhaps without tents, must be borne patiently by the candidate for the trophy, who may have to run considerable risks. The Capra Falconeri megaceros is the king of the mountain-goats, called by the author the Indian Zlatarog. There are at least four varieties of markhor known to naturalists; in some of them the horns spread out, curling widely; in others they stand up straighter; the largest specimens run to near four feet in length. The joy of the author is delightful, when he had satisfied his ambition by shooting a markhor and looks "in respectful silence at his beautiful horns, his splendid beard, and his strongly-built body in its rough silvery coat." The little book, translated from the German by a lady, is full of enthusiasm for sport, and of a general cheeriness which stamps the author as a genial sportsman and companion. He is a Major on the German General Staff, who has visited Cashmere for sport more than once and evidently made himself welcome. There is no pretence about the book; it is a bright, short narrative of a shooting expedition, which the reader cannot help enjoying.

The Artistic Side of Photography in Theory and Practice. By A. J. ANDERSON. (Stanley Paul & Co. 12s. 6d. net.)

THAT photography has an artistic side is sufficiently proved by the beautiful reproductions from photographs which illustrate this book. There are still, of course, considerable differences of opinion among artists, and a good deal of opposition—especially from miniaturists and illustrators, who have suffered most from the introduction of the camera—to the right of photography to be regarded as one of the fine arts. Mr. Anderson, who is an expert on the subject of photography, has written a valuable defence of its claim to be so regarded. If his enthusiasm in matters of theory sometimes carries him rather far afield it is because he is conscious of a good deal of misunderstanding, not only among artists and the general public, but also among photographers themselves. Much photographic work is, artistically, a failure, because, like the embroiderers who tried to imitate oil-paintings in silk, the photographers do not grasp the great essential of all real art—that it must keep strictly within the limits of the medium employed. It is a book which can be read with interest even by those who know little of the technicalities of photography, and to the student it should be valuable.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Memories of Eighty Years. By JOHN BEDDOE, M.D., LL.D., F.R.S. (Arrowsmith. 7s. 6d. net.)

DR. BEDDOE has led a life replete with interest and quiet adventure, and he has written a charming book about it. To the reader with an imagination this would be a sufficient notice to induce him to read the book, and we feel that in recounting the bare facts of Dr. Beddoe's life we are doing him an injustice, so much of the charm of his tale lying in the manner of the telling of it. He has seen Wordsworth, corresponded with Darwin, climbed mountains and laboured at archæology and anthropology with passionate enthusiasm. He went, as a member of the civil medical staff, to the Crimean War, and studied the country and its inhabitants. He has visited France, Ireland, Holland, Germany, Austria, Hungary, Italy, and Queensland, and, unlike the majority of travellers, he has always come back wiser than he went. But for us his main achievement lies in the book before us, which tells the story of a useful life with taste, modesty, and humour.

FICTION

PHILOSOPHER OR NOVELIST?

The New Machiavelli. By H. G. WELLS. (John Lane. 6s.)

THE novelist who is interested in great problems of the day, and who is at the same time a close and logical thinker, evolves for himself in due course a more or less comprehensible philosophy; he has, that is to say, his own ideas as to the correction of faults, the organisation of diffused interests, the solution of baffling difficulties. As a rule we can admire him, whether we agree with him or not, for the energy of his work tends to prove the urgency of his convictions. Mr. Wells, in this story of the tragic downfall of a fine character, may be taken as the latest exemplification of our words. The bigger the problem, the more eagerly he attacks it, and if his lance is sometimes broken, what matters it?—we are left gasping at his courage, and perplexed as to what he will be at next; yet all the time we are conscious that he is no haphazard Quixote tilting at windmills. He is, rather, in deadly earnest, and out of his innumerable blows upon the present state of education, of political life, of social life, many are bound to hit their mark and to leave our ears ringing.

We glimpse Mr. Wells's creed in a passage at the very beginning of this lengthy book—he stands for progress:—

> The things that might be done to-day! The things indeed that are being done! It is the latter that give one so vast a sense of the former. When I think of the progress of physical and mechanical science, of medicine and sanitation during the last century, when I measure the increase in general education and average efficiency, the power now available for human service, the merely physical increment, and compare it with anything that has ever been at man's disposal before, and when I think of what a little straggling, incidental, undisciplined, and uncoördinated minority of inventors, experimenters, educators, writers, and organisers has achieved this development of human possibilities, achieved it in spite of the disregard and aimlessness of the huge majority, and the passionate resistance of the active dull, my imagination grows giddy with dazzling intimations of the human splendours the justly organised state may yet attain. I glimpse for a bewildering instant the heights that may be scaled, the splendid enterprises made possible.

The Socialism with which Mr. Wells began is gradually changing, we fancy, to an outlook very different from that affected by the people who call themselves "Socialists" to-day, changing, it is pleasant to note, to a more reasonable, less narrow, more catholic frame of mind. The picture of things as they are is still chaotic, but traces of a design and ultimate clearness are emerging, relationships between apparently antagonistic patterns are being discovered, and the author is impelled to put forth his views in various ways that other men may be roused to see with him and to contemplate the tiny symptoms of order and unity which he strives to perceive ever more distinctly. "Muddle," says Remington, the hero of this novel, "is the enemy." In his youth he was a Socialist "because individualism meant muddle, meant a crowd of separated, undisciplined little people all obstinately and ignorantly doing things jarringly, each one in his own way." Life taught him the value of the individual, and the story of his gradual secession to the Conservative side is one of the most illuminating studies of character that Mr. Wells has given us.

In the methodical, detailed, patient manner of "Tono-Bungay," the hero is introduced as a boy living at the easily identified "Bromstead" in Kent; and as a youngster his dreams are of "states and cities and political things." The second and third chapters are almost uncanny in their knowledge of boyish thoughts and immature aspirations. With "Adolescence" we reach the first glimpse of the possibilities of love and passion in the young man; but not until very much later does he find out what love is. The career of the budding politician is traced in the utmost detail, but with such skill and subtlety that it never becomes wearisome. The Baileys, for instance—a couple devoted to the statistical side of political work—are drawn so thoroughly that they seem to live; we have met them, talked with them, laughed at them. She, Altiora of the "bony soul," met Bailey in the pages of a review:—

> The lurking woman in her nature was fascinated by the ease and precision with which the little man rolled over all sorts of important people; she was the first to discover a sort of imaginative bigness in his still growing mind. . . . She took occasion to meet and subjugate him, and, so soon as he had sufficiently recovered from his abject humility and a certain panic at her attentions, marry him. . . . She saw in a flash her opportunity to redeem his defects, use his powers, and do rather large, novel, startling things. She ran him.

She also, to some extent, "ran" Remington, for she artfully managed his marriage with the calm, worshipping, too unexciting Margaret, who was to help his career so splendidly, and to be cast aside so cruelly for the woman who came between. And here comes the crucial part of the story.

Remington's girl-friend Isabel works for him at an Election, writes for his "Blue Review," brings her brilliant, restless mind to bear on questions of the day in a manner that inevitably arouses Remington's sympathy and admiration. After a time they discover that love, an uncalled-for, unsuspected third, has entered unperceived into their deliberations. They resist, without avail. They discuss the matter from every conceivable point of view—the tragic position of Margaret, the terrible wreck of a career which might reach the high places of Government, supposing their secret were laid bare; but, after a tremendous effort to part, they give up the endeavour. Then comes the dreaded exposure, and Remington, to save the shame of the news reaching his wife from outside sources, tells her of his fall. The end comes with Isabel and Remington, miserable enough now that the climax of their resolution has come, departing for the Continent. Up to this point our sympathies have been with the much-worried Remington; but right here we are bound to say that his behaviour is anything but manly; it is, in fact, caddish and contemptible. Such a finish may be the logical working out of an unstable, gifted, emotional character, but we cannot help thinking that the author errs in deliberately closing on so unfortunate a note. The cleverest of arguments are used—the tale is told in the first person—but they amount, we fear, to sophistries; if such an infatuation is "love" (we take the liberty to doubt it) even in its most permanent form, it could lead to nothing but misery for the two who were centred in themselves to the exclusion of all considerations of happiness for others. Mr. Wells has a peculiarly deplorable knack of spoiling books which are otherwise nothing less than masterpieces by some such distortion of his story.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Comments have been made to the effect that many of the characters in this novel have well-known originals. It is not an essential matter whether this or that person has his prototype, whether on one page we seem to recognise Mr. Hubert Bland, on another a portrait of Mr. Balfour, although these speculations doubtless add extremely to the interest of the book. What does matter is that Mr. Wells has written a remarkably fine novel—always bearing in mind the reservations just made. There are detached phrases that might have come straight from the pen of Mr. Henry James, such as "the bleak lucidities of sleepless nights," or "interests and fine affections and indolences." In one portion of the book we were startled with the resemblance to Mr. Arnold Bennett's method of piling up details of observation in "Clayhanger," and when we found the scene suddenly changed for awhile to the "Five Towns" we took another glance at the title-page to make sure of our author. The passages in which some of the characters criticise present-day Liberalism and Radicalism are excellent, and in this respect especially we can praise the keenness of Mr. Wells' insight.

What will the philosopher-novelist (for such we must in the end term him) come to if he goes on in this rather alarming and exciting fashion? If we cannot answer that question satisfactorily, we may at any rate speak of him the words he uses concerning one of his most happily conceived actors, the amiable Willersley—"He goes on, anyhow; most men don't." But we do earnestly pray Mr. Wells not to omit that comma in his future work.

THE TRAGEDY OF DESTINY

Crown, Coronet and Clover. By CAROLINE CORNER. (Greening and Co. 6s.)

"BY apt alliteration's artful aid" the Austrian Alpine patrician and peasant life is set forth in an interesting if disconnected manner in Caroline Corner's "Crown, Coronet and Clover." The plot is somewhat reminiscent of Anthony Hope, although treated in quite another manner and related in a very different language, the latter being sadly faulty at times. A certain Prince Carl, the Heir-Presumptive to some petty German State, falls in love with Sadie, a Slav peasant-girl, and after various happenings he marries her morganatically. A few short months of wedded bliss pass by, and then Prince Carl, for reasons of State, deserts his young bride and espouses a cousin, the Princess Amelia. This second matrimonial venture proves a failure, the union is a childless one, and it is not long before Prince Carl turns his thoughts again to Sadie, with whom he had been so happy. She, however, rejects all his advances. In the meantime she has borne him a son, and he would fain make the infant his heir with the consent of the Princess his wife, but Sadie refuses to part with her child, and as she is eventually discovered to be a Russian Princess, heiress to vast estates, she is able to have her own way in the matter. For the tragic climax the reader should go to the book itself.

Most of the characters are cleverly drawn, but the story rather overflows with the stereotyped outbursts of a Yankee millionaire, Marmaduke J. Dakins, and his daughter Josie—"'Poppa, they're all ascare!' 'Any throat-scrapers going?'" and so on ad nauseam. Other characters include an Austrian Prince and Princess and some members of the English aristocracy. One of the latter, Lord Carisbrooke, is an artist, and he paints the peasant girl's picture. It is a remarkable picture, and is supposed to lead in some mysterious way to a great deal of the tragedy narrated. It is called "Destiny," and depicts "a girl in Carniolan peasant costume standing against the copper wall whereon the bloody Crusades were depicted in life-like relief. And the last red gleam of the setting sun shining on that coppery battlefield cast a gory reflection athwart the fair face of that girl." It is a pity that the authoress should have such a partiality for gore, which she spills with a lavish hand over no small number of the three hundred and odd pages preceding the tragedy of destiny. The picture, the clover, the sunset are all stained with blood, though none has been shed, and "fire like hell" generally accompanies it. A little of the occult is introduced—"It was as though the astral of that ancient stronghold beckoned to this peasant girl;" but, as the Schloss was "darker than the darkness"—a gem in the way of description—it is probable that Sadie would not have noticed it had the "astral" really done so. In spite of defects of style, made worse by several printer's errors, "Crown, Coronet and Clover" will no doubt please those who are fond of melodrama—and gory sunsets, &c.

Martin the Mummer. By DOROTHY MARGARET STUART. (Constable and Co. 6s.)

LOVERS of the history of the age of Chivalry and the Tournament times of 1450 and thenceforward, when Philip of Burgundy was a power to be reckoned with in the Low Countries, will enjoy this book.

England, France, and Spain were all plotting and scheming as to whom should be chosen to wed the beautiful Doña Isabella de Coimbra, then living at the Court of her uncle, Duke Philip, and the tale opens with one Sir Aylmer Willoughby, the English Envoy, mistaking a wandering mummer (but of noble birth, and a most marvellous mummer withal) for the son of Duke Richard of England in disguise How it falls out that the said Martin fills the place at the Court of Burgundy of the English Envoy and spends English money in a lavish fashion (including wax-candles, then an almost unheard-of luxury) on himself and his surroundings, one must read the book to know. Suffice it to say that he well discharges his duties—not easy ones—of watching England's interests and frustrating schemes inimical to them. He is equally successful in holding his own in the plots and counter-plots in the Court, the chase and the tournament, but loses his heart in the doing of it, and, unfortunately for his peace of mind, can only play the part which Miles Standish played later.

His own love-sick state is best described by a stanza from a song he sings at the Court:—

> Can love die! I thought him dead.
> Lo! a flame springs from the bier,
> Death and time are vanquishèd,
> Love on sorrow deep hath fed.
> But he lives unconquerèd,
> Here in my heart here.

Our mummer does many kind and knightly actions, saves the life of one Peter Stalkin (a merry friar), gives generously to a convent of Poor Clares, and is rewarded by a wooden cross, which serves him in trouble. Finally he goes through unspeakable tortures at the hands of his vicious enemy, a Spaniard (aided by a money-lending Moor), to save the lady of his dreams. All this material, woven into a brilliant mediæval tapestry of life as it then was, makes the story a very interesting one, and we leave Martin the Mummer, having laid down his falsely-assumed position, hastening away in his original garb to escape the sound of the betrothal bells, which ended all his hopes, to embark on a career which perhaps may make "another story." The illustrations are appropriate and vigorous.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

A Dual Resurrection. By BERTRAM MITFORD. (Ward, Lock and Co. 6s.)

AFTER reading the first nine or ten chapters of Mr. Mitford's new book, we thought ourselves embarked upon a dull task. Mr. Mitford is not successful in dealing with the English countryside; no doubt the wider spaces and fiercer colours of South Africa have spoiled him for its subtleties. His "noble, arching oaks and the green velvet of fragrant fields," and many such phrases, do not suggest the real thing, and the people he puts amid his artificially described scenes are dull with the dullness which only a fine humorist could make interesting. Paul Ingatrew, the young story-writer, is one of the most feeble characters we have ever met in a readable book; nor does his sister, the heroine, with her "long, artistic fingers," charm us as she charms Halfont, the carefully drawn but colourless hero. Halfont's father is pathetic at times, in his old age saddened by early struggles little relieved by opulence that came too late, and by estrangement from his children. But we wish Mr. Mitford would leave his pipe alone; smoking is very much over-chronicled in modern fiction. Halfont's two sisters are very cut-and-dried types of the learned and the religious young lady respectively. All things considered, we were very glad when the bad reputation of Halfont's double came home to settle on him and drive him away from Agnes Ingatrew to South Africa. This event ought to have occurred much sooner. In Africa Mr. Mitford is on firm ground. He knows the veldt and its people thoroughly, and his Colonials and his Zulus, especially the Zulus, leave little to be desired. Harvey Harland, gun-runner, liquor-smuggler, general "rip," and exact double of the hero, is the best character in the book. All that part of the story which treats of the Zulu rebellion is excellently done, and we wish there had been more. It was disappointing to be snatched away from the thick of it and brought back to Mr. Mitford's lifeless version of English middle-class rural life.

Fancy Farm. By NEIL MUNRO. (Blackwood and Sons. 6s.)

FOR the first few chapters of this book we retained our hope that, in spite of an unpromising beginning, it would presently prove to possess something of that humorous charm that pleased us in "Daft Days." Then we realised our mistake, and set ourselves manfully to accomplish our tedious task of reading it through. There is a Captain Cutlass in it, a person of shadowy eccentricities; there is a girl called Penelope, an ill-bred prig who seems to have read Bernard Shaw without understanding; there is also another girl called Norah—she is the one tolerable character in the book. There is too a poet, another of those novelist-poets of whom we are utterly weary. There is a storm and a broken ankle, and a conflagration in the heroine's bedroom. The volume is, we believe, what is known as a "pawky" book; it is also a very foolish book, quite unworthy of its author. Mr. J. M. Barrie is responsible for a good deal of really bad fiction; as in the case of Dickens, his imitators appear to find it easier to imitate his faults than to reproduce his merits. We hope that after this Mr. Neil Munro will return to his earlier manner.

The Handicap. By ROBERT E. KNOWLES. (Oliphant, Anderson, and Ferrier. 6s.)

IF this book had been a first novel we should have said that its author gave great promise of becoming a pure and earnest writer. But as Mr. Knowles has already given the world half a dozen books, we cannot speak so highly of him. It is quite time he became somewhat more alive to the complexities of human nature; that he learned, for instance, to make his good people a little less like the heroes and heroines of parish magazine stories. "The Handicap" deals with life in a Canadian frontier town, and deals with it in a way which is more likely to appeal to schoolgirls and soft-hearted old ladies than to men and women who are awake to the realities of life. The story contains a profusion of rather mawkish sentiment, and also a good deal of humour, both the Irish and the Scotch varieties, which, though not always of the best, is much better than the sentiment. Mr. Knowles is a writer of the very best intentions, and we cannot deny to him a certain grace and simplicity of style which lead us to think that, if he in time grows more sophisticated, he may yet write a good book.

A Gentleman of Leisure. By P. G. WODEHOUSE. (Alston Rivers. 6s.)

THE hero of this entertaining story is a rich young man who wagers that he will make a burglarious entry into a house in New York. The house he chooses, aided by a real burglar, proves to be that of a prominent police official, a successful dealer in "graft" and the father of a beautiful girl with whom our hero has previously fallen in love. We do not propose to give away any more of Mr. Wodehouse's agreeably extravagant plot, but will content ourselves with remarking that he has succeeded in writing an extremely amusing book. The inconsequent wit of the hero is to our liking, and we have derived real enjoyment from his fellow-criminal Spike, who speaks that exotic language, slang-American, with fluency and precision. Mr. Wodehouse dedicates his book to a friend, "without whose never-failing advice, help, and encouragement this book would have been finished in half the time." We commend "A Gentleman of Leisure" to all those who like light-hearted fiction.

BOOKS OF REFERENCE.

Hazell's Annual. (Hazell, Watson, and Viney. 3s. 6d. net.)

The Literary Year-book. (Routledge. 6s. net.)

A Modern Dictionary of the English Language. (Macmillan and Co. 1s. 4d. net.)

Stormonth's Handy Dictionary. (Blackwood and Sons. 7d. net.)

Guide to Palestine and Syria. (Macmillan and Co. 5s. net.)

Historical Atlas. (W. and A. K. Johnston. 1s. 6d. net.)

OWING to the General Election taking place during the latter part of last year, the publication of MESSRS. HAZELL'S ANNUAL has been somewhat delayed, but, at all events, the delay is amply justified, for the present edition includes a biographical list of the members of the new House of Commons, details of the pollings, and comparative tables showing the changes in representation. There is also a chapter devoted to "The Crisis of 1910," which contains summaries of the most important speeches and resolutions made during the past year. Such affairs of note as the Referendum, the Veto Bill, and the Conference are set forth in a concise and impartial manner, and must prove of great assistance to the busy politician and leader-writer. The successive editions of this annual furnish a most useful and invaluable encyclopædic view of British and foreign politics, diplomatic information, geography, and history. There are also chapters dealing with the Church, Education, Insurance, Sport, Art, Music, the Drama, and Finance, as well as special articles on Engineering Schemes and Aeronautics. Altogether we think that we can safely say that Messrs. Hazell's Annual is, as always, one of the best and most complete books of reference published.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

THE LITERARY YEAR-BOOK for 1911 is, as usual, divided into two parts, the first dealing more particularly with authors, literary and press agents, translators and indexes; while the second half is taken up with town and country booksellers, libraries, publishers, societies, and literary clubs. It cannot, of course, be expected that the portion relating to authors should be treated at the same length as we find it in that famous guide, "Who's Who," but sufficient space is allotted to each name mentioned to enable any one to trace the works of a particular author. Some very useful information is also contained under the heading of "Pen-Names and Pseudonyms," where we are supplied with the real names of writers who prefer to attach a nom de plume to their effusions. Many additions have been made to the list of Indian periodicals and a separate list of Canadian publications is given. We have heard complaints from one or two sources to the effect that some of the details with reference to the authors' section are not quite accurate, but as Mr. Basil Stewart, on page 9, invites all and sundry to assist him in getting together his information, we do not think that the editor is to blame if some slight errors should have crept into this otherwise excellent and well-arranged volume.

A remarkably cheap Dictionary is that issued by Messrs. Macmillan for the modest price of 1s. 4d., which claims to be "specially suitable for the use of pupils in secondary schools and the upper classes of elementary schools," and which contains in the body of the book the prefixes, abbreviations, and foreign words and phrases usually found in separate Appendices at the end. We also have an enlarged edition of STORMONTH'S SCHOOL DICTIONARY, which is perhaps best described by the term "handy" on the title-page.

For the fifth time we have before us a GUIDE TO PALESTINE AND SYRIA, which has been carefully revised from that issued two years previously. Many developments have taken place in these much-desired and entrancing countries. Two new railways have been opened for traffic which will considerably increase the facility of travelling to and in the Holy Land: many new roads are being made, and we understand that Fast's Hotel in Jerusalem is now lighted by electricity. There are thirteen maps and six plans, and although at first sight it might appear that the book was small when compared with the price charged, a further glance would be sufficient to convince any one that such a mass of information as is contained in so small a compass could not have been collected without great research and considerable expense.

A compact little Atlas is that supplied by Messrs. Johnston under the name of HISTORICAL ATLAS, which must prove a most useful guide to students of history; besides forty-four maps representing the different countries and districts of the world at various periods in their history—such, for instance, as Prussia and Austria during the Seven Years' War—there is also a chronological table of national history, as well as a chapter devoted to Historical Notes.

THE DAY BEFORE YESTERDAY

I.—AN ENCHANTED PLACE

WHEN elder brothers insisted on their rights with undue harshness, or when the grown-up people descended from Olympus with a tiresome tale of broken furniture and torn clothes, the groundlings of the schoolroom went into retreat. In summer-time this was an easy matter; once fairly escaped into the garden, any climbable tree or shady shrub provided us with a hermitage. There was a hollow tree-stump full of exciting insects and pleasant earthy smells that never failed us, or, for wet days, the tool-shed with its armoury of weapons with which, in imagination, we would repel the attacks of hostile forces. But in the game that was our childhood, the garden was out of bounds in winter-time, and we had to seek other lairs. Behind the schoolroom piano there was a three-cornered refuge that served very well for momentary sulks or sudden alarms. It was possible to lie in ambush there, at peace with our grievances, until life took a turn for the better and tempted us forth again into the active world.

But when the hour was tragic and we felt the need for a hiding-place more remote, we took our troubles, not without a recurring thrill, to that enchanted place which our elders called contemptuously the "mouse-cupboard." This was a low cupboard that ran the whole length of the big attic under the slope of the roof, and here the aggrieved spirit of childhood could find solitude and darkness in which to scheme deeds of revenge and actions of a wonderful magnanimity turn by turn. Luckily our shelter did not appeal to the utilitarian minds of the grown-up folk or to those members of the younger generation who were beginning to trouble about their clothes. You had to enter it on your hands and knees; it was dusty, and the mice obstinately disputed our possession. On the inner wall the plaster seemed to be oozing between the rough laths, and through little chinks and crannies in the tiles overhead our eyes could see the sky. But our imaginations soon altered these trivial blemishes. As a cave the mouse-cupboard had a very interesting history. As soon as the smugglers had left it, it passed successively through the hands of Aladdin, Robinson Crusoe, Ben Gunn, and Tom Sawyer, and gave satisfaction to them all, and it would no doubt have had many other tenants if some one had not discovered that it was like the cabin of a ship. From that hour its position in our world was assured.

For sooner or later our dreams always returned to the sea, not, be it said, to the polite and civilised sea of the summer holidays, but to that sea on whose foam there open magic casements, and by whose crimson tide the ships of Captain Avery and Captain Bartholomew Roberts keep faithful tryst with the Flying Dutchman. It needed no very solid vessel to carry our hearts to those enchanted waters—a paper boat floating in a saucer served well enough if the wind was propitious—so the fact that our cabin lacked portholes and was of an unusual shape did not trouble us. We could hear the water bubbling against the ship's side in a neighbouring cistern, and often enough the wind moaned and whistled overhead. We had our lockers, our sleeping-berths, and our cabin-table, and at one end of the cabin was hung a rusty old cutlass full of notches; we would have hated any one who had sought to disturb our illusion that these notches had been made in battle. When we were stowaways even the mice were of service to us, for we gave them a full roving commission as savage rats, and trembled when we heard them scampering among the cargo.

But though we cut the figure of an old Admiral out of a Christmas number, and chased slavers with Kingston very happily for a while, the vessel did not really come into her own until we turned pirates and hoisted the "Jolly Roger" off the coast of Malabar. Then, by the light of guttering candles, the mice witnessed some strange sights. If any of us had any money we would carouse terribly, drinking ginger-beer like water, and afterwards water out of the ginger-beer bottles, which still retained a faint magic. Jam has been eaten without bread on board the Black Margaret, and when we fell across a merchantman laden with a valuable consignment of dried apple-rings—tough fare but interesting—and the savoury sugar out of candied peel, there were boisterous times in her dim cabin. We would sing what we imagined to be sea chanties in a doleful voice, and prepare our boarding-pikes for the next adventure, though we had no clear idea what they really were.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

And when we grew weary of draining rum-kegs and counting the pieces of eight, our life at sea knew quieter though no less enjoyable hours. It was pleasant to lie still after the fever of battle and watch the flickering candles with drowsy eyes. Surely the last word has not been said on the charm of candle-light; we liked little candles—dumpy sixteens they were perhaps—and as we lay they would spread among us their attendant shadows. Beneath us the water chuckled restlessly, and sometimes we heard the feet of the watch on deck overhead, and now and again the clanging of the great bell. In such an hour it was not difficult to picture the luminous tropic seas though which the Black Margaret was making her way. The skies of irradiant stars, the desert islands like baskets of glowing flowers, and the thousand marvels of the enchanted ocean—we saw them one and all.

It was strange to leave this place of shadows and silences and hour-long dreams to play a humble part in a noisy, gas-lit world that had not known these wonders; but there were consolations. Elder brothers might prevail in argument by methods that seemed unfair, but, beneath a baffled exterior, we could conceal a sublime pity for their unadventurous lives. Governesses might criticise our dusty clothes with wearisome eloquence, but the recollection that women were not allowed on board the Black Margaret helped us to remain conventionally polite. Like the gentleman in Mr. Wells' story, we knew that there were better dreams, and the knowledge raised us for a while above the trivial passions of our environment.

We were not the only children who had found the mouse-cupboard a place of enchantment, for when we explored it first we discovered a handful of wooden beads carefully hidden in a cranny in the wall. These breathed of the nursery rather than of the schoolroom, and yet, perhaps, those forgotten children had known what we knew, and our songs of the sea stirred only familiar echoes. It is likely enough that to-day other children have inherited our dreams, and that other hands steer the Black Margaret under approving stars. If this indeed be so, they are in our debt, for in one of our hiding-places we left the "Count of Monte Christo" in English, rare treasure-trove for any proper boy. If this should ever meet his eyes he will understand.

RICHARD MIDDLETON.

THE ANARCHIST ENEMY—II.

IT was mentioned in our previous article that the execution of the Anarchist Vaillant for throwing a bomb into the midst of the French Chamber of Deputies was followed by several other outrages. The worst of these, that which occurred at the Café Terminus, when one customer was killed and a score were injured, some of them severely, was the work of Emile Henry, who, by the earlier explosion in the Rue des Bons Enfants, had caused the death of six police officers. This young miscreant was not the same type of man as Ravachol the journeyman dyer, Meunier the carpenter, Léauthier the bootmaker, and Vaillant the barely educated petty clerk. He belonged to a good middle-class family, and had qualified for admission to the École Polytechnique by his remarkable proficiency in mathematics. But he had afterwards deliberately apprenticed himself to a clockmaker in order to learn a branch of mechanics which, said he, would enable him to construct and regulate the most effective of infernal machines. Arrested after a desperate resistance, while he was seeking to escape from the Café Terminus, Henry was tried and sent to the guillotine. A Belgian named Pauwels then came forward to "avenge" him, and, after perpetrating two outrages in the Faubourg St. Martin and the Rue St. Jacques, was killed on the steps of the Madeleine by the premature explosion of a bomb which he was about to throw into the church.

Again there were many perquisitions and arrests; but the authorities, who stubbornly clung to the idea that there must be a central organisation which issued orders for all these outrages, could discover none, and although several Anarchists were sent to prison, no complicity in the recent explosions could be traced to them. Matters were in this unsatisfactory position when in June the same year (1894) President Carnot repaired to Lyons to visit a Colonial Exhibition which was being held there. The present writer happened to be in the city at the same time, and on the evening of June 25th he found himself in the Rue de la République at the moment when the President was assassinated there. The crime was committed at a little past nine o'clock. M. Carnot was on his way to a gala performance at the Grand Théâtre, and his carriage, escorted by a detachment of Cuirassiers, had just turned out of the Place des Cordeliers, the horses both of the escort and the vehicle going at a walk—for although the Rue de la République is seventy-five feet wide the crowd was extremely dense, and there was scarcely room for the Presidential party to pass. As it reached the street a young man rushed forward, holding in his raised right hand a paper which was generally supposed to be a petition. Resting his left hand on the side of the low-built landau in which M. Carnot, the Mayor of Lyons, and two general officers were seated, the young fellow in question sprang up and struck the President a terrific blow. Within the paper which he carried was a poignard, and as one subsequently learnt, the force of his blow was such that the weapon penetrated to a depth of four and a half inches, perforating the liver and opening the vena porta. No sooner was the crime committed than the assassin sprang down again, dived between the horses of the landau and those of the escort, and darted across the road towards the spot where we were standing. At that moment few people knew exactly what had happened, but some folk who noticed the young man's sudden rush and excited appearance took him to be an escaping thief; and a pretty servant-girl, who was under that impression, pluckily caught hold of him by the sleeve. He wrenched himself free, however, and struck her in the breast with his fist—for after stabbing the President he had left his weapon in the wound, whence M. Carnot himself withdrew it, letting it drop into the road. The girl we have mentioned reeled backward towards us, and as we caught hold of her to prevent her from falling a shout of indignation arose from several bystanders who had noticed the assault. Some police agents also sprang forward, and the man was seized, just as an officier de paix rushed up, shouting, "Tenez le ferme! Il vient d'assassiner le Président!" It was a wonder that the assassin was not lynched on the spot, so great became the indignation when his crime was known. Carnot, it may be remembered, lingered for about three hours, but from the outset the doctors pronounced the wound to be mortal.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The assassin's name—often given incorrectly—was Santo-Geronimo Caserio. He was born in September, 1873, at Motta-Visconti in Lombardy, where his father was a bargeman, but he had learnt the trade of a baker at Milan, in which city he had also imbibed Anarchist notions from his fellow-journeymen. We have no desire to cast undeserved aspersions on a calling which is a very necessary one, and which is followed by thousands of perfectly respectable people; but there is no doubt that a good many Anarchists are to be found among bakers on the Continent. To avoid military service Caserio left Italy for Lugano in Switzerland, proceeding thence to Geneva, and thence to Lyons, Vienne, and Cette, in France. He pursued his calling in those localities, and became more and more steeped in Anarchism by his intercourse with Swiss, Italian, French, and Spanish members of the sect, several of whom followed the same avocation as himself. It was the execution of Vaillant which first inspired Caserio with the idea of murdering the French President, and he set out from Cette on the Mediterranean, not far from the Spanish frontier, with the deliberate intention of committing that foul deed. Such was his determination that, as he lacked sufficient money to make the entire journey by rail, he covered the last twenty miles on foot, only reaching Lyons some six hours before he carried his abominable design into effect. And yet, the other week, more than one London newspaper asserted that the assassination of President Carnot was planned in our Metropolis. That is a very great error.

Caserio was guillotined, and once again the authorities made perquisitions, effected arrests, and secured a number of stringent enactments from the Legislature. During the following twelvemonth, however, there were three more outrages—two of which were directed against the Rothschild family—and others ensued in subsequent years. An attempt directed against the life of President Faure when he was setting out for Russia may have been due to some Russian Anarchists, even as the one on King Alfonso, while he was driving with President Loubet in Paris, was the work of Spanish members of the sect. Of recent years the French Anarchists seem to have executed an evolution, perhaps because they found the Propaganda by Deeds to be futile, as it only rendered the authorities more vigilant and stringent with respect to them. In any case the French Anarchist has now drawn nearer to the extreme Socialist, with whom he combines for the purpose of diffusing the so-called principles of anti-militarism, the idea being that before anything else is done the armed forces of the State must be got rid of, or won over. To teach soldiers to refuse to do their duty, and if need be to shoot down their officers—such to-day is largely the programme of the Anarchists of France. At the Anarchist Congress of Amsterdam in 1907 the American and Italian members, however, were still prominent in advocating the old Propaganda by Deeds—that is, the throwing of bombs and the assassination of rulers. Proposals were made at that time to form an Anarchist Federation, but they fell through, which in a sense is to be regretted, as federated Anarchism would be a more tangible and extinguishable thing than the elusive Anarchism of petty independent groups or isolated solitaires, by whom society has so long been confronted.

Russian Nihilism may perhaps work in a more or less systematic manner, and there may be, or have been, some organisation among the Spanish Anarchists of Barcelona; but no Government has discovered that the sect possesses a central ruling body, and as its principles include the denial of all laws and all authority, it may well be that no "central board" has ever existed. We feel, indeed, that it is precisely because Anarchism has remained sporadic, hydra-headed, and elusive, that the many efforts made to stamp it out have failed. Nevertheless, apart from the contagion of example, which is responsible for a great deal, the sect undoubtedly comes under a directing influence, that of its secret literature, its secret periodicals, which are passed stealthily from hand to hand; and in this respect particularly there is scope for much greater vigilance on the part of every Government. It is chiefly the dissemination of Anarchist principles by means of the printing-press which keeps the movement alive. Our Police Service did good work not long ago in regard to Indian seditious literature. We await from it a similar service with respect to the literature of Anarchism, in favour of which nobody can possibly claim the "freedom of the Press."

Further, the registration of foreigners arriving in this country is becoming a more and more imperative measure, and there must be a much stricter inspection of foreign clubs. On the subject of the Aliens Act so much has been written in the daily Press that we need only ask that it may be fully and properly administered in accordance with the intentions of Parliament, and not in accordance with the regulations set up by Lord Gladstone, who deliberately transformed a measure from which much benefit might have accrued to the country into a delusion and a sham.

The foreign Anarchists, the foreign Socialists, the foreign cracksmen, the foreign prostitutes, and the foreign bullies in our midst are more numerous than ever. Such a state of things ought not to be allowed, but we confess that we despair of seeing it effectively remedied so long as our social safety is in the keeping of the George, Asquith, Churchill Triumvirate.

INDIA BEFORE THE MUTINY

I.—DEVELOPMENTS OF BRITISH RULE AND LAW.

THE Mutiny of 1857-8 closed a chapter in Indian history, and afforded the opportunity for a fresh departure in England's relations to her greatest Dependency by the Crown assuming in 1858, from the East India Company, the direct government of India. We propose to show in a few papers how successive Viceroys have since that date discharged the trust reposed in them. By way of introduction it will be desirable to survey briefly the preceding period and note the progress already achieved.

By the battle of Plassey in 1757 and the extinction of the French power in 1761, the supremacy of the British in India was established. But their possessions were limited to settlements on the coasts until their contact with the "country powers" drew them onwards. With Clive's acquisition of Bengal, Bihar, and Orissa in 1765 British territorial sovereignty began; Warren Hastings and Cornwallis made some additions; the wars of the Marquess Wellesley (1798-1805) and the Marquess of Hastings (1813-1823) against Mysore and the Marathas constituted the Madras and Bombay Presidencies; Lord Amherst acquired Assam, Arakan, and Tenasserim in 1826; Sindh was annexed in 1843, the Panjab in 1849, Pegu in 1852, Oudh in 1856; some Hindu states, such as Satara, Nagpore, Jhansi fell to the British through want of direct heirs. When, before his death in 1839, Ranjit Singh, the Sikh Maharaja of the Panjab, observed how much of a map of India was coloured red, and was told that the colour indicated British territory, he said with a sigh, "It will soon be all red." His anticipation was not fulfilled. With the exception of a small strip in Bhutan and Upper Burma, annexed in 1886, no territory has been added to British India since the Mutiny. The native States, numbering some 700, with their different degrees of sovereignty, still occupy three-sevenths of the area, and contain sixty millions, or about one-fifth of the population of India. Clive, in his second Governorship of 1765-7, introduced English rule and endeavoured courageously to eradicate the abuses of private trade, bribery, and corruption. Warren Hastings organised, in the interior of Bengal, the administration of justice already systematised at the Presidency town; he also remodelled the Revenue administration. The Executive Council and the Supreme Court of Justice were created by the Parliamentary Regulating Act of 1773. Cornwallis reformed the Civil Service. Parliament renewed the Company's Charter for periods of twenty years in 1793, 1813, 1833; the last Charter of 1853 retained the Indian territories under the Company in trust for the Crown until Parliament should otherwise direct.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The Statute of 1784 created the Board of Control. The power of legislating was introduced into India, and was first effected by Regulations from 1772, and afterwards by Acts of the Legislative Councils constituted in 1834 and 1854, which passed the numerous laws required to place every department of the Administration on a legal basis. Provision was thus made for the Army, Police, Customs, Salt Revenue, Emigration, Post, and all the details of judicial, revenue, civil and municipal affairs. Acts of Parliament allowed the admission of independent Europeans, previously called interlopers, into India under licences; recognised missionary enterprise, dealt with China trade, the trade in tea, the general India trade; provided for religion, learning, and education. Thus, in 1813, the Bishopric of Calcutta was established and other Bishoprics followed. Also, one lakh of rupees a year was "set apart and applied to the revival and improvement of literature and the encouragement of the learned native of India, and for the introduction and promotion of a knowledge of the sciences among the inhabitants of the British territories in India."

In 1833 important provisions were made for enlarging the rights of European settlers and for protecting the natives and ameliorating their condition. The policy of freely admitting natives of India to a share in the administration of the country was declared in the words "that no native of the said territories, nor any natural-born subject of his Majesty resident therein, shall, by reason only of his religion, place of birth, descent, colour, or any of them, be disabled from holding any place, office, or employment under the Company." The Lieutenant-Governorship of the North-West Provinces dates from 1836; that of Bengal, created to relieve the Governor-General, from 1854; Chief Commissionerships for several parts of India also from that year. The reign of Law has been established throughout, justice also by the maintenance of Judicial Courts. Other matters received attention. A Committee of Public Instruction was formed in 1823. In 1829 suttee, or the immolation of widows, was abolished by Lord W. Bentinck by making the abetment of it a punishable crime. Measures were taken for the extirpation of the Thugs who infested Central India. Laws were passed in 1832 and 1850 to secure liberty of conscience by preventing the laws of the native religions from operating to deprive litigants of any property to which they would otherwise be entitled, and to protect converts and others from losing their property on religious grounds. In 1833 Raja Rammohun Roy, who had laboured to advance religious and social reform in India, died in England.

English education in India dates from 1835, when Macaulay's powerful Minute induced Lord W. Bentinck to decide in favour of the Anglicists against the Orientalists. During his rule the principle was affirmed that India is to be governed for the benefit of its peoples. The Press and Printing were serious questions in India from the eighteenth century. After vicissitudes of control, censorship, licensing, the Press was completely freed from all restrictions by Sir Charles Metcalfe from September 15th, 1835. The first vernacular newspaper was published in 1816, and others followed, but the vernacular Press had no great circulation until the Mutiny. The disasters of the first Afghan war of 1838-42 greatly damaged British prestige in India. Communication between England and India was metamorphosed by the foundation of the Peninsular and Oriental Company in 1840. Slavery was abolished in 1843.

When Lord Dalhousie became Governor-General in 1848, he found an effective Government in working order and the civilisation of India advancing by regular, if slow, methods. To every Department of the Administration he applied a stimulus, and left on each the impress of his personal vigour. In July, 1854, the Court of Directors sent out their famous Education Despatch, which has always been regarded as the Magna Charta of education in India, as it contains the principles which have since been generally followed. It led immediately to the creation of the Calcutta, Bombay, and Madras Universities in 1857. Lord Dalhousie added to British India some of the territories already mentioned. His final Minute of February 28th, 1856, of 180 paragraphs, presented to Parliament, recorded the results of his Administration. He introduced railways, the electric telegraph, and uniform postage; developed the material resources of the country; improved the finances, the Civil administration, prison discipline, education in all branches; he encouraged commerce and navigation, internal and maritime, irrigation and agriculture; he developed the ports and extended the roads; reformed the Department of Public Works; strengthened the measures against Suttee, Thuggi, gang-robbery, female infanticide, and the Meriah sacrifices; he did much for the military services, and passed various laws for the regulation of criminal justice and police, civil justice and procedure. Briefly, in every direction great progress was made, and foundations were laid for future development. He suppressed internal risings, and left, as he wrote, "the Indian Empire in peace, without and within." The great military revolt of 1857 took the nation by surprise.

WALLACE AND DARWIN

By Frank Harris.

On Sunday last Dr. Russel Wallace, the great scientist, celebrated his eighty-eighth birthday, and on Monday there appeared an interview with him in which the Doctor, as a determined Socialist, poured contempt on his creed as a scientific observer. The contradiction is common enough and interesting enough to be set forth at some length.

Every one knows that Dr. Russel Wallace shares with Darwin the honours of being the first to attribute the origin of species to Natural Selection. While Darwin was still thinking over the subject and preparing his book for press, he received a MS. essay from Wallace, who was then in the Moluccas. Wallace desired Darwin's opinion on his essay, which he then wished to forward to Lyell. Darwin was startled to find in the essay an admirable statement of his own theory of Natural Selection. Every one knows now how Darwin sent the essay to Lyell, who fortunately was acquainted with his views on the subject. As soon as Dr. Wallace understood the position, he admitted with rare generosity and modesty the claim of Darwin as more important than his own. In fact the two great men seemed to vie with each other in magnanimity and selfless devotion to truth.

The scientific doctrine of Evolution, or of progress as a result of the struggle for existence, has had the most profound influence on every department of human thought. It has changed our way of looking at things; it has founded a new school of sociology, modified our opinions on religion. We are studying religious beliefs to-day historically, as a development of the spirit of man: we are studying, too, the historical development of institutions and the growth of societies as organisms. We are tracing the theory of Evolution in the history of human thought itself, and thus looking at ourselves, as it were, from the outside, by the aid of this new light. We notice, for example, how the atomic theory came to view in science at the moment when the theory of individualism usurped the throne in political economy. And when the atomic theory merged itself in the molecular theory the school of individualism in economics began to be disturbed by theories founded on the claims of the family and of society.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

No generalisation has ever exercised such a far-reaching effect on thought as this theory of evolution through Natural Selection. It is hardly necessary to point out that the corresponding belief in sociology is that all progress must come from the gifted individual, from the "sport" who survives and as the fittest propagates his kind. Darwinism lays stress not on the democratic mass and their comfort, but on the few men of talent and power and their incomparable value to society. Darwinism is the creed of the oligarchy, and Dr. Russel Wallace should be the first, one would think, to preach this creed to the people.

But in his interview the other day Dr. Russel Wallace proclaimed himself a Socialist, praised the present Government—"which I have never seen approached;" declared that it is the duty of the Government "to abolish starvation;" and summed up: "You cannot be said to possess civilisation when your people are without food, clothing, and warmth." Dr. Russel Wallace was one of the first, I believe, to advocate the nationalisation of the land, and he will hardly deny that all his efforts as a sociologist have tended towards the levelling-up and lifting of the masses of the people. In other words, his creed as a man of science is contradicted absolutely by his political activity as a Socialist.

Reconciliation.

It is, of course, just possible that Dr. Russel Wallace might defend this evident contradiction. He might contend that the masses of the English people were too far sunk in poverty and destitution even to yield "sports" or talents of the highest class. He might point to the fact that the very lowest classes in England, though the most numerous, scarcely ever produce men of rare ability or character, and declare that it was in the interests of "sports" or men of talent themselves that he desires the amelioration of the masses. But that is not his attitude. As a social reformer Dr. Russel Wallace stands for doctrinaire equality. "One man, one vote; one woman, one vote," he cries, maintaining boldly that the voice of Hodge politically (or of Mrs. Hodge) should count for as much as his own voice. He does not see, or will not see, that Equality is the worst injustice. It is for Dr. Russel Wallace himself to explain this patent antinomy of thought—this flagrant contradiction is his preaching.

Comfort as a Creed.

Here, in the South of France, one can study democracy and the democratic ideal better than in any other country. The United States, though nominally also a republic, is in reality ruled by capitalists and trusts and given over to the wildest struggle for existence and the maddest inequality. The astounding difference between the two countries all comes from the fact that the Revolution gave the land of France to the people of France, and the law of succession perpetuated the gift. France has now over five millions of peasant proprietors; more than thirty millions of her population of forty millions live on the land in security, if not in ease, at any rate in such comparative wellbeing as is not given to the masses in any other country. What are the results of this general comfort? First of all, the wheels of progress have been clogged; the population is stationary; France is no longer among the first-rate Powers. Clearly we men are not here for happiness and comfort.

A concomitant of this universal comfort is that France will not face war. It is well known in our governing classes that France the other day refused to support us in combating German pretensions in the Near East. Delcassé was broken on the wheel of peasant prosperity; Ferry wrecked by the adventure in Tonquin. The French peasant will not fight if he can help it.

Secondary consequences are innumerable; nowhere in Europe is paid labour so difficult to get and so inefficient as in France. Here in the South the inconveniences are annoying. Something goes wrong in the house or flat with gas or drain, or clock or handle of a door; one has to wait days and days to get the repairs done. Blame the workman at your peril; he shrugs his shoulders, picks up his tools, and leaves you to your own devices. In every contract now one has to insert "time" as a condition with a penal clause, and even then one has to handle the condition gingerly. The artisan's life is too easy for him; he is too well paid; he works three or four days a week at most, and he works with one hand while smoking a cigarette; he has no ambition except to live as a lazy animal. Things are a little better in the North, but they are bad everywhere. Comfort has killed progress from one end of France to the other.

In this review I have purposely left out of the account other and more obvious ill results of democratic government. Municipal and State, and even Communal life are all honeycombed with corruption. The parade at Nice was extended this summer, and is now falling into the sea; the drain-pipes all showing, the smell even on the Promenade des Anglais horrible, the street cars ridiculous, the gas and electricity tenth-rate. On all sides corruption, inefficiency, and laziness, the inevitable results of democratic institutions and the democratic ideal of comfort. We men are "a little breed," and seem to require the spur of injustice and the whip of necessity to make us do our work even fairly well.

Dr. Russel Wallace.

But my disagreement with Dr. Russel Wallace does not diminish my sincere admiration for him as a man of genius. It is now twenty years since I first met him and had much talk and pleasant intercourse. He is very tall, about 6ft. in height, and well though loosely made. His whole face is framed in silver hair: the features are regular, well-balanced; the eyes super-excellent—the light in them that of genius; he has the candour of a child. Dr. Russel Wallace meets every one with amiability and gentle courtesy. He will discuss any subject, and while defending his own views with rare ability, will listen to diametrically opposed opinions with keen sympathy. A very noble, simple, great nature.

If the Order of Merit had had any meaning, his name would have figured first in the list when the Order was first created, instead of the name of some general or admiral whose services to man never spread beyond his quarter-deck or the mess-room table; which reflection reminds me that Dr. Russel Wallace would have an easy reply to me in pointing out the shortcomings of our aristocratic institutions. But so long as there is progress there is hope.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

CHARLES BAUDELAIRE.—II.

It is impossible to consider the whole work of a poet of such original and diverse talent as Charles Baudelaire in the course of two short articles, and he stands too close for us to be able to adjust properly our mental perspective in a consideration of his genius. His influence is still a living factor in modern poetry and art, and has not as yet been worked out to its logical conclusion. He stands on the threshold of an age of art in which we live, and it must remain for future generations to analyse his works with the calm gaze of a disinterested age. And it is hard to classify Baudelaire's poetry, as he stands more or less alone. Some of his poems resemble beautiful, richly-coloured pictures. They rather evoke an image in our minds than play upon our emotions. Here, of course, we see the influence of the "l'Art pour l'Art" school, with its founder, the painter-poet, Théophile Gautier. Yet Baudelaire cannot definitely be classed as one of this master's disciples. For the dim haze of mysticism creeps into his work, and from time to time veils the architectural definition of his pictures; while the poems of Gautier are like fair landscapes and palaces of rose-coloured marble standing in the full rays of the sun. Baudelaire has sometimes been called a "Réaliste," one of the school of Auguste Comte, the philosopher, and Flaubert, the author of that grimly realistic novel, "Madame Flaubert." True, Baudelaire, by his unblushing precision in the description of the horrors and evils of modern life seems to belong to this school. But the richness of his phantasy to a great extent marks him as a figure apart. Baudelaire has had a considerable influence on modern English poetry; traces of this are to be seen in the works of Oscar Wilde, and to an even greater extent in in those of Swinburne. One of Swinburne's choicest works, indeed, is his "Ave atque Vale," a poem which breathes genuine sympathy and devotion; a worthy memorial erected in memory of the dead French poet on the highway of English literature. This beautiful verse—

Thou sawest, in thine old singing season, brother,
Secrets and sorrows unbeheld of us:
Fierce loves, and lovely leaf-buds poisonous,
Bare to thy subtler eye, but for none other,
Blowing by night in some unbreathed-in clime;
The hidden harvests of luxurious time,
Sin without shape, and pleasure without speech;
And where strange dreams in a tumultuous sleep
Make the shut eyes of stricken spirits weep;
And with each face thou sawest the shadow on each,
Seeing as men sow men reap—

is an admirable epitome of Baudelaire's strange genius.

Baudelaire's philosophy consists in a sort of restless pessimism; a sense of the impotence of man's petty struggles to escape from the folds of the black shroud of "ennui." His beautiful poem entitled "Le Voyage," and itself included in a series called "La Mort," expresses the grim, despairing world-weariness and melancholy of his restless soul. In the first verse he grasps the vagaries of human phantasy, and the power of illusion in the two wonderful lines:—

Ah! que le monde est grand à la clarté des lampes!
Aux yeux du souvenir que le monde est petit!

He then proceeds to sketch, in the language of disillusionised melancholy, illumined by flashes of scenic beauty, the voyage through the world. Some to fly a country which disowns them; others a home which has become hateful; others, maddened by the scorn in a woman's eyes, to drown their sorrow with the intoxicating draught of light and space. Then come the two verses:—

Mais les vrais voyageurs sont ceux-la seuls qui partent
Pour partir; cœurs légers, semblables aux ballons,
De leur fatalité jamais ils ne s'écarlent,
Et sans savoir pourquoi, disent toujours; allons!
Ceux-là dont les désirs ont la forme des nues,
Et qui rêvent, ainsi qu'un conscrit le canon,
Des vastes voluptés, changeantes, inconnues,
Et dont l'esprit humain n'a jamais su le nom!

These verses show the poet's love of dreams, his realisation that only the realms of phantasy are beautiful. We may call it the philosophy of dreams. Then come the matchless verses in which the travellers through the world, the seekers of distraction in unknown lands, describe their voyages:—

. . . . Nous avons vu des astres
Et des flots; nous avons vu des sables aussi;
Et malgré bien des chocs et d'impie ou désastres,
Nous nous sommes souvent ennuyé, comme ici.
La gloire du soleil sur la mer violette,
La gloire des cités dans le soleil couchant,
Allumaient dans nos cœurs une ardeur inquiète
De plonger dans un ciel au reflet alléchant.
Les plus riches cités, les plus grands paysages,
Jamais ne contenaient l'attrait mystérieux
De ceux que le hasard fait avec les nuages.
Et toujours le désir nous rendait soucieux!

The centre verse is a perfect picture. The last two lines of the third verse describe in wonderful precision the illusionary nature of all hope. The poem ends with the two verses—

O mort vieux capitaine, il est temps! levons l'ancre!
Ce pays nous ennuie, Ô Mort! Appareillons!
Si le ciel et la mer sont noirs comme de l'encre
Nos cœurs que tu connais sont remplis de rayons!
Verse nous ton poison pour qu'il nous réconforte
Nous voulons, taut ce feu nous brûle le cerveau.
Plonger au fond du gouffre, Enfer ou ciel, qu'importe?
Au fond de l'inconnu pour trouver du nouveau!

Here again we see his restless burning passion for novelty and sensation, a longing to be rid of a life which held no further secrets or hopes for his penetrating mind. All through his works we find death considered as a longed-for consummation, as a great comforter. "La Mort des Pauvres" runs:—

C'est la mort qui console, hélas et qui fait vivre,
C'est le but de la vie, et c'est le seul espoir.

In "La Mort des Amants" his lovers mingle in their phantasy the mystery of death with the perfumed luxury of their marriage couch, and dream of death as a sort of consummation of their insatiable love:—

Nous aurons des lits pleins d'odeurs légères,
Des Divans profonds comme des tombeaux,
Et d'étrange fleurs sur des étagères,
Éclores pour nous sous des cieux plus beaux.

There is one poem of Baudelaire, "La Danse Maccabre" in which death masquerades at the ball, beautiful in the lean horror of its charm. It reminds us of an engraving by Felicien Rops, entitled "La Mort au Bal Masqué." Another where he describes all the terrible surroundings of a gambling-hell: the faded cushions; the brilliant glare of the lights falling on the haggard, careworn faces of the players; women who, on the verge of the grave, cannot tear themselves from the tables, and poets who dissipate the fruit of their labours in an hour. Space will not permit us to describe more of the genius of Baudelaire's poetry and his prose poems, and the greater portion of that bouquet of rich blossoms, "Les Fleurs du Mal," must remain for the present unmentioned. In conclusion, we may, perhaps, be permitted to apply a verse of his own poetry to a description of his talent and mission in life:—

. . . Il descend dans les villes,
Il ennoblit le sort des choses les plus viles,
Et s'introduit en roi, sans bruit et sans valets,
Dans tous les hôpitaux et dans tous les palais.

S. A.-B.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

THE THEATRE

THE LITTLE THEATRE

The Saloon. By HENRY JAMES.

Just to Get Married. By CICELY HAMILTON.

IF the writings of any author in the world of English fiction should be named as unsuitable for adaptation for the stage, those of Mr. Henry James would probably be the first to occur to us. His art is so subtle, so dependent upon the ability of the reader to turn back a page, tighten the threads of the story, retrace the paths of thought, that the stage, with its direct representations, seems an impossible place to meet the author of the intricacies of "The Golden Bowl," the delicate suggestions of "The Sacred Fount," and the serene studies of "The Soft Side."

In "The Saloon," however, produced at the Little Theatre on Wednesday evening last, Mr. Henry James took for his central idea a theme which had dramatic possibilities, and he was fortunate in the fine acting which was placed at his disposal. Owen Wingrave, descendant of a long line of warlike ancestors, hates war, is of the opinion that "the military delusion is a barbarism," and refuses, for the sake of his "beautiful high convictions," to carry on the tradition and fight for his country. The girl to whom he is engaged pours her contempt upon him in a scene of tremendous effect—a scene which few who saw it will easily forget. "Life! what do you call life?" he demands, as she upraids him. "Glory!" comes the answer. "Rot!" he snaps, each word sharp as a pistol-shot. His people disown and disinherit him. The final interview is thrilling; Kate Julian calls him a coward, but, repenting when too late, is thrust aside by him in a frenzy of emotion. Wingrave falls, in dense blackness, and the curtain descends to a whisper of "Dead . . . dead!" He has died on the very spot—"The Saloon"—where another member of the family met his death at the hand of his resentful, soldierly grandfather for similarly "showing the white feather;" the spectre still haunts the scene, and the supernatural element is introduced as the cause of his death. This aspect of the play, however, is melodramatic and perilously near to absurdity.

Such is a meagre outline of the plot; but half the effect is due, as every student of Mr. Henry James will know, to the magic of the dialogue. Humour is not lacking, and were the author's name concealed it would be guessed from the unmistakable phrases—"I don't want not to know"—"Scruples, doubts, discoveries"—"Beautiful high convictions"—which are inseparable from his style. Mr. Everard Vanderlip as Wingrave was as portentous a young man as the occasion demanded, and Miss Dora Barton acted the furiously indignant fiancée excellently. Mr. Halliwell Hobbes, Miss Frances Wetherall, Miss Mary Stuart, and Mr. Owen Nares took the subsidiary parts with taste and skill. In spite of the too lurid ending, we confess to the same desire which results from reading some of Mr. James's books—the wish to have it all over again, for he is one of the few authors of whom it can be said that to know what is coming does not spoil the charm.

Miss Cicely Hamilton's clever comedy, "Just to Get Married," revived this week at the same theatre, portrays the dilemma of a woman supported by her relations chafing at her intolerable sense of dependence, anxious for a husband merely that such a miserable state of affairs may be ended. Having accepted her suitor, whose bashfulness and hesitation provoke much mirth, she cannot bear the thought of the coming marriage without love, and in a tragic scene on the eve of the wedding informs him that had he been any one else she would have "said 'Yes' just the same," and refuses to marry him. Reconciliation comes in the last Act, in the waiting-room of a country station—a very realistic waiting-room it is, too; but her reversal of the rôle, when she asks him to marry her provided he will not do it "out of pity," seems too sudden to be at all natural. Miss Gertrude Kingston, however, gave her audience so fine a display of acting as Georgina Vicary that the flaw was minimised. At times she approached greatness—as when she says: "You know, poor relations don't count for much, even when they're young and beautiful; but when they grow old and plain . . . O, my God, they ought not to be allowed to grow old!"—and bursts into a fit of sobbing. Mr. Rupert Lister as Adam Lankester had a difficult part, which he played extremely well, and Mr. Thomas Sidney fitted the character of Sir Theodore Grayle with a delightful humour. A fairly high level of accomplishment was maintained by all concerned, and there is good reason to congratulate Miss Gertrude Kingston upon her combination of two so different and by no means easy plays in a single evening's bill.

MUSIC

ELGAR'S NEW CONCERTO

SIR EDWARD ELGAR'S new Concerto was heard at the Queen's Hall on Monday last (the 16th inst.) under circumstances sufficient to test its virtues to the utmost; for, though it was the chief concern of the afternoon, it had as its introductory the triumph of triumphs in that most difficult test of the composer's power—Beethoven's Concerto in D Major. The fact that it bore the test with such unqualified success makes it an undeniable fact that we have to face in this work the most important contribution to the music of Europe for some time past. These are not words in excess of the fact. We remember hearing, not so long ago, one of Straus' Tone-Poems coming after the Third Leonora Overture. It was a severe test; it was too severe a test. It threw up into sudden and brilliant lustre the success of Monday afternoon. There was another excellence about it too that is worthy of note. At the earlier concert it appeared in company with Brahms. It then seemed a noteworthy work indeed; but it bore the sterner test with even greater splendour of success than the lesser test—and this is the hall mark of supreme work.

We had not heard Fritz Kreisler's interpretation of Beethoven's Concerto before. It is, perhaps, too late in the day to praise either Beethoven's one masterly effort in this difficult branch of composition or its exponent of Monday. It is the highest of possible praise to say that Mr. Kreisler made no attempt to overwhelm Beethoven with Kreisler. He made it his business to do what it is the business of every virtuoso to do—to interpret, and only to interpret. So much was this virtue in evidence, that even in the solos he gave us Beethoven, making these recapitulations of the leading antecedent motives in the work. The result was that the mind emerged on to the subsequent argument not only with renewed strength, but with the whole progress hitherto achieved clearly before it.

This is to say that when subsequently we turned to Elgar it was after hearing the greatest of Concertos at its best. The mind was so lifted and purged with lofty emotion that one almost feared for the coming work. Yet it was not wholly owing to this that we felt a little disappointed with the opening Allegro. It is admirably constructed, and is proof, if proof were needed after "The Dream of Gerontius," that in the architectonics of music Elgar is not wanting. But it was uneven in excellence. The opening Tutti and the subsequent motives make an admirable preamble to the majestic introduction of the solo instrument. The emotional mood is ripened in us for the opening dignity of low, unostentatious, yet dignified entrance of the soloists. But, then, as the gravity gives place to the contest with the orchestra a change comes over the music, and, it must be said, not altogether a desirable change. That is to say, instead of relying on broad emotional effects he turns to such effects as we are becoming accustomed to in, say, Debussy and the later Straus—a reliance on complicated and unconvincing mimicry of the mood in him rather than an effort to create that mood for and in us. This change starts a little before the key changes to D minor and continues nearly to the end.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Yet even this has its advantage, although it is very doubtful if the advantage was intended. For being released thus from a high emotional mood we are the better prepared for the beautiful Andante that follows. Of this movement it is impossible to speak too highly. Comparisons are invidious; but the two other beautiful things in modern music, "Elektra's Welcome to Orestes" and the third or fourth movement in "Finlandia," seem puerile beside it, particularly the former. It is above analysis; it is almost above praise. It is Elgar at his best because it is Elgar in his most characteristic mood. Its beauty, that is to say, is contemplative and deep with all intimate emotion. One remembers the similarity of mood in parts of his symphony, but it is incomparably purer and richer in this Andante movement. To hear it is to pass through an enriching experience, which is more than one can say of much modern work, which is not concerned with enrichment but with excitement.

The concluding Allegro molto opens with a violent contrast, almost too much of a contrast, indeed, for those who have lingering in their memory the tender beauty of the earlier movement. With its chords given vivace, fortissimo in tutti it leads us quickly away to new experiences. But when we strike the Rondo we recover some of the old mood, for Elgar is like Beethoven in this, that he can awake memory of his deepest moods in his brightest movements. In this way he works his way to a predominance of the solo-instrument accompanied by the "thrumming" of most of the strings of the orchestra. This is Elgar's innovation. We can see that it has excellent possibilities, but as it was given by the orchestra on Monday it was scarcely a success. The "thrumming" was not continuous enough, nor emphatic enough.

The movement closed fitly with reminiscences of the Andante. Dealing with the work as a whole, we could wish that Elgar would reduce some of the complication at the end of the Allegro movement, and also that he would bring some of his power of architectonic to bear on the third movement, giving it more of compactness. It needs a little purging even as the Second Leonora Overture needed, and received, purging. But as it stands it is a lofty piece of work, the noblest contribution to the world's music for this many a day. It is with some pardonable pride that we reflect on the composer's nationality.

ROYAL ACADEMY: WINTER EXHIBITION

THE work of the "Five Deceased British Artists" which constitutes the forty-second Winter Exhibition of the Royal Academy this season may be regarded as an admirable foil, or antidote—which the reader pleases—to the more vivid and exciting phases of Post-Impressionism that have recently been widely discussed. An atmosphere of almost classic restraint, of coolness and sanity and English good taste, pervades the familiar galleries, and, while we speak of "atmosphere" (poor overworked word!), it is interesting to compare the visitors who promenade so quietly with the crowd which throngs round the noted "pictures of the year" in May." Dresses and manners are different; there is more of the serious, less of the vivacious; there is also, apparently, a greater proportion of genuine appreciation and capable observation than can be found among the gay assembly of Spring and Summer. One overheard, for example, few of those inept remarks which are so frequent in the Maytime, and which would be funny were they not so pathetic—"Too sweet for anything," "Simply delicious," "A ripping thing," and so on—qualifications which might be applied equally aptly to a box of chocolates or a new hat. However, we must not neglect the paintings for the fascinating, shadowy figures that glide, and point, and murmur as in some dim, memorable dream.

The first gallery is devoted entirely to the work of John M. Swan, and presents one or two curicus contrasts. "The Young Orpheus" and the "Endymion" are finely spiritual, full of ethereal beauty, while a portrait of the artist's daughter seems unaccountably flat and unappealing. Another "Orpheus," very much larger than the first, stands out from the pictures round it by reason of its delicacy of colour and line; the delightful touch of dense blue distance glimpsed beneath the trees holds the eye wonderfully. The artist's first Academy picture is here—"Dante and the Leopard"—and many of the animal studies which formed so large a portion of his art.

The famous "Railway Station" of W. P. Frith claims, perhaps, most attention in the second room. It is a peep at almost an early stage of civilisation compared with our railway scenes of to-day, so strange is the antiquated locomotive, so curious are the costumes of the characters. We may call them characters legitimately, since they are so evidently brought to the front of the stage for the benefit of the beholder. Perhaps some artist will idealise the present-day Paddington for us on a less crowded canvas, although we can hardly hope for the same marvellous skill in grouping the essential "story-telling" points and presenting them as a whole. "Hogarth before the Governor of Calais," with its perfectly drawn hands, and "King Charles the Second's Last Sunday" are two other large pictures by Frith shown here. How exquisite is the view of the distance through the window in the latter painting! In this room are several portraits by Sir W. Q. Orchardson, and the next is filled with his work. A portrait of Lord Swaythling arrests the spectator, and is of mournful interest just now.

The picture of "Mrs. Siddons in the Studio of Sir Joshua Reynolds," the "Social Eddy: Left by the Tide," with its charming clarity of colour, and the quaint "Housekeeping in the Honeymoon" are three of the artist's happiest paintings on view; and the delicate yet realistic tapestry on the wall in the picture of "The Young Duke" is one of those secondary effects which are liable to be missed in the more striking display of the main theme. In "The Last Dance" (Gallery IV.) it is interesting to perceive a great difference between this and the other very English work; the picture might well be by a Frenchman of the Modern school, so suggestive of warmth and movement is it. It is unfinished, but there is enough in it to keep the attention fixed: the attitude of the man sitting, leaning forward, watching—how impressive and tense it seems! Many of the portraits are well known and need hardly be mentioned; but in the painting of Miss Moxon (afterwards Lady Orchardson) the bright red dress seems to overwhelm the eye; it grips vividly, distracting attention from the face.

In this room and the next are hung some beautiful landscapes of David Farquharson and Robert W. Macbeth—the exquisite "Aberfeldy" and "The Storm at Haytime," and the "Sardine Fishery." This last seems to lack the sense of atmosphere, and the sea looks hard; the same effect is noticeable in two or three other paintings by Macbeth, and it is somewhat inexplicable when we consider the fine veiled charm of his "Sodden Fen" and "The Lass that a Sailor Loves" in the fifth gallery. These, however, are his later and better work. Farquharson's magnificent "Full Moon and Spring Tide" is here, its waves seeming to dash and swirl against the dark Cornish cliffs, and his splendid "Dartmoor," with its suggestions of bleak, wide spaces and heathery winds.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The Water-Colour Room is full of interesting studies—many of them in chalks, and the etchings in the Black-and-White Room exhibit another aspect of the work of Macbeth. A few statuettes—notable is a lovely "Orpheus" by Swan—complete a remarkably interesting and profitable exhibition.

FACILIS DESCENSUS

On a bluff overlooking the storm-beaten coast-line stands an ancient mansion surrounded by fair gardens. By imperceptible advances the sea, age on age, has planed down the adjoining land frontier and crept homeward. When the old house was built the edge of the cliff was a long ramble across the meadows. Down in the dells and grips through which the footpath led you by zigzagging ways grew great patches of meadowsweet and willow-herb. In the Spring-time all the grassy slopes and terraces were studded with the rathe primrose. In those days a troop of boys and girls ran races about the coombes and ravines, and, to the children, the yellow primrose and all things else, from the majestic roof fretted with golden fire to the sandy marge where the slow, sad pulse of ocean beat, belonged to a land of romance. Fairies had not then grown too stiff in the joints to dance o' nights. Wisdom was not bottled into a preserve which fermented when the air got to it. Wisdom dropped as the gentle dew from heaven. When the long days drew to a close, and lights crept upward in the old house, like stars into the sky, borne upon the wings of the evening breeze came visions and dreams and memories, as of some other world. Surely the young-eyed cherubim had their home in the dome strewn with stars. An old house such as this must have been the children's home in a former existence. To them the wind sang with an insistent voice. Its language was quaint but real. The birds were God's choristers. Their notes were no mere chance sounds, such as men scrape or blow or hammer.

Years crept away. The children were children no longer. They had been put through the mill of "education." The boys had grown conscious, the girls artificial. The navvy's graphic phrase was true of both of them—they were "too big for their boots." The boys' babble was mainly of "good form," the girls' of "accomplishments," not accomplishment. "Sport" had early claimed both boys and girls for its own. Sport was no longer a spontaneous impulse. It was part of "education."

Another fifteen years slipped away. The troop of children had boys and girls of their own about them. Each of the original children moved in a groove which had no passage to right or left. To them the whole game of life consisted in travelling forward a defined distance and slipping back over the same ground. It was pitiful, but they had become automata. Volition, initiative, had almost disappeared from their economy. The puppets worked on wires, social, political, and what not. What was worse still was the fact that, whereas they themselves started with visions and dreams, they took very good care to discourage such nonsense in their own children.

Herein is a parable of the modern edition of the word "development." The nineteenth century, which folk are now so anxious to tell us was a dark age, at least produced a gallant crop of names that have carried on the tradition of our race. The history of a race is the history of its great men. The name of many a Field-Marshal of that era who carried a bâton in his knapsack is now inscribed upon our banners. The old Imperial temper flashed forth when we fought with our back to the wall, amid nations who stood around and watched for our downfall. Now our foes are of our own household. The poison of asps is under their lips. Trick and artifice are statesmanship, scurrility is eloquence:—

> 'Twere long to tell, and sad to trace,
> Each step from splendour to disgrace.

Will the English people rouse from its torpor and shake off the deadly force creeping over its vitality from within and without? Racially we are changing fast. Cosmopolitanism has lowered the resisting power of the breed, but we cannot blot out our nobility of lineage as a people. The Imperial trumpet-call is now sounding in our ears. The Englishman used to be bad to beat. Napoleon, according to all laws of strategy, ought to have beaten us at Waterloo, but our thick-skulled obstinacy saved us there and otherwhere. The nation that was wont to conquer others stands to-day at the parting of the ways. One road leads to mob-law, chaos, revolution. The other path leads to ordered advance, reform of old abuses, and ancient power rekindled.

Our great allies of British blood beyond the seas watch whether the Motherland is stooping to her decline and fall or if they may still look up to her as leader. Ill will it be for those who, whether from apathy or drift, play traitor to our Constitution at this supreme moment of our national fate.

SOME OLD-FASHIONED RAILWAY NOTIONS

The youth of the present day, to whom railway travelling is as familiar as walking, can have little idea of the wonder with which grave and learned people regarded it in the early stages of its development, or of the crude and comical notions that were then entertained concerning railways and their management. The writer discovered the other day a reprint of two pamphlets on "Railway Accidents" which were published more than sixty years ago as part of a scientific series. Some of the impressions ventilated are incredibly queer and amusing in the light of our later knowledge; others are sound and sensible, indicating common-sense improvements which even yet are not perfected.

The first brochure begins with a solemn enunciation of the axiom that whatever may be the agency by which personal locomotion is produced, it has always been attended with danger to life and limb. Enlarging on this theme, it goes on to give elaborate tables and analyses of accidents and their causes, and comes to the mild conclusion that there is no very great amount of danger in travelling by rail after all. The sources of disaster—collision, derailment, etc.—are dealt with, and suggestions are made that more efficient brake-power should be provided, also better means of communication between passengers and guards. Realising that these points have been emphasised for over half a century, and are not satisfactorily settled now, one is inclined to wonder at the scarcity of reliable inventions, and perhaps at the long-suffering character of the public.

The more curious of the tracts is the second, which starts by insisting on the need of intercourse between the passengers in the train and the driver. It is stated that the Great Western Railway proposed to "fix at the back of the tender a seat for a conductor, in a sufficiently high position to see along the roofs of the carriages, so as to have a perfect view of the entire side-length of the train, and a means of passing from side to side of the tender, so as to get a view of each side of the train. Such a conductor, from his proximity to the engine, could immediately communicate with the driver, and each guard upon the coaches of the train could communicate with such conductor by signals." One is conscious of a feeling of pity for any official so situated on, let us say, the "Cornish Riviera, Limited," running from Paddington to Plymouth without a stop. What salary would be necessary to tempt him nowadays?

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The London and North Western Company proposed "that the underguard should always stand in his van next to the engine, with his face to the train, so as to observe any signal of distress, irregularity, or derangement among the carriages which the chief guard stationed at the rear of the train might make." A communication between the underguard and the driver was necessary to complete this arrangement, and the Company accordingly directed "that means should be provided by which the underguard should be enabled at pleasure to open the whistle of the engine." The picture of the poor guard glued to his post, clutching the whistle-cord, is an entertaining one.

Proceeding to comment on such accidents as can be avoided by the passengers' own care, the pamphlet supplies solemnly several "Plain Rules for Railway Travellers." The first gives the familiar caution to refrain from getting into or out of a train when it is in motion. The second enjoins them never to sit "in any unusual place or posture," and goes on to say:—"On some lines of railways seats are provided on the roofs of the carriages. These are to be avoided. Those who occupy them sometimes inadvertently stand up, and when the train passes under a bridge they are struck by the arch." Again:—"Passengers should beware of leaning out of carriage-windows, or of putting out their arm, or if a second-class carriage, as sometimes happens, has no door, they should take care not to put out their leg!" It sounds somewhat as though the country possessed a one-limbed population; but the advice was doubtless well meant and necessary. Instances of accidents are then given by way of enforcing the caution, some of which are worth quoting:—"On the Manchester and Leeds Line a passenger getting over the side of a carriage instead of going out by the door fell, and was killed." On the Bodmin and Wadebridge Line, on the 3rd of August, 1844, a passenger, jumping from one carriage to another, fell between, and was killed." "On the Preston and Wyre Line, on the 8th of August, 1845, a passenger, improperly sitting on the side of a carriage, fell off, and was killed." Some of these remarks remind us of the time when passengers were carried in open, unroofed trucks, and porters were distinctly forbidden to assist third-class voyagers with their luggage.

Another quaint rule advises that express trains should be used only when great speed is indispensable, as they are attended with more danger than ordinary trains. In amplifying this the mentor adds:—"To work express trains with safety an additional line of rails should be laid down and appropriated to them. Their number per day being necessarily small, and the duration of their trips short, the same line of rails might, without inconvenience or danger, serve for the traffic in both directions, as on single lines of railway." This is illuminating, and sounds rather terrifying; but then our sixty-mile-an-hour flyers were unknown and undreamed-of in those good old times.

Rule 9 says:—"Beware of yielding to the sudden impulse to spring from the carriage to recover your hat which has blown off, or a parcel dropped." The writer was perfectly serious, too, for he remarks—dear man!—that "there is an impulse, it would appear, which in some individuals is almost irresistible, to leap from a train to recover their hats when blown off or accidentally dropped;" and he gives instances and dates, as before. Reading these lines, an overpowering regret takes hold of the modern man that their composer cannot be treated to a run north or west on one of the famous non-stop expresses of the present day. His opinions might be worth hearing.

Rule 12 brings us to a state of things which is now obsolete. "If you travel with your private carriage, do not sit in it on the railway; take your place by preference in one of the regular railway carriages." This is driven home by a vivid description of an accident which occurred to a Countess and her maid on December 8th, 1847. The private carriage, on a truck, contained the two as passengers; it caught fire from cinders projected by the locomotive, and the passengers suffered, the maid having her skull fractured through jumping off to escape the conflagration.

Such were some of the ancient notions; but it is not wise to laugh too heartily, for some day—who knows?—people may be smiling at us and our antiquated ideas as to travelling in the air.

THE LONDON INSTITUTION

The Right Rev. Bishop Welldon, M.A., in opening his lecture entitled "Some Thoughts Suggested by Travels over the Empire" at the London Institution last Monday, observed that were it not for the horrors of the British climate there would probably have been no British Empire; a remark which was called forth by the foggy state of the atmosphere outside, which had doubtless thinned his audience. Those who came, however, had the pleasure of listening to an eloquent and very pertinent address.

The lecturer gave it as his opinion that the modern facilities for locomotion, which have rendered a tour of the world as easy as was a tour of Europe in Chesterfield's day, entail upon everyone who has the time the duty of knowing the world as much as possible. He then enlarged upon the extent of the Empire, and commented upon the great debt owed to Queen Victoria, he having been impressed, when in India at the time of her death, by the spontaneous action of the poor in closing their little booths in token of sorrow—the common people had learned to look on her as their friend.

The growth of the British Empire, continued Bishop Welldon, might be divided into four periods. In one sense it was the child of the Reformation, since the ideas of great opportunities and responsibilities which subsequently pervaded England were born at about that date: the spirit of courage, intrepidity, adventure, and piety which animated the famous Elizabethan mariners was also mentioned, and the names of Drake, Hawkins, Frobisher, Raleigh, Sir Humphrey Gilbert, Chancellor, and Grenville drew forth a natural eulogy. The second period, that of Oliver Cromwell, was marked by the conflict between England and Spain. To Cromwell was attributed the idea of making Westminster Abbey the resting-place of our illustrious dead for all time. Milton was the "first true Christian British Imperialist;" in him lived and burned the conception of the Empire and its work in the world which has actuated his countrymen for so many years; the lesson he taught has never been lost.

William Pitt, Lord Chatham, represented the beginning of the third period. The Battle of Plassey had laid the foundations of the Empire in India just before George III. came to the Throne; and, incidentally, the lecturer remarked that there could be no greater mistake than the forcing of a Western secular education on the natives of India. All over the world the majority of people want to be left alone. The defeat of Russia by Japan in recent years was the rolling back of the tide of Western progress, and marked the first real triumph of the Orient over the Occident. Wolfe's victory, which gave us Canada, was alluded to, with the colonisation of Australia and the capture of Cape Colony. England at this period began to extend her domains in the Southern hemisphere, and the part played by the Pilgrim Fathers was emphasised by comment on the legal, political, economic, and religious ties which bind us to our neighbours across the Atlantic.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The remarks which followed the theme of the fourth period—the Victorian—were perhaps the most interesting of the evening. It is customary, said the speaker, to consider the British Empire as though it were an isolated phenomenon in the history of mankind; but, in the words of Sir John Seeley, it was "the only considerable survivor of a family of empires now vanished, which arose out of the contact of the Western States of Europe with the new worlds opened by the discoveries of Vasco di Gama." Our insular position tended to preservation, keeping us free to a certain extent from entanglement with European affairs; but that isolation may be gravely threatened by the development of aeronautical science. When he first took an interest in aviation, said Bishop Welldon, he was much amused by receiving a letter from a lady who reproached him with forgetting who was the "Prince of the powers of the air."

The vital importance of the colonies was insisted upon—"the first article of a true Imperial policy is to knit the colonies to the mother-country by every possible tie." With some humorous but extremely sensible observations on the extraordinary prevalence of the English language, the lecture was brought to a conclusion.

On Monday, January 23rd, at 5 p.m., Professor Walter Raleigh will lecture on "Hazlitt."

ENGLISH GOETHE SOCIETY

Sir James Yoxall, M.P., at the meeting of the English Goethe Society on January 12th, Dr. L. T. Thorne in the chair, delivered a most interesting address, taking as his subject "Goethe Back from Italy." Those members of the Society who had taken part for the last two years in visits to the Weimar celebration, as well as the members of the Reading Circle of the Society who are making a special study of Goethe's Italian journey, could fully appreciate the lecturer's graphic and intensely sympathetic description of the great poet's standpoint when he found himself once again in the confined limits of the Grand Ducal capital after his fuller intellectual and artistic life in Rome. Regarding his subject, perhaps more from the imaginative point of view of the novelist than the purely literary one, Sir James Yoxall sought to disprove the popular theory as to the relationship between Goethe and Christiane Vulpius, taking a much more favourable view than has hitherto been the case of the character of Goethe's companion. Goethe's attitude to the French Revolution was also thoroughly gone into, and a most interesting discussion on these points ensued. Arranged round the hall was an interesting collection of portraits, prints, original sketches by Tischbein, medals, &c., all bearing on the period, kindly lent by Mrs. Ludwig Mond from her collection.

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

A real change has come over the markets since I last wrote. The public has come in. There are so many members on the Stock Exchange and so many professional punters in the purlieus of the House that, public or no public, there is always business of a sort. But when the public comes in then the business becomes profitable. Buying began at the end of last week, and all markets were moved up to celebrate the event. It seems to me that we are approaching a period of excellent trade, combined with high prices. There is no denying the high prices. The Board of Trade returns, which show the record figures of 1,202 millions, would seem to point to an extraordinary revival in trade. But, above all, we are confident. We believe that we shall make money. That is half way on the road to fortune.

Consols are now above 80, and there is little doubt that they will continue to rise. We must remember that, all the banks having written down their Consols to 80 or below, are now actively anxious to see a good rise. It means a splendid secret profit. Sir Felix Schuster once said that he heard a great deal about secret reserves and secret profits, but that he never heard any bank suggest that they had made losses that were equally secret. Banks make losses which remain on the books until such time as they can be wiped off by profits that are hidden from the world. The Government will be compelled to purchase some large blocks of Consols before the end of the financial year. Their purchases upon a rising market will have a great effect. The Bank Rate will come down, and this will also send up the price of all gilt-edged stocks.

The Foreign Market has been strong, and all the great finance houses have been steadying their pet loans with the view of unloading when the public comes in at the top, as it always does. Norway has asked for money, and she is still busy negotiating a few more millions which will probably go to the Paris Consortium. The Russian Railway Loan is being discussed, but it is doubtful whether London will be allowed to contribute. No State Loan will be required, but as Russia owns and runs her own railways there is really not much difference. The cynic remarks that there is no such thing as "earmarking" in St. Petersburg. As long as the railway is built, it doesn't much matter whether the actual money subscribed is used or whether the State uses the money and afterwards repays it. Russia is now in good credit and very prosperous, but her finances are "casual," to say the least. Japanese continue weak, but there has been no serious unloading; that might come, however, if Japan did some outrageous thing, which she is most unlikely to do, or suffered another bad rice crop, about which it is less easy to prophesy, as her finances are not in a good state.

The Home Railway dividends are being announced as I write these lines, and up to now they have pleased everybody. The market is very steady, for there is no bull account open in anything, except perhaps Dover A, Little Chats, Great Eastern, and Brighton A. The strikes kept speculators out of the market, and the rise is therefore assured. One of the cheapest stocks is Lancashire and Yorkshire. Trade in the North is now good, and this line has been neglected. The price should rise to par. North Easterns are steady, and the line is so well managed that the dividend may be relied upon to remain constant. At present prices the yield is too high for a gilt-edged stock, and if the accounts show only a moderate increase in profits I expect a rise. An increased dividend is not looked for, while the change in chairmanship will benefit Brums. The new man, Mr. G. H. Claughton, has a considerable reputation as a clever business man. He is comparatively young, and full of energy. There is no line in England that possesses the advantages of the L. and N.W.R., and, managed with foresight and skill, it could easily pay 1 per cent. higher dividend and maintain this rate. Great Westerns still hang below 128. They must rise to 140 before the end of year. The Board has spent large sums upon which as yet it gets no return. It should electrify a track to Maidenhead, do away with the branch line trains, and substitute rail-motors. Then it would be in a position to raise its dividend another $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. It is also essential that it connects up the Bakerloo Tube with Paddington.

Yankees might react. I do not say that they will, but many of the Wall Street speculators must have made large profits on the recent rise. The small gambler in the States is quick to take a profit. The general feeling throughout the States is growing more hopeful, but the trader and the country speculator are not in the Market. The great banking houses are still bullish, and they have many bond issues ready to place. The New York City Bond is a sound security, and will be worth buying when marketed. I am told to always buy Unions or Steels on any relapse in values. Readings and Norfolks are also tipped.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

CANADIAN PACIFICS are still a great market and the price is steady. It is possible that speculators will put the shares much higher, but careful people will decline to go in on the top of such a big rise. In the opinion of those who should know, Canadian Pacifics are now right on the summit. In another year they will have to face steady competition. But Canada grows so fast that the traffic in a year's time may be big enough to keep the C.P.R., Grand Trunk Pacific, and Canadian Northern all three busy.

The RAW RUBBER market was decidedly weak, and though the amount of rubber offered this week was only 380 tons, it could not find buyers, and ordinary sheet only fetched 4s. 6d. The best price, 5s. 6d., obtained was for Linggi smoked sheet. I shall be anxious to note how those companies that sold forward at high prices, such as Straits Bertam and Mount Austen, will fare. Will they be able to enforce their bargains? Grand Centrals are being pushed and puffed. They must be avoided. The estates are much over-capitalised. The shares are not worth par, much less the extravagant premium now demanded. Patalings are now beginning to look cheap. The share market follows the auctions very closely indeed, but if it falls beyond a certain point all the leading shares should be bought. The buying of rubber shares is really a simple matter. Take Parry's A.B.C., allow 1s. per lb. profit for next year and work out the dividend. If it comes to 15 per cent. on the market price the share is cheap. Never be deluded by promises of 600lb. yields. They cannot be obtained. 200lb. an acre will be the average yield all over the Malay; 300lb. on moderately good land and 400lb. on exceptional land. But 600lb. an acre means over-tapping. Never buy into a company that is over-capitalised per acre. Remember that you can bring any decent estate to the producing stage for £35 an acre all told. If the fall continues, rubber shares must be bought as an investment. To-day they are too high. Do not listen to any talk of a new boom. It is most unlikely to come. Never go outside the Malay. We know that the F.M.S. grow good Hevea. Why take risks outside?

The buying of OIL SHARES still continues. Paris is rapidly becoming excited over oil, and most of the large option dealings in Shells, which are mainly responsible for the big rise in this share, are on French account. I see no signs of the oil war ending, but I am told that it will not be carried on with vigour. "The war will smoulder for some time," said our leading oil man to me on Tuesday. Nevertheless the excitement in oil shares may last, for there are many big oil companies ready to come out, and two or three large Galician and Roumanian concerns are talked about in Paris.

KAFFIRS are very steady, and seem to be marked up by the jobbers as a precaution. The English public holds almost as many shares as Paris, and these shares were purchased at very high prices. Therefore I do not anticipate that it will pay many people to realise. I am not confident about a revival in the Kaffir Market. Prices are low, but not too low. There are a few bargains, and if the rise continues another week I will mention them. But to-day I suggest caution.

RHODESIANS always appear about to spring. But they don't. The spurt in Chartered died down. I again advise the magnates—though the mere idea of telling a Rhodesian magnate how to manage a market sounds ridiculous—to put up Chartereds. They are the bell-wether of the flock, and I am sure that the public will not come into this market till they see Chartereds over £2.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

BOOKS RECEIVED

FICTION

The Beauty Doctor. By Florence Warden. Greening and Co. 6s.
Friends of Fate. By Lucas Cleeve. Greening and Co. 6s.
The Justice of the King. By Hamilton Drummond. Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.
Tillers of the Soil. By J. E. Patterson. Wm. Heinemann. 6s.
The Brand of Silence. By Fred M. White. Ward, Lock and Co. 6s.

PERIODICALS

United Empire; Publishers' Circular; Mind; The Bookseller; Willing's Press Guide; Mercure de France; Top-Notch, New York; Book Monthly; Travel and Exploration; People's Magazine; School World; Revue Bleue; Literary Digest; Idler; Tourist Magazine; Smith's Magazine; St. George's Magazine; Hazell's Annual; Economic Review; Book Buyer, N.Y.; Dublin Review; Scottish Historical Review; Peru To-day; N.R.A. Journal; Good Health; University Correspondent; Cambridge University Reporter; The Engineer's Review.

MACMILLAN'S NEW BOOKS

REMINISCENCES.
By GOLDWIN SMITH, D.C.L.
Edited by ARNOLD HAULTAIN, M.A.
Illustrated. 8vo., 10s. net.

THE TIMES.—"All who ever knew Goldwin Smith himself or have been fascinated by the brilliancy, grace, and incisiveness of his writings, all who have ever shared his opinions or recoiled from his prejudices, all who have known anything of the Oxford and the England of his youth and prime, all whom he has influenced on the other side of the Atlantic, will turn to this volume of his 'Reminiscences' with an eager curiosity that will certainly not be disappointed."

I Wonder: Essays for the Young People.
By STEPHEN PAGET, Author of "Confessio Medici," &c. Crown 8vo., 3s. 6d. net.

THE TIMES.—"The chief point is that this little book can be read with interest, and therefore with profit by everybody. . . . A book that is the outcome of such deeply sincere thought and feeling and such ardour and confidence can face any kind of criticism, however captious."

The Young People. By STEPHEN PAGET, Author of "Confessio Medici," &c. Second Edition. Crown 8vo., 3s. 6d. net.

THE ACADEMY.—"This very delightful little volume. . . . We wish heartily that every one who has ever repulsed a child's questionings, or sent it off as a 'troublesome brat' or a 'little nuisance,' could read this series of essays; he or she would receive lessons in tact and management which could not by any chance be tedious or give offence, since the grace of a ready pen and the relief of a genuinely humorous and tender outlook on life informs it from cover to cover."

BOOKS ON APPROVAL

BOOKBUYERS are informed that any volume published by MACMILLAN & Co., LTD. (current novels excepted), will be sent on approval, on the understanding that, if it is not purchased, it is returned uncut and in good condition, and that the cost of carriage both ways is defrayed by the customer. Applications for Books on approval must NOT be addressed to the Publishers, but to a retail bookseller, through whom the transaction must take place.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

- AN - URGENT DEMAND
For Good Work has reached us.

AUTHORS should write, enclosing MSS., AT ONCE.

THE ATHENÆUM LITERARY AGENCY,
Bloomsbury Mansions, 25, Hart Street, W.C.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

CONSULT

The Gresham

On all Matters of

LIFE, FIRE & ACCIDENT INSURANCE.

Many Special Features.

Liberal Terms to recognised Brokers and Agents.

HEAD OFFICES:

ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE, POULTRY, LONDON, E.C.

JAMES H. SCOTT, General Manager.

BRANCH OFFICE:

119, HIGH HOLBORN.

ARTHUR LANGHAM, District Manager.

FREE INSURANCE COUPON
(Not to be detached).

The Gresham Fire and Accident Insurance Society, Limited,

of
ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE, POULTRY, LONDON, E.C., will pay

£100 (One hundred pounds) to the legal personal representative of the bonâ fide holder of this Coupon, if he or she be killed solely and directly by an accident within the United Kingdom to any Railway Company's Train, a Tramcar, Omnibus, Cab, or other Licensed Vehicle plying for public hire, in which the holder is travelling as an ordinary ticket-bearing or fare-paying passenger, subject always to the following special conditions which are to be taken as incorporated in the contract:—

(a) That death result within thirty days after the accident (b) that notice thereof be given within seven days to the Society at its Head Office in London (c) that such reasonable evidence of the cause of death be given as the Society may require (d) that the holder shall have written in ink prior to the accident his or her usual signature in the space provided therefor (e) that the Society shall not be liable to any one person in respect of more than one Coupon in this or any other publication (f) that this insurance shall not be available to persons under twelve or over seventy years of age, and shall hold good until Sat., Jan. 28, 1911.

Signature of Holder .....

Address .....

BOOKS.—ALL OUT-OF-PRINT and RARE BOOKS on any subject SUPPLIED. The most expert bookfinder extant. Please state wants and ask for CATALOGUE. I make a special feature of exchanging any Saleable Books for others selected from my various Lists. Special List of 2,000 Books I particularly want post free.—EDW. BAKER'S Great Bookshop, 14-16, John Bright St., Birmingham. Lord Leighton's Life, Work, Letters, 2 vols., 42s. for 18s. 6d.; Dewhurst Impressionist Painting, 25s. for 8s.; George Eliot's Works, 21 vols., 52s. 6d. for 35s.; Vernon Lee's 18th Century in Italy, 21s. for 9s.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, LTD.,
30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET, W.C.
Only 48, Queen Victoria Street, E.C.
Branches 132, Kensington High Street, W.

NEW BOOKS LESS THAN HALF-PRICE.

		Offered at s.	d.	Published at s.	d.
CRISPI, FRANCESCO, Italian Insurgent		1	9	7	6
GRAFTON, THIRD DUKE, AUTO. AND LETTERS		3	6	18	0
HARVARD, JOHN, AND HIS TIMES		3	3	7	6 net.
STEPHEN, SIR JAMES FITZJAMES, LIFE by his brother Leslie Stephen		5	0	16	0
THIEBAULT, BARON, MEMOIRS OF, 2 Vols. trans.		7	6	28	0
YOUNG, ARTHUR, AUTO. OF, Ed. M. Betham Edwards		4	9	12	6

Full List Free on Application.

BOOKS, Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold, and Exchanged. Monthly Catalogues Free. Libraries purchased, catalogued, arranged, or valued.—Thomas Thorp, 93, St. Martin's Lane, W.C. (and at Reading).

TO PHOTOGRAPHERS, ARTISTS, and DESIGNERS.—Photographs, Studies, and Designs wanted, suitable for pictorial postcard publication, particularly applicable to Coronation year. Address N. P. O. 1441, Sell's Advertising Offices, Fleet Street, London.

HOW TO WRITE FOR THE PRESS OR TO BECOME AN AUTHOR.

Interesting and useful Booklet free.

"H," LITERARY CORRESPONDENCE COLLEGE,
9, Arundel Street, W.C.

GERMAN wishes to correspond with ENGLISHMAN, to exchange German for English. Correction reciprocal. Write to Mr. G. Wolfram, Weingarten 3, Quedlinburg (Germany).

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references.—Address Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

Now on Sale. 6d. net. The January

BOOK MONTHLY.

Contents:

PERSONAL AND PARTICULAR. The Gossip of the Hour in the Republic of Authors.

A PARIS LUCKY-BAG. Book-Hunting on the Grey Banks of the Seine.—By Frederic Lees.

WHAT'S IN A WORD! Why Some English Sounds are a Delight to Hear.—By F. M. Wells.

THE SPINSTER HEROINE. Or a Poetic Quest for the Woman of Sweet-and-Forty-Five.

A LONDON LETTER. Touching the Book Effects of a General Election.—By the Editor.

SHAKSPERE, A.B. Was the Poet Seven Years Afloat on the Ocean Wave?—By J. E. Patterson.

NEW YEAR READING. The People and Plots of Seven of the Winter Novels.—By C. E. Lawrence.

A STATE OF THE REALM. The Craft of Bookselling and its Story in England.

LIVES OF GREAT MEN. Why Some of the Winter Memoirs have been Successful.

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY. Particulars of Interesting Volumes likely to be Published this Month.

BOOKS OF THE MONTH. A Chronicle of the Noteworthy Publications of December. With a Reviewing Commentary.

THE PERIODICALS. Contents of some January Reviews and Magazines.

Illustrated Supplement: BOOKS OF THE DAY IN PORTRAIT AND PICTURE.

Publishers: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO., Stationers' Hall Court, London,

Who, on receipt of 6d., will send, post-free, a Specimen of the Current Number.

Edward Whistler,

II, Strand, Charing Cross, London.

DIAMOND MERCHANT :: :: JEWELLER & SILVERSMITH.

A large stock of New and Second-hand Diamond and Gem Jewellery, Antique and Modern Silver Plate, always on hand, at bargain prices, for cash.

Fine Pearls, Emeralds, Diamonds, and early specimens of Antique Silver Plate wanted. High Prices given in Cash. Full Value allowed in Exchange.

Valuations made for Probate and other purposes.

GUN DEPARTMENT.

HAMMERLESS SECOND-HAND GUNS,

British Made, from £6 10s.

Nitro Proof. The Cheapest Gun in the Market combined with Quality.

ALSO

HAMMERLESS EJECTORS,

By Best London Makers, at Greatly Reduced Prices.

CORDITE RIFLES, ·400, ·500, ·600 Bores.

Catalogue and Price List on Application Gratis.

Telephone No.: 2033 GERRARD.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

QUEEN'S HALL.

SOLE LESSEES - - - Messrs. CHAPPELL & CO., LTD.

WITH THE APPROVAL OF

THEIR MAJESTIES THE KING AND QUEEN, and under the immediate patronage of

THEIR ROYAL AND SERENE HIGHNESSES

THE DUKE AND DUCHESS OF TECK

AND

PRINCE ALEXANDER & PRINCESS ALEXANDER OF TECK

(Chairman of the Hospital)

A Special Performance of

VERDI'S REQUIEM

TO BENEFIT

The Prince Francis of Teck Memorial Fund

In Aid of The Middlesex Hospital.

Soloists—Miss ALYS BATEMAN.

Miss HANNAH JONES.

Mr. BEN DAVIES.

Mr. EDMUND BURKE (By permission of the Grand Opera Syndicate),

AND

THE BRIGHTON FESTIVAL ORCHESTRA AND CHORUS

(500 PERFORMERS).

CONDUCTOR—MR. JOSEPH SAINTON.

TUESDAY EVENING, JANUARY 24th, 1911, at 8.

TICKETS: 21/-, 10/6, 7/6, 5/-, 2/6, & 1/-.

To be obtained at Chappell's Box Office, Queen's Hall (open 10 to 8), and 50, New Bond Street; at the Army and Navy Stores; Ashton's; Civil Service Stores; Cramer & Co.; District Messenger Co.; Harrod's Stores; Hays; Keith, Prowse & Co.; Lacon and Ollier; Leader & Co.; Morley and Son (Blackheath); Phillips, Alfred (Ealing); Cecil Roy; Steinway Hall Box Office; Webster and Girling; Webster and Waddington; White, George; W. M. Power, Victoria Gallery. 123, Victoria Street, Westminster, S.W.; Messrs. Lyon and Hall, Warwick Mansion, Brighton; Messrs. R. Potts & Co., 167, North Street, Brighton; and of

CHAPPELL'S MUSICAL AGENCY,

12, GEORGE STREET, HANOVER SQUARE, W.

Telephone: 2683 MAYFAIR.

Printed and Published for the Proprietor by ODHAMS, LTD., 25, Floral Street, Covent Garden, and 67, Long Acre, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

COLLEGE LIBRARY,
Pa. State College.

THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE

No. 2021 [Registered as a Newspaper.] JANUARY 28, 1911 PRICE THREEPENCE

Sheffield Simplex

INDEPENDENT TESTIMONY.

The following query was published in the "Autocar," December 17th, 1910:—

No. 1593.—45 H.P. "SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX."

"Will any private reader kindly give their experiences with above cars as to reliability, upkeep, &c.?—J. C. S." And elicited the following replies:—

December 31st, 1910.

"I have had a 45 H.P. 'Sheffield-Simplex' of the GEAR-BOX-LESS type in my possession for two years, and, apart from one or two trifling mishaps to start with, I have always found the car most reliable. If 'J. C. S.' wants a six-cylinder car in which power is not sacrificed for quite unnecessary silence, he could not do better than get a 'Sheffield-Simplex.' The car is as silent as any reasonable man who is not suffering from 'Silent-Knightis' can want, the engine being scarcely audible when the car is in motion. The GEAR-BOX-LESS system works perfectly, the emergency gear never being required except for starting and hills of about 1 in 8 or steeper gradient. Hills like Reigate, which cannot be rushed, offer no obstacle with a car weighing 34 cwt. and four passengers. The upkeep for a car of its size is most reasonable. I have done 6,000 miles on one pair of tyres, and 7,000 miles on another. The petrol consumption works out at about 15 miles to the gallon on a journey of over 100 miles give-and-take roads in the summer. I have always found the Company most obliging in every way. In conclusion, I am certain that there is no car on the road at present of the same cylinder capacity that can better it over a give-and-take road."—R. H. T.

December 31st, 1910.

"As an owner of a 45 H.P. 'GEAR-BOX-LESS' 'Sheffield-Simplex' Car, I can honestly do nothing but praise the car. The petrol consumption on a fair run is thirteen or fourteen miles per gallon. On tyres the car is extremely light. I have done 3,000 miles on driving wheels with grooved Dunlops, and the tyres are not ready for retreading yet. The throttle arrangement is very convenient, and every part of the car is splendidly made and finished. For running-power I do not think the 'Sheffield-Simplex' can be beaten, and hills make very little difference to it; it is very rarely that the emergency gear is required. I really think this is a beautifully made car, and a treat to drive, and whoever buys one cannot fail to be pleased with the results, if my experience can be taken as a criterion."—DERBYSHIRE.

Catalogue post-free on application to Dept. "L."

SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX MOTOR WORKS, Ltd.

TINSLEY, SHEFFIELD, ENGLAND.

London Depôt: c/o MULLINERS, Ltd., 132-135, LONG ACRE, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE & BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC

OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO AND . . THROUGH CANADA. . .

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service viâ Vancouver.

For further particulars, apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,

62-65, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON, E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street, Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE

TO

SOUTH and EAST AFRICA.

WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.

Viâ the SUEZ CANAL.

Calling at MARSEILLES and NAPLES.

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.

(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—

DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.

Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE PLEASURE CRUISES

LIVERPOOL

to the

MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC

by the

"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"

Saxonia Leaves Liverpool 9 Feb., 1911.
Carpathia " " 2 Mch., 1911.

Ports of Call . . .

CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS, MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA, ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME, PALERMO, NAPLES.

For full particulars apply—

THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

THE

"EMPIRE ILLUSTRATED."

The Tariff Reform Monthly.

40 pages.

Profusely Illustrated.

Interesting to every Unionist and Imperialist and convincing to Liberals and Little Englanders.

Price 3d.

P & O Passenger Services.

EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA, JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports

(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)

Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises

Throughout the Year, according to Season.

AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE, NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.

Programme on Application.

For Passage, Freight and all information apply—

PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,

122 Leadenhall Street, E.C., or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours

R.M.S.P. THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY.

(Royal Charter dated 1839.)

Fortnightly Sailings from Southampton to—

ARGENTINA & BRAZIL

via SPAIN & PORTUGAL.

WEST INDIES, BRITISH GUIANA, SPANISH MAIN, CENTRAL AMERICA, NEW YORK.

From LONDON to—

MOROCCO & CANARY ISLANDS,

EGYPT, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA & JAPAN.
(By Shire Line.)

For further particulars apply to

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY

18, Moorgate Street, E.C., & 32, Cockspur Street, S.W.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

CONTENTS.

	Page
Review of the Week.....	91
The South Wind	92
The Meeting of Parliament	92
The Closing of the Scheldt	93
Reviews:—
Ainsworth and his Friends	95
The Super-Teacher ...	95
Travels in Asia Minor	97
Art and the Twentieth Century	98
The Kingdom of Pharmacy	99
Shell and Kernel	99
Shorter Reviews	100
Fiction	102
A New Philosophy	104
Talks with Matthew Arnold	106
India: A Series	107
The Theatre	108
Hercules Unwrought ...	110
Claptrap, Unlimited	111
Some Art Exhibitions ...	112
The Day Before Yesterday	113
Royal Colonial Institute	114
The London Institution	115
In the Temple of Mammon	115
Correspondence	117
Books Received	118

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

THE ACADEMY is published by MESSRS. ODHAMS, LIMITED, 67, Long Acre, London, W.C., to whom all letters with reference to publication must be addressed.

Applications referring to Advertisements may be addressed to MESSRS. ODHAMS, as above.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

THE ACADEMY is now obtainable at Messrs. W. H. Smith & Sons, Messrs. Wyman's, and Messrs. Willing's bookstalls and shops.

Next week we shall publish the first of a Series of Articles by MR. HILAIRE BELLOC.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

IT is officially announced that the Canadian and American Commissioners have arrived at a provisional understanding regarding a Reciprocity Treaty to regulate trade between Canada and the United States. The details are at present lacking, and will not be known until the full text of the Treaty is published at Washington and Ottawa next week. But it is the principle involved, and not the actual details, which is of such vital importance to the people of this country. We shall not know until we see the text of the Treaty whether it will have an injurious effect on our trade—it is hardly conceivable that it can have a beneficial—but it is one of the gravest dangers which we Tariff Reformers have never ceased to point out—namely, that if we continue to offer the cold shoulder to our Colonies and Dependencies and refuse to enter into reciprocal arrangements with them, they in self-defence must form commercial alliances with nations who, if on excellent terms with us, are at least our competitors in the world's markets. But for party prejudice and obsolete Cobdenism, we should long ago have had reciprocity, not only with Canada, but also with Australia and South Africa. Now we must face the possibility of seeing American goods enter Canada on better terms than our own. How long are the British public prepared to put up with this deplorable ineptitude and lack of foresight?

Rijaat Pasha, the Turkish Foreign Minister, made a statement in the Chamber on Saturday with reference to Turko-German relations as affected by the Russo-German agreement respecting Persia and the Baghdad Railway. He communicated to the Chamber the assurance of Baron Marschall von Biberstein, the German Ambassador, that Turkish interests would in no wise suffer by the Russo-German rapprochement. Rijaat Pasha then dealt with Turkey's sovereign rights in the Persian Gulf, and emphasised the excellent relations existing between Turkey and Great Britain. He declared that all outstanding questions could, and would, be settled by friendly negotiations. This statement has been well received in Turkey. This is all highly satisfactory as far as it goes, but Sir Edward Grey must not forget that Great Britain also has rights and interests in the Persian Gulf which she cannot afford to overlook. The opening of a new highway to the East is a matter of vital importance to the future security of our Indian Empire. The control of the terminus of that line at Basra must be either in our hands, or its neutrality in the event of a European war guaranteed by the Powers. Many years must elapse before the line is completed, and many changes may come over the international stage, but we in England must keep our eyes fixed on that little-known port, which is destined in the future to be the gate to the highroad to India. We must remain the holders of the key.

According to the Daily Mail's Bloemfontein correspondent, when General Botha leaves to attend the Imperial Conference in April next, he will carry with him the outline of a South African Defence Scheme for submission to the naval and military experts of the Empire. It will be based on a compulsory adult liability for service, but no standing force will be called into being. The meaning of this last sentence is not very clear, but probably there will be no long service army even for those who wish to make it their profession, and adults will be only called upon to go through the various training camps and annual manœuvres. But there must be permanent establishments for the officers and training staffs, and also, we should have thought, for the artillery engineers. A staff college is, therefore, to be established for this purpose. The scheme is at present in a nebulous state, and we await further information with interest. Australia and New Zealand prepared the way for compulsory service. South Africa is shortly to follow their example. England alone hangs back. What will arouse us from our foolish dream of false pride and fancied security? The writing on the wall is clear enough: "Mene, mene, tekel, upharsin." Are we only to understand these words when it is too late: "You have been weighed in the balance and found wanting"?

On Saturday last the Japanese Diet was opened. The Marquis Katsura, the Premier and Minister of Finance, declared in his opening speech that Japan's relations with all the Powers were cordial, and that the British Alliance was "gaining with age." He expected to complete new treaties with all the Powers "without difficulty." This is most satisfactory especially if it foreshadows a better understanding with the United States. The Island Empire seems to have passed out of the cycle of depression which followed the Russo-Japanese war, and the finances are, as far as we can judge, in a highly satisfactory state. The ordinary receipts for the year amounted to £49,200,000, and the extraordinary to £5,900,000—total, £55,100,000; while the ordinary expenditure amounted to £40,700,000, and the extraordinary expenditure to £14,400,000—total, £55,100,000. No less a sum than £19,300,000 has been appropriated to the prevention of flood damage. The supplementary naval expenditure for the year amounted to £1,400,000. During the next six years £27,400,000 will be appropriated for railway improvements. The increase of trade for the past year amounted to no less than £48,000,000, to which manufactories contributed £14,000,000. Marquis Katsura had every right to congratulate the country on its great prosperity. Free Traders might note that Japan is a highly-protected country which has recently been raising her tariffs.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

For real progressive methods commend us to an American Court of Justice. Mrs. Schenck is being tried at Wheeling, Virginia, for poisoning her millionaire husband with a cocktail flavoured with arsenic. It seems such a strange and unnatural charge to bring against a woman—namely, killing a husband who was also a millionaire. It is quite refreshing to find some one who refuses to bend the knee to the God of Wealth. But in America the millionaire is not such a rara avis, and his life is apparently not regarded as so sacred. We confess to having tasted almost every variety of cocktail, but never one made of arsenic; the others, however, seemed poisonous enough. Mrs. Schenck's counsel deny that she had any intention of killing her husband. They say that he took the arsenic as a medicine for an internal complaint, and that she is the victim of a conspiracy. They called medical witnesses to testify to this, and one of them was challenged by the prosecuting counsel to drink the cocktail if it was as harmless as he declared it to be. The heroic doctor promptly complied with the request, and suffered no harm. The jury were then invited to taste, and, trembling with fear, they took the fatal draught, and likewise suffered no harm. But the Judge, with his eyes fixed on a pension in the near future, refused to touch Mrs. Schenck's loving-cup. This experiment opens up boundless possibilities for future criminal trials. When the jury are invited to experiment on themselves with revolvers, bowie-knives, anarchists' bombs, hyoscine, and other poisons, the service ought to become even more popular than it is at present.

Petitions are coming from all parts of the Empire against the ratification of the Declaration of London. It seems incredible that a British representative could ever have appended his signature to such a document. The main features of the Declaration are these: 1. It permits in effect the capture of all foodstuffs on the way to Great Britain in neutral ships. 2. It admits the principle of the destruction of neutral prizes. 3. It fails to forbid the conversion at sea of merchantmen into commerce destroyers. 4. It limits the powers of a blockading force in time of war. Before the Declaration can take effect as far as the country is concerned the Naval Prize Bill must be passed, which will subordinate the judicature of the British Admiralty Prize Courts and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council to the new International Prize Court which is to administer the Declaration of London. As it stands the Declaration may be said to benefit every Power except ourselves. We shall propose to deal fully with the matter in a special article next week.

Since we wrote the above the Daily Mail makes the important announcement that the Government has decided to postpone the ratification of the Declaration of London until the Agreement has been submitted to a discussion by the Imperial Conference which meets in London in May. The universal agitation against the measure has had its effect, and the Naval Prize Bill, without which the Declaration falls to the ground, will not be introduced and discussed in the House until after the Dominions have given their verdict. We see in this common-sense arrangement how easily and how satisfactorily we can manage our Imperial affairs once they are removed from the sphere of party politics.

THE SOUTH WIND

When Winter's dying thy flags are flying
From casements of the sun;
In lonely valleys thine army rallies,
And Snow Kings, one by one,
Go northward dashing, with hail-flights flashing
Like arrows as they run.

Thy sportive minions on sun-warmed pinions
Follow the storm, until
With cry and caper and flame-tipped taper
They leap on vale and hill,
And shout with delight while setting alight
Crocus and daffodil.

O'er surf-fringe foaming thy zephyrs roaming
Ruffle the long lagoon;
In chanting legions they rush through regions
Where fireflies flit at noon;
The Sphinx unsleeping can hear them sweeping
Soft lyres beneath the moon.

In trancéd measures they tread where treasures
Are hid in coral caves;
They pine for flowers from secret bowers
That bloom beneath dim waves,
Where dead men driven by tides are given
Pearl palaces for graves.

When Summer's dying thy hosts are flying
Back to their old domain,
Through leafy millions that dance cotillions
In mists of silver rain,
And fade fast under the shaking thunder
And frantic hurricane.

E. A. M.

THE MEETING OF PARLIAMENT

At present there are no barometric indications of the course of policy and affairs in the coming Session. It is impossible to predict whether storm or calm will prevail. That unusually grave questions, foreign and domestic, will present themselves for solution is abundantly clear. It will be of absorbing interest to observe whether the present Parliament vindicates its existence by rising to occasion, or condemns itself by the most miserable spectacle of all—a collection of individuals obviously unequal to the responsibilities which have fallen to their lot—

> "To be weak is miserable
> Doing or suffering: but of this be sure
> To do aught good never will be our task,
> But ever to do ill our sole delight."

Absit omen! May the Parliament about to assemble never seek to attract to itself the gospel of Milton's magnificent Arch-Enemy!

In the sphere of Foreign Affairs the Opposition may be confidently relied on to maintain patriotic reserve and to give general support to Sir Edward Grey and the sane elements in the Ministerial majority. In the sphere of domestic politics less restraint will be observed. Many measures of a highly contentious character will be introduced amongst which are generally mentioned the Parliament Bill, Payment of Members, and the Abolition of Plural Voting.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The Parliament Bill ought not to be proceeded with. It was introduced in a hurry, rather as an indication of the views of the Government than as a coherent and well-considered scheme. The Government have had plenty of time to formulate their Bill for the reform of the Second Chamber, and they ought to be forced by relentless pressure to produce it. The recital in the preamble of the Parliament Bill that the substitution of a Second Chamber based on a popular instead of an hereditary basis cannot immediately be brought into operation has ceased to be valid as a dilatory plea. It was introduced when there was in some quarters a passionate demand for a declaration of policy on the part of the Government—a declaration which it was believed would profoundly stir the people.

The Parliament Bill was produced professedly as a stop-gap. The people were not only unmoved, but, as was shown by the result of the General Election, were absolutely cold and indifferent. It was assumed that they demanded something; it was conclusively shown that they made no demand at all. It follows that an inchoate policy has no raison d'être. So far as the electorate are concerned, they are quite willing that the Government shall take ample time to produce a well-considered and coherent scheme. This they must be forced to do, and the House of Lords will be entirely unworthy of its traditions if it does not take a firm stand on that ground.

The Bill for the abolition of plural voting is merely a party move. We think it will affect the balance of votes very little. There are a large number of persons, Cocoa magnates and others, whose sympathies are with the Liberal Party, who are possessed of many votes. The measure is meant to be punitive, but, in effect, we think it will be innocuous. At the same time it is not demanded by reason, as Parliamentary representation has, at least in theory, a local as well as a national basis. All will agree that the creation of faggot-votes is a fraud on the representative system, but multiplied voting power in respect of property honestly held in divers places is strictly compatible with the representative principle.

The question of the payment of Members is in no way a burning one. It may conceal a craven desire to avoid the necessity of a decision to introduce legislation to subvert the logical and honest principle contained in the Osborne judgment, otherwise it is a matter which might well be dealt with at the Greek Kalends. It will certainly do nothing to enhance the purity of Parliament, and it will encourage many of the undesirable unemployed to seek Parliamentary honours for mercenary motives. Such a measure will further impose a large and quite unnecessary burden on the taxpayer—which may be interpreted to mean the income-tax payer. The dignity of the House of Commons will inevitably be lowered, independence and uprightness will be subjected to a strain which in not a few cases will lead to deplorable results.

Disraeli in one of his novels dwells on the folly and misery which await the man who enters the Parliamentary arena inadequately endowed with means. Few were in a better position than he to speak with authority on that subject. It is well known that M. Clemenceau forfeited the Presidency of the Chamber because he lost the vote of a deputy whom he had mercilessly assailed because he observed him transferring cakes from the buffet to his pockets. The deputy was a paid member, but the pay was just sufficient to lure him into a position in which, if he had not had a family, he might have starved with every appearance of decorum. A bachelor can live in a garret and dine on a crust, wrote Bulwer Lytton. Tragedy occurs when dependents have to be provided for. The French deputy purloined the cakes because his children were starving. In our opinion, payment of members will not be a blessing—even in disguise.

For the rest there is no reason to anticipate violent action on the part of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He will have a comfortable surplus derived from an unabated income-tax. How he will dispose of that surplus will be a criterion of his financial honesty and capacity. We have no desire to predicate that his action will be other than such as justice and wisdom dictate.

Outside of the sphere of Foreign Affairs, which are undoubtedly threatening, we think that an interval of comparative tranquillity will succeed the storms through which we have recently passed, and for the continuance of which the people have not evinced a vestige of a desire.

THE CLOSING OF THE SCHELDT

By E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT

The agitation which has arisen throughout Europe over the proposed fortification of the Dutch coast, and more especially of Flushing, which guards the mouth of the Scheldt, has somewhat subsided because a general impression is gaining ground to the effect that, owing to international complications, the Bill providing £3,000,000 for this purpose will not be proceeded with. The Dutch Parliament will be well advised if it adopts this course, and Holland will prove herself a true champion of the peace of Europe. The Hague is the home of the Temple of International Amity, and it would hardly be becoming for the guardians of so sacred a shrine to throw the apple of discord amongst the nations who have undertaken to try and settle their disputes at the Hague Tribunal.

The questions involved, if the scheme is carried into effect, are of the gravest consequence to this country, and they affect in a lesser degree the interests of France and of Belgium. The real issue, however, is between ourselves and Germany; Holland is but a pawn in the game, and Germany wishes to move that pawn to her own advantage. But as the conflicting interests of England and Germany can have no official recognition among the nations until they pass beyond the nebulous stage of misunderstanding and innuendo and assume some concrete shape, issues of secondary importance have been raised by France, who is playing the rôle of second to England in her duel with Germany.

By the Treaty of 19th April, 1839, the neutrality of Belgium in the event of a European war was guaranteed by England, Austria, France, Holland, Germany, and Russia. Now M. Pichon, as the spokesman of France—and Belgium taking her cue from her Gallic neighbour—maintain that the proposed fortification of Flushing, which commands the mouth of the Scheldt, and consequently the approaches to Antwerp, is incompatable with the Treaty of 1839. The reasons are these: If in the event of a European war the neutrality of Belgium is violated—and in the present grouping of the Powers only Germany and Holland can be the aggressors—it may be necessary for one of the guarantors to come to her assistance, and here again, in the present state of Europe, the only Powers capable of throwing a protecting army into Belgium would be France or England; then, if the mouth of the Scheldt is closed by the fort of Flushing, it would be impossible for England to come to Belgium's assistance.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

This argument is of course a little thin, because in the event of such a contingency an Anglo-French army—always assuming the entente was still maintained—would probably march by way of the Franco-Belgium frontier rather than by Antwerp. The reasons for this are obvious: (1) The sea-route from Dover, where the transports would assemble, to Calais is far shorter than from the Thames to Antwerp. (2) The duty of guarding the transports in the narrowest part of the Channel could be far more easily undertaken by the British Fleet than if they were exposed to attack in crossing the North Sea. (3) A junction could be formed at once with the French army and combined operations undertaken; whereas if a British army landed at Antwerp and a French army moved across the Franco-Belgium frontier they would stand the risk of being separated by a German army hastily thrown into Belgium, in just the same manner as Napoleon endeavoured to separate the English and Prussian armies in the campaign of Waterloo. (4) In the event of defeat the combined Anglo-French army would have a line of retreat across the Franco-Belgium frontier, whereas a British army defeated at Antwerp would either have to stand a siege or retire across the North Sea, and such an operation would, for the time being, paralyse the action of our Fleet and narrow its radius of operations. Thus M. Pichon's contention will hardly bear close examination, but in lieu of a better it has served its purpose in bringing the whole question into the sphere of examination and discussion.

Naturally, not one of the Powers considers the question simply on its merits—that is to say, whether it is incompatible with the due observance of the Treaty of 19th April, 1839. No one is interested in that purely academic question. The Powers take sides in the usual manner—namely, the Triple Alliance, Germany, Austria, and Italy, are ranged against the Triple Entente, England, France, and Russia. We can eliminate those who have no direct interest at stake—that is to say, Russia, Austria, and Italy—and we find the old rivals, as usual, face to face—viz., England and France versus Germany, with the two pawns Belgium and Holland, the former lined up with England and France, and the latter hesitating what course to adopt, but at present inclined to side with Germany.

Germany assumes the familiar rôle of a disinterested spectator, and declares that she has no right or power to interfere with the internal affairs of another country, and as a natural corollary denies that France has any right to interfere in a purely domestic question affecting Holland alone. France, on the other hand, asks for a general discussion among the Signatories to the Treaty of 1839 before the proposed scheme is developed.

But the true issue is not, as we have already pointed out, the possible violation of the Treaty of 1839, and consequently of Belgium's neutrality. The real issue is the struggle for the mastery and control of the Belgo-Dutch seaboard between England and Germany. The coastline of Belgium and Holland is of vital importance to both Powers in the event of war, but more especially to Germany, as it would provide her with a base for her fleet, and, should the opportunity arise, for an invading army, closer to the British coast than any of her own ports. Assuming that the neutrality of Belgium is respected, there is nothing to prevent Germany from throwing an army into Holland and occupying Flushing, the mouth of the Scheldt, Schevingen and Texel, except the resistance that the Dutch Army could oppose to her, and this would be slight. If Holland were once occupied by Germany, she would never be given up, and would speedily be incorporated into the German Empire, and we should have the enemy at our very doors. Therefore, in the event of war, the only means by which we could prevent this catastrophe would be by seizing strategical points on the coast and by throwing an army into Holland to resist any force which Germany—presumably engaged elsewhere with France—could spare in that quarter.

Up to this year Holland has acted on the assumption that the only enemy she is likely to have to face must come from the German frontier, and consequently she has annually devoted a sum of money towards keeping her forts on that frontier in good repair. But lately German military instructors have been called in to reorganise her Army, and these gentlemen have not unnaturally endeavoured to stop the further fortification of the Dutch-German frontier and to divert the money towards the protection of the coastline against a possible British invasion or occupation. The issue in brief is this: England wishes to see a strongly fortified Dutch-German frontier, so as to give her time to throw a covering army into Holland; Germany wishes to see a strongly fortified Dutch seaboard which will prevent England from undertaking any such operations, and which will also give Germany time to overrun Holland and to occupy the Scheldt and Flushing, and thus obtain a base close to the Channel from which she may operate against these Islands.

If Holland continues with her coast defence scheme she can only be regarded as having definitely joined the Triple Alliance, and must henceforth be numbered amongst our enemies in the event of a European war. There are semi-official rumours to the effect that if the Bill becomes law England, France, Russia, and Belgium will withdraw from the Hague Conference and Arbitration Courts on the ground that the venue is no longer suitable or neutral for the exercising of impartial justice between the nations. Holland gains not only in political and moral prestige, but also very materially, from these important peace and arbitration meetings, and the long-headed Dutch will surely hesitate before sacrificing the substance for the shadow of a very empirical advantage. There is also another grave problem. What effect would a rupture of our friendly relations with the Netherlands have on the South African settlement just at a moment when we propose to withdraw our garrisons and leave South Africa to look after herself?

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

REVIEWS

AINSWORTH AND HIS FRIENDS

[Second Notice.]

William Harrison Ainsworth and his Friends. By S. M. Ellis. Two Vols. (John Lane. 32s. net.)

In spite of the streak of arbitrariness in his disposition, Ainsworth had a delightfully pleasing habit of giving way when the affair in question was of no really serious import. His tact and self-control are always remarkable. So about Forster, Dickens's biographer, he says he cannot explain the secret of his influence over people:—

> He had a knack of making people do as he liked, whether they liked it or not. It was difficult at times to put up with the bluster of the "arbitrary one."

When two such pronounced characters met that is easy to understand. Ainsworth was fond of retailing a story in exemplification of the way in which Forster would autocratically have his own way. Our author, who had a fine taste in the Arts, had been fortunate enough to come upon a set of Hogarth's engravings, which he was anxious to purchase. But, like most other men of letters, he often had not any considerable sum of money at his disposal. And the price of the engravings was five pounds. He could not just then spare the amount. However, in Ainsworth's own words—

> I took John Forster down to see the Hogarths, whereupon he actually said that he would, and must, have them himself, and as he had not five pounds of loose money at that moment, I should lend the money to him. I pointed out the absurdity of the position—that I wanted the engravings for myself, and could not afford to lay out the money; how, then, could I lend it to him? It was of no use. He overruled me, had the five pounds of me, and bought the Hogarths I was longing for.

This, it will be admitted, must have been a somewhat severe test of temper, and Ainsworth comes out of the ordeal with flying colours.

The romancer's descriptions and estimates of some of his famous contemporaries are full of spirit, vivid, always good-natured, generally appreciative. Christopher North, whom Tennyson disdainfully jeered at as "Crusty Christopher," Ainsworth declared to be "a yellow-haired, good-humoured, pleasant, jocund man." So do we find in men what we have in ourselves! In 1836, when Browning was encountering his usual difficulties in the way of getting his poetry published—"Sordello" was then in question—Ainsworth thus depicts and appreciates the then comparatively unknown poet:—

> He is full of genius. In appearance he might pass for a son of Paganini, and Maclise and we must hide our diminished heads before his superabundant black locks—while even your whiskers are insignificant compared with his lion-like ruff.

There were not many who recognised Browning as a genius in those days.

While our author was still almost in his boyhood he had with characteristic ardour and impetuosity struck up a correspondence with Charles Lamb, for whose work he felt the greatest admiration. When he finally left Manchester and settled in London, Ainsworth eagerly seized the opportunity of making the personal acquaintance of his idol. What happened is what, unfortunately, happens only too often in such instances. He thought to find a demigod; instead of which—

> A visit which I paid to Charles Lamb the other night has given the death-blow to my admiration of literary men What a bonâ fide Cockney he is!

When we recall, in connection with this estimate of a young "buck" Carlyle's confirmatory, though far more contemptuous opinion of the same writer as a personality, we must admire Ainsworth's impartial acuteness of intelligence. His profound admiration did not obscure for a moment his powers of clear-sighted observation.

One last pen-portrait by Ainsworth may be given as a taste of his quality. The book is full of good things of this graphic kind. As a precocious youth, endowed with abundance of this world's goods, a handsome physique, splendid audacity, and liberty to do pretty well as he pleased, our future author went to Edinburgh. The renowned "Blackwood's Magazine" was in the full swing of its successful career. Ainsworth promptly got to know the chief contributors, and thus irreverently visualises the famous Blackwood himself:—

> This man of the inexpressible visage—for never before saw I such a one, with those funny teeth of his, that queer one eyebrow up and down.

Which is, we venture to think, wonderfully clever for a youth not yet out of his teens.

Ainsworth gave magnificent proof of his innate good-humour and courage during the latter half of his long life. It ended, as so many lives, especially literary lives, do—pathetically, almost tragically. He had, indeed, occasion to practise some of his most sterling qualities merely to endure the situation in which he found himself. After 1848, the date of "The Lancashire Witches," or at latest 1851, few people read what he wrote and fewer cared. It was one of the completest literary eclipses on record; it was completer than that of Martin Tupper or, magna componere parvis, that of Milton. He was unlucky in being fated to encounter a perfect galaxy of literary stars of larger magnitude. He was utterly wiped out, forgotten—to all interests and purposes dead.

His last festal, dinner-giving days were at Brighton. From there he retired to live the life of a recluse at Tunbridge Wells, where the only incident we hear of in his connection is a complaint of his house-agent that his numerous books are so heavy as to make the floor bulge in his library and the ceiling fall. Still he preserves a serene, unembittered demeanour to the outer world. It is a marvel of fortitude, of truly heroic endurance, under a wellnigh ignominious dismissal and entire neglect! Not long before his death there occurred in 1881 the public banquet at Manchester in his honour. He had outlived all his notable contemporaries. What his feelings must have been!

So ruthless had been Ainsworth's ostracism from the republic of letters, so long dead had he been to the world, that as early as 1860, at a dinner given at Teddington by Frederic Chapman, the publisher, when Browning told Forster he had met Ainsworth, "a sad, forlorn-looking being," who had recalled the old days of joy to him, Forster, Ainsworth's former intimate friend, exclaimed—"Harrison Ainsworth! Good Heavens! Is he still alive?"

Such a word from a "friend" is the slab on one's grave.

THE SUPER-TEACHER

Day and Evening Schools. By F. H. Hayward, D.Lit., M.A., B.Sc. (Ralph, Holland and Co. 5s. net.)

Dr. Hayward is an able man, and from one point of view has written a very clever book—far too clever. It is altogether beyond the capacity of the average teacher in our elementary day-schools, who has not yet "become the professor of an esoteric system of specialised psychological knowledge" (!) We sincerely hope he never will. But until he does, he will certainly not grasp the meaning of many of Dr.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Hayward's complex notions of scientific education so-called. The nomenclature and phraseology alone would be unintelligible. "Atavistic," "heuristic," "humanistic," "rudimentary apperception masses," "correlation formula"—"automatism," "pragmatism"—what do words like these connote to the ordinary elementary teacher? Or the sensori-motor or idea-motor processes and other like terminology of the Herbartian philosophy?

Ne sutor ultra crepidam. Let elementary teaching be elementary, and more thorough as such, and then we believe that the youth of the country will be better equipped for the self-building of their future education, than by ill-propounded doses and the smatterings of many subjects quite beyond their province.

It seems ludicrous to lament of the modern waiter at the Holborn Restaurant that "rarely does the vision rise before his mind of how some nameless ancestor of his once wandered dinnerless along the seashore, until at length he was pressed by hunger to experiment upon unfamiliar plants," and tried "the wild Brassica oleracea, the ancestral form of the cultivated cabbage." The acquisition of such knowledge would probably make him but an indifferent waiter. In another place Dr. Hayward writes:—

> I would urge, then, that not only should our older pupils be provided with copious materials for the induction of concepts and principles, but that they should know what "induction," "concepts," and "principles" mean, and should have helped to work out many of them. Starting, as our pupils must, from the rough-and-ready psychological concept, they must be helped and encouraged to advance towards the logical concept of exact formulation.

We do not controvert the scientific truth of this proposition. But we quote the passage as typical of a large part of the work, which would need translation to be intelligible to the greater number of our elementary teachers.

Dr. Hayward moves on the exalted plane of a scientific and philosophical expert. Hence the value of his book is limited to the minority. In any case we altogether dissent from many of the methods, and much of the teaching he advocates for primary schools in general. No doubt we need a great advance in specialised teaching for separate locations, a subject not dealt with by Dr. Hayward—engineering and chemistry at Newcastle-on-Tyne, navigation at Sunderland, mechanics at Coventry; but such subjects are out of place in thousands of agricultural district schools, where elder boys should be half-timers, and learn the business of the land, while the girls might learn more of home management. Dr. Hayward himself gives a startling example of the result of pedantic instead of simple teaching. The "production of a boy in a very poor school:"—

> Baal's cheery face was peeping through my bedroom window as Morpheus released his grip which he had on me through the night.

On which he observes "such productions indicate that the adolescent soul is beginning to feel the glory of language and idea." Possibly; but of the type which is the glory of the provincial newspaper.

There are thousands of good masters and mistresses of our elementary schools who have given the children intrusted to them a thoroughly sound basis of elementary instruction together with a careful education in religious, moral, and social duties without that equipment of the "perfect" modern teacher considered necessary by scientific psychological experts and faddists. What do elementary teachers want with the blasphemies of Nietzsche and the pessimism of Maeterlinck, or Schopenhauer? Are they really better equipped for their simple life-duties by studying the revolutionary fantasies of Tolstoy, or even the "wizard-cast illusions" of Messrs. H. G. Wells and Bernard Shaw? Does a morbid psychological introspection make healthy and better citizens? Should we, on entering a school for inspection, be inclined to gauge a head master's teaching capabilities by the pleasing fact that he could render the simple phrase "mental realities" in the following abstruse terminology:—

> They (i.e., mental realities) are sensori-motor circuits of varying complexity, built upon a basis of primitive instincts, but transcending, transmuting, and occasionally even suppressing one or more of these instincts?

Fortunately for our country the majority of teachers hitherto, aided by sound common sense, have been able to rise superior to that artificiality of system which tends to result in the manufacture of prig-children. But there is a danger ahead—the coming to the front of those appalling products of a "little learning"—the prig-teacher and the prig-child—a danger marked in America by the witty parody—

> Twinkle, twinkle, little star,
> I don't wonder what you are,
> For I know so much, you see,
> More of you than you of me.

Dr. Hayward admits that "adolescent crime is increasing in almost all lands, and the fact implies that civilisation, despite its material triumphs, has not yet learnt how to treat youth." It does not occur to him to ask what the revolt, and especially the educational revolt against Christianity, has to do with this degeneration. He is afraid to say anything about the New Testament. He gravely suggests an Adolescent Initiation corresponding to Confirmation—a sort of dedicatory rite to a "patron hero," with the aid of the Tate Gallery; while the Moral Education League, with Browning, Ibsen, Wagner, and Goethe for text-books, may inculcate the New Morality. This entrancing consummation will be reached when the prophecy of Trebell in Mr. Granville Barker's "Waste" is realised—

> I'll buy the Church, not with money, but with the promise of a new life. . . . Disappearance of the parson into the schoolmaster . . . and the Archdeacon into the inspector. What a church could be made of the best brains in England, sworn only to learn all they could, teach what they knew without fear of the future or favour to the past . . . sworn upon their honour to tell no child a lie! It will come.

There is a savour of scholastic self-assurance, not to say megalomania, about this conception of Utopia, only paralleled in another passage, where we read that—

> A century may elapse before the world accepts the verdict of educational science, alien as that verdict is to the views of religious and of irreligious men alike; ultimate acceptance is inevitable.

At the same time there is much in this learned book which is a useful contribution to educational knowledge, however far over the heads of ordinary teachers, and however ambitious—and we believe mistakenly ambitions—many of its methods, its aims, and its suggestions for application to elementary instruction it may be. We may appositely quote again, and hold up to Dr. Hayward as a mirror, his own quotation on the folly of obtruding the intellect into matters best left to routine, which is perhaps psychology's peculiar psychological error:—

> The centipede was happy, quite,
> Until the toad—in fun—
> Said, "Pray, which leg comes after which,
> When you begin to run?"
> This wrought her mind to such a pitch,
> She lay distracted in a ditch,
> Considering "How to run!"

We are threatened with the overbearing superman: the relent--ess super-teacher is a phenomenon awful to contemplate.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

TRAVELS IN ASIA MINOR

Amurath to Amurath. By GERTRUDE LOWTHIAN BELL. Illustrated. (W. Heinemann. 16s. net.)

AN attractive title is an important consideration, but an obscure one may have its disadvantages. "Amurath to Amurath" may be familiar to literary people, but it will be caviare to the general, it will not please the million. Will one person in ten thousand know its origin or its intended meaning? Shakespeare wrote, "Not Amurath an Amurath succeeds, but Harry Harry." As a statement of fact he was right, for among the fifteen Turkish Sultans between 1359 and 1640 only four were named Amurath (same as Murad), and no Amurath succeeded another Amurath. If he meant a continuity of them Shakespeare was wrong. From her Preface, addressed to Lord Cromer, it appears that Miss Bell refers to the "unbroken continuity" of the history of the East. She writes:—"Conqueror follows upon the heels of conqueror, nations are overthrown and cities topple down into the dust, but the conditions of existence are unaltered, and irresistibly they fashion the new age in the likeness of the old. 'Amurath an Amurath succeeds,' and the tale is told again." There is no objection to the view that countries continue their existence although the rulers pass away. But the allusion to Amurath is pointless. They were not continuous; they followed one another at intervals, four Amuraths in 280 years. Quotations should be verified.

But, apart from the title, this book is entirely to be commended. It is an account of five months' journey in 1909 in a part of the world which is full of historical reminiscences and studded with relics of departed greatness. Mesopotamia—not merely because it is a blessed word, as the old lady said—the Euphrates and Tigris, Babylon, Baghdad, Nineveh, and other names of that region, have a fascination of their own—as Egypt also has—from their association with ideas of the antiquity of man, his earliest location in the Paradise of which the fourth river was Euphrates, the great empires which are no more, the battlefields of nations, and the progress of Islam. Mesopotamia, too, is likely to have a more practical and immediate importance in the near future when the decayed system of irrigation which once prevailed there is remodelled, and the large tract of corn-producing land brought under cultivation by Sir William Willcocks' great schemes for the benefit of the Turkish Empire. Miss Bell is to be envied for her enterprising and successful tour in this region, so full of monuments and memories.

Starting from Aleppo, she struck the Euphrates at a point north-east of that city, and, crossing it, followed the downward course of the river as far as Hit; thence she diverged to visit the magnificent ruins of Ukheidir, a town of uncertain date. At Kerbela she came into touch with Persian history and the Mosque of Hussein; she was near Kadisiyah (also called Cadesia), the battlefield of 636 A.D., fatal to the Sassanian dynasty of Persia. At Babylon she enjoyed the hospitality of a little group of German excavators who had been working among the mounds for twelve years. At Baghdad she met with a rebuff:—"'Effendim,' I said, 'I would now gaze upon the rooms of the Khalifs in the arsenal, if your Excellency permit.' The Commandant took a moment for reflection and then gave me his answer. It was in three parts. He said, firstly, that these rooms were much ruined and not worth seeing; secondly, that they were full of military stores; and, thirdly, that they did not exist. I recognised at once that I had lost the game, and, having thanked the Commandant for his kindness, I bade him farewell." From Baghdad she rode, along the general course of the Tigris, upwards to Mosul and Diyarbekr, leaving the river for excursions to famous places on either bank. From Diyarbekr her direction was, generally speaking, eastward to Bulgurlu, near Eregli, the end of the Baghdad railway, and to Konia, where her story terminates.

On her journey she passed so many places known in one history or another—Assyrian, Babylonian, Persian, Roman—that it is impossible to enumerate them. On the Palace of Ukheidir and ruins of Samarra she has separate excursus, compiled with knowledge and care. At Kalat Shergat she was warmly welcomed by the party of German professors with Dr. Andrae, engaged in excavating at Asshur, the first capital of Assyria, called after the tutelary god of that name. "Valuable as are the contributions which Dr. Andrae has been able to make to the history of Assyria, the fact that he is bringing into the region of critical study a culture so shadowy as that of the Parthians has remained to us, in spite of its four hundred years of domination, adds greatly to the magnitude of his achievement." At Mosul, on the frontier of the Arab and Kurdish populations, Miss Bell testifies to the superiority of even inefficient Ottoman rule to the mastery of Arab or Kurdish chiefs. "The organisation of discord is carried to a high pitch of perfection in Mosul. The town is full of bravoes, who live by outrage, and live well. Whenever the unruly magnates wish to create a disturbance, they pass a word and a gratuity to these ruffians; the riot takes place, and who is to be blamed for it?" She passed, too, through the country of the Yezidis, who, from their desire to conciliate or to propitiate the Spirit of Evil, are known to Moslem and Christian as Devil-worshippers, who, nevertheless, never take the name of the Devil upon their lips, and to mention him in their presence is a shameful insult. The mountain frontiers of Eastern Turkey she found a country rich in faiths, "beliefs which have been driven out with obloquy by a new-found truth, the half-apprehended mysticism of the East, echoes of Western metaphysics and philosophy, illusive memories of paganism—all have been swept together into these hills, where creeds that were outlined in the childhood of the world are formulated still in terms as old as themselves." She conversed with several Bishops, there being so many in the country she traversed, but she could not retain more than a general impression of them; "they correspond in number to the Christian sects, which are as the sands of the seashore."

The country was by no means safe for travel; some of it was particularly lawless. The Government makes no attempt to control the Bedouin, the local tribes commit depredations, armed bands of the Shammar sweep the country, the Baggarah had their hand against every man and were foes of the Anazeh. She was accompanied, apparently always, by zaptiehs, local police orderlies, but, nevertheless, was more than once exposed to fire from wandering robbers, and was constantly in the neighbourhood of scenes of violence. She was fortunate, indeed, in experiencing only one serious misadventure. At Khakh, between Mosul and Diyarbekr, her money, saddlebags, and notebooks were stolen out of her tent at night. But she applied such pressure on all the authorities within her reach that they, by their own methods of police procedure, recovered everything for her. There is no mention of her having any female companion or servant, and, except a nun or two, she met no females of any consequence away from the big towns. But she was faithfully attended by Fattuh and others, and suffered no harm; the climate was sometimes trying. She was always able to pursue her investigations into archæology and antiquities. "This khanum" (lady), said one guide, on transferring her to another, "likes ruins." At Tomarza her host, an Armenian priest, viewed her interest in antiquities as a mere cloak wherewith to cover a political purpose, and the inhabitants took her for an itinerant missionary collecting evidence with regard to a massacre. The country had heard of the Young Turkish movement of July, 1908, the deposition of Abdul Hamid, and the new Constitution with Liberty for its watchword. But changes are not quickly introduced into distant provinces, and the old order was but slowly giving place to the new. Though Miss Bell may not be a specialist or an erudite scholar, she has read widely in classical authors as well as in history, and has incorporated much valuable research in her narrative. Her 235 pictures of scenery, ruins, buildings, and plans add largely to the value of the work, which is one of the best books of travel and topography we have read for a long time.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

ART AND THE TWENTIETH CENTURY

Essays on the Purpose of Art. By Mrs. Russell Barrington. (Longmans, Green and Co. 12s. 6d. net.)

Sincere hero-worship must always possess a certain amount of charm even for those who cannot agree with or subscribe to the opinions expressed, and Mrs. Russell Barrington, whose friendship with Leighton and Watts inspires and pervades this book, conveys to the reader much of her own enthusiasm. She writes well, and her reminiscences are invariably interesting; but at times her method seems to suggest that she assumes too freely an ignorance in the reader which she is anxious to illuminate, and she quotes from other sources so copiously that she robs her work of a great deal of originality which it might otherwise have possessed. Most of us have admired, at some time or another, the finely provocative essays of Walter Bagehot, their purity of diction and continuity of compact thought; here we have page after page of his critical studies reproduced to back up Mrs. Barrington's own ideas. In the first thirty-nine pages of the chapter entitled "National Individuality" we find, roughly, twenty-two pages consist of extracts from other authors. Mrs. Barrington's own remarks can be so pertinent on many subjects that it was a pity thus to drown them amid a riot of inverted commas.

With the somewhat pessimistic view of present conditions here set forth, however, many readers will be inclined to disagree, and there are occasional slips which seem to demand a dispute even though our mood be far from contentious. It is hardly fair to condemn the twentieth century yet for its shortcomings, for its indifference to the sense of beauty. "In the nineteenth century," says Mrs. Barrington, "pictures were painted in England fairly to be ranked among the notable works of all times, and the zest with which these were appreciated by cultured and thoughtful minds corresponded to their worth;" and she then draws an unfavourable contrast with our present day. She does not give the twentieth century a fair chance; it is but a youngster yet; moreover, does not Mr. G. K. Chesterton remark acutely, in his monograph on G. F. Watts, that "nothing can be imagined more idle, in a general way, than talking about a century as if it were some kind of an animal with a head and tail, instead of an arbitrary length cut from an unending scroll"? Again, she condemns the public for its indifference to artistic endeavour in these terms:—

> Haste, skurry, striving for striking and immediate effect, having led to a prominence in every direction of the advertising mania, the twentieth century has produced nothing more completely appropriate to its requirements in art than Hassall's posters, such as that advertising the Vacuum, or such newspaper triumphs as "Lipton's strawberry jam—warranted pure." Exquisitely funny, and strikingly obvious, these require no concentration of attention whatever for their enjoyment: hence their appropriateness to the present temper of the public.

Argument such as this will not stand criticism; and when, directly after, we find the shows of "Venice," "Constantinople," and the "White City" eulogised as "great artistic achievements"—the latter recalling "the history of Leonardo da Vinci's labours for the Duke Sforza at Milan"—it will be seen that this volume has its sad moments.

We can turn, however, with hearty approval to many passages of judicious criticism and clever suggestion. There can be little doubt that a danger does exist, in these bewilderingly busy days, of the blinding of our eyes to the perception of beauty, the blunting of our taste to the appeal of delicate and lovely things. The average man is too strenuously occupied in earning his living, in striving to keep back those who would displace him, to pause at the flooded skies of sunset or to immure his spirit for one quiet hour within the "narrow cell" of a sonnet; he is afraid that while he muses on beauty—supposing, of course, that he is so inclined—the world of harsh fact will steal a march upon him. The infrequent artist, the true artist, must climb to the spiritual heights above the noisy world, and of him Mrs. Barrington speaks wisely:—

> How few parents or sincere friends understand what stuff this passion for perfection is made of! What a momentous matter it is to the artist himself to produce the very best he aims at! "I fear you are making too serious a matter of the business" [Constable's phrase to his artist son] is much what relations and the world in general feel when a student shows signs that his art is to cost him his life. If it be his profession, then, of course, he must make an income out of it, and take the necessary steps to secure that; but that the whole of his being should be absorbed by his art—that is foolishness to nine hundred and ninety-nine out of a thousand.

Referring to the loveliness of some of Leighton's sketches of Southern travel, the author notes that frequently the slight sketch is a finer work of art than the finished picture, because it is the free outcome of the "uncommissioned mood:"—

> In this day the commissioned mood would seem to usurp even the holiday time. A sequence in the subjects is required, with a view to a "show;" calculation enters in; a responsible element dictates the choice and amount of finish, and so the free-lance fun is extinguished. Few artists, probably, intentionally mean to sacrifice serious work to the enticements of making money by work they cannot consider serious; but minds cannot run along two grooves at the same time, and the serious work requires the help of the holiday, the "uncommissioned mood" for a time, to bring fresh impulse and inspiration to the real fight of seizing and expressing in a serious, permanent form what has never been said before.

To say that "ugliness is a creed" among artists "in what ought to be happy England" is a lapse from correct perspective; ugliness among true artists has never been a creed, and never will be.

On the theme of national influences Mrs. Barrington has many capital observations, and the reader will consider with pleasure and profit some illuminating comparisons between English and French art in the chapters on "Present Conditions" and "National Individuality." Here and there, often when least expected, occur fascinating little anecdotes of Watts and his friend Leighton—anecdotes related with a personal touch and a sympathetic comprehension of the two differing characters which add greatly to their charm. It was a rare favour to be the intimate of such men, and if we are compelled to disagree with some of Mrs. Barrington's notions relating to art and its present-day expression, we can admire her thorough enthusiasm for her heroes and the manner in which she has treated their own individual work.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

THE KINGDOM OF PHARMACY

Chronicles of Pharmacy. By A. C. Wootton. Two Vols. Illustrated. (Macmillan and Co. 21s. net.)

Mr. Wootton died while his book was still in the hands of the printers, but he has left us a noble and well-written record of the history of the art and science of pharmacy which is pleasant to read and full of thought. Nothing is forgotten, nothing misplaced; the book goes orderly from Æsculapius and the Egyptians all the way to the synthetic production of salicylic acid. It is the work of a master and a lover of his subject, and deserves, and is already receiving, a good welcome.

The one fault of these Chronicles may fairly be called inevitable. It is that they tend, now and again, to lose hold of the practical work of medicine and of surgery which was achieved in the days before pharmacy became a science. We may take, for example, Hippocrates and Ambroise Paré. It is hardly open to doubt that they were the greatest practitioners whom the world has yet seen. The account given by Hippocrates how to perform the operation for empyema remains a miracle. He understood the supreme importance of a free incision; he understood how to deal with the abscess-cavity; and he used the antiseptic lotion of his time, the oil and wine of the Good Samaritan. We go from Hippocrates, four hundred years before Christ, to the practice of a hundred years ago, and we find the surgeons, in the first half of the nineteenth century, not daring to make the free incision for fear of erysipelas or other hospital diseases; therefore they treated empyema by repeated puncture and aspiration. Thirty, forty, fifty times they would puncture and exhaust the abscess-cavity, till, in cases innumerable, their instruments, not being sterile, infected the very cavity that they were trying to cure, and the patient died. At last came Pasteur and Lister, and the Hippocratic operation was made again the only way to deal with an empyema. That Hippocrates had taught what they, twenty-three centuries later, taught all over again is of more importance than the Hippocratic uses of drugs. Or take Ambroise Paré. His ingenuity, his handiness, his insight into his patients were amazing: his discovery of the use of ligatures for amputation-wounds, his abandonment of the horrid use of boiling pitch and red-hot irons are but two instances of the habitual excellence of his practical work. What does it matter, now, that his use of drugs was not scientific? He was, of all artists in surgery, one of the greatest: his art was miles ahead of his science.

That is the one fault of these Chronicles: they tend, now and again, to obscure the happy fact that a great physician, a great surgeon, is first and foremost an artist. His skill, shrewdness, practicality, common sense, experience, and what he would call his instinct and his dodges, outrun his theories; he gets results which surprise himself, and he cannot explain how he gets them; and often a case recovers under his care when it ought, on good text-book authority, to die. If this be true of our great physicians and surgeons to-day, it is even more true of them of old time. The superstition, the magic and witchcraft of their drugs is not a fair measure of the work of their lives. It is not possible to think of them as bound hand and foot by the dreadful nonsense of the Dark Ages of Pharmacy.

Here, in these admirable Chronicles, the whole story of that nonsense is faithfully told to the reader. We may let pass Æsculapius and his sons: they are hardly real figures, and Mr. Wootton, when he calls them semi-mythical, is too kind to them. We come to Egyptian pharmacy, and here are daunted by the Egyptian religion: the gods dominate the scene. Roman medicine, Celsus and others, are, on the whole, feeble; and the Galenic pharmacy is of less interest than the Galenic practice. That Galen proved, by experiment on animals, the presence of blood in the arteries; that he was ages ahead of his times in his knowledge of the structure of the spinal cord and the nerve-roots—these are facts more important now than his use of drugs and his interpretation of their actions. With the rise of the Arabian school pharmacy began to improve, and Cordova spread the wisdom of the Arabs far and wide. It does not appear that England was more than a borrower of this wisdom. John of Gaddesden, who was perhaps the original of Chaucer's doctor, was a fairly good pharmacist, and a fairly shrewd doctor, but his insight into the maladies of his patients was unhappily crossed by his almost painful insight into the length of their purses. The Arabian physicians appear to have been the great medical teachers of Europe; and with the loss of their teaching medicine settled down to a veritable nightmare of superstition.

It is rather dismal to watch this nightmare, yet it is here that these Chronicles are most full of good reading. The doctrine of signatures, the use of the Abracadabra, the transference of diseases, the Royal touch, the powder of sympathy, the amazing charms and amulets and witchcraft and astrology, the drugs compounded of half a dozen unspeakable animal nastinesses, such as make the gruel thick and slab in the fourth act of "Macbeth"—all are described here, with much else that deserves study and repays it. And, if the truth must be told, we find pharmacy becoming rather dull as the time draws near for science to be born. But pharmacy clung to her superstitions right up to the end, and, like Oxford, whispered from all her towers the last enchantments of the Middle Ages. The kind of drugs that "Macbeth's" witches had found useful were in the Pharmacopœia incredibly late; the Renaissance wholly failed to dislodge them from medical credulity; and the faculty administered to King Charles II., when he was such an unconscionable time dying, drugs of purely magical uselessness. It is not much more than a hundred years ago that science came into the kingdom of pharmacy, and the delightful dragons and basilisks perished out of the land. Our consolation is that the doctors and the surgeons in the days before science were better than their own theories. Indeed, we may doubt whether they believed always in the objective efficacy of their filthy drugs. Saliva jejuni, cranium hominis violentâ morte extincti, herbs gathered at the astrological moment, bezoar-stones, and all such unholy rubbish were prescribed and swallowed; but in many cases, it may be, they were prescribed to please the patient and were swallowed to please the doctor. Fashion, after all, may be responsible for other follies beside those of dress and amusement.

SHELL AND KERNEL

A Knight of Poland. By M. E. Carr. (Smith, Elder, and Co. 6s.)

The conscientious reviewer is occasionally confronted by some very puzzling problems—the good book and the bad book; each is simple enough; it is not difficult to point out the obvious merit or the obvious demerit. There are all sorts of excellences to be noted in novels. The purists, no doubt, would confine their praise to the book inspired by the true artistic idea, the book which is a manifest endeavour to realise beauty in the medium of words. But the purist is next door to the pedant; and sensible people recognise that the clear inspiration of beauty is not the only test, that there are other things besides a prose which is sonorous music. The sober critic does not pooh-pooh "Roderick Random" because the quest of the supernal Beauty is not to be discerned in it; and comparatively few of the many Englishmen who admire "Don Quixote" are qualified to judge of the merits of Cervantes as a Spanish stylist. "Roderick Random" is a thoroughly ugly book about thoroughly ugly people living in the most barbarous age of English history; but, for all that, there is a sort of infernal vigour about the thing that it is impossible to resist: it is Hogarth in literature. So with Cervantes: the wonderful conception of the romance shines like a noonday sun all over the great story; the mists and vapours of our mere English translator vanish away before it. And another instance—"Monte Cristo." As Stevenson said, the characters are wooden; but what a gorgeous tale it is! There is something Homeric in the picture of the ship Pharos entering the harbour just as the merchant has the pistol to his head. Homeric? Perhaps a word longer still should be used. The scene is noble, because it realises and corresponds with the eternal dream of humanity. And so that absurd meeting of all the characters of "Martin Chuzzlewit" in old Martin's rooms: it draws tears to our eyes, because in our inmost hearts we are all looking forward to that gathering in the Temple. Isaiah was thinking of that meeting when he wrote the phrase about "the crooked straight and the rough places smooth."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

But what is one to say about such a story as "A Knight of Poland"? There is nothing certainly to be urged against it. It is well composed, carefully written, the characters are probable and consistent, the conduct of the plot from the first chapter to the last is blameless. The hero is a young fellow of mixed parentage—half English and half Polish. His father has been a Polish patriot, and had married an Englishwoman who was "noble." Both parents had died in Valentine's early childhood, and he had been brought up by his mother's mother as a thorough Englishman. He was indeed known as Valentine Luttrell, though his name was Valentine Luttrell Trawinski. And just as Valentine is celebrating his twenty-first birthday, and is preparing to settle down as a good old English country gentleman, the Polish priest and violent patriot, Father Clement Nowak, descends upon him, determined to gain the young man for the cause, for the approaching insurrection of '63, to make him, in a word, a thoroughgoing Trawinski, instead of a half-and-half Luttrell. Such is the scheme, and it is well and logically worked out. The chapters dealing with the Polish revolution are done with care, the character of the Countess Metelska is excellent. And yet one wonders why it has been done at all!

For from beginning to end there is no trace of that gleam which alone hallows and consecrates books. You have a series of characters who are involved in a series of incidents; but the whole result is a tale of little meaning—though the words are strong enough. For, in addition to character, in addition to incident, this one thing is required in a book—that it have a meaning. It must symbolise, that is, by its characters and incidents, the eternal verities which are hidden beneath a phenomenal world.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Our Village. By Mary Russell Mitford. Preface by Mrs. Thackeray Ritchie. Illustrated. (Macmillan and Co. 10s. 6d. net.)

Annals of Our Parish. By John Galt. Illustrated. (T. N. Foulis. 5s. net.)

English Country Life. By Walter Raymond. Illustrated. (T. N. Foulis. 5s. net.)

Our Village.

Miss Mitford's famous account of country life in the England of some hundred years ago is profusely illustrated in a very dainty fashion—almost too dainty—and there are numerous coloured pictures of the scenes from which she drew her inspiration. It is a delight to open the book anywhere, and glance at its homely, familiar, poetic contents. And our delight is increased by Mrs. Ritchie's well-written Preface, exhaustive of everything important in the authoress's life.

Annals of Our Parish.

To Miss Mitford John Galt presents a striking contrast. The daintiness and poetry are not by any means conspicuous in his rugged annals; but there is preserved in them the true, strong soul of a genuinely religious man, who saw everything in the best light, often by sheer determination to do so; who had to confront at the beginning of his career a hostile parish, and conquered it by his great sympathy and humanity. Decidedly a strong man, whose annals will, we hope, be reprinted again and again. There is many a lesson to be learnt from them. The coloured illustrations are good.

English Country Life.

Contrasted again with the above-mentioned is the modern Mr. Walter Raymond, who has been fortunate to secure Mr. Wilfrid Ball to illustrate his word-pictures in colours. There is a charming chattiness about Mr. Raymond's book, which has quite a cachet of its own. He certainly knows our country life, both in its natural and purely human aspects, throughout the various classes and categories of a rural community. Many a quaint remark he records, and many a keen observation. It is a refreshing, breezy, countrified account well worth dipping into for pleasurable feelings.

A Short History of the Church of England. By the Rev. J. F. Kendall, M.A. Illustrated with direct Colour Photographs taken at the Church Pageant by Elliott and Fry. (A. and C. Black. 7s. 6d. net.)

It was an ingenious idea to write a history round pictures taken from the Church Pageant. Visitors and performers alike will desire to possess the book, especially those actors whose portraits are perpetuated in dramatic attire. But excellent though the pictures are, and of special interest as direct colour photographs, this is the least part of the real value of the work, which is a remarkably clever sketch of English Church history. It is no easy task to write a brief history, to know what to omit, what to include. A very clear and discriminating judgment is necessary. To this gift Mr. Kendall adds the happy possession of a terse and taking style. He has reverted to the delightful method of short sentences, which makes such easy and pleasant reading. Above all, he has opened out, as it were, a fine historical vista, in admirably drawn perspective. We took up this book somewhat prejudiced from the point of view of serious history by the pictures. But we were agreeably disillusioned, and read it through from cover to cover with great pleasure. The author, in his Preface, says that—

> Behind events there lie always the ideas and ideals which led to them; and it is simply the ideas and ideals that have influenced, or in turn have been influenced by, the National Church in its long, continuous life which I have tried to describe.

A comparison of the table of subjects chosen, with their vivid presentation in the text, will show how well Mr. Kendall has succeeded in fulfilling his aims. For example, the leading features of the very difficult Reformation period are carefully delineated in four chapters, entitled The Cry for Reform, Political Reformation, Changes in Public Worship, and Gradual Settlement. The desire of Henry

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

VIII.—not for divorce, as is generally supposed—but that his marriage with Katharine might be declared null and void ab initio, is well brought out, though Mr. Kendall misses one point, as a primary cause, that Henry, like Napoleon, wanted a legitimate son. We hope that a small, quite cheap edition may some day be published. It would be a most useful treatise for members of the Church and others.

The People of Egypt. Painted by LANCE THACKERAY, with Introduction by GORDON HOME. (A. and C. Black. 5s. net.)

IN this, the latest addition to Messrs. A. and C. Black's "Peoples of Many Lands" series, Mr. Lance Thackeray has, as was to be expected of him, given a large number of very attractive sketches in colours of types which he met while in Egypt. To the tourist who has visited that picturesque country these sketches will in most instances be familiar, so far as their subjects are concerned, and will strike an appreciative chord in his heart. There is a certain charm about the East, even in the European East of Algiers or Cairo, which never fails to take possession of the denizen of the more sober-patterned Western cities, and so permanent is this charm that it is doubtful whether any one who, once he has wandered through the bazaars of Cairo or Constantinople, does not desire to visit them again. To those who have already been to Egypt Mr. Thackeray's sketches will inflame the desire to return. To those who have not yet stood on the bank of the Nile this little book will create a new necessity.

The letterpress is of course by far the least important portion of the book, nor does it pretend to be otherwise. In this Mr. Home gives the slightest of slight sketches of one or two aspects of Egyptian life to-day. He points out very rightly that to speak of the Egyptian race is impossible for one who has any tendency towards accuracy. There is no Egyptian race; a dozen different races inhabit Egypt, and they differ as much from one another as do the various races of Europe.

Mr. Home gives a curious reason for the wearing of the veil by Moslem women. In this matter, he says, they have a perfectly free choice, but they are told, "If thy beauty cause strife among men, inspiring them with love or jealousy in others, then were it better for thee that it should be hid." No woman admits that she is ugly, and all fear that their beauty will cause strife among men. To avoid this misfortune, voluntarily, even unto the oldest, they veil themselves. Mr. Home allows the impression to be made that only the Moslem women wear the veil. This is, however, not so, for the Copts have also adopted this practice, although whether for the reason furnished by Mr. Home we are not for the moment in a position to say.

The Book of the Seasons. Poems Chosen and Arranged by GEORGE A. B. DEWAR, and Illustrated by MARGARET W. TARRANT. (George Allen and Sons. 5s.)

THIS exceedingly prettily got-up book may be commended heartily to all lovers of nature-poetry. The illustrations are attractive, and they form no inconsiderable portion of the volume. It may perhaps be ventured, by way of criticism, to suggest that to represent all the seasons as women, in female garb, was not perfectly happy. Spring and summer might well be thus represented; but autumn nad winter——! What makes the sex peculiarly inappropriate in the case of autumn is that confronting the young lady of Autumn are Spenser's verses beginning—

Then came the autumn all in yellow clad—in which that season is specially represented as a "mere male." Mr. Dewar's selection is a very interesting one. But why only one brief extract from Cowper, who has surely done admirable descriptions of Nature and natural events? However, let us not carp when we find in the selection good things such as FitzGerald's "Old Song" ("'Tis a dull sight," &c.), John Clare's "The Thrush's Nest" ("Within a thick and spreading hawthorn bush," &c.), Ralph Hodgson's "The Missel Thrush" ("I saw the sun burn in the blue," &c.), Clough's "The Shady Lane" ("Whence comest thou, shady lane, and why and how?") and Francis Thompson's "Daisy." It is amazing how Landor stands out in this selection amongst such names as Coleridge, Wordsworth, Browning, Collins, Herrick, Keats, Sir P. Sidney, George Herbert, Waller, Shelley, Marvell, Hood, Chaucer, Kingsley, Matthew Arnold, Tennyson, and other notables. Among them all Landor illustrates the supreme value of profound emotion and absolute sincerity, unstifled by excess of art or artifice. The work has obviously been a labour of love to Mr. Dewar, who may be cordially congratulated on its unusual excellence and originality of taste.

Great and Greater Britain: The Problems of Motherland and Empire, Political, Naval, Military, Industrial, Financial, Social. By J. ELLIS BARKER. Second and very greatly Enlarged Edition, completely Revised and brought up to August, 1910. (Smith, Elder, and Co. 10s. 6d. net.)

MR. ELLIS BARKER as one of the most active of the younger writers of the Tariff Reform party always commands a considerable circle of readers, and those who owe to him many of the arguments with which they are accustomed to support their political views will welcome with ardour the appearance of another book from his pen. We say another book advisedly, for the present work, although a second edition, is in many respects entirely new. For instance, the last eight chapters—a third of the book—deal with topics which were untouched in the previous edition, and of course the earlier chapters have undergone the revision which time had rendered necessary. The fresh topics which Mr. Barker discusses in this volume consist of Agriculture in England, its decay and its re-creation, the Rural Land Problem and its solution, Rural Land Reform and Urban Congestion, the Urban Land Problem and its solution, the Problem of Ireland, and the New Foreign Policy. The book is of course of its nature ephemeral and cannot be discussed as literature. It is most interesting perhaps as "an unauthorised programme." Mr. Barker votes whole-heartedly for Land Purchase on a general scale. In fact his ideal would appear to be a nation of freeholders, for in the towns as well as in the country he contends very strongly for facilities for the present tenants to obtain permanent possession of their homes. To effect this end he would not hesitate to use compulsion if necessary. His method of raising funds for house purchase on an almost universal scale is an original one. He suggests that the Post Office Savings Bank should invest the savings of the people which have been intrusted to it in mortgages. Mr. Barker cannot, however, have given very much thought to this proposal, for the objections to it are considerable and obvious.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Fragrance Among Old Volumes. By BASIL ANDERTON, B.A. (Kegan Paul and Co. 7s. 6d. net.)

THESE "Essays and Idylls of a Book-Lover" were very well worth preserving in a more permanent form than that afforded by the periodicals in which several of them have appeared. Some of the little studies, in fact, are charmingly tender and true. "Concordio, the Story of a Poor Music-master" is very human and sympathetic, and the account of two old ladies, lovers of books, who keep a "little cake for visitors" which is "only eaten privately when quite stale," is one of the prettiest cameos of literature that we have read for some time.

In his capacity as City Librarian of Newcastle-upon-Tyne the author has had opportunities of research and observation which are denied to most men, and that he has made capital use of them this volume amply proves. A MS. "Book of Wisdom," unearthed at a second-hand shop in the North of England, gives him a theme for a very interesting discussion, and an old-fashioned vellum-covered booklet of instructions to travellers, published in the sixteenth century, forms the subject of a most amusing article; it seems to have been the progenitor of the modern dialogues in various languages which help—or hinder—those who wander in strange lands. A chapter concerning "The Book-plates of Thomas Bewick" will interest those who specialise in such things, and the alphabetical list of plates with their owners will prove useful to collectors. Altogether, this modestly-named "Fragrance Among Old Volumes" is a treasurable companion for a quiet hour or two, and is the work of a true lover of the good things of literature.

The Human Complex. By CHARLES GRANVILLE. (C. W. Daniel. 1s. net.)

FROM this little collection of miscellaneous essays we can select three as worthy of special praise: one deals with "The Psychology of Words" and the other two follow naturally to the theme of literature. The author is probably familiar with Trench "On the Study of Words," since in some passages he treats his subject in a very similar manner; but he is by no means imitative. He emphasises the necessity for a clear understanding of the language we use so habitually, and too often so thoughtlessly, and notes how easy it is to "fog" our meanings by a careless choice of terms. In the chapter entitled "Literature in its Relation to Life" this point is illustrated by two happily-chosen examples of style. By custom philosophers and logicians have arrived at some moderate facility in expressing their ideas and discoveries in complicated terms; but we see the author's point, and must say that he treats it, as far as his limited space will permit him, most capably. The remaining essays are less important, but contain much that is of interest, and show the author as a writer of good, sound prose on themes which are rather too slight to do him justice.

FICTION

Blair's Ken. By W. SYLVESTER WALKER ("Coo-Ee"). (John Ouseley. 6s.)

"BLAIR'S KEN" is quite an uncommon book, and, despite its "difficulty" and lack of sustained interest, we should have liked to criticise it at length, had space permitted. Mr. Walker is a serious writer, one of that class from whom we are accustomed to expect all that is careful and much that is colourless; but he gives us, on the contrary, all that is careless and much that is strong and vivid. His book fails as a whole; it is very disconnected and much of it is, frankly, unintelligible. It deals with the influence upon two generations of a Scotch landed family of certain supernatural forces and laws concerned with the succession of the estates. The persons on whom the tale chiefly hangs are Andrew Blair, the laird, who is driven from his home by the "Ken" (the supernatural power) to become a multi-millionaire in Australia; his twin-brother Malcolm, who tries to step into his shoes, but is prevented and punished by the same power; and Andrew's two sons, the elder illegitimate, whom he loses in their infancy and finds only when they are grown up and strange to him. The greater part of the story is concerned with Andrew's attempts to find out which of his sons will be fixed upon as heir by the Ken. The end of it all is rather tragic, and quite naturally so. There is a great wealth of incident in the book, some very interesting characters, and a deal of minute knowledge of many sides of life. But it is all presented in an unattractive way, and, as we have said, the book is a failure as a novel. Mr. Walker cannot keep the thread of his story clear; at times it seems as if the Ken was a little too much for him. But he can certainly write strong and restrained English, although the structure of his sentences is often very careless; we have noticed several of great length relieved only by commas. But, in spite of all faults and failures, "Blair's Ken" is a book which holds out great promise of future achievement, and about its more understandable pages there hangs something of that fine air of baldness which Stevenson thought the most noble thing in literature.

Lady Good-for-Nothing. By "Q." (T. Nelson and Sons. 2s. net.)

WE are always sure when we are about to read one of "Q's" books that our labour will not be in vain, and "Lady Good-for-Nothing" supplies no exception to this pleasant rule. Whatever else they may do, the novels of this popular writer always deal delightfully with quite charming people, and if they do not stand uniformly for life as it is, they may at least lay claim to represent life as it ought to be. Even though "Lady Good-for-Nothing" has a serious and nearly tragic plot, it is filled with that atmosphere of charm for the creation of which "Q" has a quite individual gift. Having said so much, it will not, we hope, deter any one from reading it if we remark that taken as a whole the book is a failure. It is a sufficiently ambitious attempt to draw a full-length portrait of an agreeable but very unconventional type of girl. The eighteenth-century background is admirably done; there is an impulsive and human hero of whom we are glad to make the acquaintance, and several of the minor characters are pleasing and convincing. But the heroine Ruth, who should be best of all, is rather an intellectual conception of what a girl might be than a creature of flesh and blood, and may at best be held to justify the author's description of his book as a man's portrait of a woman. That so pleasant a man as Captain Vyell, thoughtless as he was, should have proposed such an acknowledged scoundrel as the clergyman to marry him to Ruth was wellnigh impossible; but that Ruth, on account of this insult, should have fled to the woods and lived there with the Captain without any marriage ceremony whatever is clearly incredible. The last fifty pages of the book are unsatisfactory, and we think the author must have grown tired of his creation to fall back on the conventional interposition of an earthquake to make the necessary change in his hero's character. The ultimate marriage of Ruth to Vyell seems to us almost as improbable as her original avoidance of that ceremony. Nevertheless "Lady Good-for-Nothing" is a book to be read with interest and enjoyment.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The Golden Silence. By C. N. and A. M. Williamson. (Methuen and Co. 6s.)

Without wishing to reopen the idle discussion as to the proper length for a novel—it is, indeed, as idle as debating the proper size of a picture—we do find that in practice most long modern novels are too long. Something, too, might be said concerning the relationship that should exist between the matter of a book and its external appearance. From the noble orange cover of "The Golden Silence" there smiled on us the prettily-coloured portrait of a young girl, and this frivolous exterior had by no means prepared us for the careful and minute study of Algerian life that we found within.

Nevertheless, these strictures made, we are glad to recommend "The Golden Silence" to those of our readers who have no violent prejudice against what, for lack of a better term, we must call local colour. It relates the adventures of a young girl who sets out to rescue her sister, who has been injudicious enough to marry an Arab chief. It would not be fair to the authors to disclose the perils that overtake her or the means by which her mission is ultimately crowned with success, so we must content ourselves with remarking that Victoria's adventures are quite thrilling, and that she herself is a very nice girl, fully worthy of Mr. A. H. Buckland's dainty frontispiece. We think the book would have been better if it had been some fifty pages shorter, but the elaborate word-painting will, no doubt, be to the taste of many readers, and as a story "The Golden Silence" is certainly above the average.

Hope. By R. B. Cunninghame Graham. (Duckworth and Co. 6s.)

Books like this of Mr. Cunninghame Graham's lead inevitably to the reflection that it is a pity that English readers, if publishers have not grossly maligned them, do not care very much for volumes of short stories, for it is clear that their whole-hearted devotion to novels must deprive them of a great deal of enjoyment. We should be very sorry to miss reading anything of Mr. Graham's, though we admit that we sometimes find his affectations a little irritating. Thus the "Preface" to the present volume—it is Mr. Graham's name for it, and not ours—is as near being meaningless as a knowledge of grammar and the tolerance of his readers will allow the author to be, though, when he pleases, Mr. Cunninghame Graham is a notable writer of prefaces. But for the stories themselves we have nothing but admiration. "Un Monsieur" is as good as anything of Maupassant's, which is to say that it is as good as it can possibly be, and "The Captive" is worthy of the author of "Un Monsieur." Mr. Graham has a charming style, a delicate sense of atmosphere, and the power that enables him to paint broad landscapes on small canvases. His work has real distinction, and having read his latest volume of stories with rare pleasure, we are now looking forward eagerly to the next.

Doctor Grey. By Stephen Andrew. (Greening and Co. 6s.)

Mr. Stephen Andrew has a considerable knowledge of doctoring and a very earnest desire for the bettering of the condition of the poor by means of Socialistic legislation. But these things are not enough to make a novel. Of style, plot, character, motive, telling dialogue—all matters of some import in a novel—Mr. Andrew is quite innocent. His plot is so attenuated as to be practically non-existent; his characters are indistinct reflections of some of the more conventional and commonplace types in real life; his dialogue is like the following extracts:—

> "They—some of the men, I mean—have been rotting me about you. They have been saying I am keen on you." It was her turn to flush . . . she replied rather unsteadily, "Yes, you men do say silly things."
>
> "Run away and play, little boy," she answered. "By the time you are grown up you will have learned that there are quite a number of things you don't understand."

This is hardly worthy of being printed in large type and sold for 4s. 6d. Of course we are well aware that the same sort of thing is frequently so printed and sold, and Mr. Andrew's work has the recommendation of being perfectly harmless and in faultless taste. But it is desirable that a book should be something more than harmless and in good taste if one is to wade through pages of it. On the whole, we do not think Mr. Andrew is a very promising novelist, but we do think he could write an interesting pamphlet on the problems of medical work among the poor.

The Harlot in Heaven. By Sara Drew. (John Ouseley. 6s.)

Of course it was the most natural thing in the world for the relatives of a beautiful orphan to give her a good education and then turn her adrift in London with just enough money to live on for a month. It is true that she rejoiced in the Christian name of Idal, but, even so, it seems hard that she should have fallen into the hands of a dissolute artist and a scoundrelly baron, who made her a decoy of men. Her first dupe was a rich young Australian, whose father had been "a brilliant scholar and the director of a large public company," a combination as usual as it is pleasant. The rich young Australian fell in love with Idal, and she with him, for reasons which will hardly require explanation. But the dissolute artist, who maintained an establishment of lady-pupils, and used them for various lucrative and abominable purposes, did not feel himself in sympathy with this love affair—he found Idal a money-making investment, so he decided to ruin her, having, for business purposes, omitted to do so before. But in the dead of night, when he had drugged her (a mere piece of routine in his household), the rich young Australian arrived from Egypt and cried, "You fiend!" and raised his hand to strike him—and at this point the present reviewer laid down the book and passed into that dreamless slumber which follows great exhaustion.

The Song of Songs ("Das Hohe Lied"). By Hermann Sudermann. (John Lane. 6s.)

English readers whose knowledge of Sudermann is confined to that famous writer's plays would be well advised to read this novel, in its English (or should we not rather say, American?) garb. It is beyond question one of the most powerful things Sudermann has yet conceived; and in the flood of contemporary mediocrity it stands out pre-eminent for its force of observation, often detailed in an extraordinary measure, its grip of abnormal characters, male and female, its utter unconventionality of treatment and development. Without being sensational, it gives the reader all the feelings of sustained excitement from beginning to end; and, what is more important still artistically, a sense of fundamental reality which is rarely disturbed, even by some of the more unconvincing and outrageous actions of the main characters. Finally, the whole tendency is of the most strict morality. As for the translation, so far as it has been looked into, it is good and accurate. But the translator has a perfect mania for the ugly word "gotten" (for "got"), and uses phrases like "back of" for "behind."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The Reproof of Chance. By E. W. Savi. (Digby, Long and Co. 6s.)

Myra was an ingénue, and she became the ward of Robert Chase, a prosperous business man of thirty or so. They fell in love with one another, but another woman told Myra that Robert was in love with the widow of his greatest friend, so Myra married a young American. Of course this did not betray us into thinking there was going to be an unhappy ending. Presently the superfluous American was killed in a trap accident, and, the 311th page being reached, fate did not make any further difficulties. The story is very well written in the style with which our sixpenny magazines have made us familiar. But there is something about the treatment of the love scenes—not exactly suggestiveness, perhaps—which we do not like. "The Reproof of Chance" is the sort of book any one could write after soaking him (or her) self in the class of fiction to which it belongs, which amounts to saying that there is no particular reason why it should have been written, and none at all why it should have been published.

The Girl's Head. By Edgar Jepson. (Greening and Co. 6s.)

Beyond These Seas. By M. E. Braddon. (Hutchinson and Co. 6s.)

The Revolt at Roskelly's. By William Caine. (Greening and Co. 6s.)

One quality these three tales have in common—they are eminently readable, full of mild excitement, and admirably suited for the whiling way of a few leisure hours. They are, in fact, what might be called railway novels. Mr. Jepson's story is frankly sensational and utterly impossible, yet undoubtedly interesting and often amusing for the flavour of dry humour he contrives to infuse into passages that seem about to be getting a trifle serious. The girl's head—a pretty one, we are assured—is the gruesome present sent by parcel-post to Sir John Messiter, an Englishman of sympathies with Russian revolutionaries. He is supposed to have died and been buried; but the rest of the mystery must not be divulged. We refer our readers to the book. Miss Braddon's volume—our congratulations to the lady who can produce so much and do so well—is on lines familiar to her huge mass of readers; whilst Mr. William Caine, in his latest novel, though he may not set up an artistic ideal of the highest for himself, is yet excellent in holding the reader's interest and attention. He will do much better presently, as his story shows.

A NEW PHILOSOPHY

"We all drink at the spring of happiness in a cracked vase: when it reaches our lips there is almost nothing left in it."—Mme. du Deffand.

A few days ago I read a book whose title startled me and whose contents surprised me still more, so seldom is one accustomed in our times to read about any other subject than greed, envy, and malice. And having perused the first few pages, I conceived a sort of astonished respect for its author, M. Jean Finot, who had dared to brave the tide of moral and physical neurasthenia which is, at present, sweeping over the whole world, and who had the courage to proclaim boldly and fervently the doctrine of his belief.

This new philosophy has a delightful definition: it is called "La Science du Bonheur"—the Science of Happiness. Yes, of happiness; a rather old-fashioned word, no doubt, and, surely, incomprehensible, or, to say the least, too subtle for many modernists. It would sound more profound, more scientific, to name it hedonism. "Cela ferait mieux," as the French say, and doubtless many who disdain instructing themselves on plain, homely happiness would strive eagerly to penetrate the mysteries of hedonics. M. Jean Finot is content, however, to deal with just simple, ordinary happiness. What is happiness? How is it attainable? Where can it be found? All these questions the author answers in the course of his work, with such an evident belief and sincerity that we are more than once convinced by his arguments. Happiness has, in all ages, been the target of human desire. Ever since the beginning humanity has sighed, wept, and raged for it, but very few individuals have been fortunate enough to attain it. Why, then, this impossibility in reaching happiness? Because most people know not how, or where, to look for it. They seek for happiness in philosophical doctrines, in the anagogical explanation of religions, in art, in riches, in power; and they forget to look for the small secret hiding-place in which it lurks unsuspected—the human heart.

Yes; whatever one may think, happiness is in ourselves; but it requires a certain amount of energy, an undeniable effort of will, to be happy. We must be happy! We will be happy! How many thinkers have dared make such declarations? A very few, I gage. They have, for the most part, as well as their brothers the moralists, concluded that happiness is an impossibility, an unattainable phantom; they even go so far as to profess a great disdain regarding it. Æschylus, Sophocles, Plutarch, Euripides, Pliny the Ancient, Homer, Seneca, Marcus Aurelius all proclaim the sadness, the cruelty, the unhappiness of man's brief stay in this transitory world. Their chorus, woeful and distressing, is, "Happiness is not to be found on earth." And we must confess that, in the face of this almost unanimous affirmation on the part of some of mankind's most glorious representatives, it is very natural to hesitate slightly before accepting M. Jean Finot's declaration that happiness can be discovered and possessed if one only goes the right way about it. However, if one continues reading his admirable book, one is gradually converted to the idea that if we are unhappy it is only because we will not make the effort, or because we do not know how to be happy. We lack what Maeterlinck calls "the science of happiness":—

> "D'ordinaire ce n'est point le bonheur qui nous manque, c'est la science du bonheur. Il ne sert de rien d'être aussi heureux que possible, si l'on ignore qu'on est heureux. . . . Trop d'êtres s'imaginent que le bonheur est autre chose que ce qu'ils ont, et c'est pourquoi ceux qui ont le bonheur doivent nous montrer qu'ils ne possèdent rien que ne possèdent tous les hommes dans leur cœur." *

Alas! Far from showing us that we possess happiness, everything seems to conspire to crush the little blue flower of content which often blooms unsuspected in our hearts. Even the religions, be they Christianism, Buddhism, or Judaism, strive fiercely, and succeed, to forbid man to be happy, by waving before his terrified eyes images of the various punishments, all equally fearsome, which will be his lot if he dares take the slightest pleasure—even the most innocent—in existence. Life here is but a gloomy passage towards Paradise, Nirvana, or whatever may be the name by which are designated the respective Courts of Heaven.

---

* Sagesse et Destinée. By Maurice Maeterlinck.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

We cannot be happy, but must postpone all possibility of joy or contentment until we have "crossed the Bar." Most of the modern writers, poets, and thinkers appear to be subject to the same influence of despondency and gloom. If asked their opinion of life, they respond dolefully: "It is not worth living." Lamartine, Musset, Verlaine, Zola, Maupassant, Renan, Taine—all declare in convinced accents that "happiness is unfindable."

In his "Science du Bonheur" M. Jean Finot, who combines the functions of Director of La Revue, with those of a most delicate lettré and thinker, deplores this state of things, this morbid discouragement and melancholy, which spreads like a pall over the whole of the civilised world, and exercises so distressing an influence over the weaker characters, causing, and often provoking, inertia, or even death. But e is partly comforted by observing that a great proportion of the apparent désillusionnement affected by the great men of all ages was, and is, merely "put on" for the parts they do, or did, play in life. He considers optimism one of the essential principles of life. If it disappeared he declares that the whole energy and living capacities of humanity would come to a standstill. And whatever the pessimists may do or say to abolish it, optimism will remain the secret spring of will and vigour, hidden in each of us. We may possess it unknowingly, but it is surely there. Further, the pessimists, as M. Finot slily observes, are in absolute contradiction with their theories. If life is such an inferno, why live? Why not disappear as rapidly as possible from this purgatory by self-destruction? One easily sees that M. Finot believes that very often pessimists are in reality optimists—when there is no one present to observe them.

Then what prevents humanity from being happy? Firstly, Envy, which "like a flame blackens that which is above it and out of reach"; Envy stigmatised and reviled throughout the world—be it in Denmark where the proverb states that "if envy were a fever all the world would be ill"—or in China, whence comes the saying, "Towers are measured by their shadows, and great men by those who are envious of them"—or in France where Molière declares "L'envieux peut mourir, mais pas l'envie." Envy, corrupter of man's purest thoughts and ideals, is chiefly responsible for the perpetual bankruptcy of joy and content from which all humanity suffers so bitterly. "All our modern education," says M. Jean Finot, "is corrupted by the desire of seeming and not of being." Modern men and women, far from following Pythagoras's precept, "Do not speak of your happiness to those less happy than yourself," seem, on the contrary, to take a sort of malignant pleasure in taunting their less fortunate brothers and sisters with the exaggerated and often scandalous display of their luxuries. Let us hope that the base satisfaction they thus derive in sowing discontent in the minds of those who behold them does not proceed from a conscious desire to harm, but is only the result of an egoism which often reaches a sort of frenzy. But, on the other hand, are they who envy those seemingly fortunate beings much to be pitied? Are they not equally contemptible for being capable of such a low sentiment, which arises, no doubt, from excessive humility of spirit? Are they not rather to be disdained for allowing their life and their content to be shattered by the display of other people's possessions? Without doubt. But none the less, they who, by their heedlessness or wickedness, break the golden wings of happiness, and prevent it flitting amongst us, are the most to be blamed.

The second important factor of unhappiness is money—which, said Walter Scott, "has killed more souls than the sword has killed bodies." The strenuous chase after the silver-footed hind, Fortune, is becoming each day more frantic, pitiful and laughable. Why that exaggerated wish for so much money? Why that submission to the god Mammon? "L'argent qu'on possède est l'instrument de la liberté," said a great French thinker, "et celui qu'on pourchasse est l'instrument de la servitude." Not that riches are to be disdained; far from it. M. Finot himself, whilst deploring the result of this crazy lust for lucre, recommends the benefits that mankind would derive from a reasonable comprehension of the exact value of money. He declares, moreover, that real riches consist in the independence of the soul. By possessing a serene spirit we liberate ourselves from all the petty worries and torments of existence, and can thus enjoy the contentment deriving from the thought of what we are and what we have. But if envy and lust of riches are the two principal agents of unhappiness, a great factor of joy and content is, according to M. Jean Finot, kindness. If I remember rightly, the opinion of many philosophers, thinkers, and workers is that we can obtain some semblance of happiness by being kind and charitable. The Indian axiom, "The good one has done to-day makes the happiness of to-morrow," confirms this doctrine; and even Seneca goes so far as to declare that "an act of kindness makes one happy from the happiness one has procured." Kindness is therefore an inexhaustible spring of joy, and those who will refresh themselves at its waters will be astonished at the sum of happiness they unwittingly possess. Kindness also bears after it, like a beautiful comet, a luminous train of lesser qualities which all contribute, sometimes even against our will, to making us happy.

The second imperative element, if we desire to attain happiness, is work, and in this affirmation M. Jean Finot finds many supporters amongst the giants of human thought, notably in Gray, who said, "To be occupied is to be happy," and in Voltaire, who declared, "Le travail éloigne de nous trois grands maux: l'ennui, le vice, et le besoin." Work, which is a duty, becomes soon the greatest pleasure of man's life. What are the so-called pleasures derivable from the existence of a jouisseur compared with those obtained by the artist who realises his thought, be it in a painting, a musical composition, or a book? And the confirmation that work is truly man's raison d'être is shown in the lives of so many rich men, who, despite having amassed large fortunes, continue to work for work's sake, because it is only through it that they can derive a real and lasting satisfaction.

"La Science du Bonheur" is a fine, noble book which certainly ought to exercise a great and beneficent influence on all those tormented by unhappiness and discontent. It would teach them to seek and find joy in their own hearts; it would show them that envy is, before all, prejudicible to those who provoke it; that kindness and love soothe the bruised and wounded hearts of those who practise them, and that work is the mainspring of human felicity. "La Science du Bonheur" has the courage, which amounts nearly to audacity, to proclaim that if life imposes upon us obligations, it also gives us rights, and it recognises the fact, too often neglected, that individual happiness is solidary with universal happiness. We must, according to M. Jean Finot, live our lives to the utmost, striving to do our best, seeking joy where it can be found, and, if possible, sharing our content with others.

But though M. Finot seems to tend towards the opinion that happiness is à l'ordre du jour, we cannot help feeling a little doubtful. And, when he ventures so far as to predict that an era of universal felicity may soon dawn for humanity, we cannot help remembering the declarations of many philosophers, amongst whom Herbert Spencer, who has demonstrated that the epoch of "greatest unhappiness is still to come, and that it will be concomitant with the greatest pressure of population." Let us hope, however, that M. Finot is right: in any case his doctrine and his philosophy are most comforting. "La Science du Bonheur," written in a clear, convincing style, seriously documented, containing many anecdotes and much humour, ought to prove exceedingly profitable for any one who will read it; the optimists will derive therefrom the confirmation of their beliefs; the pessimists may find therein some consolation for their distress.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

MARC LOGÉ.

TALKS WITH MATTHEW ARNOLD

BY FRANK HARRIS

A TALL MAN who, in spite of athletic, slight frame and square shoulders, had, at least in later life, something of the scholar's stoop. A face like a schoolmaster's, with side-whiskers, large, shaven mouth and strong, bare chin; the forehead low but broad, under wavy, dark hair, all streaked with grey; the nose noticeably large and somewhat beaked—a fleshy aquiline; the eyes brooding, patient, much wrinkled at the corners, as of one peering in twilight. The whole face lined and creased, extraordinarily mobile and sensitive, but otherwise unremarkable save for the prominent rudder nose and the thoughtful, scrutinising eyes.

I had met Matthew Arnold, in this house and that, a good many times before I got the chance of a frank talk with him. He was always courteous, amiable, ingenuous even. He never shut himself up in armoured politeness, as Browning sometimes did; was always charmingly open and unaffected, like a wellbred schoolboy. One day at a luncheon-party he praised Mr. Rider Haggard's "Jess," a novel which had just appeared. I could not help asking him afterwards the reason. Had he taken the glow-worm for a star?

"An old fellow," he said, "should be very sympathetic to young writers, even if they are not all Thackerays and Fieldings. Can we expect giants always? Or should we not rather be thankful for what we get? It is a good, healthy book enough; schoolboyish, as you say; but then we English rather like schoolboy books. 'Robinson Crusoe' and 'Tom Jones' are both rather boyish, and 'David Copperfield,' is that profound?" and he smiled at me quizzically.

He was about to go to America to lecture, and wanted to know my opinion as to his chance of success. "Believe me," he said, "I am not asking in order to be flattered, I should really like to know what you think before I make up my mind whether to go or stay."

"It is delightful of you," I replied, "to want my opinion, and, as you have asked me, I can only tell you the plain, unvarnished truth. There are a few people in every town in America, and even in many of the villages, who will know you before they see you, who will be able to understand and to appreciate the best you can give them; but they are so few, these chosen ones, that they are utterly swamped by the masses of people who will come to see you because they have heard from others that you are a great poet, a great English poet, too, and they will flock to hear you and measure you by their standard, which is not yours at all. They will judge you primarily as a public speaker. Is your voice resonant and good, your delivery clear and strong, they will say you are magnetic and will be prepared to believe you are a great man; but if your delivery is halting and slow, your elocution faulty, they will probably go away to make lewd jests about you; in art they are barbarians."

"Goodness me!" he exclaimed, "you frighten me. I have no elocution whatever; I even read my poetry, I believe, very badly. I remember my wife used to say to me, 'I cannot bear to hear you read your verses, Matthew; you do mouth them so!'" and he laughed heartily at the memory.

There was humour in him when he talked, a genial humour and power of laughing at himself which is not to be found in any of his writings, though there is a good deal of sardonic persiflage in his "Literature and Dogma."

"I am afraid that all poets are inclined to lay too much stress upon the metrical quality of their poetry. I have noticed that actors usually slur over the metrical quality and accentuate the sense. Is that what you would call good elocution?"

"It is what the average American would call good elocution," I replied, "which is more to the point."

"I see," he said, as if thinking over it, "I see. That frightens me a little."

"But, surely," I said, "you never thought you would be a popular success in America; you would not be a popular success in London, where the society is aristocratic, where the masses take their tone from the few, where popular opinion is formed from above, like water poured on sand, which, as it sinks, spreads more and more widely. Even in our aristocratic society you would be above the heads of all but the best in your audiences? How can you hope to be popular? Your appeal is to the future, and not to the present."

"It is very kind of you to put it that way," he said, "and perhaps true; still it disappoints one a little. I am afraid you are right," he added after a pause, "nevertheless, I think you have decided me to go," and he began to laugh, "perhaps for the sake of that remnant you speak of who will understand and appreciate."

"Oh yes," I replied warmly, "a remnant that will understand you better, I am inclined to believe, than you are understood even in England. Only they will make no sign; you will hardly know that they are among your audience; but they will be there, eager to see and hear the man who wrote 'Thyrsis' and 'The Scholar Gipsy,' and a dozen other splendid things."

I remember another talk just after he had written a poem on his dog—an exquisite requiem—for The Fortnightly Review. I went to him to ask him to write me an appreciation of Ernest Renan, whom I had met and had had long talks with in the College of France.

"I see you have divined," said Matthew Arnold, "that Renan was always a favourite of mine. We both take much the same view of miracles and the Bible generally, though to me he seemed a little superficial in his treatment of Jesus, a little—shall I say?—French. But a great influence, nevertheless, a man who appealed to the soul always. He was the first, too, to discover to me the Celtic genius. A great writer. . . ."

A little later our talk turned to Goethe. I knew, of course, that Matthew Arnold, when writing about him, had contented himself with adapting Scherer's essay on the subject without adding anything valuable of his own; but I had no idea till I heard him talk that his ideas about Goethe went no further. He had no knowledge whatever of Goethe as a moralist. He seemed to think that Scherer had exhausted the subject. I pressed him in vain to write on it. Suddenly he turned to me.

"Why do you want me to write prose when I should like to write poetry? . . . It is funny to me—years ago when I wrote prose all the editors whom I knew used to say to me, 'Arnold, why don't you write poetry?' and now you say, 'Why won't you write prose?'" And he laughed heartily at the implied criticism.

"I want both your prose and your poetry," I answered. "I prize one book of your essays—the book in which you plead for more equality in English social conditions and the necessity of educating our middle classes—Porro unum est necessarium—as the most fruitful work ever written on English politics. If our politicians had had anything of the statesman in them they would have learned these writings by heart."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

"You are very flattering," he said; "but as they would not listen to Burke, they are not likely to listen to me. Yet it delights me that you pick out just that essay on education for praise—'twas always my own favourite."

One can hardly help asking: Was Matthew Arnold a great poet, one of the fixed stars in the literary heaven? Will he live there with Browning and Tennyson? He himself thought his place secure; hinted, indeed, more than once that his position in the future might even be higher than theirs. "Tennyson had no ideas," he would say, "Browning's genius is sometimes masked by pedantry. 'The Ring and the Book' is far too long. My little things are slight, of course; but they seem to me of gold—seven times refined."

The self-estimate was somewhat too flattering. As a poet Matthew Arnold stands lower than Browning and Swinburne, but much on the same level, it seems to me, as Tennyson. I cannot help thinking, too, that some of his prose will come into the balance, some of his essays must live till their lessons are assimilated. Yet, on the greatest questions, he was not original; he had no new or fruitful ideas to give us on life or death; he never reached belief in any real sense, though obsessed with the desire of belief.

Like Carlyle, Arnold was able to look at English society from the outside, and yet with intimate knowledge; he was a sort of political seer. Sometimes I thought he was a Jew. His deepest words read like the words of some old Jewish prophet who stood for the rights of the widow and orphan against the strong oppressor, and his finest poetry is fulfilled with religious emotion:—

> The sea of faith
> Was once, too, at the full, and round earth's shore
> Lay like the folds of a bright girdle furl'd.
> But now I only hear
> Its melancholy, long, withdrawing roar,
> Retreating to the breath
> Of the night-wind, down the vast drear
> And naked shingles of the world.

INDIA: A SERIES

II.—SINCE THE MUTINY—1858-1869

Rebellion and a Fresh Start

Canning

The oft-told tale of the Mutiny need not be repeated. Its causes have been much disputed. Political animosity, stimulated by seditious agitation and supported by a military revolt, affords sufficient explanation. The Native Army saw its power and opportunity. In 1856 it numbered 235,221; the European officers and soldiers in India were 45,104. After the Peel Commission of 1859 the numbers in 1860 were—Europeans, 92,866; natives, 213,002—a very different proportion. Lord Canning had become Governor-General early in 1856, wishing for a peaceful time of office. Nowhere more than in India, as Kaye has written, do the characters of individual Englishmen impress themselves with a vital reality upon the annals of a country; nowhere are there such great opportunities of independent action; nowhere are developed such capacities for evil or for good. Canning soon had plenty on his hands. For the Persian War of 1856-57 he was not responsible. He made an agreement in January, 1857, with the Kabul Amir, Dost Muhammad, who fortunately kept quiet until his death in 1863. The Mutiny absorbed Canning's attention. When he realised its meaning he fully exerted himself. He diverted English troops on their voyage to China, and hurried up reinforcements to the disturbed localities in Upper India. He passed laws to meet the urgent needs of the time, such as the proclamation of martial law, the control of the Press, the punishment of offenders. Later the Penal Code of 1860 and Criminal Procedure Code of 1861 became law; Police Acts also were passed. For his moderation in punishing and his repression of vindictiveness he was called "Clemency Canning," and became very unpopular in Calcutta, so that a petition to the Queen for his recall was presented. For part of 1858 he personally conducted the government of the North-West Provinces. He confiscated, with certain exceptions, the proprietary right in the land in Oudh. When, on November 1st, 1858, the Government of India was assumed by the Crown, he became the first Viceroy. After the Mutiny he had to reorganise the Army employed in India, and the finances; to introduce three Parliamentary Statutes affecting the Civil Service, the Indian Legislatures, and the High Courts of Justice; to levy an income-tax; he supported plans for the education of poor Europeans and Eurasians; conciliated the Native Chiefs by granting them the right of adopting, on failure of personal heirs; he had to deal with insubordination among the British troops lately employed by the Company, and to undergo a terrible famine in Upper India in 1860-61; and he made prolonged tours. The general administration of the country was conducted by the permanent officials. Before his departure in 1862, his great services to India were recognised. His calm courage, firmness, and magnanimity were acknowledged. The increase in the English Army added to the number of the English in India. The extension of the railways and the consequent expansion of trade began to affect the development of India. Change and progress pervaded India.

Firm Rule Under Improving Conditions

Elgin

Canning's successor, the Earl of Elgin, had gained experience in the government of Jamaica and Canada, and in his Embassies to China in 1857 and 1860. It was he who, on his way to China in 1857, diverted to India, at Canning's urgent request, his force of British soldiers. He held office as Viceroy only from March, 1862, until his death in the hills at Dharmsala in November, 1863. During 1862 he resided chiefly at Calcutta, which, he thought, should remain the headquarters of Government; he spent some months at Simla in 1863. In these two years he passed some fifty Acts in his Legislative Council on a great variety of subjects, among them the Act for severing the connection of the Government with religious endowments. He was averse to interference in Afghanistan and intermeddling in all foreign politics, and disliked the military expedition which was found necessary against the Wahabi fanatics of Sitana on the North-West frontier; but he was determined to suppress disturbances wherever they occurred. He desired to develop the resources of India, improve irrigation, extend the railways (without a system of Government guarantees, and, eventually, with one uniform railway gauge for the whole country), to promote cotton cultivation, and encourage the introduction of capital. On the policy to be adopted towards the Native Chiefs, and for the assertion of British sovereignty he had distinct views, but had no time to apply them. He confirmed the death sentence on a British soldier for murder, and commented on the extreme difficulty of administering equal justice between natives and Europeans. On Lord Elgin's death the Government was conducted temporarily by Sir William Denison, Governor of Madras, who carried out the Umbeyla Campaign against the Sitana fanatics successfully.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

INTERNAL RECONSTRUCTION UNDER FINANCIAL DIFFICULTIES

LAWRENCE

Sir John Lawrence became Viceroy early in 1864. Having risen in the Civil Service, since 1830, to be Chief Commissioner and subsequently Lieutenant-Governor of the Panjab, and having saved that Province and Upper India in the Mutiny, he knew the country perfectly. Towards Afghanistan he adopted the policy of neutrality—which was called "masterly inactivity"—and recognised whichever of the competitors became de facto ruler. When Sher Ali, in September, 1868, re-established a consolidated Administration, the British Government assisted him with money and arms. The conduct of Bhutan brought on a small war in 1864-65, by which a little additional territory, valuable for tea-cultivation, was acquired. Military operations on several frontiers were required; on the Black Mountain, Hazara Border, 12,500 troops were engaged. He felt acutely the Orissa famine of 1866-67, which caused immense mortality, probably of one-fourth of the population, as he had accepted the assurances of the Lieutenant-Governor that the precautions taken to save life were sufficient. The want of inland communications and external accessibility called for remedial measures in Orissa. Since that occurrence famines have invariably been combated, and generally with success. During his term of office Lawrence had to struggle with the weight of financial difficulties, and had a net deficit of two and a half millions during his five years: he carried a Licence Tax, though other measures of proposed taxation were not accepted. He paid much attention to sanitation—appointing a permanent Commission, to works of material improvement, military communications, railways, canals, systematising their progress; to various land questions involving tenant rights and interests; to the public services, education, and State ceremonies. The main principles of military reorganisation having been settled, he aimed at improving the condition of European soldiers serving in India by constructing healthy barracks. In legislation he had the valuable assistance of his Councillor, Sir Henry Maine, the famous jurist. They passed many important measures, on such subjects as the Emigration of Native Labourers, Whipping, Official Trustees, Registration of Documents, Remarriage of Native Converts, Abolition of Grand Juries, Intestate and Testamentary Succession, Partnership, Judicial Taxation, Murderous Outrages by Fanatics, Municipalities, besides preparing many projects subsequently enacted. In the five years 1864-1868 inclusive, 153 laws were made. In 1869 the European soldiers in India were 64,858, while the native army numbered 120,000, the population of India being then reckoned at 239 millions. Whereas Canning supervised the transfer of India from the Company to the Crown, Lawrence, as an experienced Indian Civilian, advanced the Reconstruction of India under the Crown on sound lines. More fortunate than his predecessors, he lived for ten years after retirement, and did good work in England.

THE THEATRE

"PRESERVING MR. PANMURE" AT THE COMEDY THEATRE

You find yourself at St. John Panmure's house, The Clewers, Tollshunt D'Arcy, near Polehampton. In addition to the host, a trembling, corrupt, insalubrious debauchee, whose sense of loyalty, truth, and responsibility has been undermined by a persistent self-indulgence, and the hostess, a youngish and not unbeautiful woman, who suffers under a growing mania for religion, you are asked to meet a collection of creatures conceived by Hogarth, or who have been brought to a sort of life by Mr. Bernard Shaw with the assistance of Mr. Granville Barker and Mr. Galsworthy.

There are Alfred Hebblethwaite, J.P., an old man with a benign face and eyes so lascivious as to leave a stain on the painted cheeks of a cocotte; and his wife, a big woman with a large nose and a series of chins, a jealous and suspicious mind behind a face falsely good-natured. There are the Right Hon. Reginald Stulkeley, M.P., abnormally tall, egregiously pompous and self-satisfied and smug; his cousin and private secretary, Talbot Woodhouse, abnormally small, hysterical, and high strung; and Hugh Loring, an awkward and loutish man in the thirties, illiterate, vacuous, and pugnacious. There are also the hostess's sister, a Dulcie Anstice, pretty in a carefully-cultivated foreign way, with the mind of a civet cat and the manners of a coster-girl, and Myrtle Panmure, the only child of the house, who is impish, precocious, and pedantic, a sort of abortion, an Early-Victorian enfant prodigue, a most eerie and uncomfortable little beast. There is also, as you quickly discover with a sigh of relief, a young girl called Josepha Quarendon, the governess, and a friend of Mrs. Panmure, outwardly deliciously pretty, maidenly and sweet, inwardly, as you find to your distress, a very sophisticated, practical, lying person.

You quickly come to the conclusion that there is nothing which will keep you among such a set and in such a house except absolute necessity. The house, like its inmates, is weird and can be compared with no other house extant. Its furniture is aggressively magnificent, horribly Tottenham Court Road. It possesses an organ and a very vulgar gong which makes a noise like a railway accident. You feel instinctively a curious unpleasantness in the air. You realise, with growing discomfort, a sense of hideous hypocrisy mixed with the all-pervading and blatantly exposed religiosity. You regret the fact that you ever made the acquaintance of "The Clewers" or accepted the hospitality of the Panmures. You would just as soon shut yourself up in the room in some museum filled with anthropophagi in which some sportive medical student has unbottled an offensive smell.

It appears that Josepha Quarendon is a young girl who is obliged to earn her own living somehow or other. She has known the most sordid side of poverty, and dislikes it. She is very happy under the roof of "The Clewers," where she has the best of everything to eat and drink, the services of servants, and pretty clothes to wear. She is well treated by Mrs. Panmure, to whose religious mania she panders with a half smile. She looks upon the place as a harbour in which she may lie untroubled by the rough waves by which she has been battered until one of the Panmure set who has money shall ask her to be his wife. She fully appreciates the marketable value of her beauty and high spirits, and takes a not unnatural delight at being spoilt by all the men who stay at the house. Her duties as a governess seem to be very small. She is certainly quite unable to teach her charge anything, for, obviously enough, Myrtle, the child of the house, is sister to the baby in Gilbert's "Bab Ballads" who was born smoking a cigar. Her happiness and sprightliness continue until one evening before dinner, when she comes upon Mr. Panmure endeavouring with irritation and feebleness to compose what he calls a sermonette. It is the habit of this man, under his wife's orders, to deliver every night at family prayers a short address on a religious subject. Being well aware of the fact that the male members of his house-party know pretty completely the ugly story of his past life, he has sufficient sense of the ridiculous left him to feel the ghastly incongruousness and blasphemy of his position. So he lights a cigar and, croaking "Put me among the girls," he sits down to compose his sermon.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

His soddened brain is quite unable to concentrate itself upon his work, and while he is still murmuring and gibbering the vulgar words of a so-called comic song, and chewing the end of his pen, Josepha enters the room. She is intensely amused at his trouble, breaks into fits of laughter, and proceeds to give him a "tip" on the writing of sermons. She goes so far even as to deliver a mock sermon for his benefit, with a callous disregard for the rudiments of good feeling and good taste which is quite appalling in one so young, especially when she is enjoying the kindness of an employer who is very sincere in her religious feeling. She tells her host that his library contains a collection of other men's sermons, and advises him to crib from these, and together they go into the library for this purpose—she laughing and sprightly, he gurgling and giggling at what he calls a great idea. They do not go into the library, however, before he has chucked her under the chin with his beastly, trembling finger, and leered at her horribly. Almost as soon as they have disappeared a cry of awful disgust fills the air, and the girl staggers back into the morning-room with her hand over her outraged lips. This vile creature, fit only for electrocution, has kissed her, and the girl's soul is nauseated at so filthy an outrage. Her anger blazes. The man, at first amazed at her attitude and then frightened, trembles, fawns at her feet, and supplicates her to forgive him and say nothing. She flies from him, more than ever aware that he is unclean.

She goes to her room, and is discovered by Myrtle in a passion of tears endeavouring to rub from her lips the contagion which has been put upon them. Later, dressed for dinner, and still smarting under the insult, she returns to the morning-room, finding Mrs. Hebblethwaite there. Deceived by the apparent kindliness of this woman and longing for advice and sympathy, she invents a letter from a friend who has suffered a similar outrage. The old woman is, however, too clever, and being married to a man whose loyalty she suspects, old as he is, she immediately imagines that the girl's story is her own, and that her own husband is the man of whom she is speaking. Determined to follow the matter up, she seizes the first opportunity to tell her hostess and Dulcie Anstice of the occurrence. Mrs. Panmure fixes upon Panmure as the culprit, and the sweet Dulcie immediately lays the blame upon the man to whom she is engaged. Turned into raging beasts, these three women squabble and shout like drunken fishwives until Josepha makes her appearance. They then put her through a searching cross-examination, quickly discover that she has lied, and demand to be told the name of the man. Josepha sees that she has been plunged into what is likely to become a scandal disastrous to herself, and that it will be in all probability no longer possible for her to enjoy the wealthy surroundings of "The Clewers." Driven inch by inch into a corner by these three most undelectable women, she bursts into an angry and hysterical torrent of words, refuses utterly to give the man's name away, and rushes out. Dinner puts an end temporarily to the warfare, which is, however, immediately resumed, more viciously than ever, when the meal is over. The three jealous women manœuvre to obtain Panmure to themselves. To his increasing fright and dismay, they tell him what has happened, and order him to discover the culprit. Shaking and trying to bluff, this frightful specimen of over-indulgence, feigning great indignation, goes into the billiard-room to do the best he can for himself. His only ray of comfort lies in the fact that Josepha has promised him that she will not split. He hopes to be able to force one of his friends to take the blame.

While all this is proceeding the pompous Stulkeley, who is quite unlikely to have sat in any English Cabinet, has taken possession of the library, with his secretary, for the purpose of concocting a speech on Tariff Reform. They are both bored utterly with the subject of which they know nothing, and they are both glad enough to be disturbed by the entrance of Josepha, both being in their peculiar way much attracted by her. Josepha has come to beg Stulkeley to say that he is the man who kissed her, and when he refuses she turns to Talbot Woodhouse with a similar request. He also refuses, to her astonishment and dismay. So she threatens to walk up and down outside the window in the snow, minus hat and wrap, in thin evening shoes, until they give in. This she actually does, until at last Stulkeley, turning up his immaculate trousers, rushes out and pulls her in, a bedraggled object. There is a lavatory in the library, in which there are a pair of slippers and a smoking-jacket. They beg her to remove her wet things, and remain in the smoking-jacket until they have dried them in front of the fire. Afraid to be seen about the house in her present condition, Josepha gladly enough consents to the arrangement, and presently hands out her soddened frock. The two men quarrel over who shall dry it, and Josepha listens at the keyhole while Stulkeley tells his cousin that he shall take Josepha to his own house and place her under the care of his sister.

Out of one harbour Josepha sees her way into another, and comes out in her petticoat with bare legs, her feet thrust into a pair of red Morocco slippers, wrapped in the smoking-jacket. In this unconventional attire she sits on the fender and dries her hair with a towel, all smiles again. She has forgotten the kiss. Her smiles continue until Stulkeley tells her that the coat and slippers are the property of Mr. Panmure. Her cry of disgust immediately informs them as to who was the man for whose misdeed they were requested to assume responsibility. They hear steps outside and a hand on the handle of the door, which they have locked. They hurry Josepha back into the lavatory and open the door to Panmure. This man has failed to make either old Mr. Hebblethwaite, J.P., or young Mr. Loring, buffoon, confess, so he has come to bully Stulkeley or Woodhouse into a confession, eventually to find himself accused by them. Whereupon he sobs and goes into a fit of nerves, crying out, "Don't be hard on me, boys. Let me down light." At this point old Hebblethwaite and Loring, furiously angry with Panmure, come into the library, and a horrible fracas commences, which is eventually continued by all the so-called ladies of this peculiar house. The row waxes hotter. Vulgar contumely is flung from man to woman. Hugh Loring itches to fight the old man, when at the height of the brawl the gong is sounded for prayers. There is an instant lull. "Straighten the old man's hair, boys," cries Panmure, placing his trembling hand over the cribbed sermon in his pocket. But old Mrs. Hebblethwaite is in no prayerful mood. She sets another spark to the gunpowder, and once again the brawl commences. And then Talbot Woodhouse, seeing his way to get the better of his cousin Stulkeley in Josepha's affections, steps forward and says, "I am the man."

First of all his face is slapped by Hugh Loring. Then all the women except Mrs. Panmure revile him, and Stulkeley, realising his cousin's cunning, is furiously angry. Once more the gong sounds for prayers, and the organ plays a voluntary, and then Mrs. Panmure steps forward, unpins from her bosom the Golden Order of Pure Souls of the First Class, and confers it upon the man who has confessed. She leads him into the room where the kneeling servants are waiting, and is followed by the house-party. Panmure, faced with his ordeal, rushes back from the door to the writing-table, from which he takes a flask of brandy. He gulps down several mouthfuls, pulls himself together, and draws his sermon from his pocket. Just as he is going to the door with it, Josepha bursts out of the lavatory, seizes the sermon, and flings it upon the fire.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

We next find Josepha in Stulkeley's house in London. She is now being made love to by the Tariff Reform member and his secretary, and these two peculiar creatures are wildly jealous of each other. Eventually they agree to draw lots as to who shall propose to her first, and when drawing first, Woodhouse's hand cannot be removed from the vase in which the papers have been placed. After a great struggle and much ignominious wrangling, his hand is freed, and his rage is all the greater when he finds that he has drawn the paper which necessitates a proposal following upon Stulkeley's. Stulkeley, nursing the vase for comfort and looking even more foolish than usual, proceeds to propose to Josepha, in the middle of which a sound is heard outside the door. Can it be that Woodhouse is eavesdropping? Josepha takes a long quill pen, thrusts it through the keyhole, and hears a cry of anguish. "The Clewers" house-party then makes its appearance. Panmure has been found out by a footman and decorated with the Order of Pure Souls (Third Class) by his wife, of which he is mightily proud. There is much giggling and vulgar innuendo from these respectable people, and the entrance of Talbot Woodhouse with a patch over his eye. He is again reviled as a liar before these persons take their departure.

Josepha is then faced by her two suitors. Fully aware of the fact that Stulkeley, although old enough to be her father, is the moneyed man, she writes the same sentence on two slips of paper, puts them into a vase, and asks Stulkeley to draw. He draws, is overwhelmed with joy, and eyes his discomfited secretary and cousin with glee. Woodhouse, utterly crestfallen, mutters incoherent words, puts his hand in the vase, to Josepha's immense annoyance, and draws out the other paper, thus discovering the trick that has been played upon him. Greatly incensed, and with a sort of pitiful dignity, he removes the latchkey of Stulkeley's house from his chain and withdraws, whereupon the happy Stulkeley opens his stiff arms and the mercenary little Josepha walks coyly into them.

And this is the story of Sir Arthur Pinero's "comic play."

HERCULES UNWROUGHT

"All for love; or, the world well lost." Thus Dryden paraphrases, and most vilely paraphrases, heroic dignity into the flippant sentiment of the age in which he lived. The mood that achieved "The Hind and the Panther" was a far way indeed from the emotion that mocked at Time and Circumstance, finding Thrones and Powers but pedestals to reach to the stars. Thus, too, the dilettante pleasure of loves and houris lay in the dwarf-valleys, gazing unapprehensively at the mighty temper that sought to find its equal in breadth and stature, and, finding her, hailed her over the distance with the shout, "Oh, thou Day o' the World!"

Love? It was not love that won Antony, not mere sensuous delight, not the purer vision nor the softer gleam, but comradeship rather, and an equal courage to toss conventions away, sweep aside little creeds, silken chains that bind those that will be bound, greatly to dare and to be. For a very Titan was Antony. His hand brushes through gossamer beauty with his first words to us: "There's beggary in the love that can be reckoned." "I'll set a bourne how far to be beloved," says Cleopatra, rising to his mood. "Then must you needs find out new heaven, new earth," he replies, flinging his challenge to corporeal conditions. No love-song was this, but the very daring of magnificence. Will he kiss? Then it shall be no mere succulent sport. All life shall be held in bond for so supreme a deed. "The nobleness of life," says he, "is to do thus;" adding significantly, "when such a mutual pair and such a twain can do't." Truly indeed they "stand up peerless;" and love is but the usher to so meet and mighty a union.

He was ever thus. Back in the old days he had chosen Fulvia because she had it in her to rise to his own level. The early choices of instinct are seldom amiss, though they may chance to lead to folly and futility. When made they had the possibilities of splendour in them. So it was with Antony and Fulvia. She who could raise a war against Cæsar, thus to bring her husband back to her side, was not unmeet a companion for him. His choice in her was approved, for she, too, could dare. No slight spirit was hers. Though she fell away to shrewishness, yet he bears her in tender memory. She lost the right to stand by him, a giant, he, among his fellows, with the acquisition of her scolding and shrill tongue; but he can still blush when Cleopatra taunts him of her, for she had been an excellent comrade once. The news of her death wrings tribute upon tribute from him. "There's a great spirit gone," says he to himself; "she's good being gone; the hand could pluck her back that shoved her on;" to Cæsar, this:—

> As for my wife,
> I would you had her spirit in such another:
> The third o' the world is yours; which with a snaffle
> You may pace easy, but not such a wife.

It was the choice of instinct, this first of his, even as was his last. She being dead, he breaks off from Cleopatra, his enchanting Queen, in sudden remorse. When the proposal is made that Octavius should dower his sister on him, thus to patch their quarrel, sealing amity by the bonds of kinship, he takes her, thinking to raise her as a barrier between himself and his return to Cleopatra. But it cannot be done: Nature would not be denied in him; he must needs find himself a mate. His resolves that "that to come shall all be done by th' rule" avail nothing. Not that he has fault to find in Octavia! In truth, he has nothing but praise for her; he is kingly-kind when with her, gracious and tender. But it is of no avail. She is not for him. He may caress her, tend her, soothe her; but she can never stand shoulder to shoulder with him, and greet occasion with gigantic hilarity. Before she got her a waspish tongue, Fulvia was even such a one; but Fulvia is dead. There is now only Cleopatra, she of the infinite variety, she who could never cloy his appetite, who could drink through the night with him, or put the royalty of person to the stern test of hilarity in the streets of Alexandria, who could match him in speech and mate him in deed. To her he flies, and picks up life again, and the zest of being, the interim between his desertion of her and his return to her being eternally waste.

For he is not as other men, nor are their creeds his creeds. In truth, he has no creeds. Creeds are for those who live to rote and rule: such as Cæsar yonder in Rome, who must needs live to rote and rule since he has no power of personality to beat out into existence. There is nothing magnificent about Cæsar; if he had not rotes and rules to live by he would be as nothing, a cipher merely; it is the static conditions of his life that find him his being and give him his shape and outline. Not so Antony! He is himself; a vast, dynamic personality that will not, because it cannot, conform to, or be content with, the world of devitalised little people of whom Octavius Cæsar is type and chief. Will he drink? Then he will drink the whole night through, and defy the day. Will he fight? Then will his captain's heart "in the scuffles of great fights burst the buckles on his breast." Will he sport? Then it shall be among the common people, not fearing the touch of reality for his kingliness, knowing that it can thereby but appear the more lustrous. Will his best friend desert him in the hour of need? Then he will lavish out largess on him, never even thinking of blame. Will he love? Then it shall be with the only one that can rise to equality with him in spirit. It shall be with Cleopatra.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The coil of little people gather about him, however, seeking to bring him to earth. His lineage is from Hercules, and he attires himself as another Hercules. Their lineage is from the everlasting clay-born; no touch of Olympian fire is in them. But they coil about him in their multitudes, six to his one, and Octavius Cæsar, the most completely clay-born of them all, is at their head. They would pluck him to earth, and lay his star-acquainted head in the dust. He, seeing them coming, flings a characteristic challenge at them. He picks their leader and calls him out to single combat. He forgot that it was not the way of worldly-wise and reasoning men, but the way of splendid and dynamic gods, to venture all on a single superb throw. But they see his mood and play to it. They challenge him to fight at sea, knowing him weak in ships. He determines to do it. "Why will my lord do so?" asks the perplexed Canidius. "For that he dares us to't," comes the resplendent answer. Enobarbus complains that Antony has made "his will lord of his reason;" and that Cæsar has "subdued his judgment." Enobarbus did not altogether understand Antony: he deserted him.

That the coldly calculating Octavius should have overcome the splendour and magnificence of the god-like Antony is part of the eternal tragedy of the world. But it is not all the tragedy of Antony; it is not even the deeper tragedy. For she whom he had picked to be his mate, she whom of all the earth he could find one and equal with him—she failed him! The former could but win from him a challenge to very Fate itself: "Some wine, within there, and our viands! Fortune knows we scorn her most when most she offers blows." But the latter broke him.

First she had fled their common foe; and he, who knew no fear, in whose composite texture dauntlessness was the dominant note, he fled after her. "I've fled myself, and have instructed cowards to run and show their shoulders," he wails; and therewith there comes his first disillusionment of her. Revulsion seizes him. He had called her to be his equal, and she had led him to shame! When next she comes to him he shudders at the very prospect of her physical touch. He shrinks from her.

That was his first disillusionment, from which he hardly shook free. The next shattered him. For she turned from him to hold truck with the advancing Cæsar. All she had been before he met her comes rushing on him in a dark and fearful torrent at this. He taunts her with it. He could not have done so before; but she has fallen beneath him now, she is no longer his peer; and so he taunts her, and through her taunts the high gods that have lured him to his fate in her. He may say, "I am satisfied;" but it is not so. Tragedy has set, and his death is the necessary relief to the doom that has been pronounced. He may shroud the doom, but at the next reverse it will imperiously out. "All's lost," says he; "This foul Egyptian has betrayed me."

But not thus may the tragedy close. She sends him false news of her death, and immediately there floods on him the memory of the high and peerless mate she once had seemed to be. All the earth is sordid, dull, and profitless without her; life is a mockery; and it is with infinite weariness that the words break from him: "Unarm me, Eros; the long day's task is done, and we must sleep."

All is over. He may fall on his sword, he may see her, he may even win his last kiss from her; but Hercules is unwrought without having won his mate, and the earth is given up to Octavius and his like. "There is nothing left remarkable beneath the visiting moon." "A rarer spirit never did steer humanity. But you, gods, will give us some faults to make us men," is the half-discerning epitaph of Agrippa. But beneath the epitaph her dust lies mingled with his—she who unwrought him, and brought him to dust and futility; she whom he hailed to be his peerless mate, and who failed him at the last.

DARRELL FIGGIS.

CLAPTRAP, UNLIMITED

THIS company has been handed down to us from the days of the ancient Britons, but during the past five years it has been doing an exceptionally active business in our midst. One of its primary functions nowadays is the extirpation of the Peerage, which it proposes to effect by doubling the number of Peers. The company has enlisted into its service a staff of hooligans, who can be depended upon to howl down latter-day orators who dissent from its creed and to shout inane doggerel at public meetings. By these means it conducts classes for the prevention of fair argument, or at least for the prevention of that argument being audible. It knows that large sections of the community do not read and never give themselves the trouble of thinking. It has procured a strong hold upon these unthinking classes.

The majority of the professors of the Claptrap School in the present Cabinet are lawyers—some are men of considerable distinction, others are of the Tadpole type. They receive big salaries, and their patronage is valuable and extensive. The adage about making hay while the sun shines is one they have laid to heart. "The British Constitution" used to be a time-honoured phrase. They regard this phrase as representing an outworn creed. Their public talk is, speaking broadly, mostly mere fooling of the crowd, and it is spoken with the tongue in the cheek. They know, further, that passion must be torn to tatters, to very rags, to split the ears of the groundlings, and their first player accordingly assumes the mantle of Bottom. "If I do it, let the audience look to their eyes," says he; "I will move storms, I will condole in some measure. To the rest:—Yet my chief humour is for a tyrant: I could play Ercles rarely, or a part to tear a cat in."

The Claptrap School goes back to dim antiquity, probably to the very dawn of humanity. Wherever men have congregated in communities its influence has been active. As the sun of one great Empire after another has risen and set, it is this school which has been its undoing and the cause of its decay. No people in whom its professors are paramount can escape decline and fall. Two modern instances will suffice to show its methods. It is rather more than fifty years ago that red revolution was in the air. Thrones and dynasties seemed toppling all over Europe. In England was a terrible unrest. The Iron Duke, the hero of a hundred fights, had thrown a terse phrase which summed up the situation in the face of the mob—"the Queen's Government must be carried on." As a result the windows of Apsley House were smashed and the house half wrecked. Those windows remained boarded up until the Duke's death. The Claptrap School might shout itself hoarse for him. The grim old warrior was not one to waver or turn a fraction of an inch from his course, let their orators orate never so virulently.

Another historical occasion was in 1831. The Wizard of the North was assailed this time. The noble spirit that had witched the world with magic artistry, Sir Walter, whom it would have been thought all men must unite to honour, he whose name stands next to that of Shakespeare as the interpreter of the human story, was singled out for insult and threatened violence. Broken in health and nearing the limit of his days, Scott had dared to express an unpopular opinion. He drove with Lockhart to Jedburgh, where an election was taking place. His carriage was received with a shower of stones because he did not wear the popular colours and refused to conceal the faith that was in him. A storm of foul abuse and blasphemy saluted him on his way to the poll, and a woman spat upon him from a window. He says in his diary, "The mob was exceedingly vociferous and brutal, as they usually are nowadays. . . . Troja fuit. I left the borough in the midst of abuse and the gentle hint of 'Burk Sir Walter.'" That phrase hung about his mind and filled his last few months with dire distress. Well might he exclaim during his last illness, "England is no longer a place for an honest man. I shall not live to find it so; you may."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The story of the French Revolution has been told a hundred times in history and fiction. The story demonstrates how easily the insane passions of the mob may be roused. Ill will it be for the demagogue who plays that dangerous game amongst us. Great Britain may yet see the ordered progress of a hundred years swept away in scenes of bloodshed. Ulster does not take the views of the Claptrap School. She is buying arms, and she means to use them rather than see her liberties destroyed and her industries perish.

The present crisis should appeal to moderate men to intervene in State affairs. The non-partisan has been so accustomed from time beyond the memory of man to see settled order, and to know that wild talk is usually its own Nemesis, that he does not easily believe in the possibility of actual physical disturbance. "Things will straighten themselves out all right," he has been accustomed to think. "We have heard strong language and bad language before. It's a safety-valve. Let the pent-up gases escape, and we shall settle down again to sober verities." Lately the news of towns and villages wrecked in South Wales, and of authority unequal to the emergency, has come to him with an awakening shock. The temper of South Wales is surging throughout Great Britain from one end to the other. It is held in check by the strong arm of the law. Let the demagogue in high places gain the mastery over his more passive colleagues and we shall see the Tonypandy riots spread like the Armada fires from shire to shire. Ireland will pass through a baptism of blood, for civil war dogs the footsteps of the firebrand agitator there.

It is to the more sober element that Britain must turn. The country wants nothing so much as a cessation of strife and turmoil and to be allowed to get on with its business. Who would start building operations while an earthquake is in progress? Business men, the bread-winners, say, "A plague on both your Houses. Leave us alone to work quietly, without all this firework display and the eternal limelight." Limelight and Limehouse—aye, there's the rub.

SOME ART EXHIBITIONS

THE GRAFTON GALLERIES

The National Portrait Society opened their inaugural exhibition in London at the Grafton Galleries on Saturday. In the foreword to their catalogue they lay stress on the fact that the Society is national and not insular, and that it extends the usual courtesies to distinguished foreign artists. For this they are to be congratulaled, as the presence of foreign pictures in an exhibition is always interesting for purposes of comparison, and in the present instance serves to demonstrate the excellence of modern English portrait work. Further, the Committee by their decision to hang a few pictures by dead masters have given an interesting opportunity for the comparison of old and new methods of portrait-painting. The dull, conventional excellence of the three examples of Watts' portraiture serves but to emphasise the imaginative qualities of the younger artists of the present day; while the presence of two portraits by Whistler is interesting as throwing light on the artistic ancestry of a number of quite modern portraits. It is refreshing to see the good work of modern English portrait painters, and to note that they have utilised past traditions, and have not spoilt their art by excursions into the grotesque and the sensational. It has remained for a Frenchman, De Bussy, to introduce this tone into the exhibition, and his picture is silently condemned and ridiculed by the excellent work which surrounds it. As an example of the good work of the younger English artists we may mention the pictures of Gerald Kelly and Walter Russell, whose exhibits are hung side by side in the main hall. They are both really sound artists, both in drawing and painting. Kelly's work is somewhat more rigid than that of Russell; he has carried definition and execution to a higher degree, while Kelly leaves more to the imagination. Russell's two portraits, especially his Camilla, show much character and imagination, combined with admirable technique. There are two striking portraits by Glyn Philpot, painted with great audacity and skill. They are works that should last, and when the artist's technique has overtaken his ambition he should produce something much finer still. Clifford Addams has several charming exhibits, while W. G. von Glehn's picture of a lady is a bright piece of painting with much life. Harrington Mann has, as usual, some delightful pictures. "The Harvesters" of Austen Brown is interesting and powerful. John Lavery's exhibits hardly show him at his best. Sargent's pictures are too well known to call for reference here. George Henry has three charming exhibits. The picture "Light" is a clever work, but suggests problems as to the origin of one of the lights which are thrown on his portrait figure. As a nocturne the picture is particularly effective. Miss Flora Lein has an attractive firelight scene, in which the figure of the baby is painted with particular skill; for the rest her pictures are rather exaggerated and vague in their style. Mr. Mouat Loudan has some good and attractive pictures. J. McLure Hamilton has a series of pictures, painted with skill, but somewhat lacking in depth. America is represented by Miss Ellen Emmett with two portraits, one of which—"The Misses Metcalf"—is clever and original. A number of foreign artists have availed themselves of the Society's courteous invitation. Señor Gaudara has three striking portraits, of which his Mlle. Polaire is at once the most pleasing and the best. His other portraits are also good, and that he can draw is proved by the foot of Mlle. Polaire and the hands of Madame J. P. It is a pity that M. Blanche did not see fit to sustain his reputation by better examples of his art. Of the pictures exhibited by him, his study of Mr. Charles Shannon and Mr. Ricketts is the only one which merits attention. The pictures of the German artist Herr Leo Samberger are clever and full of character, with the exception of his portrait of the Archbishop of Bamberg. A study of this work makes us wonder if Herr Samberger would not have been a brilliant caricaturist had his art been differently applied. P. A. Lazlo has a collection of striking and stately, but somewhat conventional and unimaginative, portraits. There are two exquisitely fine dry-point etchings by M. Theodore Roussel executed with all the artist's usual skill.

Excellent sculpture is also to be seen at the exhibition, amongst which is some interesting work by Roslin, in all its rugged strength. Mr. Stirling Lee, in his two beautiful heads, Cassandra and Lydia, has carved a wonderful spirit of dreamy mysticism into the marble. Mr. Basil Gotto has three exhibits—an Ismael, a bust of Thomas Vickers, Esq., and a model for a statue of King Edward, which we hope to see reproduced as a memorial. His works show a classic purity combined with a psychological penetration which is remarkable. Mr. Eppstein has several original figures which are charming in their Oriental mystery.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The noticeable point about the exhibition is the excellence of the work of the English portrait-painters, and the great promise shown by the younger artists. This is particularly pleasing at a time when the hopeless decadence of art is being so universally preached. The work of the English artists combines imaginative and original qualities with a respect for tradition. Their works further seem to breathe a spirit of genuine originality and imagination, and not to simulate these qualities by assuming traits at once grotesque and inartistic, and by breaking with all the accumulated æsthetic traditions of the past. The National Portrait Society are to be congratulated on their inaugural exhibition, and we wish them all success in the future.

THE GOUPIL GALLERY

At the Goupil Gallery the Senefelder Club formed for the advancement of artistic lithography in commemoration of its inventor, Aloys Senefelder, is holding its Second Exhibition. In addition to the work of the present members, the Exhibition includes some lithographs by Manet, Fantin-Latour, Renouard, and Rops. There is nothing, however, by the artist who did so much for the revival of lithography, and whose own works in this medium—of which a special exhibition was given recently—were some of the most perfect contributions to the art. While much of the work now being exhibited is exceedingly clever, there are few things which can compete with the finest of Whistler's impressions, and in its general disregard of Whistler's theory that lithographs should be comparatively small in size and delicate in treatment, we think that the Senefelder Club is not developing its art in the best possible way. The Exhibition is very interesting, however, and includes some of the sympathetically touched work of Miss Ethel Gabain, Mr. T. R. Way, Mr. A. Chisholm, Mr. Emile Claus, and Professor Legros.

In the upper rooms at the Goupil Gallery may be seen a collection of the paintings of the late Miss Sarah Dodson which will shortly be taken to America for a Memorial Exhibition to be held there. That Miss Dodson was an artist in the real sense is sufficiently proved, we think, by her landscapes; while several of her studies for figure-subjects—the sketch for the "Invocation of Moses," for instance, and "Psyche carried away by the Zephyrs"—show a power of construction and composition, and a feeling for the rich massing of colour which promise more than she was able to carry out—judging from this exhibition, which may be taken as a fair example of her powers—in her larger canvases.

THE BAILLIE GALLERY

At the Baillie Gallery, Bruton Street, there is now on view an Exhibition of some of the very interesting work of Mr. W. J. Leech, R.H.A., R.O.I. The pictures exhibited are by no means equal in quality, but this must almost inevitably be the case with any art in which there is vitality. The "Blue Nets in a Breeze" and the "Glittering Sea" prove that Mr. Leech has acquired a considerable mastery of technique, but in some of his pictures—the "Children in the Sun," the "Portrait of the Artist," "A Valley, Brittany," with its texture of tapestry, there is more than fundamental brainwork.

There is also on exhibition at this Gallery a small collection of paintings and illuminations by Miss Jessie Bayes, some of which are applied to the decoration of caskets, &c., and there is a certain beauty of colour and design in this work; but in its extreme elaboration it has a somewhat laboured appearance, and there is some effective drawing in feet and hands. In the same room are shown the original water-colour illustrations to "Virginibus Puerisque" and others by Mr. Norman Wilkinson, of Four Oaks. Some of these contain good work, especially in the management of the colour which is always fresh and transparent, while there is also a certain beauty and originality, as in the aeroplane picture illustrating "We have no leisure to entertain the terror of Death," and the girl's figure in "A Gracious Tremolo." The two remaining rooms are devoted to some very slight sketches of the Valley of the Loire by Mr. Frank Galsworthy, and a collection of water-colour drawings by Mr. William Wildman, some of which—"Rain and Sun," "The River, Greenwich," and "The Edge of the Wood"—are touched with a certain delicacy and charm.

THE CARFAX AND DOWDESWELL GALLERIES

Few probably will question the cleverness of many of the sketches which Mr. Walter Sickert has now on view at Messrs. Carfax's Gallery in Bury Street. Anything like criticism of them would involve more than can be attempted here. When compared, however, with the sketches recently exhibited at Grafton Street, they tend to prove that pencil and chalk are among the least successful mediums for expressing the ideals of the modern French school.

Finally, there is an exhibition of water-colours of "Old-World Towns in Belgium and Holland," by Mr. W. L. Bruckman, at Messrs. Dowdeswell's Galleries. There is some very charming work here, and it is to be found in the half-dozen English landscapes—notably "The Country Road," "Near Lewes," and "Near Poole"—which, strangely enough, greatly surpass the pictures which give the Exhibition its name.

THE DAY BEFORE YESTERDAY

II.—A RAILWAY JOURNEY

I SUPPOSE that when little boys made their journeys by coach with David Copperfield or Tom Brown and his pea-shooting comrades, they did in truth find adventure easier to achieve than we who were born in an age of railways. But though the rarer joys of far travel by road were denied us, it did not need Mr. Rudyard Kipling in a didactic mood to convince us that there was plenty of romance in railway journeys if you approached them in the right spirit. We were as fond of playing at trains as most small boys, and a stationary engine with the light of the furnace glowing on the grim face of the driver was a disquieting feature of all my nightmares. So when the grown-up people announced that one of us was to make a long journey, young Ulysses became for the moment an envied and enchanted figure. Our periodical excursions to London were well enough in their way; noisy, jolly parties in reserved carriages to pantomimes and the Lord Mayor's Show, or matter-of-fact visits to the dentist or the shops. But we all knew the features of the landscape on the way to London by heart, and it was the thought of voyaging through the unknown that fired our lively blood, our hazy sense of geography enabling us to believe that all manner of marvels were to be seen by young eyes from English railway-carriages. Also we did not feel that we were real travellers until we had left all our own grown-ups behind, though in such circumstances we had to put up with the indignity of being confided to the care of the guard. Until children have votes, they will continue to suffer from such slights as this!

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

One morning in early Spring I left London for the North. The adult who saw me off performed his task on the whole very well. True he introduced me to the guard, a bearded and sinister man, but on the other hand he realised the importance of my having a corner seat, and only once or twice committed the error of treating me as if I were a parcel. For my part, I was at pains to conceal my excitement beneath the mannerisms of an experienced traveller. I put the window up and down several times and read aloud all the notices concerning luncheon-baskets and danger-signals. Then my companion shook hands with me in a sensible, manly fashion, and the train started. I sat back and examined my fellow-travellers, and found them rather disappointing. There were three ladies manifestly of the aunt kind, and a stiff, well-behaved little girl who might have stepped out of one of my sister's story-books. She was reading a book without pictures, and when I turned over the pages of my magazines she displayed no interest in them whatever. I could never read in the train, so, with a tentative effort at good manners, I pushed them towards her, but she shook her head; to show her that I did not think this was a snub, I pulled out my packets of sandwiches and had my lunch. After that I played with the blind, which worked with a spring, until one of the aunts told me not to fidget, although she was no aunt of mine. Then I looked out of the window, a prey to voiceless wrath.

By now we had left London far behind, and when I had finished composing imaginary retorts to the unscrupulous aunt, I was quite content to see the wonders of the world flit by. There were hills and valleys decked with romantic woods and set with fascinating and secretive ponds. To my eyes the hills were mountains and the valleys perilous hollows, the accustomed lairs of tremendous dragons. I saw little thatched houses wherein swart witches awaited the coming of Hansel and Gretel, and fairy children waved to me from cottage-gardens and the gates of level-crossings, greetings which I dutifully returned until the aunt made me pull up the window. After a while a change came over the scenery. The placid greens and browns of the country-side blossomed to gold and purple and crimson. I saw a roc float across the arching sky on sluggish wings, and my eyes were delighted with visions of deserts and mosques and palm-trees. That my fellow-passengers would not raise their heads to behold these marvels did not trouble me; I beat on the window with delight, until, like little Billee in Thackeray's ballad, I saw Jerusalem and Madagascar, and North and South Amerikee.

Then something surprising happened. I saw the earth leap up and invade the sky and the sky drop down and blot out the earth, and I felt as though my wings were broken. Then the sides of the carriage closed in and squeezed out the door like a pip out of an orange, until there was only a three-cornered gap left. The air was full of dust and I sneezed again and again, but could not find my pocket-handerchief. Presently a young man came and lifted me out through the hole, and seemed very surprised that I was not hurt. I realised that there had been an accident, for the train was broken into pieces and the permanent way was very untidy. Close at hand I saw the little girl sitting on a bank, and a man kneeling at her feet taking her boots off. I would have liked to speak to her, but I remembered how she had refused the offer of my magazines, and was afraid she would snub me again. The place was very noisy, for people were calling out, and there was a great sound of steam. I noticed that everybody's face was very white, especially the guard's, which made his beard seem as black as soot. The young man took me by the hand and led me along the uneven ground, and there was so much to see that my feet kept stumbling over things, and he had to hold me up. On the way we passed the body of a man lying with a rug over his head. I knew that he was dead; but I had seen drunken men in the streets lie like that, and I could not help looking about for the policemen. Soon we came to a little station, and the platform was crowded with people who would not stand still, but walked round and round making noises. When I climbed up on the platform a woman caught hold of me and cried over me. One of her tears fell on my ear and tickled me; but she held me so tightly that I could not put up my hand to rub it. Her breath was hot on my head.

Then I heard a detested voice say, "Poor little boy, so tired!" and I shuddered back into consciousness of the world that was least interesting of all the worlds I knew. I need not have opened my eyes to be sure that the aunts were at their fell work again, and that the little girl's snub nose was tilted to a patronising angle. Had I woken up a minute later she, too, would have joined in the auntish chorus of compassion for my weakness. As it was, I looked at her with drowsy pity, finding that she was one of those luckless infants who might as well stay at home for all the fun they get out of travelling. She knew no better than to scream when the train ran into a tunnel; what would she have done if she had seen my roc?

The train ran on and on, and still I throned it in my corner, awake or dreaming, indisputably master of all the things that counted. The three aunts faded into antimacassars; the little girl endured her uninteresting life and became an aunt and an antimacassar in her turn, and still I swung my legs in my corner seat, a boy-errant in the strange places of the world. I do not remember the name of the station at which the bearded guard ultimately brought me out of my dreams. I do remember standing stiffly on the platform and deciding that I had been travelling night and day for three hundred years. When I communicated this fact to the relatives who met me, they were strangely unimpressed; but I knew that when I returned home to my brothers they would display a decent interest in the story of my wanderings. After all, you can't expect grown-up people to understand everything!

RICHARD MIDDLETON.

ROYAL COLONIAL INSTITUTE

ON Tuesday afternoon, January 24th, a lecture was delivered at the Whitehall Rooms, Hotel Métropole, by the Hon J. G. Jenkins, on "Papua and the Papuans," the Hon. J. H. P. Murray (Lieut.-Governor of Papua) taking the chair at four o'clock.

The lecturer in his preliminary observations explained that he visited that little-known island not altogether as a sight-seeing, world-encircling tourist, but rather with the object of learning what he could about the climate, the productive possibilities of the soil, and the adaptability of the natives to white supervision and civilisation. Few people have any idea of its size and importance, or any acquaintance with its history. After attempts at annexation in 1793 by the East India Company, and in 1873 by Captain Moresby, another attempt was made in 1883, when Sir Thomas McIlwraith, the Premier of Queensland, took possession of all the eastern part of the island. He asked for a ratification of his action, pointing out the danger to Australia by allowing foreign nations to take possession, especially referring to Germany's acquisition policy in the Pacific. The Home Government were again blind to Great Britain's interest, and refused the request on the ground that they considered there was no danger from German expansion. The very next year Germany took possession of about half of the unannexed part of the island, thus securing a splendid harbour and naval base in New Guinea, which, were it not for the sleepy stupidity of the home authorities, should have all belonged to the British Empire. After the Germans had annexed this territory in 1884 the British Government became partially awake and allowed Australia to protect the unannexed portion of the island, providing that she (Australia) would guarantee £15,000 per annum for expenses. This was at once agreed. Four years afterwards, in 1888, Great Britain formally annexed it, upon Queensland, New South Wales, and Victoria consenting to bear the cost of government. This financial responsibility was undertaken by all Australia upon the establishment of the Commonwealth in 1901, and in 1905 the full control of Papua was given over to the Commonwealth by an Act which came into force on September 1st, 1906.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The white population numbers about eight hundred; the natives are estimated at about 400,000, and the speaker proceeded to give many interesting details of the mode of life pursued, the climate, the ideas of the inhabitants. "Before one visits the tropical islands," said Mr. Jenkins, "and sees and hears for oneself what is being done, one is inclined to indulge in mistaken zeal and soft sentiment over the wickedness of making the poor natives work. I have heard wealthy men in this country deplore the condition of these free men of the bush, while they themselves are blind to the fact that white men and women are employed in the heart of civilised England under far less healthy conditions and at far smaller compensation, considering the needs and surroundings of each. It is a great mistake to think that properly directed work is doing any injury to the native; on the contrary, it is his greatest civiliser, and is teaching him lessons in self-preservation and maintenance which must be of permanent benefit. Natives to live must eat. When they are taught that they can easily grow a great part of their own food and buy the balance of their requirements with their labour, they cease their desire for warfare and for eating each other.

"Most of the missionaries now fully understand the necessity of keeping the natives at work as far as possible. These missionaries are real reformers, and as such they fully recognise what some professional reformers will not see—that the idle poor are a far greater menace to a country than the 'idle rich,' and the greatest benefit to mankind must come by the elevation and improvement of the many, and not by the abuse or even the destruction of the few. The natives are very imitative, and those who loaf around the ports in idleness soon learn the worst features of white civilisation. The only place where we had any necessity to question the uprightness of the natives was in those localities where the evil influence of the demoralised European had contaminated them."

With a few remarks on the possibilities of development in Papua, and the probability that at no very future date the island may become one of Britain's valuable assets, the lecture was brought to a close. Some excellent views thrown on the screen, illustrating the position of New Guinea, its scenery, and its people, concluded a very successful and profitable hour, and the large audience showed its hearty approval of the knowledge and care which had been brought to bear upon the subject.

THE LONDON INSTITUTION

Professor Raleigh on Hazlitt

In introducing the subject of his lecture at the London Institution on Monday evening last, Professor Walter Raleigh remarked that a good deal of Hazlitt's work consisted of "criticism of criticism"—a process which could be carried too far, a "chain of parasitism which sometimes goes on until the parasite becomes too small to attract attention." No excuse for this sort of writing need be made in the case of William Hazlitt, for he, like all great critics of literature, was always talking about life, and was free from any taint of the pedantic.

After mentioning the circumstances of Hazlitt's birth, and the hard fighting stock from which he descended, Professor Raleigh spiritedly protested that the most brilliant schoolboys rarely made the finest successes in life—alluding to the desultory character of Hazlitt's education—and quoted passages from some of the well-known essays presumably referring to the author's childhood. In very early life the future essayist scribbled on many themes, and doubtless his meeting with Coleridge and Wordsworth had something to do with his career. Not until he was forty years of age however, did he get thoroughly into touch with human life, and do his best work.

Settling in London in 1812, Hazlitt began his strenuous years as a working journalist, contributing to many papers matter of the most varied description. His gifts in some respects were extraordinary. He could produce in a short time an essay abounding in profound thought, couched in terse and polished English, without apparent premeditation. The explanation is to be found, said Professor Raleigh, in the fact that for years he had been thinking deeply—the preparation had been going on—and that he rarely wrote on any subject which did not interest him. He recorded the "Pleasures of Hating," but nearly all his essays were concerned with the things he loved, and were remarkable for the justness and directness of their thought. His youth may have seemed futile, but it was the period of inception. "For many years," said Hazlitt, "I did nothing but think."

Hazlitt remained passionately true, observed the lecturer in conclusion, to his early principles. He loved mankind, but not man as an individual. The eulogy of Charles Lamb, his devoted friend, was quoted, and the gatherings of the little circle of those happiest days were mentioned, when Hazlitt excelled as a talker—days which doubtless bore their part in his memory when he said, "I have had a happy life." Professor Raleigh also enlarged on many fascinating points—Hazlitt's splendidly childlike heart, his love for the open air, his keen pleasure in things seen.

The lecture was loudly applauded, and from a literary and intellectual standpoint must have thoroughly charmed and interested every listener.

On Monday, January 30th, at 5 p.m., Mr. R. W. A. Brewer, F.R.S.E., A.M.I.C.E., will give a lecture on "The Art of Aviation," which will be illustrated by lantern slides and experiments.

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

The public soon cried "enough"; it bought steadily for a few days and then stopped. The professionals were not able to unload, and as a result we now see a Stock Exchange almost wholly bullish. It is not a pleasant position, but it may be ameliorated by further buying. The business of the jobber is to sell shares, not buy them. Everybody in the City believed that a good strong market had arrived, and everybody laid in a stock of shares with which to supply the greedy countryman who always comes in upon the top of a rise after having got out right at the bottom. We are now somewhat disappointed, for no one in the City wants to hold shares one moment longer than obliged. The brilliant journalist who writes the market report for the Financial

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

News crystallises the views of the City in an aphorism that will one day become a copybook maxim in all commercial Colleges. He says "The aloofness of the public is distasteful to the professionals."

The MONEY MARKET added to our chagrin by remaining unaccountably hard, so hard that the Bank of England felt justified in retaining its rate. It is not a difficult matter to persuade the Bank to keep up the Rate; very little pressure is required; but the merchant who lives upon cheap money does not look eye to eye with the banker. He sees no urgent demand, and he cannot understand why our official Rate should be $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. while that of France is 3 per cent. Clearly, we are now suffering from our ambitions. Great Britain, proud in her position as the champion of the gold standard, induced all the other nations to imitate her; the result is that the U.S. Treasury and banks now hold 263 millions, France holds 131 millions, Russia 130 millions. The Brazil and the Argentine have added 50 millions in a few years, Austria and Italy another 50 millions. Great Britain has hardly added to her official reserve at all during ten years. But the gold of the rest of the world has increased 77 per cent. in the decade. Something will have to be done to remedy the strange anomaly. We have our cheque system, which takes the place of currency, but in the event of a big war we should be placed in a serious dilemma. We live upon credit—not a bad thing to live upon if we conserve it. But Consols at under 80 make one pause, and wonder if we have realised our position.

The FOREIGN MARKET has been barely steady. The great house of Rothschilds made a success of the Chilian Loan. Messrs. Seligmans acted over here as the agents for the New York City Bonds, another great success; they will, of course, be allotted to the finance houses. Paris has been slightly disturbed by one or two mishaps and consequent liquidation. They are not of a serious nature, but they prevented the French from supporting Tintos, and they checked the operations of the small dealers in shares who call themselves bankers, but are really share-pushers of a somewhat unscrupulous order. Russians have remained dull; indeed on the whole account they are slightly down. The rise has been steady and should continue when the French begin to buy again. But the top has almost been reached, and the Fours can hardly go beyond par. Peruvian Debentures have been bought and Japanese have been supported in face of considerable liquidation.

The HOME RAILWAY MARKET has been sad and gay by turns as the dividends have pleased or annoyed the punters. The public should not be discouraged at the Great Eastern distribution, but should buy the stock upon any relapse. I have advised the purchase of Lancashire and Yorkshire, and the dividend showed that the line had done well; as I have said before, this stock must go to par. Trade throughout the North is good, and traffics will continue to increase. The investor who refuses the ordinary stocks of our leading English railways to-day must be hard to please. He can obtain from $4\frac{1}{2}$ to 5 per cent., and if money becomes cheap, he will make 10 per cent. upon his capital outlay within the year. The Southern stocks have been gambled in, and are therefore not sound as a speculation. The news that the Scotch companies have won their case against the shippers means a great deal; Caledonians, Glasgow and South Western and North British should be bought. Trade in Scotland is improving, and all these stocks must rise.

YANKEES have been hesitating. But I can hear of no speculation in Wall Street. The tone on the other side is very bullish. The big houses seem quite determined to keep prices up. They will not "take the pin out" yet. The omnipotent Pierpont Morgan has again been playing to the gallery. He came forward and decreed that the Carnegie Trust should be taken over. This Trust has nothing to do with Andrew Carnegie, who only loaned them a million dollars in the panic, and now stands as a creditor for 750,000 dollars. The failures were quite unimportant. Pennsylvania intends to make a six-track road from New York to Pittsburg, and needs money; it will therefore sell forty million dollars' worth of stock during the next few months. It denies that it has purchased more Norfolk and Western stock. It already owns about half the capital. As Pennsylvania is one of the greatest lines in the world, the shares are worth buying to-day. Do not forget that it now has a terminus in New York itself. The Steel report for the end of the month is now expected to be only moderate, but the dividend will remain unaltered. Kuhn, Loeb and Company remain bullish on Unions.

The RUBBER MARKET has been quite bright. The fact that prices have fallen rather lower than the circumstances justified has had something to do with the rise, but the real reason for the upward movement is the cessation of sales from the East. The rubber people in London will never part with a share if they can hold on by hook or by crook; they are enthusiasts, and, like all such people, carry enthusiasm too far. Thus we find many of the smaller non-producing companies priced at fancy premiums. A careful examination of the leading shares in which there is a free market shows that Linggis should produce about 10 per cent. at present prices for the year 1911, Cicely $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., Vallombrosa 10 per cent., Selangor 15 per cent., Kuala Lumpur 10 per cent., Anglo-Malay 15 per cent., Batu Caves 13 per cent., Consolidated Malay $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., Damansara $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., Federated Selangor 15 per cent., Kapar Para $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., Highlands, Lanadron, and Ledbury about the same, Pataling about 15 per cent. Nearly all these were capitalised by their promoters at a low price per acre, the most expensive on this list being Ledbury at £77 per acre as against Pataling at £15, Cicely £19 15s. and Selangor £18. The amount of capitalisation per acre is bound to tell in the long run, especially when all the newly planted estates come into bearing. No one should ever buy shares in an estate that is overburdened with capital. I should rule out anything over £100, even though this includes Shelford, which may pay 50 per cent. this year. Never buy cheap shares in the Rubber Market. Buy only the best. Do not forget that though prices have fallen they are higher in all cases than they were last year before the boom.

OIL SHARES soon fell away into their former neglected condition when it was found that the public did not come for them, but the news that the Mexican Eagle had got a gusher caused those behind this market to make a bid for the shares. The company is spending a great deal of money; it is still fighting the Waters Pierce Company, and it is still unable to fulfil its contracts with the Mexican Railway. But if the gusher does not catch fire—a bad habit that all fountains have acquired—then one may expect great results and big dividends. Oil is badly wanted in Mexico, and if the new field yields well the Standard Oil people may come to terms. The war has cost huge sums, has lasted a long time, and both sides must be heartily sick of it by now. The news from California is good; oil continues high in price, and I look upon this as one of the most promising and profitable oil-fields we can invest in to-day. Many of the companies can make a profit at 25 cents and they have sold at 50 cents.

KAFFIRS have not yet caught the fancy of the speculator, but they are steady and somewhat oversold by the dealers. There is not much to go for at the moment. We all hold Kaffirs, we all want to get out, but we wait the pleasure of the magnates. They do not seem inclined to move the market, but rather to seek fresh fields for their capital.

RHODESIANS remain in much the same expectant frame of mind as that I have chronicled for so many weeks past. Clearly we may get a very good report from the Chartered Company, but no one buys the shares. They are steady. This is not what the gambler wants. He looks for a smart rise. Did he get what he asked for, I think we should see a big rise in the whole market. But the rates in many Rhodesians at the Settlement were far too high. Some poor punters paid 10 per cent. for the pleasure of carrying El Dorados. This does not make for booms. Considering the hundreds of thousands of shares that the big houses have for sale, I wonder at the lack of cohesion amongst the would-be vendors.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

CORRESPONDENCE

"THE AUTHOR OF THE MOST FAMOUS ENGLISH JOKE"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—That a literary Argus such as Mr. Frank Harris should attribute to Charles Reade "Punch's advice to those about to marry" will astonish most of your readers, Where has he buried himself that he should talk of Punch's authorship of the immortal joke as a "tradition" and "an incredible story"? His version of it is indeed incredible. Whom can he have "asked again and again and received no satisfactory answer"? Not a member of the Punch staff, surely, nor any reader of "The History of Punch;" nor could he have visited the Punch Exhibition, held not long ago, where the very page was displayed with the celebrated line underlined in red. Otherwise he would have escaped the haunting doubt by which he has so long been afflicted.

The joke appeared in the Punch Almanac for 1845 under "January," and was based upon an advertisement then being widely put forth by E. A. Monson and Co., well-known house-furnishers of the day. It was written by Henry Mayhew, the man who, with Landells, conceived the idea of Punch and shaped it from the beginning, and was one of its first editors (Mark Lemon and Coyne having been his co-editors). It was contributed by him in the ordinary way and was paid for in the usual way.

As Reade's comedy was published in 1859, Mr. Harris will doubtless acknowledge the error of declaring "that Punch is the plagiarist and not Charles Reade." The curious thing is that the joke sprang into instant popularity and was widely quoted from that time onwards; yet Mr. Harris has traced it back no further than to the fifteenth year of its age.

M. H. SPIELMANN.

21, Cadogan Gardens, S.W.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The author of this famous joke on marriage was the Reverend Mr. Christie, parish schoolmaster of Marnock, a secluded district in the county of Banff. The writer has the best means of knowing this, as it was on the suggestion of the writer's own father that Mr. Christie sent the joke to Punch. Whether, like most jokes, ancient and modern, it had been perpetrated before I do not know, but of this I am sure, that, so far as Christie was concerned, it was original and was not copied from any romance, French or English. The author was one of those old Scottish "dominies," now fast passing away, who took the schoolmaster's desk as a stepping-stone to the pulpit, and never got beyond it. He was the son of one minister of Kildrummy, in Aberdeenshire, and the grandson of another, and was a member of a highly gifted family, his brother, the Rev. John Christie, D.D, being for many years Professor of Divinity in the University of Aberdeen. Although he has long passed away, many must still remember his pawky wit and his devotion to his fiddle and his fishing-rod. He himself followed the advice he gave, for he was never married. Although all his friends and contemporaries have long crossed the Styx, I have no doubt that many of their descendants must be able to corroborate this fact, notably the representatives of the old laird with whom he dined every Sunday, summer and winter, for twenty years. The publishers of Punch will also find on looking up their books that they paid the author a five-pound note for this, I think, his first and last contribution.

A CORRESPONDENT.

Dundee.

DICKENS' WOMEN

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It has been charged against Dickens that his "women" are defective; and, accordingly, that he must have had a distinct bias in thus depicting them so commonly. It might be well, therefore, in view of the fact that Dickens did quite frequently portray exceedingly defective and utterly ridiculous women characters, to inquire into this matter, and to seek to absolve from such a charge as that of prejudice one whose rare gifts and noble accomplishments have endeared him to the hearts and affections of many tens of thousands of English-speaking and English-reading people. In the first place, then, I think it must be granted—even by the most dissembling critic—that Dickens did occasionally depict, in vivid colours, delightful and lovely women characters—women of practical sense and loving natures—women of strong affections and of most dutiful and generous promptings and emotions—women whose intuitive perceptions and fine governing principles pronounced them "most excellent of women," and whose virtues, self-sacrifices, and utter self-renunciation and devotion to service to others contrasted so eminently with the meanness, the self-indulgence, and the utter want of principle of their fathers and brothers!

Take "Little Dorrit" for a single instance, or "Ruth Pinch" for another. Where in all the picture-galleries of womanly nature and character will one find truer or more exquisite examples of all that is lovable and worthy in humanity? And again, what could there be found wanting in characters such as Esther Summerson and Kate Nickleby, not to mention others? For surely they are sufficiently normal and sufficiently intelligent and amiable Dickensian women characters. Moreover, let us hear what Dickens himself has avowed in so many words regarding his estimate of women and of womanhood at large. "Oh, woman!" he apostrophises in "Martin Chuzzlewit," "God-beloved in Old Jerusalem! The best among us need deal lightly with their faults, if only for the punishment their nature will endure in bearing heavy evidence against us in the Day of Judgment!"

Indeed, so tender and merciful and so chivalrous was the nature of Dickens in all that related either to the infirmities or faults of women as to render this charge of "bias" and "depreciation" at once preposterous and unjustifiable. For, even though he did render the greater number of his women characters in a somewhat ridiculous and "defective" light, he did so only because he found them so, and, as a true and graphic depictor of English character and of human nature, he could not do otherwise. Yet Dickens was ever most merciful and considerate of the very infirmities and defects of even those amongst his most ridiculed women characters; and who that is capable of reading between the lines can fail to discover in his keenest satires a tender and compassionate humour, which, while provocative of mirth and derision at the "defective's" expense, is yet tinged with sadness and reflection? And Dickens had his Motive and Purpose! He, at all events, never wrote without one. He thought clearly and felt deeply! He knew, as the man of genius only can know and realise, that great wrongs and injustices were imposed and inflicted upon the masses of his countrymen in his day, as in times before, and, perhaps, even greater and worse than ever before. He knew that the women and children of England suffered such wrongs and injustices as to cry to Heaven for redress and vengeance; that their education was utterly neglected, and quite commonly actually perverted; that might prevailed over right, and that darkness and confusion covered his native land. And he devoted his life and talents to the awakening and restoration of the national conscience.

But stern though his resolve, and devoted though his efforts, there was no grain of the demagogue in Dickens' nature and purpose. He resolved only to shed forth such a light as to convey to the darkest recesses of the English mind and consciousness the startling sense and conviction of the imminent snares and dangers that lurked in the prevailing social and industrial, as well as educational, conditions and methods; and he wrote and depicted accordingly. Hence his scathing satires and denunciations of the "Circumlocution Office," of the "Court of Chancery," of "Dotheboy's Hall," and of many another "educational" establishment! Nor did he ever really exaggerate, as many have affirmed who should know better; for we have data in plenty, and there are still multitudes of English men and women who can recall instances and experiences enough amply to justify the accuracy and pertinency of Dickens' most scathing and bitter denunciations and findings. And so, when we are confronted with this charge of "bias" and of "depreciation of womanhood" against Dickens, it is well to remember that he depicted character only as he found it, or in its true colours, and that he can in no wise be held responsible for the "defects" (educational or otherwise) of his woman characters, since they were the defects of perverted and neglected education; and just how much Englishwomen to-day are indebted to Charles Dickens for their present well-being and social advancement is a question which nothing short of an earnest and appreciative review of all that he has written on behalf of English education, and for the redress of the wrongs and oppressions of his fellow country men and women, can solve or decide at all adequately. It should be enough, I think, to know and realise that Dickens knew full well and dearly loved his England and his fellow-men.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

With him countless thousands have laughed and cried, have loved and hated, in common; and with him to this day countless thousands still laugh and weep, love and hate—love all that he loved in human nature; and hate, as he hated, all that is mean and vile. O Dickens! great master and interpreter of human character and nature; of all the secrets, perfections, imperfections, and virtues of the soul and heart—what a debt do we not owe to thee, thou very archetype of all that is generous, loving, and joyous in human relation! Peace to thy ashes! rest to thy soul! honour to thy memory! and everlasting joy to thy radiant and triumphant spirit!—I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

EDWIN RIDLEY.

136, College Street, Buffalo, New York, U.S.

BOOKS RECEIVED

THEOLOGY

The Great Texts of the Bible and our English Translations. By S. F. Pells. Simpkin and Co. 1s. net.

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND MEMOIRS

The Oldest Music-room in Europe: A Record of Eighteenth-Century Enterprise at Oxford. By John H. Mee, M.A., D.Mus. Illustrated. John Lane. 10s. 6d. net.

The Awakening of Scotland: A History from 1747 to 1797. By William Law Mathieson. James MacLehose and Sons, Glasgow. 10s. 6d. net.

Reminiscences and Letters of Joseph and Arnold Toynbee. Edited by Gertrude Toynbee. Illustrated. Henry J. Glaisher. 2s. 6d. net.

Storm van 's Gravesande: The Rise of British Guiana. Compiled from his Despatches by C. A. Harris, C.B., C.M.G., and J. A. J. de Villiers. Illustrated. 2 vols. The Hakluyt Society.

Sixtine Rome. By J. A. F. Orbaan, D.Ph. Illustrated. Constable and Co. 7s. 6d. net.

History of the Popes, from the Close of the Middle Ages. From the German of Dr. Ludwig Pastor. Edited by Ralph Francis Kerr. Vol. X. Kegan, Paul and Co. 12s. net.

The Japanese Letters of Lafcadio Hearn. Edited by Elizabeth Bisland. Illustrated. Constable and Co. 12s. net.

EDUCATIONAL

Vergil, The Georgics: A Translation. Books I. and II. by F. P. Shipman, M.A., and Books III. and IV. by A. A. Irwin Nesbitt, M.A. W. B. Clive, University Tutorial Press. 2s. 6d.

A New English Dictionary on Historical Principles. Edited by Sir James A. H. Murray. Si—Simple (Vol. IX.), by W. A. Craigie, M.A., LL.D. Henry Frowde. 2s. 6d.

Stormonth's Handy School Dictionary, Pronouncing and Explanatory. Thoroughly revised and enlarged by Wm. Bayne. Wm. Blackwood and Sons. 7d. net.

Historical Atlas. Thirty-two Plates printed in Colours, containing Forty-four Maps and Plans, together with Historical Notes and a Chronological Table of National History. Index to Place Names. W. and A. K. Johnston. 1s. 6d. net.

A Handbook of Greek Religion. By Arthur Fairbanks. American Book Co., New York.

India: Eight Lectures Prepared for the Visual Instruction Committee of the Colonial Office. By H. J. Mackinder, M.A. Illustrated. Also an Edition specially prepared for the use of Lecturers. George Philip and Son. 8d. net each.

Self-Education in Gesture for Public Speaking. By John P. M'Laurin. W. and R. Holmes, Glasgow. 1s. net.

A New Poet.
THE SEARCH FOR LOVELINESS.
By G. ROSTREVOR HAMILTON. Dainty cloth, 2s. 6d. net.
Daily Telegraph.—"A scholarly and accomplished little volume of verse. Mr. Hamilton has a good ear, much metrical resource, and a sense of natural beauty, and the poetry which he compounds of these good qualities is full of nerve and sensibility."
Academy.—"Many of Mr. Hamilton's lines are of quite haunting beauty, and the whole effect is satisfactory from a poetical point of view."
 Kindly write for John Long's Catalogue which contains a full List of Poetical Works by Living Authors.
London: JOHN LONG, Ltd., 12, 13, 14, Norris Street, Haymarket.

George Odell,
31, KING STREET, ST. JAMES', LONDON, S.W.
Ophthalmic and Mathematical Optician
Inventor of the Porter-Odell Patent Lens.
SPECTACLES AND EYEGLASSES
made to the individual facial measurements, thereby assuring accuracy and comfort. To enable the fitting of the innumerable variety of faces my different patterns have already run into the hundreds.
LORGNETTES in Gold, Metal and Tortoiseshell.
BAROMETERS. THERMOMETERS.
FIELD AND OPERA GLASSES.
The ODELL LUMEX PRISM BINOCULAR
pronounced by Naval and Military Officers to be the best (see testimonials).

Leo Liepmannssohn.
Antiquariat
Berlin SW. 11, Bernburgerstrasse 14
KATALOG 177
Autographen
Ariosto — Bodmer — Bürger — Catharina II.— Dogen von Venedig—Doria—Elisabeth Charlotte —Erasmus von Rotterdam—Fiesco Friedrich II. (Prinz von Homburg) — Frischlin — Gellert — Goethe — Gottsched — Grumbach — Kaspar Hauser — Heine — Helvétius—Hume—Ibsen— Angelica Kauffmann—Heinr. v. Kleist—Körner —Reinh. Lenz—Marie Antoinette—Melanchthon — Menchikoff—Nettelbeck—Ottheinrich v. d. Pfalz—Pompadour—Schertlin von Burtenbach — Sickingen — Süss-Oppenheimer—Tolstoy —Volta—Wallenstein—Wieland—Winckelmann —Zwingli.
Telephon: Amt VI, No. 12370.
Telegramm-Adresse: "Tonleiter, Berlin."
(Adams Cable Codex, 10th Edition.)

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, LTD.,
30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET, W.C.
Only Branches } 48, Queen Victoria Street, E.C. 132, Kensington High Street, W.

NEW BOOKS LESS THAN HALF-PRICE.

	Offered at		Published at
CRISPI, FRANCESCO, Italian Insurgent	s. 1	d. 9	s. 7	d. 6
GRAFTON, THIRD DUKE, AUTO. AND LETTERS	3	6	18	0
HARVARD, JOHN, AND HIS TIMES	3	3	7	6 net.
STEPHEN, SIR JAMES FITZJAMES, LIFE by his brother Leslie Stephen	5	0	16	0
THIEBAULT, BARON, MEMOIRS OF, 2 Vols. trans.	7	6	28	0
YOUNG, ARTHUR, AUTO. OF, Ed. M. Betham Edwards	4	9	12	6

Full List Free on Application.

The Fauna of British India,

including Ceylon and Burma, published under the Authority of the Secretary of State for India in Council.

Medium 8vo., with Text-Illustrations and Two Coloured Plates.

Coleoptera—Lamellicornia. Part I. (Cetoniinæ and Dynastinæ). 10s.

Rhynchota. Vol. V. 10s.

London: Taylor & Francis, Red Lion Court, Fleet Street.
Calcutta and Simla: Thacker, Spink & Co.
Bombay: Thacker & Co., Ltd.
Berlin: Friedländer und Sohn, Carlstrasse II.

CONSULT
The Gresham
On all Matters of LIFE, FIRE & ACCIDENT
INSURANCE.
Many Special Features.
Liberal Terms to recognised Brokers and Agents.
HEAD OFFICES:
ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE, POULTRY, LONDON, E.C.
JAMES H. SCOTT, General Manager.
BRANCH OFFICE:
119, HIGH HOLBORN.
ARTHUR LANGHAM, District Manager.

Free Insurance Coupon to readers of "The Academy."
(Not to be detached.)
The Gresham Fire and Accident Insurance Society, Limited,
of
ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE, POULTRY, LONDON, E.C.,
will pay
£100 (One hundred pounds) to the legal personal representative of the bonâ fide holder of this Coupon, if he or she be killed solely and directly by an accident within the United Kingdom to any Railway Company's Train, a Tramcar, Omnibus, Cab, or other Licensed Vehicle plying for public hire, in which the holder is travelling as an ordinary ticket-bearing or fare-paying passenger, subject always to the following special conditions which are to be taken as incorporated in the contract:—
(a) That death result within thirty days after the accident (b) that notice thereof be given within seven days to the Society at its Head Office in London (c) that such reasonable evidence of the cause of death be given as the Society may require (d) that the holder shall have written in ink prior to the accident his or her usual signature in the space provided therefor (e) that the Society shall not be liable to any one person in respect of more than one Coupon in this or any other publication (f) that this insurance shall not be available to persons under twelve or over seventy years of age, and shall hold good until Sat., Feb. 4, 1911.
Signature of Holder .....
Address .....

BOOKS, Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold, and Exchanged. Monthly Catalogues Free. Libraries purchased, catalogued, arranged, or valued.—Thomas Thorp, 93, St. Martin's Lane, W.C. (and at Reading).

TO PHOTOGRAPHERS, ARTISTS, and DESIGNERS.—Photographs, Studies, and Designs wanted, suitable for pictorial postcard publication, particularly applicable to Coronation year. Address N. P. O. 1441, Sell's Advertising Offices, Fleet Street, London.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references.—Address Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

GERMAN wishes to correspond with ENGLISHMAN, to exchange German for English. Correction reciprocal. Write to Mr. G. Wolfram, Weingarten 3, Quedlinburg (Germany).

Now on Sale. 6d. net. The January
BOOK MONTHLY.

Contents:
PERSONAL AND PARTICULAR. The Gossip of the Hour in the Republic of Authors.
A PARIS LUCKY-BAG. Book-Hunting on the Grey Banks of the Seine.—By Frederic Lees.
WHAT'S IN A WORD! Why Some English Sounds are a Delight to Hear.—By F. M. Wells.
THE SPINSTER HEROINE. Or a Poetic Quest for the Woman of Sweet-and-Forty-Five.
A LONDON LETTER. Touching the Book Effects of a General Election.—By the Editor.
SHAKSPERE, A.B. Was the Poet Seven Years Afloat on the Ocean Wave?—By J. E. Patterson.
NEW YEAR READING. The People and Plots of Seven of the Winter Novels.—By C. E. Lawrence.
A STATE OF THE REALM. The Craft of Bookselling and its Story in England.
LIVES OF GREAT MEN. Why Some of the Winter Memoirs have been Successful.
NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY. Particulars of Interesting Volumes likely to be Published this Month.
BOOKS OF THE MONTH. A Chronicle of the Noteworthy Publications of December. With a Reviewing Commentary.
THE PERIODICALS. Contents of some January Reviews and Magazines.
Illustrated Supplement: BOOKS OF THE DAY IN PORTRAIT AND PICTURE.

Publishers: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO., Stationers' Hall Court, London,
Who, on receipt of 6d., will send, post-free, a Specimen of the Current Number.

Edward Whistler,
II, Strand, Charing Cross, London.
DIAMOND MERCHANT :: :: JEWELLER & SILVERSMITH.
A large stock of New and Second-hand Diamond and Gem Jewellery, Antique and Modern Silver Plate, always on hand, at bargain prices, for cash.
Fine Pearls, Emeralds, Diamonds, and early specimens of Antique Silver Plate wanted. High Prices given in Cash. Full Value allowed in Exchange.
Valuations made for Probate and other purposes.
GUN DEPARTMENT.
HAMMERLESS SECOND-HAND GUNS,
British Made, from £6 10s.
Nitro Proof. The Cheapest Gun in the Market combined with Quality.
ALSO
HAMMERLESS EJECTORS,
By Best London Makers, at Greatly Reduced Prices.
CORDITE RIFLES, ·400, ·500, ·600 Bores.
Catalogue and Price List on Application Gratis.
Telephone No.: 2033 GERRARD.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

THE SPECTATOR says you

"could not do better than read this book."

THE PASSING OF THE SHEREEFIAN EMPIRE.

By ELLIS ASHMEAD-BARTLETT,

Author of "Port Arthur: The Siege and Capitulation."

Illustrated. 15s. net.

"Of particular interest to Service men are the description and analysis of the French troops engaged in the Chaouia campaign and of the Spanish force in the Riff campaign, and the well thought-out deductions drawn therefrom. Apart from its value in these directions—and it is literally crammed with useful facts—the book reads as thrillingly as any novel, with tenfold more interest than the ordinary run of that class of fiction."—War Office Times.

"It is very full and interesting work that the author has given us, and one that will probably make many readers desirous of visiting the land which he finds so exhilarating."—The Daily Telegraph.

"Of all books about Morocco, this one is quite the best."—The Observer.

"Those who remember Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett's book upon the Siege of Port Arthur will welcome this new volume from so enterprising and brilliant a war correspondent."—Daily Graphic.

"This thoughtful, entertaining, and valuable book."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"The book is an interesting study of the condition of affairs in Morocco, and as a record of adventure it makes excellent reading."—Morning Post.

"The writer of this most interesting and instructive volume is already favourably known to fame as the author of the best English book on the Siege of Port Arthur, and now he may be congratulated on having produced an equally pre-eminent account of recent events in Morocco."—Daily Chronicle.

"No book written about Morocco in recent years has shown a better grasp of facts or a sounder judgment of the forces at work in what was down to a few years ago Africa's last great independent Empire."—The Illustrated London News.

"One reads this really vivid book by Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett as much as one reads the narratives of the Conquistadores."—The Nation.

"An excellent book, to the great interest and variety of which it is impossible to do justice here."—Glasgow News.

"A valuable and fascinating volume."—Sunday Chronicle.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, Edinburgh and London.

At all Booksellers and Libraries.

Printed and Published for the Proprietor by ODHAMS, LTD., 25, Floral Street, Covent Garden, and 67, Long Acre, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE

No. 2022 [Registered as a Newspaper.] FEBRUARY 4, 1911 PRICE THREEPENCE

THE CARNEGIE LIBRARY
THE PA. STATE COLLEGE
STATE COLLEGE, PA.

ARE YOU A SPENDTHRIFT?

LOGIC.

☛

ROLLS-ROYCE.

Have you ever realised that it costs you more to constantly hire a taxi-cab than it does to maintain a luxurious 6-cylinder Rolls-Royce car?

Captain Morris, a private owner, has certified that his 40-50 h.p. Rolls-Royce, with luxurious landaulet body, has cost only 9d. a mile for 9,593 miles, including tax, £21, £2 10s. per week driver's wages (£130), tyres, petrol, garage, and all expenses included in cost of upkeep, whereas a taxi will cost you 8d. per mile and 2d. for every 2½ minutes it waits for you.

Compare these two methods of travel for comfort, luxury, independence, and economy. Which is the better investment?

ROLLS-ROYCE, LIMITED, 14 and 15, Conduit Street, London, W.

Telegrams: "Rolhead, London." Telephones: Gerrard 1654, 1655, and 1656.

And at PARIS: 56, Avenue Hoche.

Telegrams: "Rollsroyce, Paris."

The following firms who purchase direct from us have the sole selling rights of our cars in their respective districts:—LEICESTERSHIRE, DERBYSHIRE, NOTTINGHAMSHIRE, LINCOLNSHIRE, WARWICKSHIRE, NORTHAMPTONSHIRE, and RUTLANDSHIRE: The Midland Counties Motor Garage Co., Ltd., Granby St., Leicester; SCOTLAND: L. C. Seligmann and Co., 96, Renfrew St., Glasgow; MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT, including East Lancashire (as far north as a line drawn on the map due east from Cockerham) and East Cheshire: Joseph Cockshoot and Co., Ltd., New Bridge Street, Manchester; YORKSHIRE: A. B. Wardman and Sons, Ltd., Cambridge St., Harrogate; LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT, including West Lancashire (as far north as Cockerham), West Cheshire, and North Wales: W. Watson and Co., 56, Renshaw St., Liverpool: NORTHUMBERLAND, DURHAM, CUMBERLAND, WESTMORLAND, and NORTH LANCASHIRE: Sir Wm. Angus Sanderson and Co., St. Thomas' Street, Newcastle-on-Tyne; IRELAND: J. B. Ferguson, Ltd., Chichester St., Belfast; WESTERN AUSTRALIA: The Perth Motor House, 888, Hay Street, Perth, W.A.

The following firms are appointed as Retailers of Rolls-Royce cars in London:—Messrs. Barker and Co. (Coachbuilders), Ltd., 66-68, South Audley St., W.; Messrs. Charles Jarrott, Ltd., 35, Sackville Street, W.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Sheffield Simplex

INDEPENDENT TESTIMONY.

The following query was published in the "Autocar," December 17th, 1910:—

No. 1593.—45 H.P. "SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX."

"Will any private reader kindly give their experiences with above cars as to reliability, upkeep, &c.?—J. C. S." And elicited the following replies:—

December 31st, 1910.

"I have had a 45 H.P. 'Sheffield-Simplex' of the GEAR-BOX-LESS type in my possession for two years, and, apart from one or two trifling mishaps to start with, I have always found the car most reliable. If 'J. C. S.' wants a six-cylinder car in which power is not sacrificed for quite unnecessary silence, he could not do better than get a 'Sheffield-Simplex.' The car is as silent as any reasonable man who is not suffering from 'Silent-Knightis' can want, the engine being scarcely audible when the car is in motion. The GEAR-BOX-LESS system works perfectly, the emergency gear never being required except for starting and hills of about 1 in 8 or steeper gradient. Hills like Reigate, which cannot be rushed, offer no obstacle with a car weighing 34 cwt. and four passengers. The upkeep for a car of its size is most reasonable. I have done 6,000 miles on one pair of tyres, and 7,000 miles on another. The petrol consumption works out at about 15 miles to the gallon on a journey of over 100 miles give-and-take roads in the summer. I have always found the Company most obliging in every way. In conclusion, I am certain that there is no car on the road at present of the same cylinder capacity that can better it over a give-and-take road."—R. H. T.

December 31st, 1910.

"As an owner of a 45 H.P. 'GEAR-BOX-LESS' 'Sheffield-Simplex' Car, I can honestly do nothing but praise the car. The petrol consumption on a fair run is thirteen or fourteen miles per gallon. On tyres the car is extremely light. I have done 3,000 miles on driving wheels with grooved Dunlops, and the tyres are not ready for retreading yet. The throttle arrangement is very convenient, and every part of the car is splendidly made and finished. For running-power I do not think the 'Sheffield-Simplex' can be beaten, and hills make very little difference to it; it is very rarely that the emergency gear is required. I really think this is a beautifully made car, and a treat to drive, and whoever buys one cannot fail to be pleased with the results, if my experience can be taken as a criterion."—DERBYSHIRE.

Catalogue post-free on application to Dept. "L."

SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX MOTOR WORKS, Ltd.

TINSLEY, SHEFFIELD, ENGLAND.

London Depôt: c/o MULLINERS, Ltd., 132-135, LONG ACRE, W.C.

THE SPECTATOR says you

"could not do better than read this book."

THE PASSING OF THE SHEREEFIAN EMPIRE.

By ELLIS ASHMEAD-BARTLETT,

Author of "Port Arthur: The Siege and Capitulation."

Illustrated. 15s. net.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, Edinburgh and London.

At all Booksellers and Libraries.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

CONTENTS.

	Page
Review of the Week	123
The Artificer	124
What of the Representative System?	124
The Great Sight	125
Reviews:—
Some Modern Religious Problems	127
Lafcadio Hearn	128
The First Temptation of Saint Anthony	130
The Missouri	131
Imperial Poetry	132
Peacock's Plays	132
Two Descendants of the Trouvères	133
Shorter Reviews	133
Fiction	137
The Theatre	138
Music	139
Paul Verlaine—I.	140
The Hero as Baby	142
India: A Series	143
Charles Dilke	144
The Day Before Yesterday—III.	146
The Landseer Exhibition at the Leicester Galleries	147
The London Institution	147
In the Temple of Mammon	148
Correspondence	149

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

THE ACADEMY is published by MESSRS. ODHAMS, LIMITED, 67, Long Acre, London, W.C., to whom all letters with reference to publication must be addressed.

Applications referring to Advertisements may be addressed to MESSRS. ODHAMS, as above.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

THE ACADEMY is now obtainable at Messrs. W. H. Smith & Sons, Messrs. Wyman's, and Messrs. Willing's bookstalls and shops.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

THE breath of scandal is always busy about those in high places, and the nobler the position of the person attacked the more scurrilous and detestable are the methods often employed. The result of the action which was heard on Wednesday last before the Lord Chief Justice and a special jury, by which the man Mylius was found guilty of a libel upon King George V., and was sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment, will prove a deterrent, it is to be hoped, to any Republican fanatics or half-insane nondescripts of anarchical tendencies who may feel inclined to speak against the honour of royalty. In olden days the penalty for so gross a libel would have been infinitely heavier, and in the light of such times the punishment does not seem severe, although the underhand methods of Mylius aggravated his offence. For obvious reasons, the paper containing the libel could not be printed in this country; but hundreds of copies were brought from Paris, and the intention was to circulate them among officers of the Army and Navy, the very persons upon whom such statements might be expected to make least impression—men thoroughly loyal and true. We hope that if any similar case ever occurs, the lenient penalty inflicted upon Mylius will not be a precedent too closely followed.

The disadvantages attaching to greatness overtake cities as well as men, and London suffers them in many ways; her huge street-traffic, admirable in one sense, terrible in another, is a notable instance which at constantly recurring crises engages the attention of experts. For the moment, however, the river is the centre of interest. When London was built, evolved, or "happened," there was no thought of the monster ocean-going liner, or the bulky tramp-steamer that thrashes its slow and steady way across the seas, and pushes its bluff nose into most harbours of the world; the hollowed log lurched down the stream impelled by primitive oars, and the modest sailing-boat scurried for shelter at a threatening storm. We have progressed from the coracle to the clipper, from the clipper to the stately battleship and graceful liner, and our means of accommodation have not progressed at the same rate; hence the historic Port of London is in danger of taking a subordinate place among the great cities which lie within easy reach of the open sea. The scheme now under discussion, by which the Thames will be deepened to an extent which will admit the passage of the largest boats up-river to the Albert Dock, seems worthy of all praise. The nuisance of waiting for the tide, the hindrance of other vessels, will be done away with by the suggested improvements in the extent of the docks, and the length of their entrance-locks.

Experience shows that in the matter of ship-building it is well to look forward more than at first consideration might seem necessary. Only ten years ago an entrance-lock was designed for the London and India Dock Company to take vessels of 700ft. in length, and doubtless at that time such accommodation was thought to leave an ample margin. Now, however, the locks have to allow for the immense 800ft. leviathans, and a provision is suggested by which their dimensions may be increased to 1,000ft. in case of need. The difficulty is, of course, to know where to stop in these matters. It is quite possible that in ten years' time, with science and engineering revivified by new discoveries, and fresh applications of these discoveries to problems of travel, dilemmas of which we do not now dream may confront us, Meanwhile the pressing need of the day has to be met, lest London wane. Many of those who gaze at the busy scenes of shipping between the Tower and London Bridge have never visited Tilbury in their lives, and have no idea of the ocean-going passenger traffic so near the City's borders. It is to preserve and increase that fine asset of the premier port of the world that the new scheme of dock-enlargement has been planned, and it is to be hoped that no unnecessary difficulties will be thrown in its way.

The question of a censorship of Naval intelligence in time of war, mentioned by the scribes as being under consideration by those in authority, leads us to emphasise the unsatisfactory method—or lack of method—by which we attempt to ensure our national means of defence from inspection by prying and unauthorised strangers. We arrest a young German officer for sketching and taking notes and photographs half a mile from a fort, yet we allow the full particulars of the latest heavy ordnance, the details of the latest battleship's armament, the speed, dimensions, and fighting power of any proposed addition to our fleet to be published in the daily papers. Visitors are conducted with the utmost freedom over our dockyards, and over our battleships when they lie at anchor—are welcomed, in fact, and treated with a courtesy which would be admirable were it not so mistaken and indiscriminate. We understand that a few years ago it was possible for any stranger possessed of an inquiring turn of mind to saunter into one of our important gunnery training-grounds unchallenged; to pass into the huge rooms, inspect the mechanism of the guns and the diagrams on the walls, and, provided no one was looking, to jot down such information as he might be able to secure. In neither France nor Germany (unless under very exceptional circumstances such as those which have recently happened, and which may almost be said to prove the rule) would he have been permitted to approach within a hundred yards of the entrance without inquiry as to his business from armed and vigilant sentries. Probably a change has occurred since then, in this particular instance; but there still remain many flaws in our administration of national affairs with regard to the Army and Navy.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

These observations refer, of course, to times of peace. In war, or even in the case of the strained relations which often prevail between two countries long before their smouldering quarrel bursts into flame, the control of news should be very rigidly exercised by those who are responsible for the direction of operations, especially now that wireless telegraphy has become practicable over distances of many hundreds of miles. It is all a part of our futile and dangerous manner of tinkering with big questions—questions which demand above all things strong and decisive action—that newspapers should be permitted to publish to the whole world (including the enemy, who naturally reads them with interest) the movements of battalions, of squadrons, the progress of events, and the general scheme of attack during the conflict. The "liberty of the Press" and "free speech" are quite praiseworthy elements of our national fame; but they must not be invested with the qualities of a fetich, and this is one of the instances when they may easily become a national danger.

Similar absurdities occur, on a smaller and less striking scale, when a crime is committed. The criminal has only to buy a copy of any newspaper to ascertain exactly what the police are doing, in what quarters he is being sought, and what clues have been found; he may order his movements accordingly, give endless trouble before he is captured, and even evade capture altogether until public interest has died down and only one person here and there remembers his name. Some day, perhaps, our methods will be the subject of an outburst of international laughter, or will cause a national catastrophe, and the policy of muddling along which now inspires our administrators will give place to something more in harmony with our reputation for greatness and good sense.

Two artists, who laboured in very different spheres, but both achieved fame, have passed away during the last few days. Mr. John MacWhirter, R.A., was one more instance from the long list of men who quietly set aside the plans made by others for their occupation in life and took their career into their own hands. His landscapes are familiar to all, and his work in water-colour alone would have made him celebrated. Mr. Lockwood Kipling was perhaps less known to the man in the street and the desultory reader as an artist than as the father of Mr. Rudyard Kipling, since his achievements were in the way of instructing others rather than in a large output of original work, and the scene of his action was so far removed from England. From 1875 to 1893 Mr. Kipling devoted himself to the Lahore School of Arts and Designs, of which he was Principal; his knowledge of Indian art was probably unequalled. For some years he had lived in retirement, but had keenly followed the progress of events in India to the last.

THE ARTIFICER

If I were a goldsmith, a crown of gold would I make,
Studded with emeralds, shedding a soft, cold light
Through the veils of thy hair, as gleam through a ferny brake
The glowworm lanterns at night.

Could I weave the delicate fabrics the Persian weaves,
I would fashion a garment of glistening azure silk
Inwrought with silvery borders of birds and leaves,
For thy body that's whiter than milk.

A weaver am I, but the silk of my weaving is words,
Shot over with crimson and pearl and transient gleams,
And cast on the weft, for patterns of leaves and birds,
Are thoughts and visions and dreams.

And I am a maker of gems, but speech is the gold,
Starred with pearls that glimmer and rubies that blaze;
With crafty hand the ductile metal I mould
To forms of rhythm and phrase.

So, with what art I may, will I fashion for thee
A coffer of gold and jewels, a delicate shrine,
That in after days who looketh therein may see
The beauty that once was thine.

M. D. A.

WHAT OF THE REPRESENTATIVE SYSTEM?

A SOLEMN farce has been perpetrated. A General Election which nobody wanted has taken place, and the status quo ante has been maintained. Members of the Government retain their identical posts, and in some cases the enhanced salaries which it was their fortunate lot to attract to themselves prior to the appeal to the people. The Government boast of their great majority, to which they ought to be heartily ashamed to make the faintest reference, having regard to the elements of which it is composed. The Opposition—completely disorganised—are ranting at their organisation—or, more properly speaking, want of it—and are in full flight from many of their most cherished ideals.

Two items are steadfast. The Socialists hold to red ruin and the breaking-up of laws. The Irish Redmondites race for their cherished goal—Home Rule and Civil War. What of patriotism and sane government?—

Then, pay the reverence of old days
To his dead fame;
Walk backward with averted gaze,
And hide the shame!

If patriotism reigned and love of country ever claimed a thought, what would be the outcome of the present situation? It would be a determination to suppress the pestilent ego, and consign "into a limbo, large and broad," the toxic serum of party.

The two great parties to whom the electorate has confided its trust in equal proportions would, under any sane system of government, join forces in irresistible array to defeat disruption, civil war, and revolution at home, and to render innocuous hostile combinations abroad. They would combine to uproot the lodgment of anarchy on these shores, and by wise and just treatment of the Colonies would enfold them in closest embrace.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Did ever perverted imagination shadow forth a more incongruous and grotesque system of government than that which threatens to prevail? The country is to be ruled by what? Not by a majority of its own choice, but by detrimental minorities, which it mostly abhors.

Is defence to be adequately provided for in accordance with the will of the country as declared by at least five hundred members of the House of Commons? Certainly not! unless the 120 detrimentals are bought over. Mr. Keir Hardie, with devilish ingenuity, is now suggesting the threat of a general strike as a preventive of war—a scheme which, if realised, would paralyse our diplomacy and deliver us bound to our enemies. It is true that Mr. Keir Hardie, in a dream of Earlswood or of Bedlam, would rely on foreign nations imitating the lunacy which he advocates. Those whose judgment is not warped by a long course of infatuation know that such reliance would prove to be wholly illusory.

If the House of Commons is to be the sport of noxious minorities, if the will of the majority can only prevail as the result of a series of anti-national and corrupt bargains, can it be contended in good faith and with mental balance, that a loyal and patriotic Second Chamber removed from the contamination of impure motives should be swept away, or synonymously reduced to a nullity? The proposition has only to be stated to supply the answer. The corollary is that the whisperings which are heard in Conservative circles that the Veto Bill must of course go through are the panic-stricken aftermath of a defeat. Defeat forsooth! well may Ministers exclaim, "Another such a victory, and we are lost." As a matter of fact, they are lost now, but only if they are confronted with the serried ranks of a foe sufficiently British to be unable to recognise defeat. A few weeks ago we argued and showed conclusively that on no account must the hasty and temporary expedient—in view of a General Election—entitled the Parliament Bill be allowed to pass into law. It will be a scandal if it is permitted even to occupy the time of Parliament. It was simply an item in an Election manifesto which failed of its design—to inflame the passions of the people.

As we have pointed out before, the Government gave away the whole case for the Bill in the preamble to it:—

> And whereas it is intended to substitute for the House of Lords as it at present exists a Second Chamber, constituted on a popular instead of hereditary basis, but such substitution cannot be immediately brought into operation
>
> And whereas provision will require hereafter to be made by Parliament in a measure effecting such substitution for limiting and defining the powers of the new Second Chamber, but it is expedient to make such provision as in this Act appears for restricting the existing powers of the House of Lords.

What if not the General Election and their Home Rule pledges was in the mind of the Government when they asserted that their proposals for a substituted Second Chamber "cannot be immediately brought into operation"? We quite admit that it would have been foolish, if not impossible, to have laid on the table of the House of Commons on November 16th last a well-considered measure for a brand-new Second Chamber with written functions and limits; and therefore as some sort of a declaration of policy on the subject had to be promulgated in view of the Dissolution for which they were preparing, they produced the Veto Bill. Now there is no obstacle to prevent Ministers giving adequate consideration to and producing in reasonable time their proposals for establishing and defining the powers of a new Second Chamber, and an Opposition possessing courage and steadfastness would compel them to do so, or in the event of failure a House of Lords which would vindicate its existence would reject the Veto Bill.

As an electoral device the Bill is no longer needed; as a dodge to secure the passage of Home Rule and revolutionary legislation, which no Chamber substituted for the House of Lords would sanction, it deserves contempt and condemnation. Surrender in such circumstances would be craven.

The Parliament Bill must not become law.

CECIL COWPER.

THE GREAT SIGHT

BY H. BELLOC

ALL night we had slept on straw in a high barn. The wood of its beams was very old, and the tiles upon the roof were green with age; but there hung from beam to beam, fantastically, a wire caught by nails, and here and there from this wire hung an electric-light bulb. It was a symbol of the time, and the place, and the people. There was no local bye-law to forbid such a thing, or if there was, no one dreamt of obeying it.

Just in the first dawn of that September day we went out, my companion and I, at guess-work to hunt in the most amusing kind of hunting, which is the hunting of an army. The lane led through one of those lovely ravines of Picardy which travellers never know (for they only see the plains), and in a little while we thought it wise to strike up the steep bank from the valley on to the bare plateau above, but it was all at random and all guess-work, only we wisely thought that we were nearing the beginning of things, and that on the bare fields of the high flat we should have a greater horizon and a better chance of catching any indications of men or arms.

When we had reached the height the sun had long risen, but it as yet gave no shining and there were no shadows, for a delicate mist hung all about the landscape, though immediately above us the sky was faintly blue.

It was the wierdest of sensations to go for mile after mile over that vast plain, to know that it was cut in regular series by parallel ravines which in all that extended view we could not guess at; to see up to the limits of the plateau the spires of villages and the groups of trees about them, and to know that somewhere in all this there lay concealed a corps d'armée—and not to see or hear a soul. The only human being that we saw was a man driving a heavy farm cart very slowly up a side-way just as we came into the great road which has shot dead across this country in one line ever since the Romans built it. As we went along that road, leaving the fields, we passed by many men indeed, and many houses, all in movement with the early morning; and the chalked numbers on the doors, and here and there an empty tin of polishing-paste or an order scrawled on paper and tacked to a wall betrayed the passage of soldiers. But of the army there was nothing at all. Scouting on foot (for that was what it was) is a desperate business, and that especially if you have nothing to tell you whether you will get in touch in five, or ten, or twenty miles.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

It was nine o'clock before a clatter of horse-hoofs came up the road behind us. At first my companion and I wondered whether it were the first riders of the Dragoons or Cuirassiers. In that case the advance was from behind us. But very soon, as the sound grew clearer, we heard how few they were, and then there came into view, trotting rapidly, a small escort and two officers with the umpires' badges, so there was nothing doing; but when, half a mile ahead of us on the road they turned off to the left over plough, we knew that that was the way we must follow too. Before we came to the turning-place, before we left the road to take the fields on the left, there came from far off and on our right the sound of a gun.

It was my companion who heard it first. We strained to hear it again; twice we thought we had caught it, and then again twice we doubted. It is not so easily recognisable a sound as you might think in those great plains cut by islands of high trees and steading walls. The little "75" gun lying low makes a different sound altogether at a distance from the old piece of "90." At any rate there was here no doubt that there were guns to the right and in front of us, and the umpire had gone to the left. We were getting towards the thick, and we had only to go straight on to find out where the front was.

Just as we had so decided and were still pursuing the high-road, there came, not half a mile away and again to our right, in a valley below us, that curious sound which is like nothing at all unless it be the dumping of flints out of a cart: rifle fire. It cracked and tore in stretches. Then there were little gaps of silence like the gaps in signalling, and then it cracked and tore in stretches again; and then, fitfully, one individual shot and then another would be heard; and, much further off, with little sounds like snaps, the replies began from the hillside beyond the stream. So far so good. Here was contact in the valley below us, and the guns, some way behind and far off northwards, had opened. So we got the hang of it instantly—the front was a sort of crescent lying roughly north and south, and roughly parallel to the great road, and the real or feigned mass of the advance was on the extreme left of that front. We were in it now, and that anxious and wearying business in all hunting, finding, was over; but we had been on foot six mortal hours before coming across our luck, and more than half the soldiers' day was over. These men had been afoot since three, and certain units on the left had already marched over twenty miles.

After that coming in touch with our business, not only did everything become plain, but the numbers we met, and what I have called "the thick of things," fed us with interest. We passed half the 38th, going down the road singing, to extend the line, and in a large village we came to the other half, slouching about in the traditional fashion of the Service; they had been waiting for an hour. With them, and lined up all along the village street was one battery, with the drivers dismounted, and all that body were at ease. There were men sitting on the doorsteps of the houses and men trotting to the canteen-waggon or to the village shops to buy food; and there were men reading papers which a pedlar had brought round. Mud and dust had splashed them all; upon some there was a look of great fatigue; they were of all shapes and sizes, and altogether it was the sort of sight you would not see in any other Service in the world. It was the sort of sight which so disgusted the Emperor Joseph when he made his little tour to spy out the land before the Revolutionary Wars. It was the sort of sight which made Massenbach before Grandpré marvel whether the French forces were soldiers at all, and the sort of sight which made Valmy inexplicable to the King of Prussia and his staff. It was the sort of sight which eighteen months later still convinced Mack in Tournai that the Duke of York's plan was a plan "of annihilation." It is a trap for judgment is the French service.

So they lounged about and bought bread, and shifted their packs, and so the drivers stood by their horses, and so they all waited and slouched, until there came, not a man with a bugle nor anything with the slightest savour of drama but a little fellow running along thumping in his loose leather leggings, who went up to a Major of Artillery and saluted, and immediately afterwards the Major put his hand up, and then down a village street, from a point which we could not see, came a whistle, and the whole of that mass of men began to swarm. The grey-blue coats of the line swung round the corner of the village street; they had yet a few miles before them. Anything more rapid or less in step it would be difficult to conceive. The guns were off at a right angle down the main road, making a prodigious clatter, and at the same time appeared two parties, one of which it was easy to understand, the other not. They were both parties of sappers. The one party had a great roll of wire on a drum, and as quick as you could think they were unreeling it, and as they unreeled it fastening it to eaves, overhanging branches, and to corners of walls, stretching it out forward. It was the field-telephone. The other party came along carrying great beams upon their shoulders, but what they were to do with these beams we did not know.

We followed the tail of the line down into the valley, and all that morning long and past the food time at midday, and so till the sun declined in the afternoon, we went with the 38th in its gradual success from crest to crest. And still the 38th slouched by companies, and mile after mile with checks and halts, and it never seemed to get either less or more tired. The men had had twelve hours of it when they came at last, and we after them, on to the critical position. They had carried (together with all the line to the left and to the right of them) a string of villages which crowned the crest of a further plateau, and over this further plateau they were advancing against the main body of the resistance—the other army corps which was set up against ours, to simulate an enemy.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

A railway line ran here across the rolling hedgeless fields, and just at the point where my companion and I struck it there was a dip in the land and a high embankment which hid the plain beyond; but from that plain beyond one heard the separate fire of the advancing line in its scattered order. We climbed the embankment, and from its ridge we saw, over two miles or more of stubble, the little creeping bunches of the attack. What was resisting, or where it lay, one could only guess. Some hundreds of yards before us to the east, with the sloping sun full on it, a line of thicket, one scattered wood and then another, an imperceptible lifting of the earth here and there marked the opposing firing line. Two pompoms could be spotted exactly, for the flashes were clear through the underwood. And still the tide of the advance continued to flow, and the little groups came up and fed it, one after another and another, in the centre where we were, and far away to the north and right away to the south the countryside was alive with it. The action was beginning to take on something of that final movement and decision which makes the climax of manœuvres look so great a game. But in a little while that general creeping forward was checked: there were orders coming from the umpires, and a sort of lull fell over each position held. My companion said to me:—

"Let us go forward now over the intervening zone and in among Picquart's men, and get well behind their line, and see whether there is a rally or whether before the end of this day they begin to fall back again."

So we did, walking a mile or so until we had long passed their outposts and were behind their forward lines. And standing there, upon a little eminence near a wood, we turned and looked over what we had come, westward towards the sun which was now not far from its setting.

Then it was that we saw the last of the Great Sight.

The level light, mellow and already reddening, illumined all that plain strangely, and with the absolute stillness of the air contrasted the opening of the guns which had been brought up to support the renewal of the attack. We saw the isolated woods standing up like islands with low steep cliffs, dotted in a sea of stubble for miles and miles, and first from the cover of one and then from another the advance perpetually, piercing and deploying. As we so watched there buzzed high above us, like a great hornet, a biplane, circling well within our lines, beyond attack from the advance, but overlooking all they concealed behind it. In a few minutes a great Blériot monoplane like a hawk followed, yet further inwards. The two great birds shot round in an arc, parallel to the firing line, and well behind it, and in a few minutes that seemed seconds they were dots to the south and then lost in the air. And perpetually, as the sun declined, Picquart's men were falling back north and south of us and before us, and the advance continued. Group by group we saw it piercing this hedge, that woodland, now occupying a nearer and a nearer roll of land. It was the greatest thing imaginable: this enormous sweep of men, the dead silence of the air, and the comparatively slight contrast of the ceaseless pattering rifle fire and the slight intermittent accompaniment of the advancing batteries; until the sun set and all this human business slackened. Then for the first time one heard bugles, which were a command to cease the game.

I would not have missed that day nor lose the memories of it for anything in the world.

REVIEWS

SOME MODERN RELIGIOUS PROBLEMS

The Gospel of Jesus the Son of God. By George William Knox.

The Earliest Sources for the Life of Jesus. By F. Crawford Burkitt, M.A., D.D.

Sin and Its Forgiveness. By William de Witt Hyde.

Paul and Paulinism. By James Moffatt, D.D. (Constable and Co. 1s. net each.)

These four handy little volumes are members of a series called "Modern Religious Problems;" and it may be interesting to examine rather the general standpoint of the series than the particular treatment of particular questions.

It is to be gathered from the "General Introduction" by Dr. A. W. Vernon that these books are written from the point of view which is sometimes called "Modernist" and sometimes that of the "Higher" Criticism; and in the opening paragraphs of Dr. Vernon's Preface we meet with that bedrock faith in the destructive work of Darwin that is so characteristic of the "advanced" theologian. Men of science, for the most part, are now only too ready to proclaim that the work of Darwin, so far as it stands, does but leave the mystery of things a darker and more obscure enigma than it was before Darwin's days; but the "liberal" theologian is fully persuaded, as Little Billee in "Trilby" was persuaded, that Darwinism explains everything; and therefore that the miraculous is no longer credible, and therefore that it is necessary to write little books reassuring the faithful. The reassurance in question, it may be noted, usually takes the form of telling the perplexed Christian that though miracles are nonsense, still Christ was a good man.

Thus Dr. Vernon:

> The acceptance of the doctrine of Evolution by all intelligent and educated men has diminished the possibility of founding belief upon miracle or supernatural intervention of any kind. . . . While New Testament scholarship has emphasised the spiritual supremacy of Jesus Christ and established His unique power over both diseased and undiseased humanity, it has left His direct intervention in the laws of the natural world at least an open question.

So, fortified by the little books, "a man, incredulous of miracle, may still through Jesus Christ be permitted to apprehend, to perform, and to glory in the Will of God." And the author of "The Gospel of Jesus" says:

> Thus we turn to Jesus; not to the creeds, nor to the theologians, nor even to the earliest disciples. Perhaps these may emphasise aright, and if so, we shall be the more rewarded in our search; and if they differ, with whatever sadness, we must still reject their witness, since Christians may not contradict the Christ.
>
> [Spiritual law, as interpreted by Jesus] needs essentially, not sacrament, nor ritual, nor ecclesiastical organisation.

On the whole, then, we get the statement that miracles do not matter, and that we—any person or persons who choose, on any grounds or no grounds, to fancy that they are expert in spiritual things—have a right to revise the whole Christian religion in accordance with our own notions.

We are to disregard the Church, we are to make nothing of the witness of tradition, we are to take the New Testament exactly as we please, emphasising what happens to suit us, striking out the texts which happen not to suit us, and, in fine, it would appear, we are to reconstruct the doctrine of powder when you come," and in his reference to shirts! We get nearer the man when he takes off his intellectual trappings, and nearest of all when he writes without restraint about his little son.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

We lay down this volume of letters with infinite gratitude, and with the hope that more will be published in the near future. They are letters we shall read more than once, for they are aglow with genius. They are haunting, tender, infinitely pathetic letters written by a man who knew how to transmute words into jewels. He stood ever for the beautiful in art, and if he has seen fit to condemn the New Japan, he was never for one moment disillusioned in regard to the Old! He wrote: "Then I stopped thinking. For I saw my home—and the lights of its household gods—and my boy reaching out his little hands to me—and all the simple charm and love of Old Japan. And the fairy-world seized my soul again, very softly and sweetly—as a child might a butterfly." That is our last remembrance of Lafcadio Hearn, for it was from such thoughts as these that he dreamed his dreams, called up to a weary and cynical and hustling world the ghostly magic of the Land of the Gods.

THE FIRST TEMPTATION OF SAINT ANTHONY

The First Temptation of Saint Anthony. By Gustave Flaubert. Being a Translation into English by René Francis from the 1849-1856 MSS. Edited by Louis Bertrand. (Duckworth and Co. 7s. 6d. net.)

Balzac, in that remarkably powerful little story "Le Chef d'Œuvre Inconnu," has given us the portrait of a master-painter who could, with a few touches of his brush, transform the mediocre work of a brother-artist into a superlative painting, and who claimed to have himself produced a figure of a woman in which perfection of form and colour had been realised; but when his friends were admitted, after infinite delays and difficulties, to see the masterpiece, they found nothing but a blank canvas covered with a few scratches; the painter, in his desire to attain absolute perfection, had touched, retouched, and obliterated till nothing was left. This story might serve as a parable for the literary achievements of Flaubert, as its prolific narrator might serve as his foil. In all history there are few examples of men of letters of the first rank, living, as he did, almost entirely for literature and attaining a moderately-advanced age, who have left so little finished work behind them. The nearest parallel we can find is Thomas Gray, and, were there not something incongruous in putting beside each other the sober poet of the "Elegy" and the sensuous imaginer of "Salammbô," we might find many points of resemblance between these two devotees of good writing. But the chief point of contact is the consuming desire of each of them to lay hold of that impalpable and elusive quality—perfection. The inspired moment is with them not a unit of time, but a series of such units; the results are the "Elegy" and "Madame Bovary."

"La Tentation de Saint Antoine" is a most extraordinary example of Flaubert's ideals and methods of work, inspired by a picture—Breughel's "Hell"—and written, so to speak, in one breath in the years 1848 and 1849. It was withheld from publication owing to the discouraging reception of friendly critics. But Flaubert regarded this book as the child of his imagination, and he returned to it, refashioned it, and had it in the end of 1856 "beaucoup plus sur ses pieds que la Bovary," which he published in that year. But, though completed, it was not to see the light in that form, at least in the author's lifetime. The prosecution of "Madame Bovary" for immorality and impiety so scared Flaubert that he resigned himself to withhold once more a work that smelt infinitely more of the stake than its predecessor. The final accepted version of "Saint Antoine" appeared in 1874, but the changes in it are so wholesale and enormous that the casually dipping reader would have difficulty in recognising it for the same work. Such is the result of the struggle for perfection by Flaubert. As M. Bertrand, in his admirable introductory study, pertinently asks—"Who knows what Flaubert would have done later, if the 'Temptation,' for some reason or other, had again been put back into the drawer?" M. Bertrand is at some pains to justify himself for publishing the first "Temptation;" he finds himself in presence of a "cas de conscience"—would the author have permitted the publication of the first draft of a work he has subsequently given to the Press in a thoroughly revised form? The affirmative answer, which gives us cause for rejoicing, is implied in the appearance of the present work. But M. Bertrand is not content with the negative satisfaction of an acquittal on the charge of exceeding his powers; he is anxious to show—and he appears to us to prove his case—that he is giving publicity to "not a chance fragment, that has but a documentary value, but—we cannot repeat this too often—an original work, of which the 1874 version is but a replica." He adds further that there are passages peculiar to the first version which ought never to perish, enduring treasures of the French language. And finally he claims that the first version is a revelation of a Flaubert that had ceased to exist in 1874, that had already begun to fade in 1862, when "Salammbô" was written—the Flaubert of the quintessence of Romanticism. "This first St. Anthony is perhaps the most profound and perfect expression of itself that romanticism has bequeathed to us; therein the evil of the century attains its paroxysm." Romanticism born of despair was fated to perish of despair. It would be a curious study to compare Flaubert and, say, Baudelaire and the Goncourts with Matthew Arnold and Clough, and others of our English Middle-Victorians.

The English version of Mr. Francis is a successful performance. He has spared no pains to obtain a translation that shall preserve the marvellous colouring of the originals. Neglecting "those lengthy periods and that baffling modernism of language that characterise Flaubert," he has taken his stand on "an archaic, semi-Biblical phraseology," and the result is a far more faithful version than a servile rendering would have been; the inexhaustible vocabulary of Flaubert is met with a choice of words almost equally exuberant. We do not say that the translation is easy reading, in the sense that the sixpenny magazines are easy reading, but neither is the original, and, for those who cannot procure or read the latter, Mr. Francis's book is treasure-trove—a masterpiece cast up on the shores of literature after many days.

The authoritative introduction of M. Bertrand is supplemented by a second prefatory study from no less a pen than that of Sir Gaston Maspero, given in both languages. Unfortunately, in the copy we have received a kind of landslip seems to have occurred with regard to the printing, whereby we find only a few pages of Sir Gaston's dual introduction. It is a passport giving the author licence to evoke his visions amid the waste sands of ancient Egypt, and a masterly discussion of the psychology of the "Temptation." With this introduction, that of M. Bertrand, and the notes and appendices of Mr. Francis, we feel that it would be impertinent for us to attempt any criticism of the actual work. All of these sponsors know their affairs particularly well: M. Bertrand primarily introduced the "First Temptation" to the public in the columns of the Revue de Paris some eighteen months ago. With regard to the Notes, they are scholarly and excellent in their way, but there are hardly enough of them, or perhaps, considering the magnitude of the task, they are already too many. The "simple reader" will find himself dismayed at his ignorance when confronted with the formidable array of the heresies, or watching the almost interminable procession of the religions of humanity driven on to oblivion by the inexorable lash of Death. He may rejoice, as we did, when the authority is not more recondite than Herodotus. Twenty pages are devoted to "sources" alone. We know from M. Bertrand that Flaubert devoted two years of the severest study to reading authorities of every kind, with a single view to Saint Anthony. When the object is, as here, no more than "a book of fantasy," we cannot help resting our imaginations in the introductory chapter of "The Wrong Box," and thinking of the pigeon-holes crammed with documents relating to Tonti, inventor of Tontines.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The "First Temptation" is a work to rank with "Salammbô." It is replete with the most gorgeous imagery; it is a storehouse of romantic material, and its successor has probably been used as such by many famous writers of our own day. The plan and sequence of ideas, utterly different from the final work, are yet perhaps as successful. But what makes, above all, its charm is the intrusion of the author himself into his work; it is full-blooded, subjective Romanticism, it is all that Flaubert censured himself for most bitterly at a later date—"dans l'idéal que j'ai de l'art, je crois . . . que l'artiste ne doit plus apparaître dans son œuvre que Dieu dans la nature." But that was when he was exhaling his "haine des épiciers" in "Bouvard and Pécuchet," and when he no longer wooed Art as a lover, but tortured himself as an ascetic before her shrine. Browning was thinking of some particular case or had his tongue in his cheek, perhaps even wilfully set himself to give an object-lesson in a theory he did not hold, when he wrote—

> Shakespeare unlocked his heart . . .
> Did Shakespeare? If so, the less Shakespeare he!

The Revue de Paris, which published the first "Saint Antoine," is now giving the first "Education Sentimentale," which supplies a further, perhaps even more striking, proof of Flaubert's fastidious and self-critical habit of mind.

THE MISSOURI

The River and I. By JOHN G. NEIHARDT. Illustrated. (G. P. Putnam's Sons. 6s.)

FROM his early boyhood the Missouri River has had for Mr. Neihardt numberless romantic associations and a great poetic appeal. The pioneers of its upper basin, the old fur-hunters and Indian-fighters, are to him the standing types of heroism and strong endeavour, and he champions them against all the heroes of antiquity. He longs for the "Missouriad," the epic of the Missouri which shall take its place beside the "Iliad" and "Æneid," and he wonders why no great poet arises to compose it. We could perhaps find some explanation of this latter omission, but we have no desire to explain away Mr. Neihardt's enthusiasm:—

> To me the Amazon is a basking alligator; the Tiber is a dream of dead glory; the Rhine is a fantastic fairy-tale; the Nile a mummy periodically resurrected; the Mississippi a convenient geographical boundary-line; the Hudson an epicurean philosopher.

But the Missouri, my brother, is the eternal Fighting Man! To one holding these sentiments the descent of the Missouri from Fort Benson, near its source, to Sioux City was the fulfilment of a long-cherished desire, the end of many years of longing; and it says a great deal for Mr. Neihardt's manhood that he was not disappointed. For it was no gentle summer tour, that journey of two thousand miles over rapid, sandbar, and quicksand, by hundreds of miles of mere desert, and at first in a frail canoe with a gasoline engine which would not work, and with two pieces of rotten wood for paddles. The progress through the Bad Lands of Montana ("hell with the lights out," they have been called) involved such hardship that two of the party—old wanderers and hardy men—had more than they cared for and withdrew at the earliest opportunity. "We pushed on with little mourning," says Mr. Neihardt, but he regretted their cooking. A third of the travellers gave up soon afterwards, and our author was left to continue the journey accompanied only by a youngster called "the Kid," whose cheerfulness nothing could long subdue. At the mouth of the Yellowstone River they changed their canoe for a steel boat with oars and a sail. In this they completed the remaining 1,400 miles, struggling usually against strong head-winds, which allowed them to advance at the rate of only a mile an hour for days on end, often in great bodily discomfort, and always put to the full use of their muscles and their temper.

The record of such a journey could not be treated roughly, even if its literary claims were slight. At his best, however, Mr. Neihardt is no mean writer; he commands a strong and vivid English full of happy phrases. At times his style is apt to degenerate into froth or smartness, but he has that power, denied to many better writers, of making a picture leap out distinctly by a few telling words of description. And surely he who can go so near to the decadent as in

> Like a dark-browed Yotun woman wooing the latent giant in me, the night pressed down. I closed my eyes and through me ran the sensuous surface fires of her dream-wrought limbs, or indulge in music-hall facetiousness like "hanging out the bleached rag of a sympathetic smile" without losing the sympathy of the critical reader must be a man of parts. Mr. Neihardt has no difficulty in convincing us that he is neither a decadent nor a mere wag. His humour is somewhat superficial, but it does not seem out of place, and his sentiment is not morbid or forced. He makes a night excursion to the grave of an old hero, but instead of giving us a few sentiments appropriate to the occasion, he says simply, "perched on the ill-kept grave we spoke for an hour under the flying moon." Imagine, say, Mr. A. C. Benson in the situation!

Mr. Neihardt's philosophy of the beautiful is not the most satisfying thing in his book. His demand that great forces should gloriously do nothing seems a rather narrow protest against the practical use of natural power, and his disgust at the "puny Philistines eating peanuts and watching Samson at his Gaza stunt" is not very helpful. He finds the trolley-cars at Black Eagle Falls incongruous, but they are no more incongruous than his own camera, and quite as necessary. "They tell me," he exclaims, "that the Matterhorn never did a tap of work, and you couldn't colour an Easter egg with all the gorgeous sunsets of the world. May we all become, some day, perfectly useless and beautiful!" It is shallow philosophy to assume the useful and the beautiful are eternally divorced. We prefer Mr. H. G. Wells's idea that the useful tends to be ugly only because utility is not yet an art. As a thinker Mr. Neihardt would be well advised to criticise his own beliefs a little more, and not to assume that they are wise merely because they are vivid.

The book is neatly produced and printed in large type; there are many interesting and some beautiful photographs. But it was not really necessary to make the volume so heavy that it is a weariness to hold it.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

IMPERIAL POETRY

Poetry of Empire. Nineteen Centuries of British History. Selected and Edited by JOHN and JEAN LANG. With Sixteen Drawings in Colour by W. RAINEY. (T. C. and E. C. Jack. 7s. 6d. net.)

IT is not for nothing that patriotic poetry is apt to be a little "suspect." Poetry stands for those eternal truths that transcend the distinctions which one cluster of men chooses to raise against an opposing cluster of men; and therefore, by this very fact, the expression "patriotic poetry" is a contradiction in terms; or, to put it more accurately perhaps, the poetry that lays its emphasis on the distinctions rather than on the essential unity of men falls beneath its own Divine level. It calls on us for a lower emotion when we should be seeking the higher ecstasy.

This is an important distinction, and the compilers of this anthology would have done well to have remembered it. For there is a national poetry that does not forget it, and is natural, simple, and unaffected in its manner—virtues which cannot be predicated of all the poems in this collection. There is a patriotic poetry born of strong and natural emotion, a poetry which attempts no heights not proper to it, but, being contented with its lesser sphere, rings conviction with its every word. In illustration of our point we could not do better than join issue with the editors of this volume on their selections from Shakespeare. The chief of their selections, it is worth noting, are from "Richard III." and "Henry V.," or, as we may say, from Shakespeare when he was most Marlowesque and Shakespeare when he was least himself. But they have omitted the most supremely patriotic passages in all Shakespeare. They are the following famous lyric of Gaunt's:—

> This fortress built by Nature for herself
> Against infection and the hand of war;
> This happy breed of men, this little world;
> This precious stone set in a silver sea,
> Which serves it in the office of a wall,
> Or as a moat defensive to a house,
> Against the envy of less happy lands;
> This blessed plot, this earth, this realm, this England.

Also the one supreme thing the execrable queen in "Cymbeline" says: there is scarcely need to quote it—at least not more of it than the following:—

> A kind of conquest
> Cæsar made here; but made not here his brag
> Of Came, and saw, and conquered.

Compare these two with Henry's too loudly vaunted bombast before Harfleur! It is the distinction between poetry and fustian.

Unfortunately, this distinction is too characteristic of the volume. Too much of it is given up to a poetry (which we must needs give that august name) that seeks to flagellate us into a mood that its writers possibly never felt. Moreover, there are some strange and unaccountable gaps in its selection. We looked immediately for Browning's—

> O to be in England
> Now that April's there!

But we failed to find it. Also Milton's—

> Captain or Colonel or Knight in arms.

With the same result. We would also like to have seen Michael Drayton's "Polyolbion," parts of which are at least better worth comment than some of the poems quoted.

Possibly this fault is but part of a greater incoherence. The editors of this compilation seem to lack distinction of aim; they call the book "Poetry of Empire," but they have had to make their selection from poets who wrote long before the modern conception of the word Empire. In fact, it is not so much Poetry of Empire as Poetry of England—or, we might add, "and Scotland." Poor Ireland is ignored in a perplexing manner. Even the doubtful virtue of Jacobite songs wins preference.

The illustrations by Mr. Rainey are of very mixed quality. Their execution is good, but their design is sometimes unintentionally humorous, as, for example, that on the Battle of the Baltic. A group of officers deftly arranged on a bridge in the midst of a battle, with marines at sentry-go, and sailors in spruce clothing—well! "C'est magnifique, mais ce n'est pas la guerre!"

PEACOCK'S PLAYS

The Plays of Thomas Love Peacock. Edited by A. B. YOUNG. (David Nutt. 2s. net.)

ALTHOUGH there are at least two cheap readable editions of his novels, Peacock is an author who even now may hardly be said to have come into his own. It is easy enough to find reasons for this. As a writer he was individual to the point of being eccentric; he belonged to no school and founded no school, though his son-in-law, Meredith, was undoubtedly influenced by his work. In an age greedy of elaborate plots and love-scenes drawn out to tediousness, he wrote romances almost entirely destitute of plot, and love-scenes that added a commendable but highly improbable brevity to the bloodless artificialities of his day. His characters were hardly more like men and women than those of his romantic contemporaries; but where they were romantic he was intellectual. He used the novel to criticise what he considered to be the follies of his age, and by conceiving characters to represent these follies he endeavoured to show that they were ridiculous.

He laughed at Coleridge in the shapes of Mr. Skionar and Mr. Flosky, at Byron in Mr. Cypress, and more sympathetically at his friend Shelley in Scythrop Glowry. His disapproval of landscape gardening shows itself in the person of Mr. Milestone, and his dislike of popular science in Mr. Firedamp. On the smallest excuse he forsakes romance to indulge his notable talent for composing learned and witty dialogues on every subject under the moon. His pages are freely adorned with poems of the highest merit, written in doggerel metres. His characters are oddities, and, unlike most writers, he wearies us only when he is not discursive. It could hardly be expected that books so little like other books would ever be widely popular.

Nevertheless we have always been of opinion that a great many more persons would appreciate Peacock if only they would take the trouble to read him, and it is for this reason that we are inclined to regret the pious enthusiasm that has led Mr. Young to publish three of his plays in the neat little volume that lies before us. We tremble to think what conception any one would form of Peacock's talent who made his acquaintance for the first time through this book. It is not merely that the plays are unworthy of the author of the novels; they are unworthy of any author with the smallest claims to our consideration. Two of them are farces wherein the most unkind Victorian humours are set forth with all the outworn tricks of the worst period of the British stage. The third is a fustian drama in blank verse wherein we defy any one to discover two tolerable lines. Most astonishing of all—for Peacock was a great song-writer—the songs, with but one exception, are as devoid of merit as the rest of the pitiful stuff, and we are forced to conclude either that these are the products of his green, unknowing youth, or that he was endeavouring to write down to the dramatic level of his age, and accomplished his aim with an overflowing measure of success.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

We need hardly say that the editor does not share our opinion as to the demerits of these plays. "Replete with fun, written in a flexible style, and bearing the imprint of a scholarly discrimination and judgment, they clearly betray their authorship." Which only goes to prove that hero-worship, when expressed in terms of literary criticism, is apt to be a little less than just to the hero worshipped.

TWO DESCENDANTS OF THE TROUVÈRES

Juana of Castile. By MAY EARLE. (W. Heinemann. 5s. net.)

The Chained Titan. By M. G. HOLE. (G. Bell and Sons. 4s. net.)

WE call Miss Earle and Mr. Hole descendants of the trouvères because both elect to set forth in verse a consecutive narrative interspersed with lyrics. There is no other resemblance between the light-hearted old French romancists and these two solemn and thoughtful moderns.

In "Juana of Castile" Miss Earle ambitiously essays to versify the whole life-history of the Castilian Princess whose husband was the fickle Philippe Le Bel. Miss Earle imparts a pleasing variety to her narration by the extraordinary diversity of the metres which she employs; and while the first half of her book ambles along in smooth serenity, the last half reaches a decidedly higher level. Here is a really passionate lyric:—

Too late, my lord; what would you with me now?
Our Alpha and our Omega are said,
And on our lips their fervent speech is dead;
Yea, though in Love's high name we still should vow,
The words were vacant being dumb at heart;
Therefore I pray depart.

Three dim, pale moons from these chill British skies
Peered down upon me, as so oft alone,
Forsaken of you on some slight pretext shown,
I lay through weary nights, with sleepless eyes
That saw yours kindling all the darkling hours
With light in other bowers.

Wild passions tore my breast, ere in disdain
(Stabbed to the heart through woman's rightful pride)
I rose imperial to cast aside
The marriage robe, abhorring any stain,
And scorning to be scorned; while love's own fire
Driven back, became its pyre.

O, would that we had drunk the seething wine,
The cup of Ocean's mighty sorcery,
The only loving-cup left you and me;
Then had my heart been yours and your heart mine;
Whelmed in deep waters, joy had been by us
Refound—sought vainly thus.

Another good poem is that beginning—"There was an image in Crete." Having in mind the crisp and vigorous prose style evinced in Miss Earle's introduction, we are inclined to think that the story of Juana would gain much in interest and poetic value were it retold in prose, interspersed with lyric fragments.

Mr. Hole is a poet of wider aim and higher achievement. He has become oppressed—as all poets of to-day sooner or later are troubled—by the evils of modern civilisation; and, under the guise of a wanderer through Greece who has a mountain vision of the chained Prometheus, lover of man, he voices in passionate and melodious blank verse the sorrows of his kind.

He gives expression to the inarticulate many in a passage of great beauty, too long for quotation. The weakness of the book lies in the lyrics, which were better omitted. For Mr. Hole blank verse seems a perfect medium, wherein he moves apparently effortless, never lapsing into monotony. He is plainly a disciple of Milton, and is sometimes betrayed into preciosities, such as "inagitate," and "innumerous,' when the common usage would have served him better; but we would end upon a note of praise. Mr. Hole has the felicity of epithet which marks the true poet. Here are two instances:—

Panthea flung
Back from her brow the midnight of her hair.

Through the warm glooms and whispering secrecies
Of valley-nesting woods.

SHORTER REVIEWS

THE PERSIAN BOOK OF KINGS

The Shâhnáma of Firdausi. Done into English by ARTHUR GEORGE WARNER, M.A., and EDMOND WARNER, B.A. Vol. V. (Kegan Paul and Co. 10s. 6d.)

THE appalling length of the "Sháhnáma," the "Book of Kings" of Persia, 60,000 couplets in rhyme, always recalls the story told by Macaulay, in his essay on Burleigh, of the Italian criminal who preferred the galleys to reading Guicciardini's voluminous history. The length, indeed, might be tolerated if the "Sháhnáma" were trustworthy history. But this national epic embodies all the ancient traditions, all the mythological and legendary lore, far removed from the canons of accurate history, which the author Firdausi inherited from Dakiki or collected for himself. To Dakiki belongs the credit of commencing the Persian epic, but, after he had composed about a thousand couplets, including the appearance of Zoroaster, he was assassinated by a favourite slave. Firdausi, born at Mashad about 940 A.D., was intrusted by Mahmood of Ghazni (997-1028) with the material collected up to date. When, after thirty to forty years' labour, the work was completed in 1010, Mahmood refused to pay the promised reward. Firdausi wrote a satire on the King and was sentenced to death, but escaped and fled for his life. Mahmood repented and sent the poet a large sum, which arrived as Firdausi's corpse was being carried to burial.

This national epic has been several times translated, and is now being rendered into English blank verse by the present translators. They have reached their fifth volume, which still deals only with the Kayanian dynasty. According to Professor Browne of Cambridge, the "Sháhnáma" recognises four dynasties of pre-Muhammadan Persian Kings—the Pishdadi, the Kayani, the Parthian, and the Sasani, of which the first two are entirely unhistorical, belonging to the mythology of the Avesta and the common Indo-Iranian legend. In the absence of the Persian text, it can only be said that the translation has the appearance of being literal; it is simple and clear, and the language is appropriate and dignified. With the help of the table of contents and the careful argument and notes it is fairly easy to follow the narrative, divided in this volume into four parts. It begins with the advent of Zarduhsht—that is, Zoroaster, the founder of a new religion, the traditional author of the Zendavesta. Gushtasp, the King, is converted and war ensues between Iran (Persia) and Arjasp, the King of Turan (Chinese Tartary). Many brave acts are performed in the war and heroes killed. The volume concludes with the death of Gushtasp, and the succession of his grandson, Bahman, son of Asfandiyar, as King of Persia. The "Sháhnáma" as a whole, and in detail, appeals to the patriotic feelings of the Persian race, which lives on the memories of a glorious past; the names of the heroes of mythology and tradition are familiar, but fail to rouse a spirit of imitation; and the conditions and circumstances are very different. The story of former ages is a contrast to the present decadence. As a noble effort of the poet Firdausi, the "Sháhnáma" will always hold a high place in the epic literature of the nations.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

MALTA

Malta. Painted by VITTORIO BORON, described by FREDERICK W. RYAN. (A. and C. Black. 7s. 6d. net.)

IT is surprising that Malta has been so much neglected by English writers, and also by English seekers after health and pleasure. Apart from the British connection, and the consequent exceptional interest which the island should have for British readers, the history of the island since the days of the Phœnicians has been specially varied and interesting, and its romance should alone be sufficient excuse for many popular writers to turn their attention to it. As a health and pleasure resort this picturesque Mediterranean island seems to have been overlooked to a great extent, and it would be well if some of those who are accustomed every winter to hasten further a-field or a-sea, were to tarry by the way and spend a month or so in the ancient home of the Knights of St. John.

Without pretending to deal at all exhaustively with his subject or to attempt a book of a serious nature, Mr. Ryan has succeeded in writing a very pleasant and attractive volume, which certainly arouses the desire for further information concerning this romantic spot. The letterpress alone would have justified this modest book, but its value has been very much enhanced by the splendid illustrations which Signor Vittorio Boron has contributed as his share of the work. The book, although nowhere deep or detailed, covers a wide field. Not satisfied with an historical account of the island, and incidentally of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem, Mr. Ryan adds chapters on the climate (reprinted from the Colonial Office List), manners, and customs, his impressions, and the social life of the islanders. In addition he furnishes a chronology of the history of the island, a list of the Grand Masters who governed Malta and another of the British Governors of the island, and an account of its constitution. Mr. Ryan even reprints Byron's "Farewell to Malta."

The Knights of St. John have been often and justly criticised. The other side of the picture should, however, not be suppressed, and the value of their services to the Island cannot be better illustrated than by the following account of the condition of Malta immediately previous to the occupation compared with the position to-day :—

> It was but an arid rock, covered in many places with sand, and in a few with a light scattering of earth brought from Sicily; that it had neither rivers nor springs, and that the fresh water was for the most part rain collected in tanks or cisterns; that it produced little corn, not half enough to feed the scanty population; that it would be a very unpleasant residence, particularly during the summer months, violently hot, with not one forest-tree, and hardly a green thing for the eye to rest on; with a sort of ill-walled town, called the capital, at some distance from the sea; that which are called casals are miserable villages, or shocking huts rather befitting fishermen or pirates than the renowned Hospitallers.

THE JEWISH BOARD OF DEPUTIES

A Century and a Half of Jewish History, extracted from the Minute Books of the London Committee of Deputies of the British Jews. By CHARLES H. L. EMANUEL, M.A., Solicitor and Secretary of the London Committee of Deputies of the British Jews. (G. Routledge and Sons. 5s. net.)

THE London Committee of Deputies, or the Jewish Board of Deputies, as it is colloquially known, is the one representative Anglo-Jewish institution which concerns itself with external events and proposals in so far as they are likely to affect Jewish interests. The Committee first met in 1760, and the 150th anniversary of that meeting was celebrated at the end of last year. The present volume, which is intended as a history of the Board, is published in honour of the event.

In the preparation of the volume an initial mistake was made in the form decided upon. The book is in no sense either a history or a work of literature. It is merely a reasoned index to the minutes of the Board, or a catalogue of the various decisions which the Committee arrived at during the century and a half of its existence. Presumably as an index it is complete, although the reader frequently feels doubtful whether references to matters dealt with by the Board have not been omitted. If omissions do occur, then the value of the book as an index disappears, and with it all justification for its existence. No attempt has been made at any connecting-up of entries relating to the same subject, nor has the compiler allowed himself on any pretence to wander outside the covers of the minute books of his institution; consequently there is no endeavour at explanatory comment, without which the entries often convey little or no meaning. Mr. Emanuel has in fact resolutely closed his eyes to all outside information bearing on the subjects with which his Board dealt, and as a result no complete account can be obtained from his volume of any subject on which it touches. Even in his editing—that is to say, if he has done any—Mr. Emanuel has not exercised a very wise discretion, for trivialities of no possible interest to any human being except those immediately concerned abound and probably equal in number the entries of general interest. Mr. Emanuel has lost a great opportunity. The last century and a half of the history of the Jews in this country is full of interest to English men and women of all faiths, and its story should obtain a wide circulation. One item alone, which appears casually in Mr. Emanuel's pages—the political emancipation of the Jews in this country—if properly described would prove attractive to Jew, to politician, and to student of English history, but none of these will find any satisfaction from a consultation of Mr. Emanuel's pages. In fact the book is a great disappointment, and it is to be regretted that the Committee of Deputies did not decide to perpetuate their celebration more suitably.

India: Eight Lectures Prepared for the Visual Instruction Committee of the Colonial Office. By H. J. MACKINDER, M.A. Illustrated. Also an Edition, specially prepared for the use of Lecturers. (George Philip and Son. 8d. net each.)

LORD MEATH, Chairman of the Visual Instruction Committee, explains in his Introduction that these Lectures

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

have been prepared with the object of imparting knowledge regarding the component parts of the Empire to the schools in different countries. A Committee of Ladies collected a considerable sum of money for the purpose, and this is the instalment relating to India. As the name implies, the method adopted is instruction by pictures and maps, reproduced in illustrative lantern-slides. There are sixty slides for each of the eight lectures, which survey the whole of India. Under each Province a sub-heading intimates the treatment of a special subject. Thus "Madras—the Hindu Religion." Mr. Mackinder is to be congratulated on his text. He has said just enough, simply and clearly. It is necessarily descriptive, but some history and account of the principal religions and the administration are included. He rightly notes that "religion rules all life," "governs all the social relations of an Indian." Where accuracy is conspicuous it may seem unkind to criticise. But Job Charnock, who founded Calcutta on August 24th, 1690, and died on January 10th, 1693, did not, as stated, build the first Fort William, which dates from 1696; the British flag was first hoisted in Calcutta on October 6th, 1703. There is no "form of tent-pegging with a sword;" lemons and potatoes are cut at by a horseman with a sword. In a map Gujarat is erroneously printed for Kattiawar. The allusion to a "national caste" is vague. Diana-ud-dowla is a new name; so, too, the Vishnagi Temple at Benares. Alexander the Great reached the Bias (Hyphasis), not the Sutlej. Some repetitions—for instance, about Clive and the religion of the Marathas—are not required. But these small slips, and others, can easily be corrected. The edition, which shows exactly when each slide should be exhibited, will be most useful for lecturers. The whole project is praiseworthy as extending a knowledge of India to schools in an agreeable manner.

The Dramatic Author's Companion. By a THEATRICAL MANAGER'S READER. (Mills and Boon. 2s. 6d. net.)

MR. ARTHUR BOURCHIER, whose pen is only out of his hand when he is actually on the stage, supplies a short Introduction to this small book. In this he gives the "Theatrical Manager's Reader" a patriarchal blessing because he has done something to help would-be dramatists to acquire technical knowledge of stage possibilities which is "so sadly lacking." Mr. Bourchier is an optimist. We do not find that the anonymous writer of this commonplace volume has done anything at all to make the difficult art of playwriting any easier. His chapters are made up of generalities, and his advice on technique is of use only to those who do not possess a vestige of ordinary intelligence. If all theatrical managers' readers hold the views that are set out in this quite unnecessary book, and the plays they select for the managers' final decision are accepted on their recommendation, the explanation of the abortive seasons through which the stage has struggled is clear. The book seems to us to have been written to encourage illiterate persons into a field of work in which they will do nothing but encounter disappointment and heart-burning, and a paragraph printed in italics in the chapter entitled "Things Worth Remembering" proves it to be little more than an elaborate advertisement. The paragraph runs as follows:—

> The author of this book will be glad to give advice as to the practical possibilities of production, merits, and placing of authors' MSS. For terms, &c., apply the Reader of Plays. . . .

Here follows the name and address of a literary agent. As all authors have discovered, after much bitter experience, the help of these practical advisers is very expensive indeed, generally costing them a large percentage of their royalties. There is also nothing for a dramatist to gain by putting himself in the hands of a literary agent. If his play appeals to a manager, it has more chance of being produced if it is sent first-hand than through an agency. No literary agent in the history of the stage has ever yet been instrumental in persuading a manager to accept a play. All that he can do is to act as a distributor, and in nine cases out of ten the distribution is unintelligent. The dramatic author's companion is not disinterested. He sets a net to catch the unwary. "For terms, &c." is an expression which undermines the whole primâ facie intention of the volume.

Four Fascinating Frenchwomen. By MRS. BEARNE. Illustrated. (T. Fisher Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)

ADELAIDE FILLEUL, Comtesse de Flahaut and Marquise de Souza, Claire de Kersaint, Duchesse de Duras, Marie Caroline de Bourbon, Duchesse de Berry, and the Princesse Mathilde Bonaparte are the four Frenchwomen whom Mrs. Bearne has chosen as her heroines on this occasion. These four famous women are, however, not the only personages who appear in Mrs. Bearne's pages, although they are among the most prominent of them. The authoress has by no means narrowed herself down to the limits of her title, but has drawn interesting and clear pictures of life in France, and occasionally elsewhere also, during the periods at which her heroines flourished.

The period covered by these studies extends practically from the early years of the Great Revolution until half a century ago. They all deal intimately with Court life, and they have one very strong trait running through them all, and that is the trait of immorality. Judging from these pages, it would seem that, Royal or Imperial, the Court of France was incurably immoral. Perhaps for this reason France needed the cleansing of several revolutions from which she has suffered before her governing classes could at any rate depose vice from the exalted and honoured position which it had hitherto held, and this may help to explain the stability of the present republic in a country which used to change its form of government about twice a decade. It must not be thought, however, that the entire book consists of the details of sordid intrigue, although quite sufficient of that will be found therein. There is much interesting information of the historical-memoir description to be found in the book, and the account of prisoners of the Terror returning once more to freedom, gradually collecting the survivors of their dispersed and persecuted friends, and finding here and there a few crumbs remaining from their former splendid patrimonies is at times pathetic; and so are the stories of the splendid integrity and loyalty of former servants of the nobility, who, on the return of their masters from exile, hastened to lay at their feet whatever they had managed to save, often at the risk of their lives, from the universal ruin of which the Terror was the instrument.

Whether Mrs. Bearne's heroines are properly described as fascinating or not there are two opinions; of the fascination of the book itself there can be no doubt.

Les Jours Vécus: Souvenirs d'un Parisien de Paris. By JACQUES NORMAND. (Calmann-Lévy, Paris. 3f. 50c.)

REMINISCENCES of childhood, essays, and sketches form the contents of this entertaining volume with the familiar yellow paper covers, and if we say that we like the pictures of childhood and the essays best it is only because they are so good that the other material of the book is overshadowed. The themes vary, but one little story of school-

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

days may be mentioned as showing a keen appreciation of the psychology of a boy. The child is sent for the first time to college, and is utterly miserable at the thought of being separated from his mother. His first night at the place is almost intolerable; in his mother's arms he weeps and sobs out his misery, until she half-promises to remove him. On the second night he sleeps better, and by the third day the light-heartedness of youth asserts itself, and he distinguishes himself in a game called "La Balle au Mur," which gives its title to the sketch. In the midst of his success, flushed, radiant, and happy, a messenger approaches him. "On vous demande au parloir," he says. It is his mother, come to assure him that he shall be taken away from the school at once! Slight enough material for a story, maybe, but it is told so delicately that the reader is charmed.

Of the essays we prefer "Le Phare." It is dated from Étretat, 1906, and is a vivid description of the life of the lighthouse-keepers, and almost, we could add, of the soul of the lighthouse itself. With unerring strokes the impression is conveyed that the lighthouse is some sentient, benevolent giant watching over land and sea. The whole essay is a triumph of quiet prose, reaching a sudden and remarkably impressive climax in the apostrophe with which it closes—"Veillez, ô phares de France! Ouvrez-vous et fouillez l'horizon, ô grands yeux palpitants de la nuit!"

Some most interesting pages are devoted to reminiscences of Guy de Maupassant, from which, had we space, we should like to quote; and the amusing incident of "Véronique" displays that humour rendered poignant by a hint of sadness which only a clever brain and a sympathetic imagination can conceive. M. Normand is already famous, and he gives in this volume of his best.

Chez les Français. Edited by H. Carter, B.A. With Exercises by C. F. Shearman, M.A. (A. and C. Black. 2s.)

This—the sixth volume of "Black's Reform French Course"—is a capital Reader for those who are preparing for the Higher Certificate and similar examinations. It includes selections from Taine, Flaubert, Victor Hugo, Théophile Gautier, Alexandre Dumas, Alphonse Daudet, George Sand, René Bazin, and other writers of acknowledged merit, all of the extracts treating of France, its scenery, people, and customs. Perhaps a few narrow-minded persons may feel nervous on discovering that some of the passages are taken from Flaubert's "Madame Bovary," which is certainly not intended, in its entirety, virginibus et puerisque. But the pages selected by Mr. Carter will be found unimpeachable in tone and excellent as examples of the work of the great stylist, whose influence on the writing of French prose has been so manifest. All the passages in the volume are followed by suitable explanatory notes in French; and Miss Shearman contributes a number of well-planned exercises, which supply all the necessary material for composition and practice in grammatical forms. The little book is nicely printed and illustrated.

The Life of Joseph Hart. By Thomas Wright. (Farncombe and Son. 2s. 6d. net.)

The writer of a beautiful hymn is often absolutely unknown to fame, and it was wise in Mr. Thomas Wright to preserve in concise form his investigations into the career of the "Hogarth of hymnists," Joseph Hart. Hart was born in London about the year 1712, and at first he gave few indications of any tendency to a sacred destiny—quite the reverse, in fact, for after a period of superficial religion and earnest study, he wasted his substance in the most thorough manner. "He was a welcome guest," says the author, "in gilded and convivial circles, and the public gardens, the playhouse, and the tavern were his habitual resorts. If he broke with his companions, as now and again happened, it was only to return with impetuosity after a brief interval to his old and vicious courses." In the year 1751, however, he began to live more soberly, and in 1755 came under the magnetic influence of Whitefield at the "Tabernacle" in Moorfields; two years afterwards his agonies of soul were set at rest, and he devoted himself to the ascetic life which is lived by few. His collections of hymns went into several editions during his lifetime, and some of them are familiar to readers of the present day. They are not often good poetry, perhaps, but sincerity and pleasing rhythms redeem them from the fate which befalls very much of the religious verse of past years.

Joseph Hart died in 1768, and was buried in Bunhill Fields; a new headstone was placed at the grave in 1877 by various lovers of his work, and may be seen at the present day. This story of his life is of great interest, not only from the personal standpoint, but because many notable events are connected with his times, and are alluded to by the author; the illustrations also give it added value, there being many reproductions of old title-pages and prints.

The Footprints in the Snow, and other Tales. By H. F. W. Tatham. With a Memoir by A. C. Benson. (Macmillan and Co. 3s. 6d. net.)

The attributes which Mr. A. C. Benson mentions as having belonged to the author of these stories—"simplicity, kindness, purity"—pervade the stories themselves to such an extent as to render criticism almost unnecessary. They are slight, beautifully and clearly written, occasionally possessing a suspicion of the "moral lesson," and invariably readable with pleasure. A prefatory note by the author's brother informs us that they were composed "partly for his own delight and partly for a purpose, to read aloud to the small boys in his house (at Eton) on Sunday evenings." The joy of writing is evident to any one who can read between the lines, and it occurs to us that these little imaginative and sometimes dramatic episodes are admirably suited to enchain the attention of youngsters who are too acute and sensible to be put off with the ordinary semi-religious "moral" tale. Mr. Benson gives a memoir which is tenderly and affectionately inspired, and sets the personality of the author before us vividly.

The Kiltartan Wonder Book. By Lady Gregory. (Maunsell and Co. 3s. 6d.)

This is a very charming fairy-tale book for little "tots." There are about sixteen short stories, all told in the most quaint and interesting Irish fashion—we do not mean Irish language. Many have nice little morals, quite understandable by quite young "chicks." The pictures, by Margaret Gregory, are well thought out and amusing. We like the way the book is covered, the cloth coming over the edges, as in some of the Church books. We all know how annoying it is to take up a book with the edges full of dust, although otherwise the book may be quite clean. A cheaper edition has a paper cover. We can confidently recommend the little book as interesting and diverting, and those who appreciate an Irish flavour will be especially pleased with it.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The Brownies, and Other Tales. By JULIANA HORATIA EWING. (George Bell and Sons. 2s. 6d.)

WE find this a very nicely got-up little book that no child could fail to be pleased with. We do not know which of the tales we found the more interesting, "The Brownies" or "The Land of Lost Toys;" but all are good, and the pictures, by Miss Alice B. Woodward, most excellent.

FICTION

The Beauty Doctor. By FLORENCE WARDEN. (Greening and Co. 6s.)

WHEN we opened Miss Florence Warden's latest novel it was with the pleasurable anticipation of reading something good, as superior to the trash that so many so-called novelists turn out to-day as gold is to dross. We must confess that we were grievously disappointed. We consider the story altogether unworthy of the able authoress of "The House on the Marsh," her initial success, "A Prince of Darkness," and many other deservedly popular works of fiction. Miss Warden should look to her laurels, or else they will inevitably fade, perhaps never to flourish again, though we hope not.

The catch-title is undoubtedly a good one; but beyond being a bait to capture the unwary—and, alas! it captured us for a while, though not for long—it is entirely wasted. We who can recall the notorious Madame Rachel, who, before Miss Warden's time—though no doubt within her ken—professed to make women beautiful for ever, and swindled them accordingly, know of the possibilities of a work on such a subject. But Miss Warden entirely fails to take advantage of them, for Netta, the heroine, and presumably "The Beauty Doctor," with the exception of two or three occasions on which she professionally attends an elderly dowager, who is either a fiend or a maniac, devotes her attention to quite other matters throughout the story. First and foremost of these is, of course, love; and equally, of course, her lover is a lord. 'Twas ever thus in novels of this description.

It will not surprise the experienced reader to learn that after marrying Netta, naturally by special licence, the noble lord is suspected of having committed bigamy. But it may surprise him to hear that after many queer, not to say absurd, happenings, over which we prefer to draw a veil, were taking place, his lordship was not only suffering with a broken leg, but was also being drugged with morphia by his doctor and slowly poisoned, with goodness knows what, by his wicked stepmother. Nevertheless, he survives it all, and when the climax is reached the naughty dowager goes into hysterics, and Netta falls into Lord Kneesworth's arms, broken leg notwithstanding. The description of a somewhat dubious Orphan Girls' Home, where Netta is kept prisoner after being kidnapped, is to our mind the only really readable part of the story, which can boast the usual amount of unnecessary padding. Miss Warden has shown over and over again that she can produce better work than this, and we trust that before long she will once more do so.

Fortuna Chance. By JAMES PRIOR. (Constable and Co. 6s.)

FAME has not hitherto spoken very loudly of Mr. James Prior, but if he intends to write many books as good as "Fortuna Chance" she will need to get her trumpet ready. At a time when the characters of novels can usually be numbered on the fingers, he gives us an endless succession of people of all types and classes and of all degrees of humour and seriousness. In a day when historical writing consists chiefly of picturesque costumes, obsolete oaths, and fighting, he gives us a world as quiet and familiar as our own surroundings, a world in which the Jacobite rising of 1745 looms with all the vagueness and uncertainty of contemporary events. The scene of the story is laid chiefly in Sherwood Forest and the Peak country, and the characters are drawn from the people who live there. Roland Surety, the hero, is the offspring of a semi-legal union between Fortuna Chance and a young fellow named Bond, "of the tribe of the Nobodies of Nowhere," who afterwards becomes a Judge however. His mother, disgraced and separated from her lover, takes up her abode in a little house on the edge of Sherwood Forest. There Roland is born and brought up strong in the Roman Catholic faith and the Stuart cause. When the Pretender's army marches southward to Derby he sets off to join it, in spite of his being forbidden as a "Popish recusant convict" to leave home without permission. He fails to reach the army owing to its retreat, and, returning home on a night of blizzard, he is partial witness of the murder of his old enemy, a forest-keeper. How he is accused of the murder, his flight, final capture, and trial by his own father (a situation which recalls "Weir of Hermiston," but is legally more plausible) we must leave the reader to find out. The plot is a good one, but good as it is, and good as are the gentlefolk, especially Roland, Fortuna, Press, her maid and her two female relatives, Mistresses Alliot and Ann Chance, there is nothing in the book like the rustics. How Mr. Prior came by their dialect, and whether it is accurate, we do not know or care. The result is thoroughly delightful. The conversations in the alehouse at Kirkby, the pursuit of Roland, the Methodists, the episode of Job Owlett, who shot a marauding Highlander and had to fly, and many other scenes and men, are work of the highest order. The number of these rustics is astonishing, and only equalled by their perfect distinctness among themselves. Perhaps the very fullness of Mr. Prior's book robs it here and there of the perfect clearness and swiftness of action that we admire in such a book as "Kidnapped," but this is its only fault. If Mr. Prior can improve very much on "Fortuna Chance" there is no saying what he may not accomplish.

The Simpkins Plot. By GEORGE A. BIRMINGHAM. (T. Nelson and Sons. 2s. net.)

"THE SIMPKINS PLOT" contains matter for a splendid short story, but we think Mr. George A. Birmingham has made a mistake in writing a full-length novel. Quite two-thirds of his pages are mere talk, clever talk always, we admit, but superfluous, and therefore giving the book a smudgy effect instead of that clear-cut neatness which it ought to have had, and which Mr. Birmingham was just the man to give to it. Imagine a young lady writer of "daring" novels being the double of a woman who has just been acquitted of murdering her husband, the Judge having been the uncle of the authoress. Imagine then a furiously interfering and indecently broad-minded Irish parson mistaking the authoress for the murderess, and planning to marry her, with, he hopes, fatal results to a land-agent who has made himself a nuisance to the inhabitants of a West of Ireland town where the authoress is spending her summer holiday. Here are obvious materials for a very pretty mix-up, and a very pretty mix-up there is. We must leave the reader to discover by what skilful touches Mr. Birmingham makes the plot seem plausible, and how it failed. His parson, the chief character, is cleverly drawn. At the beginning and the end of the book he is very funny, although in the middle we found ourselves skipping his long-winded remarks a good deal, and once or twice he awoke in us a stronger desire to snub him severely than to laugh at him. Simpkins and the Judge are also very good. The lady-novelist does not appear very often, we are glad to say, as she is a type of which we have lately had more than enough. The Irish people are above praise. We do not ever remember to have seen their characteristic turns of speech more completely and easily suggested, and without a single "indade," "bejabbers," or other novelistic absurdity of the kind. It would be a very good thing if all the speeches of Mr. Birmingham's Irish folk were extracted and printed with notes for the use of intending painters of Irish character.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

THE THEATRE

"BEAU BROCADE" AT THE GLOBE

If we had found ourselves at the Apollo Theatre, and seen the name of Mr. Pélissier in place of that of Mr. Frank Curzon and discovered a small footnote on the programme to the effect that "Beau Brocade" was an extravaganza or a caricature of a romantic play, we should have spent a fairly amusing evening. As it was, we were amazed to find that "Beau Brocade," by the Baroness Orczy and Mr. Montagu Barstow, was written very seriously indeed, and produced very seriously and acted in grim earnest. The result was more pitiful than painful. We do not ever remember to have witnessed a performance so child-like and bland, so ingenuous, foolish, puerile, or inane in our experience of the theatre. The very scenery suggested the potted scenery at the Apollo Theatre. The incidental music was nothing but a caricature of the "Henry VIII." Dances of Mr. Edward German and the hornpipes of tradition. The acting was in the nature of a caricature also. Mr. Bertram Wallis, a fine figure of a man, caricatured Mr. Lewis Waller in "Beaucaire," while Miss Grace Lane exaggerated the methods she employed when with Mr. Waller in that very play. The dialogue, too, was a caricature. There was not one original line in it. Every line spoken was easily recognisable and belonged to the type of the "Unhand me villain!" and "You shall pay for this!" With feelings of curious excitement we sat the thing out to the bitter end. We felt as Sherlock Holmes must have felt when, having laid down a series of deductions they came true one after another.

It gave us a sort of horrid joy to finish sentences and find that we were right. "If I could but look . . ." and to add mentally "into those dear eyes of thine I should indeed die happy," provided us with a certain kind of amusement. The monotony of always being exactly correct became, it is true, a little tiresome. But, on the whole, the evening was not wasted. The play was received with rapture by an audience mainly composed of women of uncertain years. We were therefore provided with an insight into the intelligence of the average theatre-goer. It was also, it must be confessed, somewhat disheartening, because if such a play as this can give delight and pleasure to a crowded house, what possible chance can a play of any literary ability have in London? We can only suppose that the public which is drawn to "Beau Brocade" is the same public which waits for hours in the rain and cold outside the walls of His Majesty's Theatre to see Sir Herbert Tree's representation of "King Henry VIII.," and that it is the same public which prefers the foolish pictures that are provided by the electric theatres to "Pompey the Great" and other worthy and epoch-making plays. We brought a very fair mind to bear upon "Beau Brocade." Above all things we desired to be entertained at any cost. We told ourselves, having had a lengthy experience of so-called romantic plays, that we must leave whatever analytical powers we possessed with our hats in the cloakroom.

We expected, and even looked forward to find, a hero who wasn't a hero but was a highwayman, and therefore a thief, holding his own with ease and gracefulness against a dozen varlets armed to the teeth. We expected, and even desired, that the heroine who was not a heroine, but an extremely foolish maiden, would give her heart instantly, at first sight, to the richly dressed person who smacked his thigh and said, "By my halidom!" We looked forward to meeting once more the village fool who was not a fool, but the only sensible person in the play; and we were eager to renew our acquaintance with the heroine's maid-servant who loved a blacksmith, whose anvil was struck by a man in the orchestra—a brunette with twinkling ankles and a tip-tilted nose, who skipped and pirouetted, and was always at hand for a comic love scene with her sheepish lover. In all these things we were not disappointed. One after another they made their appearance at precisely the right moment, and they were followed, as we hoped, by the villain who wasn't a villain, but a man of so little ingenuity and cunning, that the hero who wasn't a hero, the heroine who wasn't a heroine, the fool who wasn't a fool, and even the beadle who wasn't a bit like a beadle, could outwit him and outmanœuvre him with the greatest possible ease. "Beau Brocade" contained them all, and in addition it contained the acrobatic village maiden, who skipped about the stage; the male villager who entered at odd moments, when he wasn't making sounds in the distance, and who was always physically incapable of being able to see the villain who wasn't a villain, or the hero who wasn't a hero, or the heroine who wasn't a heroine. Unlike its predecessors, "Beau Brocade" contained live horses which trotted over the hollow sward and were timidly held by anxious and unpractised hands. These horses, like the actors, many of whom were far less important, seemed wholly unreal and devised in the same spirit of caricature as the play, the music, and the dialogue.

Captain Jack Bathurst, known as "Beau Brocade," had been cashiered from his Majesty's Army after the battle of Culloden Moor. When we say cashiered, it goes without saying that we mean wrongfully dismissed from his regiment, because eventually he marries the heroine, known, and wrongfully known, as Lady Patience Gascoyne. There was, as a matter of fact, nothing of patience in her nature. Bathurst, cosmopolitan in his choice of friends, was on terms of intimacy and even of affection with the village smith, oddly named Stich. With the exquisite carelessness of the undoubted hero, he housed his well-known brown charger with the white diamond in a loose box in Stich's shop for all the world to see. What did it matter to him that a price was set upon his head and that even romantic villains might very easily come to the childish conclusion that where the horse was there also would be the master. It happened that this shop was the headquarters also of a young gentleman of wide gesture and mincing enunciation known as the Earl of Stretton, who was also wanted, so he disguised himself by wearing a leather apron which was quite sufficient to render him unrecognisable in his native village. This person possessed those letters which were now becoming so dogeared and which, for reasons which are never explained, must find themselves in the hands of the King, any King. Sir Humphrey, the villain, who loved the heroine, desired the letters in order that he might blackmail the heroine into joining him at the altar for better for worse.

So Jack Bathurst, finding time somewhat heavy on his hand, and having fallen in love with the heroine, whose rose he has picked up and pressed to his lips, offers to place the letters in the hands of the King, any King; whereupon, the curtain having been up nearly thirty-five minutes, he loses them at the feet of the villain. By him they are greedily captured and taken off. Sensation! all the villagers run in, the orchestra swells, the highwayman presses the rose to his lips, gives forth a number of well-known lines in a ringing voice, and strides out to look for the villain, whom he has just seen making a triumphant exit in precisely an opposite direction. So it goes on through four bewildering Acts. Foolishness is piled upon foolishness, inanity upon inanity. Never has Mr. Pélissier done anything so spitefully amusing, so impishly clever as this serious series of unconscious caricatures. We know exactly what would have happened had the Globe Theatre been the New Theatre, Oxford, and the audience undergraduates. Homeric laughter would have shivered the looking-glasses, and shaken the pillars, and filled the actors with amazement and surprise. The one thing that was deliciously funny was the complete self-satisfaction of the gentleman who played Beau Brocade. He had so evidently seen the photograph of himself in one of the weekly illustrated papers and the line which ran beneath it—"The handsomest actor on the British Stage." His condescension was exquisite. He swaggered, posed, attitudinised, mouthed his flowery sentiments, purred, and pressed the rose to his lips under the undeniable belief that he was the object of worship of every woman in the house. He even sung a little song rather nicely, but with an air of charming patronage. He was unique. He was, in a word, Pélissier at his best, and when we heard this little song we knew at once what had happened to "Beau Brocade."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

It was a musical comedy, a long way after Seymour Hicks, out of which some humorist had cut the numbers. In the hands of Mr. George Edwardes, who would, of course, have made room in it for a German waltz, it would have been welcomed by the daily Press with hysterical enthusiasm, and Mr. George Edwardes would have been accused of outdoing himself. There would certainly have been an Esquimaux chorus and a duet between the beadle and the county magistrate, leading up to imitations of Mr. Winston Churchill and Mr. Lloyd George, or of those less-advertised knockabouts "Joe and Cully." Then there would have been a string of bored young ladies in tiaras, who would have been put down on the programme as "villagers, &c." Imagine what Mr. Hadyen Coffin would have done with "Beau Brocade." Conceive Mr. "Teddy" Payne as H.R.H. the Duke of Cumberland and Mr. George Grossmith, junior, as the Earl of Stretton, with frequent references to his tailor. Think of Miss Gertie Millar as Lady Patience with a nigger solo, "Under de same old moon," and a duet with his Royal Highness in which a perambulator would have played a conspicuous part. It is obvious that the Baroness Orczy and Mr. Montagu Barstow have not treated themselves seriously enough. A little more ambition, a little better advice, a flying visit to America for a song or two, and a telegram to Vienna for the inevitable mazy waltz, and they might have had a Gaiety play which would have drawn the town for a number of years—until, in fact, Mr. George Edwardes, bored by the wholesale accommodation of gold, was seized with the spirit of rash speculation, sent it into the country, and put on another "instantaneous success" on precisely the same lines. The play was produced by Mr. Henry Ainley, who, having served under the banner of Sir Herbert Tree, has gained a sure knowledge of how to treat such things as this. The note of His Majesty's Theatre was obvious more than once, especially when the curtain went up on the second Act and disclosed the hero sitting on a real horse with a movable sky behind him.

MUSIC

To the question "Are the English a musical people?" your optimist will sometimes reply, "They must be; look at the number of concerts given in London alone; there is always an audience, frequently a large one!" But is it certain that the music is always the attraction? We have our doubts. No plea of music is necessary for the numerous Mrs. Eltons of to-day, who, like their great ancestors, "only want to be going somewhere." Cabbage-beds, as we know, would have been enough to have tempted that lady, when a visit to the Donwell strawberry-beds was proposed; and any music, and any performers, will bring swarms of chocolate-crunching ladies to Queen's or Bechstein Hall. This species was recently present in unusual abundance at Miss Marie Brema's new operas, and also at the performance of Verdi's "Requiem." On the latter occasion, hearing of the more piano passages was rendered difficult by the continuous frôlement of bonbon-papers, and also by the frantic endeavours of a large party to identify a friend in the chorus. As when Mr. Titmarsh took Master Augustus to the pantomime and that young gentleman descried his schoolfellow Smith in the pit, so it was at Queen's Hall. The choir whispered its prayer "Lux perpetua luceat eis," but these listeners whispered, "That's her, in the third row on the left; she's the seventh from the end; no, she's the sixth; no, that's not her," &c. And this went on so incessantly that one almost wished that the fair chorister could have had a cold and been prevented from coming. We fear that such an audience gives no proof that we are, by nature, a musical nation. It is, however, distinctly encouraging to learn that Brighton can muster so good a choir as that which Mr. Sainton brought to sing the "Requiem." It showed freshness, energy, and docility, and when to these qualities it has added greater refinement and a quicker perception of the mood of the music it sings Brighton may well be proud of it. A point worthy of attention is the pronunciation of Latin. In this the choir's accomplishment was only elementary. What beautiful, moving music there is in this "Requiem!" and how odd it seems that some of our learned "critics" should always think it their duty to apologise for thinking so! We had not heard it in Queen's Hall since it was sung there by artists from the opera, in commemoration of Verdi, ten years ago, when Anselmi and Plançon were magnificently fine. Mr. Ben Davies was much the best of the soloists the other day, but we could not forget Anselmi's "Sfatuens in parte dextrâ," nor Masini's, years ago, at the Albert Hall.

The fact that our largest concert-rooms and opera-houses can be "sold out" when some particular composition, or composer, is new or fashionable is, alas! no proof that we are musical. For how quickly do we show that we have had enough of them! An enthusiastic student of orchestral music told us recently that in one year he had heard Elgar's Symphony thirty times! Well do we remember the crowds and the excitement produced by that work not long ago. Yet was it lately played by the Queen's Hall Orchestra to a modest audience whose applause was not more than moderate. It had been given twelve months' holiday, and now it looks as if its vogue were ended. We had hoped to find that the Symphony "wore" well, but were disappointed. The grandeur and nobility which have been so loudly praised are not yet apparent to us, and its undeniably first-rate workmanship is not sufficiently compensating. It is as full of virtue as a novel by Miss Charlotte Yonge, and it makes something of the same effect upon us as does (or did) the "Heir of Redclyffe." The "famous" melody, on whose majestic wings so many devotees say they have been wafted to Heaven, would fit Guy de Morville to perfection, and the slow movement breathes with the breath of Verena—or was she Vanessa? Sir Henry Wood made his first appearance at a Symphony Concert of the orchestra which he has made great. Seldom has a musical knighthood been so well bestowed, if to have done the greatest good to the greatest number of people is a criterion of desert. But no titular distinction, we make bold to believe, will give Sir Henry such a sense of reward as the sight of the audience at his Promenade Concerts!

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Can it be truthfully said that the overflowing audience which M. Pachmann brings to hear him at Queen's Hall is certain proof of England's devotion to music? Or is it the case that a large proportion of the ladies, at any rate, are attracted by him in his character as a "funny little man" rather than by a sincere delight in brilliant pianoforte-playing? We fear that there is much to be said in favour of this latter point of view. For M. Godowsky is even more marvellous as pianist than Pachmann, and there is no question at all that he is much the finer artist, yet he does not so far attract the crowd which his mirth-provoking rival can ensure. It is difficult to hear M. Pachmann without being conscious of a feeling which is almost exasperation. Here is a pianist unique in the beauty of his touch on the keys, unsurpassed in the silvery brilliance of his execution of rapid passages—a pianist who could be, if he would, an unrivalled player of Chopin, who throws away his gifts and in the course of a long recital only shows once or twice, perhaps, of what he is really capable. It must be admitted that last week his playing was, even for him, astoundingly brilliant. His runs in Liszt's "Rigoletto" were tours de force indeed. Now and then, too, he played a few bars of his Chopin with his old perfection of style, but the few bars were always succeeded by passages distorted in their sentimentalism and exaggeration. There were failures of memory, also in the adagio of the Sonata in B Minor and the Impromptu in F sharp. It was announced that M. Pachmann would play this Sonata "for the first time." But we very well remember hearing him play it long ago in the old St. James's Hall. How could we forget it? For his playing of Chopin in those days was one of the delights which leave an ineffaceable memory. The only unalloyed delight he gave us the other day was in his two Mazurkas. Here, indeed, was a lesson in rhythm and in style. This was the real Pachmann, and his playing brought at once to our mind the gallant dancers who came here with Mlle. Pavlova and their perfect movements to the tune of a mazurka.

M. Godowsky's concert was exceedingly interesting. He played Beethoven's Thirty-two Variations with such a spirit as well as a clarity that each one could have been reheard with pleasure. Then he played some of the most hackneyed of all the Brahms' pieces that everybody plays. To listen to them played with so flawless a technique, and at the same time with all the necessary insight into their meaning, was something of a rare experience. To Chopin's Barcarolle Godowsky gave sweetness and vigour truly poetical; the Polonaise in F sharp minor he played with superb fire, and though we would willingly have foregone the pleasure (?) of hearing his arrangements for left hand alone of two of Chopin's studies, we could not but listen in amaze at the man's uncanny certainty and agility. His "Sonata in E minor" was rather a collection of characteristic pieces with no very apparent link to hold them together, than a formal sonata. They were all distinctly agreeable to hear, and they gave one the impression that they were all constructed by a musician of considerable scholarship, and certainly by one who possesses and can express a fund of graceful and melodious thought. The Sonata is probably too difficult for any other pianist to play with great effect, but in its composer's hands it did not sound inhumanly impossible.

A young pianist from Australia, Mr. William Murdoch, made a very favourable impression on Thursday. He has a clear and vigorous technique; he likes good music and plays it as if it interested him deeply. It says much for a young pianist that he should choose Bach's Chromatic Fantasia, Beethoven's Sonata, Opus 101, and César Franck's Prelude, Aria and Finale for his first concert, and play them all with real intelligence and such an amount of sympathy. But we should like to point out to him that Franck's noble music gains greatly in the hands of those who do not so perpetually alter the time at places where the composer has given no directions for such alterations. He has given plenty of indications as to his wishes. Then, too, the themes when they appear in the minor parts should not be always trumpeted out to the upsetting of the balance between theme and counterpoint, and it is dangerous for a pianist to begin the Finale at such a pace that he is unable to make a sufficient contrast when the "Animato" begins with its soft, light octaves in the right hand.

Miss Marie Brema has produced two operas at the Savoy Theatre by Mr. Emmanuel Moor, operas of such poor, conventional quality that it is to be regretted she should have wasted her time and talents over them. We could only perceive one advantage to be gained from a visit to this wearisome performance. A singer whose name is new to us—Mr. Spencer Thomas—made a very successful appearance in the first opera. He has a good tenor voice, sings well, acts more than creditably, and should prove a valuable recruit for English or any other opera.

PAUL VERLAINE—I.

To grasp the true note of Verlaine's poetry we must understand his character and his life; we must follow his gradual descent through all the stages of human suffering to a grave of sorrow, and must glance at the literary influences which help to shape the form of his verse. The great model on which his literary style is based is Charles Baudelaire. Indeed we may say that Baudelaire is the literary parent of modern French poetry. His works form the bridge of transition from the fairy-land of sentiment of the "Romantiques" to the morbidly beautiful world of the modern poets. He it was who first inspired beauty with a perverse and morbid spirit, and his feverish genius discovered entirely new associations and connections between the objects mentioned in his verse. Furthermore, Baudelaire introduced symbolism into his poetry which was a mixture of mysticism and sensuality. Paul Verlaine, although his poems clearly show the influence of the morbid, paradoxical symbolism of Baudelaire, discovered an entirely new note in his verse. He climbed the mountain of the muses until he reached the misty realms of music, and his poems are like songs. Hence the strange, incomprehensible charm of some of his verses. The words produce no tangible vision in our minds, but yet are beautiful. It is to our sense of sound that they appeal. The system of the symbolists consisted in not saying what sentiments or thoughts they expressed by their images. A symbol, in the words of Lemaître, is a prolonged comparison, of which we are only given the second term, a system of successive metaphors. It will at once be seen that the use of such a system places a matchless instrument of expression in the hands of the poet; but to the ignorant their poems appear obscure. The apparent incoherence of Verlaine's verses, due to musical and symbolical influences, has laid him open to the attacks of adverse critics, who have ridiculed him in the eyes of an undiscerning public. But time has vindicated his art, and succeeding generations salute the greatness of his genius. A slur has also been cast on his poetry in the eyes of the world by the unfortunate incidents of his life, by his acute sensuality, by the difference between the beauty of his dreams and the grim realities of a life spent in the bars of Paris. But rather let us bow before the suffering that must have been his—he who dreamed such dreams of beauty and had not strength to turn from the alluring arms of vice ; who, awakening from his visions in the fog and mud of a great city, strove to drown the force of the reaction by the fumes of absinthe, or in the arms of some unworthy vendor of her charms to whose door his fevered wanderings had led him.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Paul Verlaine was born at Metz in 1844, the son of an officer of artillery who had taken part in the last of Napoleon's campaigns, and who had been reared amidst all the horrors of the Revolution. Both Captain Verlaine and his wife were undistinguished types of the French middle class—people that could be tabulated and who make a routine of their very pleasures. Yet their son was destined to be the exact antithesis of this middle-class spirit of regularity. For him life was to be a dream and his only governor his impetuous senses. All regularity was hateful to him, all order and established form fretted his impatient soul. There is surely some connection between the unsettled state of France between 1789 and 1848, the shock and bloody cataclysm of the great Revolution, and the nerve-destroying events of Napoleon's wars, and this new paradoxical spirit which first began to make itself felt about 1850: the morbid love of emptiness; the struggle against established forms; these wild dreams of realms unknown; we may say the love of the beauty of death; the birth of poets who built systems of art out of their morbid visions, and whose lives were a continual protest against the equalising tendencies of modern life.

The fruit of Verlaine's unwilling studies at the Lycée Bonaparte was the degree of "Bachelier-ès-Arts," which, together with the influence of his parents, procured for him a post in the municipal administration of Paris. This was in the year 1864. He remained a member of the Parisian Bureaucracy during seven years. This was perhaps the happiest period of his life, despite the dreariness of municipal routine. In his spare hours he escaped from the dusty files of a Government office to the salons of the Marquise de Ricard and of the delightful Nina de Callias, which were frequented by the younger poets of the age—such men as François Coppée, Léon Dierx, Anatole France, and the picturesque Villiers de L'Isle-Adam and Catulle Mendès. It was during this time that the much-discussed journal "Le Parnasse Contemporain," to which Verlaine was a constant contributor, began its brief career. During this part of his life Verlaine professed the doctrine of an "Impassible." He preached the isolation of the poet in his "tower of ivory." The world having made of poets outlaws, let the poet scorn the world. Let him not descend to the contemplation of the vulgar crowd. Let these priests of beauty take the Infinite for their temple, and let their altar be Art. Verlaine has himself expressed his doctrine in the verses :—

. . . Ce qu'il nous faut, à nous les suprêmes poètes
Que vénérous les dieux et qui n'y croyons pas
. . . A nous, qui ciselons les mots comme les coupes
Et qui faisons des vers émus très froidement
. . . C'est l'étude sans trêve
C'est l'effort inouï, le combat non pareil
C'est la nuit, l'âpre nuit de travail d'où se lève
Lentement, lentement, l'œuvre ainsi qu'un soleil

Poor Verlaine's future career is a grim commentary on these verses, inspired with all the enthusiasm of youth brilliant with unshattered illusions. The immediate fruit of these doctrines were his "Poèmes Saturniens," published in 1866. These poems, although they clearly show the influence of Baudelaire and Leconte de Lisle on the style of the young poet, are yet highly original. We notice at once the musical nature of Verlaine's genius. We quote an example :—

Les sanglots longs
Des violons
De l'automne
Blessent mon cœur
D'une langueur
Monotone.

Tout suffocant
Et blême quand
Sonne l'heure,
Je me souviens
Des jours anciens
Et je pleure, &c.

This poem is in reality a song. The association of sounds in verse to heighten effect is nothing new. Verlaine's originality consisted in having carried the process to a higher degree than had before been reached and in his use of symbols. We quote a poem in which the musical and symbolical nature of his verse is peculiarly evident :—

Le souvenir avec le crépuscule
Rougeoie et tremble à l'ardent horizon
De l'ésperance en flammes qui recule
Et s'agrandit ainsi qu'une cloison
Mystérieux où mainte floraison
—Dahlia, lys, tulipe et renoncule
S'élance autour d'un treillis et circule—
Parmi la maladive exhalaison
De parfums lourds et chauds dont le poison
—Dahlia, lys, tulipe et renoncule—
Noyant mes sens, mon âme et ma raison,
Mêle dans une immense pâmoison
Le souvenir avec le crépuscule.

Much of the beauty of the piece consists in the music of the words. He has established a new association between music and poetry. Take, for example :—

Une aube affaiblie
Verse par les champs
La mélancolie
Des soleils couchants.
La mélancolie
Berce de doux chants
Mon cœur qui s'oublie
Aux soleils couchants, &c.,

which reads like a melancholy Eastern chant. A study of Verlaine's poetry will at once reveal the fever of sensibility which breathes through them. And this is but the reflection of the fire which burnt with tenfold more power in his veins. It is seldom that poetry is more than the afterglow of emotion. When we realise this it is not hard to understand the tragedy of Verlaine's life. The series of the "Poèmes Saturniens" contains also some wonderful picture poems, morbidly-coloured pictures, and landscapes with an atmosphere of dissolution and despair. The poet has further shown a wonderful power in the choice of his images. Take, for example, the lines in which he describes the voice of the woman of his dreams :—

Et pour sa voix lointaine, et calme, et grave, elle a L'inflexion des voix chères qui se sont tues.

When we read his works with understanding, our repulsion at the story of his life is merged in a sentiment of sympathy for the sufferings of the poet, for his vain struggles to escape from the depths of depravity towards which the frailties of his temperament hastened him. Even in these, his first and so-called "impassible" poems, we see

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

the reflection of the cold hand of despair which already pressed upon his soul. We cite as an example some lines from his poem, "A une femme:"—

O je souffre, je souffre affreusement, si bien,
Que le gémissement premier du premier homme,
Chassé d'Eden n'est qu'une églogue au prix du mien!

Perhaps one of the greatest of his "Poèmes Saturniens" is his "Nocturne Parisien." It stands unrivalled as a morbidly beautiful description of the mystery and horror of the black waters of the Seine as they flow at night past the lights of Paris, remorselessly carrying their freight of ships and human corpses; while one of the most beautiful of the series is the delicate song "Il Bacio:"—

Baiser! rose trémière au jardin des caresses!
Vif accompagnement sur le clavier des dents,
Des doux refrains qu'amour chant en les cœurs ardents,
Avec sa voix d'archange aux langueurs charmeresses.

Sonore et gracieux baiser, divin baiser!
Volupté sans pareille, ivresse inénarrable.
Salut! l'homme, penché sur ta coupe adorable,
S'y grise d'un bonheur qu'il ne sait épuiser. &c.

S. A.-B.

THE HERO AS BABY

It may be stated as an irrefutable axiom that the initiatory period of a hero's life, during which he helplessly surveys a sadly circumscribed universe from cradle, mattress, or doorstep, according to the chances and conditions of his birth, is rather uninteresting to the general reader, however suggestive and even enthralling it may be to the prophetic senses of his enthusiastic biographer. So far the hero in embryo has done nothing save cry, eat and sleep, and we all can claim to have started fair in the race if such immature doings are to be put on record. Babies, in this connection, are at a disadvantage. Whatever stirring deeds or high adventures they may be intended to accomplish later on, whatever wonderful philosophies or alluring creeds it may be their destiny to spring upon an irreverent and sarcastic world, their insignificant size and the deplorable incoherence of their remarks tend to confine their importance within the comparatively narrow bounds of an admiring circle of intimates. Outside that magical limiting line stands the stranger, apathetic to the excitement of the first tooth, callous and unmoved at the first articulated word, the first undeniable association of ideas; the murmurs of ecstasy and volleys of badly-aimed kisses from inexperienced male worshippers to the worshipped affect him not at all, or, if they do, it is but to an unkind display of risibility.

The truth is, it should be sedulously concealed from the public that any given hero was ever a baby. It is so undignified to be a baby, and so terribly common; it is the one accusation he cannot possibly deny or evade if it should be brought up against him in after years. We can conceive of a planet where heroes might be thrust into life muscular and gifted and fully developed, as sprang Minerva in shining armour from the brain of Zeus, ready to tackle at once the tasks for which those who play the game in high Olympus had ordained them; where babyhood—if it could so be termed—is the heyday of existence, and the remainder of their span would be a mere passive resting on their laurels early won.

In such a sphere biographers and chroniclers could hold their magnificent inky revels undisturbed by the labour of tracking their hero's spoor to the family lair; from the very outset of his career they could depict airily his behaviour, his appearance, his predilections, his triumphs. They would escape the humiliating confession that he arrived just like any ordinary member of the community, toothless, graceless, and practically hairless, and would be spared the horror of investigating parental diaries for evidences of uncanny precocity, or the shame of composing beautiful stories about his budding intellect and his hebdomadal spankings. Not so is their duty disencumbered on this revolutionary earth of ours. Imagine them, poor scribes, confronted with the ungrateful toil of portraying the Great Man as Baby—hunting for the comfortable adjective that shall gloss over the puling and puking embryo warrior, poet, or statesman—wrestling with his howls, his mischief, his torn pinafores, his bejammed fingers, his gurgles of illegitimate delight at deeds of darkness—striving desperately to trace in the chaotic actions of this small shred of humanity the origins of subsequent fame! It is a picture of pathos unredeemed by a single ray of joy.

In support of this thesis that persons of renown should be tacitly understood ex officio to have shunned the vagaries of immaturity, it is only necessary to take a few concrete examples. Let us ask, for instance, if Carlyle, hero and biographer in one, can be thought of lucidly as a little blue-eyed, pink-and-white imp that upset the porridge, played with the coal, and made curious noises when it perceived the moon? What system of philosophy, however it might be reinforced by Teutonic stolidity, could withstand so cruel a light thrown on its exponent? Picture, again, Napoleon weeping bitterly because he was compelled to go early to bed and to leave his leaden soldiers in a frozen conflict on the table; Sir Francis Drake stamping his feet in a tantrum because his attendance at church interfered with an absorbing game of marbles; Cobden smiting his nurse with a rose-leaf fist in that she did deprive him, with malice prepense, of a large piece of sugary-cake which he had cautiously abstracted from the pantry what time the milkman claimed her temporary attention. Or, to come to modern times (but this is a delicate matter), imagine Professor Münsterberg, astute psychologist, searcher of our innermost motives, whipped ingloriously for having indulged an unrestrained passion for sweets; figure to yourself Mr. Henry James, most delightful and astonishing of novelists, pensively carrying out experiments with a tin kettle and the cat's tail; Mr. Richard le Gallienne, at the age of three, stripping a rose-tree of its precious blooms that he may crown some golden girl of two summers, and suffering the unpoetic cane for his premature gallantry . . . and so on. It were wiser not to proceed, lest our imagination be unduly stimulated, and the repute of certain heroes fall in tatters at their feet.

Hero-worship, then, should be postponed as an art until a few of the world's bruises have toughened the hero's soul. It avails us nothing that he spun a top or trundled a hoop better than others, that he smashed more windows than his fellows, or that his fame for sauciness to the master brought him the adoration of smaller and less enterprising boys. "The Great Man," said Carlyle, "as he comes from the hand of Nature, is ever the same kind of thing," and a tedious kind of thing, as a rule, is this babyhood of the great—uninspiring, charged with an immense banality.

Since, however, all heroes have been babies, though all babies (thanks be) are not likely to become heroes, it is necessary to make the best of affairs as they are. Not many men distinguish themselves before the age of twenty-one, and a law might be passed to cheer the hearts of biographers to the effect that any hero's pre-majority days shall be blacked out as is the racing news in certain libraries. Exceptions might be made in favour of boys who swept offices and became railway magnates at twenty, or of authors who wrote poetry at the age of fourteen and refrained from publishing it, for such things certainly denote special gifts. Beyond that we dare not go. Let it be clearly understood that the hero never was, never could have been by any combination of circumstances so dull, so utterly lost to any sense of fitness as to assume the shape of a baby. If such an insinuation is made, let him deny it strenuously and angrily. Let all evidence to that effect be burnt; let his preliminary scrawls be torn up relentlessly, and let the records of his toddling feet be obliterated in spite of the protestations of those who kissed and slapped him into conformity with other human beings. Let the froth of sentiment be blown from the brimming cup—in other words, let the poor fellow start fair. Why should he, more than others, have the glare of publicity turned upon his irresponsible early wayfarings—his robbing of orchards, his antipathy to washing, his exceeding delight in climbing trees and spoiling a new suit? Leave him in peace. Thus shall the labours of the busy biographer be lessened, and the faces of the scribes blush once more with the glow of health; and in their literary dens we may think of their joys as they exclaim, "Thank heaven—this man was never a baby!"

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

WILFRID L. RANDELL.

INDIA: A SERIES

III.—DECENTRALISATION OF THE FINANCES—1869-1876.

MAYO

WHEN the Earl of Mayo arrived in India as Viceroy in January, 1869, the Amir of Afghanistan, Sher Ali, had just defeated, finally, his brother Azim and secured his throne. He thereupon renewed his application for an interview with the Viceroy. This took place at Ambala on March 27th, 1869. Lord Mayo's personal presence and bearing, and his splendid reception, gained a complete ascendancy over Sher Ali, who was informed that "while the British Government had no desire to interfere in the internal affairs of Kabul, yet it would view with severe displeasure any attempt on the part of the Amir's rivals to disturb his position and rekindle civil war." Besides this moral support he was promised assistance in money, arms, and ammunition at the discretion of the British Government, and he took back to Kabul six lakhs of rupees and two batteries of artillery as presents. Lord Mayo also managed to have an agreement made with Russia that the integrity of Afghanistan should be respected, and that the boundary of Sher Ali's dominions should be recognised. His influence with Sher Ali was maintained unimpaired. Lord Mayo also laboured to establish friendly and well-governed States on the Indian frontiers. When stronger measures were required he despatched an expedition in 1871-72 to punish the Lushai tribes for their raids on the North-Eastern frontier. By his personal relations with the native Princes he gained their respect and affection, and improved their administration of their States, while he obtained the establishment of Colleges for the education of the young Chiefs.

But it was to the internal administration of India that Lord Mayo, like his predecessors, was required to devote most attention. In the three previous years there were deficits amounting to six millions sterling. In his first year he secured practical equilibrium, and had a surplus aggregating four millions in his last two years. These results were not achieved without the closest examination of income and expenditure. He reduced the expenditure on Public Works and the grants to spending Departments, introduced an income-tax and raised its rate, and stopped the policy of paying for deficits by borrowing for ordinary expenditure. He insisted on close scrutiny and rigid economy. The system of financial administration was thoroughly examined and rectified; punctuality and accuracy were required in the submission of Estimates; statistical information was improved and systematised. By a Government resolution of December, 1870, called the Charter of the Provincial Governments, the finances were largely decentralised. A fixed yearly consolidated grant for five years was made to each Government, to enable it to defray the cost of its principal services, exclusive of the Army, but including Public Works. A certain income capable of expansion by good administration was assigned in each case, and, subject to some general conditions, the manner in which that income might be expended on the various branches of the public service was left to the Provincial Governments to determine; the latter were thus made responsible for the management of their own local finances. The services made over to them included the protection of person and property, education, registration, medical, printing, roads, civil buildings and various public works, miscellaneous public improvements and other services of many sorts. Briefly, the finances were divided into Imperial and Provincial, with immense advantage to the country; the system thus inaugurated has since been wisely extended.

At the same time the development of the country was not overlooked. An Agricultural Department was created; a foundation was laid for the reform of the salt duties; the Public Works Department was reorganised on principles of economy and efficiency; besides the usual extension of roads, railways, and canals a system of State railways was launched. The first census was taken under Lord Mayo's orders. The Legislative Department under Sir James F. Stephen was fully employed, passing eighty-seven Acts, some of great importance in the three years, 1869-70-71. It fell to Lord Mayo to entertain the first member of the Royal Family to visit India, the Duke of Edinburgh, in 1869-70. It was the irony of fate that the most popular of Viceroys should perish by the hand of an assassin at the Andamans on February 8th, 1872.

DELIBERATE POLICY OF RESTFULNESS

NORTHBROOK

After the temporary interregnum of Lord Napier of Merchistoun, during which some important legal projects were passed into law, Lord Northbrook entered on the Viceroyalty in May, 1872, no stranger to Indian affairs. He had drafted for Sir Charles Wood the great education despatch of 1854. His first words on assuming office referred to business, and this was the keynote of his Administration. He regarded the late taxation, progress, and legislation pushed too fast as the causes of an uneasy and dissatisfied feeling in the country. Averse to the increase of local taxation, he vetoed a Bengal Municipal Bill which authorised it, and he abolished the Income-tax as unsuitable to Indian conditions. Regarding India as a poor country, and economy in expenditure as essential, he checked costly schemes of irrigation and military works. His general principle was to adapt expenditure to income; he endeavoured to keep down the assessment of land revenue, and to consider the effect of British rule on the social habits and religious beliefs of the people. He approved of the policy of as much free trade as possible for India. He declined to remit the import duty of 5 per cent. levied on Manchester piece-goods, as he required the money for revenue purposes. By the Indian Tariff Act of 1875 the general rate of import duties was reduced, and most of the export duties were abolished, as that levied on Indian wheat had been. He obtained for British management the extensive salt sources in Rajputana, and abolished 800 miles of the Inland Customs Line. When the monsoon rains of 1873 failed in Bengal and Bihar, and the rice crop withered, famine was imminent had not the Government, mindful of the Orissa disaster of 1866, intervened. The famine-relief administration, supervised by Lord Northbrook, and carried out by Sir Richard Temple, was so effective that hardly any deaths from starvation occurred, though, from want of experience, the cost was great. This assumption by the State of the duty to save life was new and important.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Foreign affairs necessarily occupied the Viceroy's attention. In 1873 the Amir of Afghanistan, alarmed by Russia's absorption of Khiva, asked him for a closer alliance, but Lord Northbrook was not allowed by the Liberal Cabinet to promise more than Lord Mayo had promised. When the Conservative Government proposed the placing of British Agents in Afghanistan, Lord Northbrook, a follower of Lord Lawrence, opposed the suggestion. When the Gaekwar of Baroda in 1874 attempted to poison the Resident, Lord Northbrook appointed a Commission to investigate the charges judicially, with the result that the three English members of the Court decided on all the charges against the Gaekwar, and the three native members in his favour. The home Cabinet decided to depose the Gaekwar on the grounds of his misconduct, misgovernment, and incapacity, and a new Gaekwar (still ruling) was installed. This fact showed India that the policy of non-annexation was observed in practice. In the controversies which arose about the frontier policy and the cotton duties Lord Northbrook differed greatly from the Secretary of State, and resented the increasing control from England. He therefore resigned in September, 1875, and retired in April, 1876, after he had entertained the Prince of Wales on his visit to India in December, 1875, to March, 1876, a visit which elicited an outburst of loyalty to the Crown. Lord Northbrook aimed constantly at gathering the feelings of the natives, and at governing in sympathy with native public opinion when he could obtain it; he desired to govern not for our own profit and advantage but for the benefit of the people of India. He gained their confidence and attachment to a remarkable degree.

CHARLES DILKE

AD MEMORIAM

By Frank Harris

A personable man of five feet nine or ten, strongly built, always in hard condition; the figure and quick, energetic walk of an athlete. A long head, a well-balanced face, with excellent, shapely, straight nose and good forehead; the grey eyes are only clear, however—fair mirrors merely, not founts of light—set close together, too, suggesting over-great prudence, or even suspicion—a virtue only in the weak; the mouth and chin seem heavy under the thick, greying moustache and beard.

The voice is noticeably clear, apt to be monotonous and sharp, barking out "Yes, yes!" in sign of agreement and "No, no!" in dissent; the voice of a man of action, of opinion, and not of persuasion, much less of charm.

The manner is like the voice (all this man is of a piece), quick, abrupt, frank, honest, at times courteous or even kind—rarely winning, never inspiring.

A man who might be the head of a great business (by inheritance, and not of his founding), and successful by dint of prudence, honesty and fairness; a man of great energy, method, and care; an admirable lieutenant who might be loyal to genius or power.

I met Dilke first in the summer of 1883, when he was President of the Local Government Board, and had several talks with him. I had heard him called a Republican and spoken of as a militant anarchist would be spoken of to-day. I found him a man keenly alive to all distinctions and dignities, an epicurean and not a stoic. There was nothing violent in him, nothing doctrinaire; he struck one as a cultured man of the world, with an extraordinary fund of special information on many subjects. He was more interesting to me than almost any other English politician, for he had touched life at more points than most Englishmen. He knew all our Colonies intimately, and he spoke French like a Frenchman. He could look at England and English politics in a detached way—from the outside, so to speak. And yet, at the same time, no one knew English life and English prejudices much better than he did. Take him on his own subjects, he was extremely instructive. No one got up facts more carefully, or loved them more passionately; no one had the details of foreign politics more at his fingers' ends than Dilke. He was always a House of Commons authority on half a dozen subjects. He appalled you with his knowledge of the Factory Acts, and when you spoke to him about the Army or Navy he had all the details of the subject ready. He could tell you, besides, what Admiral Hornby had thought of this project, or what Admiral Fisher said about that.

Of course one soon found that his extraordinary command of details and knowledge of isolated facts was accompanied by a peculiar impatience of general ideas. No generalisation, however brilliant, appealed to him; his mind was fact-ridden; he never saw the forest for the trees.

A peculiar instance of a cognate characteristic occurs to me. He once spoke with admiration of an American he had met, I think in San Francisco. The American told him he would be coming to England in a year. Dilke invited him to lunch, and gave him a day fourteen months later, assuring him he would give him a distinctively English lunch, begging him at the same time to be punctual.

"If you will give me an hour I'll be on hand," replied the American. Dilke gave one o'clock. As the clock struck one on the day in question fourteen months afterwards Dilke walked downstairs to the dining-room, which was on the ground-floor of his house, just as the American walked in.

At Dilke's table one met all the distinguished people of the day, particularly all the distinguished Colonials and Americans. I first met Cecil Rhodes there in 1887, and Harold Frederic, Alfred Deakin, too, M. Jusserand, and a host of others. It was through his introduction that I came to know MM. Renan, Ferry, Freycinet, Rochefort, and other Frenchmen of note. Dilke was a political leader of the first class, and his house was a social centre where one met more men of real importance in letters and politics than in any other house in London.

Then in 1885 came the scandal, and the attack upon him by the Nonconformists, the ordeal, when he was tried, so to speak, as by fire. I was at the time editor of the Conservative Evening News. Of course, the great whispering-gallery of London society had echoed and re-echoed with the case before it came into court. All the tit-bits had been whispered about before the public trial.

Nearly everybody in society and nearly everybody in Parliament whom one spoke to about it treated it lightly, as men of the world treat such things, but graver whispers went about, and the cloud became threatening. All the Liberal papers handled the matter very seriously. They hoped Dilke would be cleared. The Conservative papers followed suit; it was not their cue to prevent an important Radical leader from being worried to death by the pack he was leading.

I happened to be particularly interested in two threads of policy which Dilke to some extent represented. I believed in a large Imperialism and a closer union with our Colonies. Dilke knew the Colonies, and knew too all the men who guide Colonial opinion. He was the inventor of the phrase "Greater Britain." A vast confederation of English States was to him possible, if not a passionate ideal. He had a great liking for France too. The French Army, he said, had improved wonderfully, and was quite as strong as the German Army. He held that France was much more peaceably inclined than Germany, much less likely to become our trade rival. Consequently he was in favour of a close alliance with France as against Germany. For this reason, even in 1885, I regarded him as the most valuable of English politicians with the single exception of Lord Randolph Churchill, who, without any of his advantages of knowledge, was a personality of finer mind and stronger character.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Accordingly I defended Dilke in the Evening News, and declared that, whatever the outcome of the trial might be, he was too greatly needed by England to be sacrificed to our provincial narrow-mindedness and puritanical hypocrisy.

He wrote to me thanking me for my way of treating the case, and during the trial called me to counsel. He wanted to know whether he should go into the box and deny on oath the accusation brought against him or not. Mr. Chamberlain, he said, had advised him, as he was not a party to the suit, not to go into the box. At that time the strongest Liberal paper and the most powerful assailant of Dilke, the most powerful upholder, too, of the conventional puritanism of the time, was the Pall Mall Gazette. Mr. Stead, the editor, was continually saying that Dilke must go into the box and stand a cross-examination and deny the vile charge. Under the circumstances I thought he should go into the box, but, for reasons which I cannot give here, Dilke decided not to go into the box, and the "unco' guid" raved against him to their heart's content.

The case threw a strong light on Dilke's manhood; he had begun the fight badly, I thought. As soon as the scandal was on foot, he had written to the Chairman of the Chelsea Liberal Association denying the charges, and adding that "if the Liberal interests should be in any degree compromised by one who rests, however undeservedly, under so grave an imputation," he would be prepared "to retire from public life until this accusation should be disproved."

He himself took the charge ultra-seriously from the beginning, and when the trial went against him, for Mrs. Crawford got her divorce, and when later the Queen's Proctor's intervention was dismissed, he was forced to retire, or logically to eat his own words. Shortly afterwards he was beaten at Chelsea, and was out of Parliament till 1892, when he was elected to the Forest of Dean division. It was always understood, however, that he would never again be in a Liberal Government, much less in a Liberal Cabinet. The ha'penny papers are thus perhaps justified in speaking of him as "a brilliant statesman whose career was ruined by a divorce case."

But was his career ruined by the divorce case, or by his own want of pluck? It is a very difficult question, and could not be decided without such a discussion as would be impossible in public. Those of us who admired Dilke most and knew him best realised that in the trial he had shown fatal hesitancy and weakness. It was just the same weakness which in 1880 led him to refuse a seat in the Government unless or until Mr. Chamberlain had a seat in the Cabinet. At that time nine out of ten men regarded Sir Charles Dilke as the abler man, and it astonished every one that he should press Mr. Chamberlain's claims on Mr. Gladstone as superior to his own. Every one can see now that Dilke, though infinitely better informed and better equipped than Mr. Chamberlain, could never be compared to the Member for Birmingham in force of character or dominant self-assertion. But it is very rare indeed for any politician to insist that his colleague and rival should be preferred before him. However we read it, such self-abnegation is a sign, I think, of high mental and moral qualities, and a sign, too, of a certain weakness as a fighting man.

Again and again when thinking of Dilke he appears to me a representative English mind; he was English in his knowledge of details and love of facts, English in his indifference to general truths, English in his impatience of all theoretical questions, English in his admiration of all practical things, English above all in his impartial fairness of nature. This was really his highest gift.

For years I lunched with him once every week in order to hear what he thought of this or that politician, and particularly what he thought of the younger men. There was no judge in Parliament to be compared with him for knowledge and fairness combined, except the late Duke of Devonshire, another peculiarly English character. If Dilke missed any Parliamentary force, it was in spite of himself, a defect of insight and not of prejudice. He was naturally apt to underrate the man of genius, who was ill-informed and imperfectly educated, or very careless of facts; Charles James Fox would have puzzled him or escaped him as Lord Randolph Churchill did at first. He could hardly believe that a man so ignorant as Lord Randolph could win through by sheer genius. But as soon as Lord Randolph Churchill demonstrated his power by leading the House of Commons in the Bradlaugh business Dilke threw off his critical spirit, and spoke with admiration and wonder of his surpassing ability.

People talk of Dilke's career as having been ruined, but that is only a form of words. He remained to the very end one of the leaders of the House of Commons, one of the members who was always listened to with most respectful interest, though he was often dull. He was by no means a brilliant speaker, but he had always something to say, and he had always interesting facts at command. Moreover, he was an old Parliamentary hand, with a really quick and impartial eye for ability in opponents as in friends, and he had an intimate acquaintance with all the great forces and great minds in politics for the last thirty or forty years.

Fortunately for himself, when the crash came and the sentence went against him he was not wholly unprepared. Though first and foremost and always a politician, he touched life at many points, and had many engaging interests. From the University onward he always practised fencing and rowing. He had travelled in every part of the world as a young man, and to the end he kept his interest in travel and sport of all sorts; in books, too, and in men. True, he never cared for poetry or poets. He was not at home with saints, or heroes, or singers, but he was always an exceedingly pleasant companion, a very kindly, though somewhat selfish, man of the world in the best sense of that much-misused phrase.

Was it my fault or was it his that we never spoke of any other world? It may have been mine. Dilke's nature kept me in all discussions with him to such subjects as are within the ken of practical politicians. But I dare say that one who had no interest in politics and small concern for any belief that can be established by facts might have touched a side in Dilke which I never touched. I say this in my endeavour to be fair to him, for I remember how astonished I was once when I sent him a book, The Story of an African Farm. He declared to me that it was the greatest novel he had ever read—greater than Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress. This made me aware of a soul-side in Dilke which I had never explored. We know so little of those we call our friends; we are often like marbles touching each other at only one of a myriad points.

I should not be doing justice to Dilke if I did not say that I owed him hundreds of pleasant hours of intellectual and cordial companionship. If he was not apt to lift life to a higher standpoint, he certainly never debased the moral currency of his time. He was always one of the leaders of English life and opinion in the best sense, and the world will be greyer to many of us since he has gone out of our lives.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

THE DAY BEFORE YESTERDAY

III.—THE MAGIC POOL

Being born in a sceptical age, heirs of a world that certainly took its Darwin too seriously, we children did not readily enlarge the circle of our supernatural acquaintances. There was the old witch who lived in the two-storied house beyond the hill, in whom less discriminate eyes recognised only the very respectable widow of an officer in the India Army. There was the ghost of the murdered shepherd-lad that haunted the ruined hut high up on the windy downs; on gusty nights we heard him piping shrilly to his phantom flocks, and sometimes their little bells seemed to greet us from the chorus of the storm. There was a little drowned kitten who mewed to us from the shadows of the rain-water cistern, and a small boy who cried about the garden in the autumn because he could not find his ball among the dead leaves. We had all heard the three last, and most of us had seen them at twilight-time, when ghosts pluck up their poor thin courage and take their walks abroad. As for the witch, we relied on our intuitions and gave her house a wide berth.

The credentials of these four unquiet spirits having been examined and found satisfactory, schoolroom opinion was against any addition to their number. We would not accept my younger brother's murderer carrying a sack or my little sister's procession of spectral tortoises, though we acknowledged that there was merit in them, regarded merely as artistic conceptions. Perhaps, subconsciously, we realised that to make the supernatural commonplace is also to make it ineffective, and that there is no dignity in a life jostled by spooks. At all events, we relied for our periodical panics on those which had received the official sanction, and on the terrifying monsters our imaginations had drawn from real life—burglars, lunatics, and drunken men.

It was therefore noteworthy that as soon as we discovered the pool in Hayward's Wood we were all agreed that it was no ordinary sheet of water, but one of those enchanted pools which draw their waters from magic sources and are capable of throwing spells over mortals who approach them unwarily. And yet, though we felt instinctively that there was something queer about it, the pool in itself was not unattractive. Held, as it were, in a cup in the heart of the wood, it still contrived to win its share of sunshine through the branches above. On its surface the water-boatmen were ferrying cheerfully to and fro, while overhead the dragon-flies drove their gaudy monoplanes in ceaseless competition. All about the woods were gay with wild garlic and the little purple gloves that Nature provides for foxes, and through a natural alley we could see a golden meadow, where cups of cool butter were spread with lavish generosity to quench the parched tongues of bees. The mud that squelched under our feet as we stood on the brink seemed to be good, honest mud, and gave our boots the proper holiday finish. Nevertheless we stared silently at the waters, half expecting to see them thicken and part in brown foam, to allow some red-mouthed prehistoric monster to rise oozily from his resting-place in the mud—some such mammoth as we had seen carved in stone on the borders of the lake at the Crystal Palace. But no monster appeared; only a rabbit sprang up suddenly on the far side of the pool, and, seeing we had no gun and no dog, limped off in a leisurely manner to the warren.

After a while we grew weary of our doubts, and, tacitly agreeing to pretend that it was only an ordinary pond, fell to paddling in the shallows with a good heart. The mud slid warmly through our toes, and the water lay round our calves like a tight string, but we were not changed, as we had half anticipated, into tadpoles or water-lilies. It was apparent that the magic was of a subtler kind than this, and we splashed about cheerfully until the inevitable happened and one of us went in up to his waist. Then we sat on the bank nursing our wet feet, and laughing at the victim as he ruefully wrung out his clothes. We were all of a nautical turn of mind, and we agreed that the pond would serve very well for minor naval engagements, though it was too sheltered to provide enough wind for sailing-ships. Still here we should at all events be secure from such a disaster as had recently overtaken my troopship Dauntless, which was cruising in calm weather on Pickhurst Pond when all of a sudden "a land-breeze shook the shrouds and she was overset," and four-and-twenty good soldiers sank to the bottom like lead, which they were. Regarded merely as an attractive piece of water, the pool could not fail to be of service in our adventurous lives.

But all the time we felt in our hearts that it was something more, though we would have found it hard to give reasons for our conviction, for the pool seemed very well able to keep the secret of its enchantment. We did not even know whether it was the instrument of black magic or of white, whether its influence on human beings was amiable or malevolent. We only knew that it was under a spell, that beneath its reticent surface, that showed nothing more than the reflection of our own inquiring faces, lay hid some part of that especial magic that makes the dreams of young people as real as life, and contradicts the unlovely generalisations of disillusioned adults. All that was necessary was to find the key that would unlock the golden gates.

The brother who was nearest to me in terms of years found it two days later, and came to me breathlessly with the news. He had been reading a book of fairy-stories, and had come upon the description of just such a magic pool as ours, even to the rabbit—who was, it seemed, a kind of advance-agent to the spirit of the pool. The rules were very clear. All you had to do was to go to the pool at midnight and wish aloud, and your wish would be granted. If you were greedy enough to wish more than once you would be changed into a goldfish. My brother thought it would be rather jolly to be a goldfish, and so for a while did I; but on reflection we decided that if the one wish were carefully expended it might be more amusing to remain a boy.

It says something for our spirit of adventure that we did not even discuss the advisability of undertaking this lawless expedition. We were more engaged in rejoicing in anticipation over the discomfiture of our elder brothers and settling the difficult problem of what we should wish. My brother was all for seven-league boots and invisible caps and other conjuring tricks of a faëry character; I had set my heart on money, more sovereigns than we could carry, and I finally brought my brother round to my point of view. After all he could always buy the other things if he had enough money. It was agreed that he should wind up his birthday watch and that we should only pretend to go to bed, as we should have to start at half-past eleven. When planned by daylight the whole thing seemed absurdly easy.

We had no difficulty in getting out of the house when the time came, simply because this was not the sort of thing that the grown-up people expected us to do, but we found the world strangely altered. The familiar lanes had become rivers of changing shadows, the hedgerows were ambuscades of robbers, the tall trees were affronted giants. Fortunately we were on very good terms with the moon at the time, so when she made her periodical appearances from behind the scudding clouds she came as a friend. Nevertheless, when my hand accidentally touched my brother's in the dark it stayed there, and we were glad to walk along hand in hand, a situation which we would have thought deplorable for two fellows of our years by day. It seemed to me that my brother was breathing shortly and noisily as if he were excited, but presently the surprising thought came to me that it might be my own breathing that I heard. As we drew near to Hayward's Wood the moon retired behind a cloud, and stayed there. This was hardly friendly of her, for the wood was terribly dark, and the noise of our own stumblings made us pause in alarm again and again. When we stood still and listened, all the trees seemed to be saying "Hush!"

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Somehow we reached the pool at last, and stayed our steps on the bank expectantly. At first we could see nothing but shadows, but, after a while, we discovered that it was full of drowned stars, a little pale as though the water had extinguished some of their fire. And then, as we wondered at this, the moon shone through the branches overhead, and lit the wood with a cool and mysterious radiance that reminded me oddly of the transformation scene in our last pantomime. My brother pulled his watch out of his pocket, but his hand shook so that he could hardly tell the time. "Five minutes more," he whispered hoarsely. I tried to answer him, and found that I could not speak.

And then, as we waited breathlessly, we heard a noise among the undergrowth on the other side of the pool—a noise, it seemed, of footsteps, that grew louder and louder in our excited ears, till it was as if all the armies of the world were tramping through the wood. And then . . . and then . . .

When we stopped to get our breath half-way home we first discovered that neither of us had had presence of mind enough to wish. But we knew that there was no going back. We had had our chance, and missed it. But, even now, I do not doubt that it was a magic pool.

RICHARD MIDDLETON.

THE LANDSCAPE EXHIBITION AT THE LEICESTER GALLERIES

WHATEVER may be said of other forms of English art, there can be little doubt of its vitality so far as concerns landscape. After the puzzledom and madness of some recent Exhibitions, of the never-ending array of pictures that will not explain themselves until after severe brain-cudgelling, and then in a strained and uncertain fashion, the relief of turning to these humble-minded appeals to Nature by men who reverence her is indescribable. "Nature never did betray the heart that loved her," though she can play strange tricks, as we have seen, with those who try to lower her to their own ridiculous level; but to those who approach her in a right spirit she is the kindly nurse who withholds from her children no good thing. And so it is in this particularly choice little Exhibition. There is no trickiness, no eccentricity, none of the intolerable conceit which ruins so much modern work. The artists have approached their task with the simplicity of little children, eager only to learn and to interpret, and they have reaped a rich reward. "Art may be still away there in the mountain summit," as the motto of the Catalogue, quoted from Stevenson, observes, but the men who have contributed to this Exhibition have climbed perceptibly further up the slope than most of their compeers and contemporaries.

Mr. Robert W. Allan sends eight delightful pictures—faithful studies of Nature in many moods. He is particularly successful with wet sands and posts left by receding tides. But his outlook is many-sided, and he paints the sea in many moods, rippling gently in the sands or tossing heavily in mid-ocean. Inland he presents us with green lanes and Scotch moorlands, and as a taste of the clear atmosphere of the South he gives us a vivid sketch of the Acropolis of Athens. Mr. J. S. Hill, though a less accomplished artist, is not less conscientious, and his pictures, though unequal, are not lacking sometimes in grim power, as in his lurid study of the Thames at Charing Cross—a fine piece of work, at which men of a future generation, when our skies are cleansed of smoke and such abortions as the Charing Cross railway bridge have vanished from amongst us, may well marvel as a weird record of an evil past. Mr. Hill has a real gift of bold sketching, too, such as in his studies of Wareham and Rempstone Heath, Dorset, while another charming piece of work, full of light and air and the space that associates with "the next parish to Newfoundland," is the breezy view near Lelant, in Cornwall. Mr. James Patterson is master of a broad and vigorous style, which is at its best when it is most sketchy or frankly aims at merely producing a sketch—as in his delightful pictures of Caudebec and the Seine; while there is real pathos, though almost coarsely expressed, in "The Last of the Indomitable"—the breaking up of an old "wooden wall" in some foreign shipbreaker's yard, beneath a red glare that well expresses the temper of the nation which permits such a fate to its inanimate heroes.

Mr. Coutts Michie revels in autumn colours and evening lights, and wild moorland with a background of sea, and his pictures leave a more pleasant impression. The bowed figure in the foreground of the group of autumnal poplars gives a touch of poignant pathos to his first picture—the pathos which is inseparable from the dying year. The same may be said of Mr. Leslie Thomson's varied studies, which include silver seas and spreading sands, a fine view of the Bass Rock against a clear wet sky, and some glorious sands and distant hills with a touch of bold foreground make up the view which he calls "Holyhead Mountain." Of Mr. Moffatt Lindner's work we carry away the most pleasing memory. He is a lover of dim twilight and evening colours and moonlit waters, and in these he rings the changes with real mastery and the ease—or apparent ease—which comes of understanding. St. Ives is his favourite sketching-ground, and a man might go much further and fare much worse. His sunset at Amsterdam is a daring piece of fiery colour, which none but a master could have handled without crudity. Mr. J. Aumonier wanders among quiet English countrysides, and his understanding of them is keen and thorough. The quieter and less startling they are the more he seems to love and appreciate them and the more perfectly he expresses their rich, if homely beauty. In one large canvas only does he break out into more ambitious effort, and his "Dulas Valley—Autumn" is a fine rendering of a peaceful valley transfigured in a golden flood of sunset glory—simply and broadly executed, but full of feeling. Eight pictures by Mr. T. Austen Brown wind up the collection—he is a more vivid colourist than his companions, but seldom to the point of crudity, and his work is rougher than that of the others—indeed, it is almost too rough at times and too sketchy. But in such company he is judged by lofty standards; among a lesser galaxy of stars he would shine more brilliantly. He is in any case not unworthy of the company in which he finds himself.

THE LONDON INSTITUTION

AN unusually large audience assembled in the theatre of the London Institution on Monday last to hear Mr. Robert W. Brewer, F.R.S.E., A.M.I.C.E., on the subject of "The Art of Aviation." In order that the more practical portion of his address should be thoroughly understood the lecturer first sketched the theory of human flight, and remarked that from the earliest days it had been man's ambition to emulate the motion of the bird; any thought of flapping wings, however, had been gradually eliminated from the schemes of inventors. The wings of a bird form both aeroplane and propeller, and many interesting slides of birds in flight were shown to illustrate this point.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Practically as much of the science—as distinguished from the art—of aviation was known in the year 1842, when Henson experimented, as is known now; Henson, however, was unable to make any progress because of the lack of suitable engine-power, and only the remarkably rapid development of the internal-combustion engine in recent years had enabled our present results to be achieved. The lecturer explained lucidly, with the aid of models, the action of the air on the planes of a flying-machine, and alluded to the all-important question of balance with regard to the varying air-currents; it was a difficult matter, he said, for the aviator to reason out the direction of these currents, supposing him to attempt a landing in a country of a configuration different from that of his starting-point, and with possibly a different wind prevailing at the moment of his descent.

The enormous advances made in aviation during the last few years found their only parallel in the development of wireless telegraphy; many valuable lives had been needlessly sacrificed, although every scientific triumph seemed to involve this sad element. In his opinion a very much more perfect machine than the present type of aeroplane would shortly be produced, but in England, at any rate, the art of flight would not for a very long time be more than a sport, owing partly to our treacherous weather. Many pictures of aeroplanes and aviators were shown on the screen.

On Monday, February 6th, Dr. A. C. Haddon, M.A., Sc.D., F.R.S., will lecture on "The Art of Palæolithic Man."

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

THE public is decidedly not in a gambling mood. It seems more inclined to subscribe for new issues. Indeed, it has oversubscribed in one or two instances. But it shows discrimination. Such a mood cannot last. Sooner or later it must revert to its normal and asinine condition. The sooner the better, hopes the Stock Exchange. The House does not like new companies; it considers that every thousand pounds subscribed is so much the less for the members. You see there are a thousand members for a dozen promoters. The Shell people bought out their Lake of Soda, more valuable than gold, and placed in the heart of Africa. The thought of these millionaires—Reyersbach is on the board—offering Tom, Dick, and Harry a participation for simple sovereigns is very beautiful. I have made a study of millionaires. They are a curious race, of varied physical appearance, but unvarying mental type. They never give away anything. Therefore when they offered me one pound shares in the Magadi Company, I came to the conclusion that the venture must be very speculative indeed. Otherwise the Samuels, and the happy group of multi-millionaires who control Central Mining would have kept Magadi Soda in the family.

The BANK RATE went down, and should fall again soon, for we are now approaching a period when money returns to London. But Egypt hangs on to her gold in a most unusual manner, and it would seem that she has not sold all her cotton. The crop is very large, and the price very high. Speculators have been financed up to the hilt, and though the position is not dangerous, it is hardly secure. Seven and a quarter million cantars at twenty dollars will eat up a great deal of money. But the Argentine crop is not asking for more money than usual, and it is now said that Indian demands will be but little over the normal. There is no speculation in copper, very little in stocks and shares, none in American cotton. There is a corner in tin, but otherwise the world is merely jogging along at the usual trade pace. Therefore, whether the Banks like it or not, they must reduce their rates.

CONSOLS were evidently purchased by the optimists, or why should the contango be so high? If all the banks sold out a few weeks ago, and are obtaining $4\frac{1}{4}$ from the bulls, they are doing well. But I think it will be found that there is not the large bull account the newspapers imagine. Thinking thus, I advise a purchase.

FOREIGNERS remain dull. Even the enterprising Jap is not supporting his market, and, with the brilliant exception of Chilians, the rest of the Foreign Market is flat and uninteresting. There has been some heavy selling of Tintos, but the bears appear inclined to buy back on a vague rumour that the Supreme Court will decide in favour of Trusts, and thus permit the Morgan people to form the great Copper Trust. It is not safe to go short of Tintos at the moment. But I see nothing to go for in the Foreign Market. Paris may move up Russians if her settlement goes off happily.

HOME RAILS are steadily losing interest. The public does not gamble in Home Rails, for the dealers make this impossible by charging prohibitive rates. The only stocks that are bought and sold as a speculation are such low-priced stocks as Little Chats, Dover A, Hull and Barnsley, Great Easterns, and Great Northern Deferred. The bulls here are somewhat tired, and I expect may soon be shaken out by dealers. The investor who pays for his stock has still some admirable bargains at his disposal. He can buy Great Western, London and North Western, North Eastern, and Lancashire and Yorkshire to pay him almost 5 per cent. He should take this chance, for all these stocks must rise as money becomes cheaper. I still think the Scotch stocks remarkably cheap.

YANKEES are in a curious mood. The speculation in Wall Street is jumpy. No one dares to go short for more than a few days—one might almost say hours. The great banking houses are determined to support all their favourite shares. It is true that Steels appear weak because the figures are not good, but it would be dangerous to sell, for there are many contracts ready to be given out and Morgans can if they choose almost immediately put quite a different complexion upon that curious item "unfilled orders." The story goes that Norfolk and Western will increase their dividend; but there are many bulls in this market and a purchase appears dangerous. There has been some buying of Rocks, which are said to have reduced working expenses and increased their traffics. Rocks are a favourite gamble, and must be put up sooner or later to enable those who took over the Pearson shares to unload. Some have been sold, but not all. As far as I can see, the moment is not ripe for a rise here. It requires a good speculative tone to allow a pool to unload Rocks. The new banking scheme of Senator Aldrich appears to an English mind very cumbersome. The proposal to tax notes if issued in quantities exceeding the present issues seems inviting a panic when money is tight. The tax of 6 per cent. is also far too high. There are two things that not even Senator Aldrich can legislate away—the immense distances between the towns, and the huge foreign populations prone to panic. The present currency system of the United States is quite childish. Every American desires its destruction. But though Central Banks are a necessity in Europe, they might well become a great danger in the United States. In my humble opinion, all that is required is freedom. Abolish all banking laws, call in all notes, and then permit any one to issue notes against gold, and above all permit branch banks. Panics cannot be avoided in a comparatively new country like the States. They could be minimised if the small banks were driven out of existence by the competition of the great banks. Senator Aldrich has propounded a really great scheme, but it is far too complicated, and the moment it was known that the banks were paying a tax on notes their poverty would be advertised all over the States and a panic would ensue.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Rubbers are quite cheerful. The sales went off very well, and better prices ruled. The bulls of rubber seem quite sure that the Brazilian Government, having valorised coffee, will proceed to valorise rubber. This way madness lies. Look at the figures of the Coffee Ring; not one-tenth of the stock was sold last year. Nine-tenths are being carried. It is true that coffee has doubled in price, but that is not much use if no one desires it. The Rubber Market is not in such a good position for a valorisation scheme as coffee, and any attempt to corner fine, hard, cured Para, although it might bring about a second rubber boom, would only end in failure. However, rubber has risen in price, and the shares in the Rubber Market have also gone up. This I suggested might happen, but I based my views upon the state of the market, not upon wild-cat cornering schemes. The shares were low, liquidation had come to an end, and a reaction was plainly in sight. But I can see no boom ahead. If prices rise much higher cautious people should get out. They will be able to get in again later on.

Oils have been bought by those who desire to bring about a state of affairs that will enable them to market their stocks. The Maikop people are ready to pump as soon as the pipe-line can take their oil. The opening of the line will of course create some talk, but it will probably pay holders of Maikop shares to sell upon the rise. The Russian Government is the most paternal Government with which I am acquainted. It lends money to necessitous traders and owners of oil-wells, it buys their oil and it nurses the industry. But it does not pay more than the market price for mazout. This is low to-day, and it will not rise because the Maikop field puts a few million poods upon an already overstocked market. The kerosine trade in Russia is bad. The export trade at present prices is impossible. Therefore again I say sell your Maikop shares if a rise is engineered. And if you must buy oil shares, put your money into California, where the oil is high in price and where the Standard Oil seems to have been taught a severe lesson.

Waihis were once as high as $10\frac{1}{8}$. They fell away to $4\frac{3}{4}$ not so very long ago; then they reacted to $5\frac{1}{4}$, and now they are $3\frac{1}{2}$. In the meantime all sorts of stories have been going round. The officials pretend to be optimistic, but I expect that some large holders have been getting out whilst they have been booming the shares. I expect, also, that we have not heard the end of this business. It does not look nice. I am surprised at my extreme moderation. Let us suppose that there still remains a million tons of ore in the mine; that it can be got out to pay 28s. a ton. This gives us £1,400,000 profit on a capital of £500,000, or nearly 300 per cent. So that those who buy to-day at $3\frac{1}{2}$ may lose about 12s. of their capital if no new lodes are discovered. But we are told of a lode at the 1,000ft. level worth 63s. a ton. In face of this announcement the shares fell as hard as they could. I await the future with amusement tinged with disgust. My experience of New Zealand mining does not fill me with confidence.

Kaffirs and Rhodesians.—Little need be said of these markets, for they are both entirely professional, and I should not have alluded to them had it not been for the fact that the Rhodesia Exploration Company is sending out a notice calling attention to the amount of money distributed by the Rhodesian companies during the past year. It is necessary to remark that a considerable portion of this money was made by stock-jobbing. The Rhodesian mines are excellent prospects, and some admirable mines are to be found. But the country has not yet "arrived." I again say that the only way to make a boom is to "rig" Chartereds.

Raymond Radclyffe.

CORRESPONDENCE

"THE AUTHOR OF THE MOST FAMOUS ENGLISH JOKE"

To the Editor of The Academy

Sir,—I must apologise doubtless; but I cannot discern either much wit or wisdom in this so-called and frequently-trotted-out Punch joke, "Don't." What is it but a bit of oral advice which every wench doubtless also has blurted out ever since the world began? But, thank God, I can see a "joke" in the serious and highly authoritative way in which your correspondent "M. H. Spielmann" gives the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth in this trifling matter, only to be bowled over by your humble "A Correspondent" (Dundee). Can the Editor of The Academy explain this?

Arthur Vitton.

Conservative Club, Heworth-on-Tyne.

[The Editor is mindful of the adage, "For fools rush in where angels fear to tread."]

AN INTERESTING PARALLEL: ALEXANDER MONTGOMERIE AND CLÉMENT MAROT

To the Editor of The Academy

Sir,—It was a German commentator, Oscar Hoffmann, who, in Englische Studien. Vol. XX., first pointed out that Alexander Montgomerie, the Scottish poet, was imitating Ronsard in his sonnets.

To this discovery I have now to add the still more interesting discovery that Montgomerie was indebted to a still earlier French source—namely, to Clément Marot. It is a strange thing that this fact has remained undetected heretofore, as the poem by Marot to which I have found a parallel is one which is familiar to most English students of French poetry. It is the 68th epigram given in the edition of Jannet, the epigram entitled "De Ouy et Nenny":—

Un doulx Nenny, avec un doulx soubrire,
Est tant honneste, il le vous fault apprendre:
Quant est d'Ouy, si veniez à le dire,
D'avoir trop dict je vouldroys vous reprendre,
Non que je soys ennuyé d'entreprendre
D'avoir le fruict dont le desir me poinct;
Mais je vouldroys qu'en le me laissant prendre
Vous me disiez: "Non, vous ne l'aurez point."

This has been translated and extended by Montgomerie as follows:

A bony "No," with smyling looks agane,
I wald ye leirnd, sen they so comely ar.
As touching "Yes," if ye suld speik so plane,
I might reprove you to haif said so far.
Noght that your grant, in ony wayis, micht gar
Me loth the fruit that curage ocht to chuse;
Bot I wald only haif you seme to skar,
And let me tak it, fenyeing to refuse.

And warsill, as it war against your will
Appeiring angrie, thoght ye haif no yre
For haif, ye heir, is haldin half a fill.
I speik not this, as trouing for to tyre;
Bot, as the forger, when he feeds his fyre,
With sparks of water maks it burne more bald;
So, sueet denyall doubillis bot desyr,
And quickins curage fra becomming cald.

Wald ye be made of, ye man mak it nyce;
For dainties heir ar delicat and deir,
Bot plentie things ar prysde to lytill pryce;
Then thoght ye hearken, let no wit ye heir,
Bot look away, and len thame ay your eir:
For folou love, they say, and it will flie.
Wald ye be lovd, this lessone mon ye leir;
Flie whylome love, and it will folou thee.

Cranstoun, the modern editor of Montgomerie, who was under the impression that this was an original poem, pays Montgomerie an unwitting compliment as a translator by calling this one of

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

the happiest of his lyrics. The last lines, I need hardly observe, are borrowed from the "Romaunt of the Rose":—

If thou fle it, it shall flee thee;
Folowe it, and folowen shal it thee.

I fancy that Montgomerie was impelled to extend his version to three stanzas by the difficulty which he would encounter in translating the French epigram in all its neat terseness.

Since I first made this discovery—now a considerable time ago—claims upon my time have prevented me from ascertaining whether Montgomerie is further indebted to Marot. But I have no doubt at all that such is the case. The very forms which he chose—including his "flyting," his Psalms and other devotional poems—lead me to suppose that a much more extensive parallel could be found between the two poets. I should not be surprised to find traces of still earlier French poetry in the works of the Scottish writer.—I am, yours faithfully,

GEOFFREY A. DUNLOP.

Dublin, January, 1911.

THE ROYAL MAUSOLEUM, FROGMORE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—May I ask you to be so good as to contradict a report extensively circulated in the daily Press in connection with the recent memorial service at the Royal Mausoleum, Frogmore, and regarding the lately completed decoration of that building? Apart from certain inaccuracies in the description of the work, the reports in most cases contain the misleading statement that the work was only executed, and not designed, by myself. This is totally incorrect. I myself designed, as well as painted, the groups of angels which form the subject of the decoration of the interior of the dome; and all the stained glass with which the windows of the Mausoleum are now entirely filled is likewise of my own design.

I must apologise for troubling you in the matter, but my professional reputation as a decorative artist would be seriously prejudiced if the impression were allowed to go abroad that my personal responsibility for the numerous commissions, at Windsor and elsewhere, intrusted to me by their late Majesties Queen Victoria and King Edward was limited to only the merely mechanical portion of the work.

ION PACE.

"Milneholm," Hounslow, Middlesex,
January 27, 1911.

BOOKS RECEIVED

EDUCATIONAL

Black's Literary Readers. Written and Edited by John Finnemore. Book V. Illustrated. A. and C. Black. 1s. 6d.

Victoria the Good and Edward the Peacemaker. (Blackie's Story-Book Readers.) Illustrated. Blackie & Son. 4d.

PERIODICALS

Blackwood's Magazine: Fortnightly Review; Edinburgh Review; Church Quarterly Review; Harper's Monthly Magazine; Debrett's House of Commons and the Judicial Bench, 1911; Public Schools Year Book, 1911; The International Journal of Ethics; The English Review; Mercure de France; Revue Bleue; Publishers' Circular; Bookseller; The Literary Digest; Peru To-day; The Idler; Popular Magazine; Ainslie's Magazine; The Tramp; The Bibelot; Book-Prices Current; Old-Lore Miscellany of Orkney, Shetland, Caithness, and Sutherland.

A New Poet.
THE SEARCH FOR LOVELINESS.
By G. ROSTREVOR HAMILTON. Dainty cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

Daily Telegraph.—"A scholarly and accomplished little volume of verse. Mr. Hamilton has a good ear, much metrical resource, and a sense of natural beauty, and the poetry which he compounds of these good qualities is full of nerve and sensibility."

Academy.—"Many of Mr. Hamilton's lines are of quite haunting beauty, and the whole effect is satisfactory from a poetical point of view."

 Kindly write for John Long's Catalogue which contains a full List of Poetical Works by Living Authors.

London: JOHN LONG, Ltd., 12, 13, 14, Norris Street, Haymarket.

George Odell,

31, KING STREET, ST. JAMES', LONDON, S.W.

Ophthalmic and Mathematical Optician

Inventor of the Porter-Odell Patent Lens.

SPECTACLES AND EYEGLASSES

made to the individual facial measurements, thereby assuring accuracy and comfort. To enable the fitting of the innumerable variety of faces my different patterns have already run into the hundreds.

LORGNETTES in Gold, Metal and Tortoiseshell.

BAROMETERS. THERMOMETERS.
FIELD AND OPERA GLASSES.

The ODELL LUMEX PRISM BINOCULAR
pronounced by Naval and Military Officers to be the best (see testimonials).

BELLOC

Mr. Belloc, after five years in the House of Commons, resigned his seat at the last Election in protest against the unreality of Party Politics. In "THE PARTY SYSTEM" the secret collusion between the two Front Benches is demonstrated, and the ways in which they have captured the control of Parliament, and effected the elimination of the Private Member are carefully analysed. The book concludes with an examination of certain suggested remedies.

THE PARTY SYSTEM

By HILAIRE BELLOC and CECIL CHESTERTON

Cloth, crown 8vo.,

3/6

net.

STEPHEN SWIFT,
10, ohn Street, Adelphi, London.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, LTD.,

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET, W.C.

Only } 48, Queen Victoria Street, E.C.
Branches } 132, Kensington High Street, W.

NEW BOOKS LESS THAN HALF-PRICE.

		Offered at s.	d.	Published at s.	d.
CRISPI, FRANCESCO,	Italian Insurgent	1	9	7	6
GRAFTON, THIRD DUKE, AUTO. AND LETTERS		3	6	18	0
HARVARD, JOHN, AND HIS TIMES		3	3	7	6 net.
STEPHEN, SIR JAMES FITZJAMES, LIFE by his brother Leslie Stephen		5	0	16	0
THIEBAULT, BARON, MEMOIRS OF, 2 Vols. trans.		7	6	28	0
YOUNG, ARTHUR, AUTO. OF, Ed. M. Betham Edwards		4	9	12	6

Full List Free on Application.

The Fauna of British India,

including Ceylon and Burma, published under the Authority of the Secretary of State for India in Council.

Medium 8vo., with Text-Illustrations and Two Coloured Plates.

Coleoptera—Lamellicornia. Part I. (Cetoniinæ and Dynastinæ). 10s.

Rhynchota. Vol. V. 10s.

London: Taylor & Francis, Red Lion Court, Fleet Street.
Calcutta and Simla: Thacker, Spink & Co.
Bombay: Thacker & Co., Ltd.
Berlin: Friedländer und Sohn, Carlstrasse II.

CONSULT

The Gresham

On all Matters of

LIFE, FIRE & ACCIDENT INSURANCE.

Many Special Features.

Liberal Terms to recognised Brokers and Agents.

HEAD OFFICES:

ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE, POULTRY, LONDON, E.C.

JAMES H. SCOTT, General Manager.

BRANCH OFFICE:

119, HIGH HOLBORN.

ARTHUR LANGHAM, District Manager.

Free Insurance Coupon to readers of "The Academy."
(Not to be detached.)

The Gresham Fire and Accident Insurance Society, Limited,

of
ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE, POULTRY, LONDON, E.C.,
will pay

£100 (One hundred pounds) to the legal personal representative of the bonâ fide holder of this Coupon, if he or she be killed solely and directly by an accident within the United Kingdom to any Railway Company's Train, a Tramcar, Omnibus, Cab, or other Licensed Vehicle plying for public hire, in which the holder is travelling as an ordinary ticket-bearing or fare-paying passenger, subject always to the following special conditions which are to be taken as incorporated in the contract:—

(a) That death result within thirty days after the accident (b) that notice thereof be given within seven days to the Society at its Head Office in London (c) that such reasonable evidence of the cause of death be given as the Society may require (d) that the holder shall have written in ink prior to the accident his or her usual signature in the space provided therefor (e) that the Society shall not be liable to any one person in respect of more than one Coupon in this or any other publication (f) that this insurance shall not be available to persons under twelve or over seventy years of age, and shall hold good until Sat., Feb. 11, 1911.

Signature of Holder .....

Address .....

BOOKS, Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold, and Exchanged. Monthly Catalogues Free. Libraries purchased, catalogued, arranged, or valued.—Thomas Thorp, 98, St. Martin's Lane, W.C. (and at Reading).

HOW TO WRITE FOR THE PRESS OR TO BECOME AN AUTHOR.

Interesting and useful Booklet free.

"H," LITERARY CORRESPONDENCE COLLEGE, 9, Arundel Street, W.C.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references.—Address Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

GERMAN wishes to correspond with ENGLISHMAN, to exchange German for English. Correction reciprocal. Write to Mr. G. Wolfram, Weingarten 3, Quedlinburg (Germany).

Now on Sale. 6d. net. The February

BOOK MONTHLY.

Contents:

PERSONAL AND PARTICULAR. The Topics of the Time in the Land of Letters.
THE SERIAL STORY. Things Needed in it by the Present Day Reader.—By W. Maas.
THE CANADIAN READER. The Authors and Books he Most Delights to Honour.—By W. A. Craick.
LITERARY BASE COIN. Things Attributed to Authors who Did Not Write Them.—By W. Baily Kempling.
A LONDON LETTER. "Truth Stranger than Fiction," so Novelists Must Beware!—By the Editor.
STEVENSON INTIMATE. The Author and the Man, with New Gleams on Both.
FEBRUARY FILL-DYKE. The Plots and People of Some Recent English Novels.—By C. E. Lawrence.
STARS OF THE EAST. The Literary Women of Japan and Their Work.—By Evelyn B. Mitford.
MACHIAVELLIAN! Mr. Wells on his New Novel, and Other Views.
NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY. Particulars of Interesting Volumes likely to be Published this Month.
BOOKS OF THE MONTH. A Chronicle of the Noteworthy Publications of January. With a Reviewing Commentary.
THE PERIODICALS. Contents of some February Reviews and Magazines.
Illustrated Supplement: BOOKS OF THE DAY IN PORTRAIT AND PICTURE.

Publishers: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO., Stationers' Hall Court, London,

Who, on receipt of 6d., will send, post-free, a Specimen of the Current Number.

Edward Whistler,

II, Strand, Charing Cross, London.

DIAMOND MERCHANT :: :: JEWELLER & SILVERSMITH.

A large stock of New and Second-hand Diamond and Gem Jewellery, Antique and Modern Silver Plate, always on hand, at bargain prices, for cash.

Fine Pearls, Emeralds, Diamonds, and early specimens of Antique Silver Plate wanted. High Prices given in Cash. Full Value allowed in Exchange.

Valuations made for Probate and other purposes.

GUN DEPARTMENT.

HAMMERLESS SECOND-HAND GUNS,

British Made, from £6 10s.

Nitro Proof. The Cheapest Gun in the Market combined with Quality.

ALSO

HAMMERLESS EJECTORS,

By Best London Makers, at Greatly Reduced Prices.

CORDITE RIFLES, ·400, ·500, ·600 Bores.

Catalogue and Price List on Application Gratis.

Telephone No.: 2033 GERRARD.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE & BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC

OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO AND . . THROUGH CANADA. . .

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service vid Vancouver.

For further particulars, apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,

62-65, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON, E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street, Glasgow. 41, Victoria S reet, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE

TO

SOUTH and EAST AFRICA.

WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.

Via the SUEZ CANAL.

Calling at MARSEILLES and NAPLES.

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.

(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—

DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.

Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE PLEASURE CRUISES

LIVERPOOL

to the

MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC

by the

"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"

Saxonia Leaves Liverpool 9 Feb., 1911.
Carpathia " " 2 Mch., 1911.

Ports of Call . . .

CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS, MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA, ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME, PALERMO, NAPLES.

For full particulars apply—

THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

THE

"EMPIRE ILLUSTRATED."

The Tariff Reform Monthly.

40 pages.

Profusely Illustrated.

Interesting to every Unionist and Imperialist and convincing to Liberals and Little Englanders.

Price 3d.

P & O Passenger Services.

EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA, JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports

(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)

Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises

Throughout the Year, according to Season.

AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE, NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.

Programme on Application.

For Passage, Freight and all information apply—

PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,

122 Leadenhall Street, E.C., or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours

R.M.S.P.

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY.

(Royal Charter dated 1839.)

Fortnightly Sailings from Southampton to—

ARGENTINA & BRAZIL

via SPAIN & PORTUGAL.

WEST INDIES, BRITISH GUIANA, SPANISH MAIN, CENTRAL AMERICA, NEW YORK.

From LONDON to—

MOROCCO & CANARY ISLANDS,

EGYPT, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA & JAPAN.

(By Shire Line.)

For further particulars apply to

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY

18, Moorgate Street, E.C., & 32, Cockspur Street, S.W.

Printed and Published for the Proprietor by ODHAMS, LTD., 25, Floral Street, Covent Garden, and 67, Long Acre, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE

No. 2023 [Registered as a Newspaper.] FEBRUARY 11, 1911 PRICE THREEPENCE

THE CARNEGIE LIBRARY, THE PA. STATE COLLEGE, STATE COLLEGE

THE MOST VALUABLE PROOF.

THE MOST VALUABLE PROOF OF THE SUPERIORITY OF THE ROLLS-ROYCE CAR IS AMPLY AFFORDED BY THE ENTHUSIASTIC PRAISE OF THOSE WHO HAVE PURCHASED ROLLS-ROYCE CARS AND ARE PAYING FOR THEIR MAINTENANCE.

The following are Unsolicited Testimonials from private owners:—

The Most Perfect Thing of the Kind.

"Your car is the most perfect thing of the kind I have ever been in; it is as Purdey's guns are to all other guns."—Ref. No. 34.

Even Amongst High-class Cars Stands Quite Alone.

"I am very pleased with my Rolls-Royce car. Even amongst high-class cars it, in my opinion, stands quite alone, and is quite different from anything I have driven before."—Ref. No. 45.

Rolls-Royce Preferred to Anything Else.

"Our 40-50 R.-R. is so entirely satisfactory in every respect, and we have had so much trouble with other makes, that we feel we would rather have a second-hand R.-R. than a new one of another make."—Ref. No. 55.

The originals of the above testimonials may be seen at our Showrooms.

ROLLS-ROYCE

The World's Best Car.

ROLLS-ROYCE, LIMITED, 14 and 15, Conduit Street, London, W.
Telegrams: "Rolhead, London." Telephones: Gerrard 1654, 1655, and 1656.

And at PARIS: 56, Avenue Hoche.
Telegrams: "Rollsroyce, Paris."

The following firms who purchase direct from us have the sole selling rights of our cars in their respective districts:—LEICESTERSHIRE, DERBYSHIRE, NOTTINGHAMSHIRE, LINCOLNSHIRE, WARWICKSHIRE, NORTHAMPTONSHIRE, and RUTLANDSHIRE: The Midland Counties Motor Garage Co., Ltd., Granby St., Leicester; SCOTLAND: L. C. Seligmann and Co., 96, Renfrew St., Glasgow; MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT, including East Lancashire (as far north as a line drawn on the map due east from Cockerham) and East Cheshire: Joseph Cockshoot and Co., Ltd., New Bridge Street, Manchester; YORKSHIRE: A. B. Wardman and Sons, Ltd., Cambridge St., Harrogate; LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT, including West Lancashire (as far north as Cockerham), West Cheshire, and North Wales: W. Watson and Co., 56, Renshaw St., Liverpool: NORTHUMBERLAND, DURHAM, CUMBERLAND, WESTMORLAND, and NORTH LANCASHIRE: Sir Wm. Angus Sanderson and Co., St. Thomas' Street, Newcastle-on-Tyne; IRELAND: J. B. Ferguson, Ltd., Chichester St., Belfast.
The following firms are appointed as Retailers of Rolls-Royce cars. LONDON: Messrs. Barker and Co. (Coachbuilders), Ltd., 66-68, South Audley St., W.; Messrs. Charles Jarrott, Ltd., 35, Sackville Street, W.; WESTERN AUSTRALIA: The Perth Motor House, 888, Hay Street, Perth, W.A.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Sheffield Simplex

INDEPENDENT TESTIMONY.

The following query was published in the "Autocar," December 17th, 1910:—

No. 1593.—45 H.P. "SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX."

"Will any private reader kindly give their experiences with above cars as to reliability, upkeep, &c.?—J. C. S." And elicited the following replies:—

December 31st, 1910.

"I have had a 45 H.P. 'Sheffield-Simplex' of the GEAR-BOX-LESS type in my possession for two years, and, apart from one or two trifling mishaps to start with, I have always found the car most reliable. If 'J. C. S.' wants a six-cylinder car in which power is not sacrificed for quite unnecessary silence, he could not do better than get a 'Sheffield-Simplex.' The car is as silent as any reasonable man who is not suffering from 'Silent-Knightis' can want, the engine being scarcely audible when the car is in motion. The GEAR-BOX-LESS system works perfectly, the emergency gear never being required except for starting and hills of about 1 in 8 or steeper gradient. Hills like Reigate, which cannot be rushed, offer no obstacle with a car weighing 34 cwt. and four passengers. The upkeep for a car of its size is most reasonable. I have done 6,000 miles on one pair of tyres, and 7,000 miles on another. The petrol consumption works out at about 15 miles to the gallon on a journey of over 100 miles give-and-take roads in the summer. I have always found the Company most obliging in every way. In conclusion, I am certain that there is no car on the road at present of the same cylinder capacity that can better it over a give-and-take road."—R. H. T.

December 31st, 1910.

"As an owner of a 45 H.P. 'GEAR-BOX-LESS' 'Sheffield-Simplex' Car, I can honestly do nothing but praise the car. The petrol consumption on a fair run is thirteen or fourteen miles per gallon. On tyres the car is extremely light. I have done 3,000 miles on driving wheels with grooved Dunlops, and the tyres are not ready for retreading yet. The throttle arrangement is very convenient, and every part of the car is splendidly made and finished. For running-power I do not think the 'Sheffield-Simplex' can be beaten, and hills make very little difference to it; it is very rarely that the emergency gear is required. I really think this is a beautifully made car, and a treat to drive, and whoever buys one cannot fail to be pleased with the results, if my experience can be taken as a criterion."—DERBYSHIRE.

Catalogue post-free on application to Dept. "L."

SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX MOTOR WORKS, Ltd.

TINSLEY, SHEFFIELD, ENGLAND.

London Depôt: c/o MULLINERS, Ltd., 132-135, LONG ACRE, W.C.

THE SPECTATOR says you

"could not do better than read this book."

THE PASSING OF THE SHEREEFIAN EMPIRE.

By ELLIS ASHMEAD-BARTLETT,

Author of "Port Arthur: The Siege and Capitulation."

Illustrated. 15s. net.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, Edinburgh and London.

At all Booksellers and Libraries.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

CONTENTS.

	Page
Review of the Week	155
Now Goes Our Lady to the Woods	156
"Vivat Crimen"	156
"What of the Representative System?" — An Answer	157
The Scheldt—I.	158
Reviews:—
The Pen and the Sword	160
"Femina Fecit"	163
A Group of French-women	164
A Disillusioned Traveller	165
Lecky's "European Morals"	166
Modernism and the Resurrection	167
Reviews—(continued)
Fantasy and Parody	167
Fiction	168
Shaw on Shakespeare: An Open Letter	168
The Theatre	171
Music	173
Paul Verlaine—II.	174
The Day Before Yesterday—IV.	176
India: A Series—IV.	177
A Matter of Bluff	178
Reviews and Magazines	179
The London Institution	180
In the Temple of Mammon	181
Correspondence	182
Books Received	182

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

THE ACADEMY is published by MESSRS. ODHAMS, LIMITED, 67, Long Acre, London, W.C., to whom all letters with reference to publication must be addressed.

Applications referring to Advertisements may be addressed to MESSRS. ODHAMS, as above.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

THE ACADEMY is now obtainable at Messrs. W. H. Smith & Sons, Messrs. Wyman's, and Messrs. Willing's bookstalls and shops.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

THE movement having for its object the promotion of cordial relations between this country and Germany is one which we look upon with the utmost goodwill. A meeting held on Monday last at the Queen's Hall, under the auspices of the Councils of the Churches in both Empires, was a distinct success, and, we hope, may be regarded as an indication of renewed interest in the matter. From its inception we have been connected with Lord Avebury's Anglo-German Entente Committee, and have regretted that of late its activities have seemed somewhat in abeyance. Both nations, as represented by individuals, find each other pleasantly in agreement when they meet and converse on ordinary affairs; there is no inherent antagonism between the German and English natures, and we can reciprocate the remark made by Dr. Spieker at the Queen's Hall to the effect that the German people desired most earnestly to live in peace with all their neighbours. The question of rivalry in navies and armaments, which recurs periodically in certain newspapers—eager for copy at all costs—and is too often fostered, we fear, by startling headlines and imprudent journalism, receives, perhaps, too much attention. As a nation we cannot resent Germany's energy in the building of battleships or her wish to possess a powerful fleet; in the present state of civilisation every country must take care of itself and be ready to defend itself. Conversely, Germany need not grumble if we endeavour to maintain our own fine position among the great Powers of the world by keeping up the highest possible naval standard. A strong Navy is the best guarantee of peace, and its possession can be dissociated entirely from any idea of offence or ill-will towards other nations.

Sixty-two Members of the Irish party, at a meeting presided over by Mr. John Redmond, discussing the proposed Act providing for the payment of Members of Parliament, have arrived at some conclusions replete with a type of unconscious humour which we may term "Irish" in a double sense. They consider that "the Irish party are in this Parliament as a protest against the system of government forced upon them against their will," and that as they have never asked for the application of this measure to Ireland, but "have always been and are still content to depend upon the voluntary contributions of their own race," the Government should be requested to devote the money which would otherwise remunerate these truly Irish Members for their invaluable services to "some useful purpose in Ireland." Passing over this delightful testimony to their own inutility, we may note that the reference to "voluntary contributions of their own race" is particularly brazen—or naïve, as the case may be—in view of the recent haul from America. This self-sacrificing relinquishment of golden guineas, however, has a conditional clause; it is only "pending the grant of Home Rule to Ireland" that the Irish Members desire to offer their services free of cost. When they obtain Home Rule—which means the management of their own local affairs—they are to be paid, we presume, from the Imperial Treasury. It is exceedingly good of these sixty-two bland and benevolent Irishmen to lay before us their academic views; but, as they take very little interest in anything outside their own concerns, we may be permitted to remark that those views will hardly materialise. Is the "useful purpose in Ireland," to which these savings of proposed payment are to be devoted, the erection of a statue to the god of blarney?

Another small labour trouble flamed up last week and luckily flickered out, although for one day it threatened to become a serious conflagration. In one respect, which it possessed in common with the strike on the same railway—the North Eastern—which occurred last July, Saturday's brief rebellion merits attention as a sign of the times. The men acted on their own initiative, without the authority of the leaders of their Trade Unions—the very organisations which during the last few years, by their own demand and consent, have been built up ostensibly for the protection of their own interests. The question as to whether or not the cause of complaint was justifiable in this particular instance does not for the moment matter; what we wish to emphasise at present is that the workman, subtly imbued by means of specious oratory and plausible leaflets with Socialistic views, will in a sullen or intemperate mood ignore the so-called safeguards he has been persuaded to construct.

Meanwhile, the type of workman who does his best for his employer or employers, confident that in the long run this will be best for him; who thinks out matters for himself, and refuses to let his thinking be done for him by raucous-voiced street-corner politicians (if their strange processes of ratiocination can be dignified by the term "thinking"); who realises that a "successful" strike is the very antithesis to true success, since it is ruinous to all harmony and good feeling—this type of working man seems to be dying out. In his place we find too frequently the morose, dissatisfied product of ignorant agitators—a man inflated by windy arguments, ready at a word from his "Union" to break into open rebellion, and to incite his fellows to do the same. Naturally such a man often loses his situation, sinks to the melancholy ranks of the unemployed, and becomes a hindrance to all social progress and a problem to philanthropists and economists. We are far from suggesting that such a man is a fair sample of the British workman of the present day; happily he is still outnumbered by hard-headed, sensible fellows; but the disease is at work in our midst, and until the present febrile methods of Socialistic legislation are replaced by procedures at once sane and strong, such men, in increasing quantities, will be the miserable result.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The National Council of Public Morals opened its conference at Edinburgh this week, and discussed, among other things, a question which seems to grow more pressing in this country as time goes on—the flood of injurious literature that continues to pour forth in spite of the spasmodic efforts made from time to time to stop it. We use the word "literature," of course, in its broadest interpretation. Any one who has noted the development of popular reading-matter during, say, the last twenty years, cannot have failed to observe the contrast which the present day offers to the preceding period; the windows of the shops which purvey such wares are evidence enough. Covers of thousands of cheap and nasty novels are designed obviously with a view to provoking erotic curiosity; the contents of such books, when not definitely pernicious, are often highly suggestive. For such publications the excuse of "art" is untenable; good art of any description, literary or otherwise, is the last thing to be found between their covers. We are far from wishing that writers should be haunted by the spectre of the "young person" when they conceive and elaborate their plots; but a serious, thoughtful analysis of the sombre side of life and a story written deliberately to excite harmful curiosity are two very different things. There is a lack of system and an incoherence in our manner of dealing with this problem which must be remedied before much good can be accomplished. Conferences, however useful, are intermittent; and writers are prolific, knowing that in this particular market a supply, luridly displayed, creates a demand.

According to advices from St. Petersburg, Tolstoi's posthumous works partly consist of his memoirs in the form of a diary, which he has kept from his twenty-fifth year up to a few days before his flight from Yasnaya Poljana. This diary is very extensive, and would fill about thirty printed volumes. There are also two volumes, of about six hundred pages each, of social studies, stories, and novels, partly unfinished. Some of the above-mentioned manuscripts have been stolen, but the thieves will not be able to make use of them, as the titles of the complete works are known; also, there exist one or two copies of each manuscript. The inventory of Tolstoi's works includes a comedy, "The Sage," and various sociological articles; also the following literary treasures:—"Hadje Murad" (inspired by Tolstoi's sojourn in the Caucasus), "Peter Sergius" (the psychology of a priest), "After the Ball," "The Devil," "The Corpse," "The Jester," "The Diary of a Madman," "The Moon Shines Through the Clouds," "A Young Tsar," "Theodor Koumishe's Diary," "Who is Right?" "The History of a Beehive," "Alioka Govcheff," "What I saw in a Dream," "She Possesses All the Qualities" (study of a woman), "Tikhon and Melanie," "The Diary of a Mother," "They Are Not Criminals," "Who has Killed?" "The Wisdom of Children," "By Accident," "The History of a Doochebor," and "Modern Socialism."

NOW GOES OUR LADY TO THE WOODS

Now goes our lady to the woods:
Not that she needeth to take flight:
Her soul hath its own solitudes—
Its stars, on the most starless night,
Its light, on the most sunless day.
She takes not flight—she goes away
As quiet, queenly, rare, as here,
In Babylon, when days are drear,
She moves about. She does not fly;
She does not haste; she merely goes—
To where the dreaming poplar rows
Look upward to the Milky Way;
Where men have bliss of stars by night,
Behold the gorgeous sun by day,
The coloured seasons drifting by:
She takes not flight—but none the less
Doth she rejoice again to catch
The spaces to her soul, and match
Her quiet soul with quietness.

F. N.

"VIVAT CRIMEN"

On July 23rd last we published an editorial entitled "Sense or Sentiment." It dealt with Mr. Churchill's speech in the House of Commons outlining a pet scheme for tampering with sentences and converting prisons into abodes of "luxury and ease." A very valuable article in the Sunday Times of the 5th inst., although inaccurate in its reference to the action of the Kingston County Bench, enforces the same conclusions with remarkable vigour. Speaking with some experience, we do not endorse the writer's strictures on the Probation of First Offenders Act. We consider this Act one of the most valuable on the Statute Book. We think that the Act most admirably tempers justice with mercy and common sense. The writer of the article, who no doubt has no judicial experience, commits himself to the statement that the first offender who is bound over is "practically pardoned." Of course that statement is wholly misleading. Postponement of sentence quam-diu se bene gesserit exactly explains the operation of the Act.

Apart from the few inaccuracies to which we have referred, we entirely commend the substance and the spirit of the article. What is more, the Blue-book recently issued on Criminal Statistics reveals a remarkable increase in crime during recent years, including many acts of violent brutality, such as that within the last few days at Kingston-upon-Thames.

What is in reality the underlying cause of this criminal recrudescence? We think we can trace it to a disposition to rebel against law, order, and authority generally, which is permeating vast masses of the people. The tendency is observed in insubordination in the ranks of the Trades Unionists and in defiance of authority at Tonypandy. Another cause, we think, of increase of crime is that in a large portion of the Press, at cinematograph shows, and at Madame Tussaud's, the criminal is able to attract to himself a niche in popular estimation. If he is not interesting, why are his doings chronicled in dailies, and especially weeklies, to the exclusion of entertaining, useful, and cleanly news which it might be supposed a wholesome people would desire to be purveyed to them? If he is not interesting, why does a Chancellor of the Exchequer compose an effort in emulation of Gray's Elegy to the blue-eyed shepherd whose many lapses Mr. Churchill excuses on the ground that he was "only a pilferer"? We think the criminal is essentially a vain person, and, realising to the full that is anxious to emerge into the limelight, and become the darling of Chancellors and of Home Secretaries, and to share with them the attention of the cinematograph operator, and appear as a central character in a new novel by one of the authors who knows that a nice spice of crime will cover ignorance of grammar and innocence of the rules of composition.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

> Full many a gem of purest ray serene
> The dark, unfathomed caves of ocean bear,

Another reason why the criminal is increasing is that Mr. Churchill, when he is tired of spending public money on circulars instructing magistrates in their duties—circulars which meet with a uniform destination—is in the habit of revising—in the interest of the criminal—sentences which have been passed under circumstances of which he is blandly ignorant. It is a common occurrence for a prisoner when sentenced to remark insolently that Mr. Churchill will soon put matters right, and thus law is brought into contempt.

In a former article we ventured to criticise Mr. Churchill's speech outlining his ideas of prison reform. We remarked from knowledge that prisons were already viewed by many criminals as "Homes of Rest" and we added:—

> In what estimation will they be held when bands of music, concerts, landscape gardens, the latest novels with criminal heroes, and other luxuries are supplied, and when the perfectly wholesome porridge and prison fare is exchanged for a menu by Oddenino's chef?

To those words, written many months ago, we adhere, and we repeat our protest against sickening sentimentality in high places. Our view is entirely supported by the "Lay of the Last Prisoner" on the walls of Reading gaol, in which he contrasts his comfortable lot with the misery many of the honest are enduring outside of the gaol precincts.

How strangely history repeats itself! Juvenal, about 80 A.D., wrote:—

> Probitas laudatur—et alget,
> Criminibus debent hortos, praetoria, mensas
> Argentum vetus et stantem extra pocula caprum.

How faithfully are reproduced to-day the follies and the vices of Ancient Rome!

CECIL COWPER.

"WHAT OF THE REPRESENTATIVE SYSTEM?"

AN ANSWER

IT is quite true to say that nobody wanted the recent General Election. But that feeling of personal disinclination to engage in it in no way diminishes the authority or value of its results. On the contrary, it rather enhances them, and for this reason. The attention of the whole country was concentrated upon the cause that compelled it. It reminded electors, ordinarily accustomed to exercise the franchise under the guillotine-like operation of the Septennial Act, that there was some special reason for disturbing their ease at that particular time of the year, when one wants, if possible, to release the mind from strain and annoyance. But so urgent was the matter that not even the fear of upsetting the trade and festivities of Christmas could prevent or delay it. Mr. Balfour himself admitted that at most it could have been postponed but a few weeks. Clearly the Election then was not "a solemn farce."

Why was the General Election of January held, and what was it to determine? It was held for the sole purpose of satisfying the Sovereign that there was a majority, a substantial majority possibly, in favour of the Veto Bill of the Government. And if that became clear, then the question of the settlement of the differences between the two Houses of Parliament was determined, since the Government scheme, as opposed to the scheme outlined in the Lansdowne resolutions, would have won the day.

Surely, then, a result which secures an ad hoc majority of well over one hundred and twenty returned in support of the Government scheme cannot be called the status quo ante? A majority of over one hundred and twenty is a very big majority, and there resides in the Government controlling it great power and authority. If the representative system is to be respected and preserved at all, if the seat of Government is to remain in the House of Commons and be occupied by the party able to carry on the business of the nation, then such a party which can outnumber its opponents in the division lobby by one hundred and twenty is, in the mind of every constitutionalist at least, in a very strong position to do its work.

If the composition of that majority is to be considered and weighed, still the Government position is infinitely better than that of its opponents. If Ireland is to be left out of account—though I do not know why it should be—then the Unionist Members returned for Irish constituencies must naturally also be deducted. This would leave the Liberal party, as regards England, Wales, and Scotland, in a majority over the Unionists of more than seventy. And even if the Labour Members are to be deducted—though on this question of the Veto Bill to do so would be absurd—still the Government's majority would be over thirty. But to make those subtractions in order to diminish the authority of the Government's majority is about as sensible as it would have been for the Liberals in 1895 to deduct the Liberal-Unionists from Lord Salisbury's majority and to claim that as Liberal-Unionists were not Conservatives they should be deducted, leaving the Conservative party with so slender a majority that it had no right to continue in office! There was at that time quite as much divergence between the two groups making up the coalition which maintained Lord Salisbury in power as there is between the differing sections of Mr. Asquith's majority. The coalition of the 1895 Parliament was united upon one thing only—opposition to Home Rule.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The coalition of the 1911 Parliament is united, if you will, upon one issue only—opposition to the House of Lords as it is at present constituted, and support to the Veto Bill proposed to alter that constitution. It was found in practice that that Conservative-cum-Liberal-Unionist coalition was a very solid and reliable thing, and it maintained the Conservative party in office during two Parliaments and over ten years. There is no reason for the Government to fear a less fortunate result for this present coalition.

Further, there is no ground for saying that the country is being ruled "not by a majority of its own choice." Mr. Balfour introduced the Referendum upon the Tariff Reform question to enable the Conservative Press to state, as the Daily Mail did on its placards, "Tariff Reform not to be decided by this Election." All are, I think, agreed that the House of Lords question was kept clearly in the forefront, and that, as far as any Election ever could be said to be fought upon one issue alone, this one was. In other words, something very like a perfect Referendum or poll of the people actually took place. Therefore every vote cast for a coalition candidate was a vote, given with eye-openness and intent, to secure by the only recognised constitutional means—viz., through the chosen representatives of the people—the settlement of this long-overdue problem along the lines clearly laid down in the Parliament Bill of the Government.

"If the House of Commons is to be the sport of noxious minorities . . . can it be contended in good faith and with mental balance that a loyal and patriotic Second Chamber removed from the contamination of impure motives should be swept away or synonymously reduced to a nullity?" The last thing the Liberal party would seek to do would be to sweep away "a loyal and patriotic Second Chamber removed from impure motives." But after the admissions of Lord Rosebery and Lord Lansdowne and the other leaders of the Opposition to the Government's plan, it is rather late in the day to pay the House of Lords such a thorough-going and handsome compliment. It is for the very purpose of securing a Second Chamber much more loyal to the constitution that gives us our freedom and our representative institutions, much more patriotic and less purely party, and very much farther removed from the contamination of impure motives, such as guided it in passing the Licensing Act of 1904 and throwing out the Licensing Bill of 1908, that the Government have taken the matter so firmly in hand.

For the Government to hesitate in carrying through the Bill, for which they have been specifically provided with a majority, would be the basest and blackest betrayal of loyal and enduring followers in all our political history. There is no reason to suppose they will. On the contrary, it is certain that they will not, and that considerably before the Coronation time arrives the whole matter will be through. To incite the House of Lords to reject the Bill is to incite them to break the law, to reject the clearest views of every constitutional authority.

And suppose they did reject it? The necessary peers would most certainly be created, and for the first time since our Parliamentary institutions became settled upon a representative basis you would have a Liberal majority in both Houses. Then would the representative system receive its fullest expression, and, ceasing to be a sham, become the real living thing it ought to be. For the very sake of our representative system itself I say—

The Parliament Bill must become law.

A. Wenyon-Samuel.

[We have much pleasure in printing the above reasoned reply to our editorial of last week. We shall welcome views from others of our readers.—Ed.].

THE SCHELDT—I.

By H. Belloc.

Some few weeks ago it was known that the Dutch Government had proposed to establish large modern and permanent fortifications upon either side of the mouth of the Scheldt.

The Government of the French Republic at once appreciated the importance of this departure; somewhat tardily, the Press of this country also interested itself in the matter. Were the policy to mature, and were the mouth of the Scheldt to be fortified, this country, as I shall show, would necessarily be the chief sufferer; it is worthy of attention, therefore, that the meaning of such a policy, and the very fact that it was contemplated at all, was missed for some weeks by our authorities, and when it was tardily recognised was recognised through the influence of the Press, and that Press informed or aroused from French sources.

The matter will be less talked of in the immediate future, for the French protest will certainly be successful; but after the lapse of some little time the question of the Scheldt is bound, in one way or another, to re-arise. It behoves us, therefore, to get some clear idea as to what the fortification of the mouth of the river means in the military situation of Europe, under what counsels it can have been suggested, and what its ultimate effect would be.

I propose this week to consider these points in their most general aspect, and next week to go with some detail into the conditions under which such fortifications would be established, the vulnerability of Antwerp, its communications with the East and with the South-West, &c. In other words, I propose this week to deal with the generalities of the problem, and next week with its particulars.

The first general question we must ask ourselves is whether Belgium and the Netherlands would be neutral territory in case of a war in Western Europe, as they were maintained neutral territory during the last great war of the kind, forty years ago.

The answer to this question is admittedly in the negative. A policy ultimately unwise (for it corresponds morally to running into debt) is admitted upon the part of Prussia and of the German Empire which is now Prussian in administration. This policy sets out to disregard the terms of treaties after an act of war. By that simple expedient immediate advantages can always be gained. The progressive disadvantage attaching to it is an inability to form secure alliances, to guarantee internal stability, or to pursue any fixed foreign policy. The curious will note that the inauguration of this policy in the partition of Poland has in little more than a century saddled the Prussian Service with a larger proportion of unreliable troops than are to be discovered in any other Service in the world.

For the strict purpose of military inquiry, however, the wisdom or folly of such morals does not concern us. It is a fact that the neutral territory of a weak State would be violated in case of a war in Western Europe to-day. One Power has virtually declared its intention so to act; its potential enemies are bound to follow suit. We conclude, therefore, of Belgian territory as of some parts of Swiss territory, as of Danish and as of Dutch, that after the first act of war the pledged word of guaranteeing Powers will carry no further sanctity. It is to be remarked that this conclusion is of wide effect: it does not only mean that troops may, after the first act of war, be discovered in Belgian territory approaching from the eastward, but that they may also be discovered approaching from the southward and westward, or from the sea. It does not only mean that Luxembourg, the railways of which are in German hands, may be traversed from Treves; it also means that those railways may be cut by cavalry from Longwy. It does not only mean that Brussels is eighty miles from Aix; it also means that Brussels is a little more than sixty miles from Lille; and the communications from the north-east of France into the "neutral" territory are far simpler and easier than those from Germany.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Granted, then, that Belgium must be treated as part of the seat of war, of what strategical value is the Scheldt, and the town of Antwerp situated upon it, to the various parties that may be engaged?

Apart from communication by sea, the great river and its port are of no positive strategical value. To purely Continental combatants upon Belgian soil Antwerp is nothing, save that, even in the present unfinished condition of its new fortification, the city affords a stronghold into which the Belgian or any other army could retire. But if Antwerp be of this character, to close the mouth of the Scheldt is only of advantage to Antwerp's opponent. In other words, there would be no point in any one's closing the Scheldt in a military fashion unless he were considering hostile reinforcements from the sea.

To hold the keys of the Scheldt after a successful war would indeed be a permanent commercial and strategical advantage to the conqueror who should also have occupied and be administrating Antwerp, but to forge such a lock and such keys before a campaign without knowing to which of two land forces they might fall, one's own or one's enemies, would be folly. It becomes wisdom only when a maritime partner in the struggle is considered.

France and Germany combined against England would wish to see the mouth of the Scheldt fortified; either of them acting alone against England would wish to see the mouth of the Scheldt fortified; but in no conceivable case, save the improbable one following upon an annexation of Dutch territory by England, could England wish to see it fortified.

The port of Antwerp is for many reasons, which cannot be here detailed, among the first in the world. For the same reasons it may become in the near future the first in Europe. The knowledge of this confuses men when they consider the military problem. To possess such a port through a long period of commercial development, to be able to use it as a base in time of war, would be of the utmost value to whomever might be its Sovereign; but all that has nothing to do with its strategical value in the course of a campaign originating outside Belgian territory, and that strategical value is, as I have said, purely negative from the point of view of an invader. Were a French Army successfully attacking a German upon the neutral territory of Belgium in violation of treaties, or a German Army successfully attacking a French, either could afford to neglect Antwerp altogether, save for the sea. The moment a maritime belligerent enters as a party to the contest the cutting off of Antwerp from the sea becomes all-important to whichever of the two combatants is the enemy of the maritime Power. Not the holding of Antwerp, nor the using of Antwerp as a base, but the cutting off of Antwerp from the sea.

The mouth of the Scheldt once closed, in a military sense, by the lock of fortification, to grasp the keys of that lock would be the very first act of whatever Power violating the neutrality of the Low Countries had England for an opponent.

The Scheldt is not a barrier as is the Meuse to French armies marching eastward, or to German armies marching westward. It is a mouth—a source of supply from the sea. Antwerp is indeed a great place of war; but its life, should an army be thrown behind its fortifications, would still depend upon the sea; indeed, the whole scheme of the fortification of Antwerp depends upon an open river.

We may sum up then and say that, quite apart from the present real or supposed international situation, the only conceivable meaning of the fortification of the mouth of the Scheldt is that it is directed against the military action of whatever maritime Power could, by its purely maritime preponderance, affect an European war in the Low Countries. There is but one such Power, and that Power is England. The proposal to fortify the mouth of the Scheldt, though it is France that will defeat it for the moment, was aimed at England, and it was aimed at England not in her capacity as the momentary half-ally of France, but in her capacity of the permanent modern rival of Germany.

That Germany does not intend war, that Germany cannot proceed to war without an understanding with France, though the first statement is probably, and the second certainly, true, should in no way affect our judgment of this matter. The fortification of the mouth of the Scheldt is undertaken, as every military act in time of peace must be undertaken, in view of a contingency only. It presupposes one possible enemy and one alone, and that enemy is England. It would equally presuppose such an enemy were its ultimate authors French, German, or X. No other conceivable military meaning attaches to the step, unless we are to regard Holland as a great Power which is threatening another great Power, Belgium, and finds in the threat to close the great river of Antwerp a powerful weapon against its dreaded opponent.

Well and good. The reader may grant that the proof in generalities is conclusive; but what of the proof in particulars? Could not the Scheldt be as effectively closed by mines? To what perils is Antwerp exposed? Is the magnitude of the interests involved sufficient to make the shutting off of Antwerp worth an enemy's while? Does not the line of the Meuse sufficiently protect Belgian territory from the east? And so forth. The reader will demand an answer to these particular points, without the right apprehension of which the general policy of fortifying the mouth of the Scheldt might very well, though politically plausible, be militarily ridiculous. I shall attempt to answer such questions in my next article.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

REVIEWS

THE PEN AND THE SWORD

The Life of Sir William Howard Russell, C.V.O., LL.D., the First Special Correspondent. By JOHN BLACK ATKINS. With Portraits and Illustrations. Two Vols. (John Murray. 30s. net.)

THE attentive reader of a poorly-conceived biography is often drawn to and fro in a harassing manner between two themes: what a man is, and what he has done. Psychologically considered, the two things are inseparable; at various crises in his career a man acts, not so much on impulse (as it may well seem to the unwitting outsider), but rather according to the cumulative effect of preceding years combined with the character he has developed up to that point; character and experience, in fact, are the two forces, growing stronger as we grow older, which determine our behaviour in matters great or small, and which shape our destiny. To show these forces in lively operation, unobtrusively and incidentally, while relating the story of his chosen hero's life, may be regarded as a triumph of the biographer's art, and in this skilfully-woven, detailed record of the man whom Wolseley called "the link between Literature and the Army," Mr. Atkins, himself well versed in war and warlike affairs, has come very near to the ideal. He brings before us the personality of William Howard Russell so vividly that we seem to know the man himself, to realise intimately his nature, to feel ourselves breathlessly with him in emergencies, to understand the stress of his mind when real or imaginary slights came in his way. Few writers can accomplish so much without being occasionally dull; but it is perfectly true to say that there is not a dreary or tiresome page in the whole of these two bulky volumes.

Russell's first glimpse into literature was through the magic glass of "Pickwick," bought casually in Dublin. "In five minutes," he wrote, "a new world was open to me; I have been living in it ever since." At the age of twenty his friends hinted that he must be up and stirring, "though no suggestion was made as to what he should be up to or what he should stir;" but the starting-point of his active life was close at hand. His cousin, Robert Russell, on the staff of the Times, needed the assistance of competent men to report election affairs in Ireland, and young Russell then began that career of setting things seen into a frame of words which lasted almost continuously for half a century. Up and down the land he went, witnessing all the excitement of Irish elections that were "saturated and highly flavoured with whisky," narrowly escaping duckings and maltreatment, and doubtless hugely enjoying himself. Then came a visit to London to see the elder Delane, who, strange to say, did not at once secure him. Russell actually accepted the post of junior mathematical master at Kensington Grammar-school, but very soon began a spell of free-lancing, at the mercy of London editors. Mr. Atkins does not say whether any of his immature stories and articles are preserved, but they would make interesting reading in the light of after-events.

One more, however, the Times came to his rescue, and Russell took his place on the staff as a reporter in the Press Gallery of the House of Commons. At the bidding of his chief—J. T. Delane—he went to Ireland and described the Repeal Agitation, following this by reporting the trial of O'Connell. From Dublin to London with the verdict was probably his first serious emergency-run: it proved also a preliminary to his first severe lesson, for after his journey by special boat and train he was trapped by an apparently casual remark made to him by some men in shirt-sleeves at the very door of the Times offices. He replied indiscreetly, only to repent heartily the next morning, when he discovered that they were emissaries of the Morning Herald, and had thus secured the news which he had so laboriously brought! "We would have given hundreds of pounds," said Delane, "to have stopped your few words last night."

The story of Russell centres, of course, in the Crimean War, and more fascinating than any romance is the portion of this biography which deals with those exciting and terrible times. At the age of thirty-four, having won his spurs by his steadily excellent work, he was requested to proceed to Malta with the Guards; while there, the news came that an advance of the combined expeditionary armies of France and England was to be made, and, little dreaming what was in store, Russell followed them. For a considerable time nothing really happened in the way of conflict, and the need to write frequent letters to his paper, says Mr. Atkins, was a test of his abilities as a correspondent:—

> Many journalists in such circumstances would have felt that they were out for a war or nothing; that so long as war did not begin there was "nothing to write about." Russell perceived that not only was everything interesting, but everything was relevant. Nothing was too small for him to notice; the incidents of the streets, the conversations of the soldiers, the appearance of the amazingly mixed population, the scenery, the agriculture, the flora and fauna. All these things were made the background of a running narrative of extraordinary ease and vivacity. This result was not produced, of course, by mere industry in retailing what he saw; he had a scholarly mind and humour; the one saved him from treating small matters without dignity, and the other made his choice of material perfectly appropriate and well proportioned. . . .
>
> He "reported" the war, yet in a very genuine sense he was a critic of astonishing acumen and efficiency. In encompassing this combination of values his letters were a new thing in journalism. They were a model of what such letters should be. Every reader of them in the Times felt that he had the movements, the sufferings, the aspirations of the Army—nay, the very ground on which the troops were camped—presented before his eyes.

In this luminous passage, which illustrates the author's admirably clear and forceful style, is summed up the appeal which Russell's letters made to his readers. His character comes out in them. He is angry at the sorrows and sufferings of others—anxious to relieve them; he sees the glaring faults in the administration of the troops, and fears no condemnation for his direct and outspoken words. "The management is infamous," he wrote to Delane from Gallipoli, where he had landed with the Light Division; but he was to behold many things far worse than mere mismanagement. His landing at the scene of operations was inauspicious. Unable to find his friends, unable to return to the ship, he "crept under a cart and spent the night listening to the splash of the rain, the thunder of the surf, and the striking of the ship's bells." Before dawn he woke from a troubled doze to see the red glow from burning houses in the direction of Sebastopol.

It is curious to note the high-handed way in which war correspondents were treated in those days. Russell, backed by the first newspaper in London, was ordered here and there, found himself generally in the way, regarded as an interloper who had no business to be at the seat of war at all. Sir De Lacy Evans told him to "get attached to something or other," but when he began following Lord Raglan's cavalcade an A.D.C. came up and worried him off :—

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

> "You mustn't stay here, I tell you. There are orders for everyone to get out of this." Russell entreated in vain. "I'll send Sir John [Burgoyne] to you, I will, if you don't go." "I never," says Russell, "was in a more unpleasant position. Everyone else on the field had some raison d'être. I had none. They were on recognised business. It could scarcely be a recognised or legitimate business for any man to ride in front of the Army in order that he might be able to write an account of a battle for a newspaper. I was a very fly in amber."

But the art of war correspondence was then in its infancy; present-day speed was unknown. Russell writes from Balaclava, for example, that he is certain "a telegraph might be dispatched from the Crimea and received in London in a hundred hours at farthest."

Very much of the interest of this record is embodied in the various letters which Mr. Atkins freely reproduces, and which, in many instances, are printed for the first time. In one from Alexander Soyer, the famous French chef, who was superintending the food system of the expedition, we have an especially pleasant reminiscence of Miss Florence Nightingale, who so recently passed away :—

> Miss Nightingale, who intended to visit with me the Camp Hospital on Monday, was, I am sorry to say, detained on board from sudden indisposition, being attacked with the premonitory symptoms of Crimean fever. Mr. Taylor was in attendance upon her, and called in medical assistance—Drs. Anderson and Sutherland ordering her immediate removal to the Castle Camp Hospital, where she remains. She was conveyed upon a stretcher by eight men. Mr. Bracebridge and I being out of the way, Taylor accompanied, holding an umbrella over her to keep the sun off her face, and to-day we hear she is a little better.

On the part which Russell played in awakening the people at home to the real state of affairs we need not enlarge; it is a matter of history. His plain-speaking letters roused the land, and, naturally, made for him plenty of enemies; on September 27th, 1856, the Secretary for War wrote to Gladstone trusting that the Army would "lynch the Times correspondent when they read his letter of yesterday." But Russell lived to be hailed as the saviour of the British Army, and most of his enemies came to admire him. In chapter xix. Mr. Atkins discusses whether Russell was unjust to Lord Raglan in his strictures, and concludes that he was not. "Russell could never have written with malice, because he had not not a grain of malice in his nature. He was animated in the Crimea by the simplest emotions—a vast pity and a generous indignation." At the same time the author is impartial, and admits that there were times when Russell drew wrong conclusions from what he saw—"He was human—very human—and he was an Irishman." To remember the conditions under which an enormous amount of his writing was done is to pardon him for any slips. After many wearying hours spent on the field, he had to set down his impressions when the troops were sleeping; his thoughts must often have formed a very scattered fleet. By day, by night, under every conceivable hindrance, he had to write, and the wonder of it is that his letters were so readable and lucid. We have his essential character in three lines later on:—"So long as he satisfied his scruples by publishing what seemed to him to be the truth, he was splendidly indifferent to the personal discomfort which might follow."

The lecturing tour which he entered upon after his return to England was not much to his taste, although he was then brought into contact with many eminent men—Palmerston, Thackeray, Dickens, Jerrold, Ainsworth, and others. On the last day of the year 1857 Russell was in the Mediterranean on his way to investigate for the Times the state of affairs in India. During this campaign the treatment meted out to him by those in authority was of a very different quality from the slighting methods of Raglan. "Now, Mr. Russell," said Sir Colin Campbell, after greeting him frankly and cordially. "I'll be candid with you. We shall make a compact. You shall know everything that is going on; you shall know all my reports and get every information that I have myself, on the condition that you do not mention it in camp or let it be known in any way, except in your letters to England." Russell accepted the conditions, and Colin Campbell would visit his tent "at all times of the day or night with papers and explain the position of affairs." It was a fine tribute to the honour and esteem in which Russell was held.

The Mutiny and its accessory episodes came near to being the death of Russell. A thrilling description of his escape from the enemy, while yet ill and suffering from the kick of a restive stallion, is given in his own words; his constitution must have been marvellously strong to recover after such a fearful strain. Coming home once more, he was set to the task of leader-writing by the indefatigable Delane, and found the confinement an irksome contrast to the freedom of his previous life. To a great extent the story of Russell is the story of Delane. The character of that potentate of journalism is exhibited finely in the many letters which are quoted. The friendship between the two men was as firm as a friendship could be; but Delane never hesitated to give his friend a "wigging" when he considered it necessary; remarkably neat and pungent wiggings some of them are, too :—

> "I don't think," he wrote, upon receiving a particular review from Russell, "you have given yourself anything like time to write this last article. It is full of small points of detail, but contains no such general summing-up of the book as the public will naturally expect. Pray look it all over again, and let me have a separate 'But to conclude.'"
>
> Delane had no notion that it was right for a reviewer to be clever rather than to be informing and clear. He could not tolerate that a writer should gratify his ambitions at the expense of his reader; to produce the most brilliant criticism which left the reader in some doubt as to the contents of the book was, to his mind, simply perverse; the review must state clearly the matter and manner of the book. The reader should be enabled to say, "Now I know what that book contains and how it is written," rather than "Whoever wrote that review is an uncommonly clever fellow."

In 1861, in spite of the fact that Russell was editor of the Army and Navy Gazette, which he had founded in conjunction with Messrs. Bradbury and Evans, he again resumed the profession so dear to his heart, as special correspondent of the Times to the American Civil War. Here he proved that his deductions were not invariably accurate, writing in his diary to the effect that he was "more satisfied than ever that the Union can never be restored as it was." More than once he became embroiled in serious troubles, sometimes through his unfailing integrity and his refusal to colour an event in the slightest, at other times from his desire to reassure a friend—as when his innocent telegram to Sam Ward was misconstrued into an advice to speculate on the Stock Exchange. It was a rash and thoughtless telegram, sent on the joyous impulse of the moment, and it came near to ruining his reputation. His report of the battle of Bull Run was fearless, as usual, and when the English papers arrived the Northern journals simply raved at him, execrated him, and made it distinctly questionable whether he was wise in remaining at his post. He became known as "Bull-Run Russell," was shot at, jeered at, abused, and advised to "clear out." The New York Times stood by him, but, as Mr. Atkins remarks, this was only a "whisper in the storm."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

During a comparatively restful period in this restless career, Russell reported the laying of the Atlantic cable on board the Great Eastern, being the only journalist present; he became also an intimate friend of the second Duke of Wellington, and met Disraeli. His diary is quoted on one occasion when he was staying at Strathfield Saye with the Duke:—

> Dizzy in great force after dinner. Talked of Tycho Brahe, Copernicus, Euler, Kepler, Galileo, and Ptolemaic systems to our wonder, till Calcraft suggested he was lecturing, and John Hay shrewdly hit on the fact that he was only repeating a part of the speech that he was to have made if he had been elected Rector of the University of Edinburgh! He does not shoot, and does nothing at all but spy into books.

Delane was at him again in 1866, demanding imperiously an answer to his request that Russell should proceed to the seat of hostilities, as "Special" with one of the armies, in the Austro-Prussian upheaval. The answer was given, and he started from London on June 20th. Here we must note with pleasure the way in which Mr. Atkins contributes a brief summary of the situation and of the reasons for each campaign, for the benefit of his readers. Not every one has the necessary points of history at his fingers' ends, and the page or two of explanation before the story is resumed refreshes the memory to just the requisite extent. Russell was soon back, but after an attempt to enter Parliament (in which he opposed Sir Charles Dilke—then Mr. C. Dilke—for Chelsea) he was once more a special correspondent of the Times, in 1870, to the Franco-German War. In this conflict he realised for the first time that war correspondence was a very different matter from the letter-writing of the Crimean days. Reuter's telegraph agency had come into existence; the forces of electricity were being harnessed more and more; news was flashed home in an hour or two, even including delays, which in the olden times would have taken several days of travel by land and sea. Competition was keen; correspondents of other papers were on the spot. Archibald Forbes was distinguishing himself for the Daily News, and was eclipsing Russell in a way that made the staff of the Times gnash their teeth. How Russell ultimately scored and received the congratulations of his paper we must not tell here; suffice it to say that the whole record of his experiences during this world-famous war—his interviews with Bismarck, his residence in besieged Paris—makes the most enthralling reading.

Russell went with the then Prince of Wales to India, as every one knows, reporting the progress of the tour for the Times, but an amusing instance of his rather careless ways is given with regard to the publication of his narrative of that journey. His publishers wrote to him: "Your elaborate corrections have far exceeded all our previous experience or conception. The printer's account has just come in—Cost of original composition of the whole volume, £94 2s. 4d.; cost of corrections and cancelled matter, £473 17s.!"

His last campaign was the Zulu War which began in 1879, and this was undertaken for the Daily Telegraph. He found again no lack of adventures. The wound he had received in India twenty-one years before bothered him, and he suffered an accident while crossing a swollen stream which lamed him for the rest of his days. After this record his life becomes more peaceful, as was only meet; he rests on his laurels, edits the Army and Navy Gazette, and cultivates the amenities of city life. His knighthood, on Lord Rosebery's recommendation, came in 1895, and to the end, which occurred in 1907, he enjoyed the firm and thoughtful friendship of King Edward and Queen Alexandra.

So, strangely enough, this first of Special Correspondents, as he may be justly termed, linked in his own career the old methods and the new, bridged the gap between the time when the actual written letter had to reach the office of the paper and the time when the telegraph flashes the latest news to half the world at once. Finely, indeed, is his individuality brought before us in these pages; we realise that he made his life a success, not through a dominating intellect or an equipment of exceptional scholarship, but by his irresistible personality, his eager desire to be a friend to all who would permit him, his scorn of subterfuge, his utter freedom from the small and petty vices of spite and jealousy. He was "Billy" Russell to his intimates, "My dear old friend," "My dearest of friends," "You very dear old fellow" to many others, and to Delane, whose letters throughout this book are a delight, he was always very much more than a member of the staff. He was a great man in the best sense—that of great-heartedness—and his career has been recorded by one who understands and is in true sympathy with him.

We cannot fairly leave this biography without alluding to the excellent little essay which Mr. Atkins has added, dealing with "The Work and Future of War Correspondents." It is written with great good sense from the point of view of one who has experienced the difficulties and dangers of the profession, and we may quote one paragraph which puts the correspondent's duties clearly:—

> The self-respecting correspondent has an enormously important task; he must be able when he surveys the tangle of contradictory tendencies to pick out, with the help of his experience and his instinct, what is essential. If he picks out what is unessential his narrative will be misleading and probably tedious. His office does not end with merely supplying the news, for that word postulates in itself that he should have the capacity of discriminating between what is true and what is false, what is likely to happen and what unlikely. The power of selection must be cultivated in the correspondent even more than in the artist. He is more than a translator; he is an interpreter.

Mr. Atkins inclines to the opinion that if it was decreed that the telegraph should no longer exist for correspondents "all would still have an equal opportunity to emulate the achievement of Russell; the newspapers would be saved much expense; the serious study of war would be advanced; the standard of writing would possibly become higher; and only the public would be deprived, for the sake of their country, of the means to satisfy their craving for promptly delivered sensations." We agree heartily in deprecating the present eager appetite for lurid reports and theatrical effects, the blatant headline and the screaming print; but the question is, would the public stand it? Our papers, or rather the worst of them, thrive on sensations, and the public have become clamorous for such fare. In any case, however, would not the news soon diffuse itself, since those in authority and their subordinates would receive it immediately from the general commanding at the scene of action? To abolish the war correspondent altogether is, as Mr. Atkins recognises, impossible, but he concludes, sensibly and wisely, that "the task for the future is to remove all the causes of error," so that in the hands of a man like Russell such correspondence "may yield a public service comparable with that of the soldier himself. And this task does not seem to be beyond the reach of ingenuity."

W. L. Randell.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

"FEMINA FECIT"

The Emancipation of Englishwomen. By W. Lyon Blaese. (Constable. 6s. net.)

There are a few passages in this serious and lengthy plea for giving women absolute political equality with men which are worthy of some attention. Firstly, speaking of the early eighteenth century, the writer says:—

> In a society where there was neither railway, nor telegraph, nor telephone, and where a journey from Manchester to London was a more formidable task than a journey from Manchester to Vladivostok at the present day, new ideas of any kind spread with the utmost difficulty.

Again, treating the period of the first Reform Act, the writer instructs us that—

> When the people declared . . . that a Peer had no more right to nominate a member of the House of Commons than a commoner, they meant that . . . a Peer was no better than one of themselves.

Then we learn that Byron drove away the cloud of false ideals, and left a clearer vision of things as they were, "and also cleared the ground of its accumulations of eighteenth-century rubbish." Finally, after Byron, "'delicacy' was not only dead, but damned."

So it is not surprising to be informed that the phrase in the first report of the Ladies' College at Cheltenham pledging that institution to preserve the "modesty and gentleness of the female character" smacks of the "old school." The new school, it would appear, wishes to create a race of women which is immodest and ungentle, and there is every reason, from the evidence of the last few years, to anticipate complete success for this brave enterprise.

As to the passages cited, it is odd to find that there are still human beings who believe that there is any relation between thought, new or old, and the telephone, telegraph, and railway to Manchester. The thinking of the world is a thing quite of another sphere from these unimportant mechanical inventions. It might perhaps be argued plausibly enough, that since men and messages have been diffused, thinking has become both foolish and diffuse; but that question may be left to another time. Then it may be mentioned that peers, qua peers, never possessed the sole right of nominating members of the House of Commons. The privilege of the pocket-borough was open to any man with money. Secondly, the view that the eighteenth century was absurdly "delicate" about women is interesting but entirely ridiculous. The author of "The Emancipation of Englishwomen" should read the "Memoirs of Casanova," on the one hand, and Boswell's "Johnson" on the other. Casanova was a cosmopolitan ruffian and profligate; Johnson a typical John Bull armed with a Prayer-book and a Latin grammar—in neither case is there the slightest approach to the sham sentimental delicacy to which our author alludes. There were drivellers in the eighteenth century as there are drivellers in the twentieth. The former, who talked about "the blushing fair," were silly and vacuous; the latter who babble over the details of Indian Bazaar life are silly, objectionable, and obnoxious to the wellbeing of the State. The notion that Byron, whose whole life was a piece of elaborate play-acting and pretence, whose sentiment is humbug, whose debauchery is vulgar though entertaining, cleared the world's mind of cant is quite exquisitely absurd. There have been men who have written of animal passion with such virile and plain directness that their work is in fact a purgative and wholesome medicine of the soul; the grossest tales of Chaucer are healthy and excellent, and there are pages upon pages of the "Gargantua" and "Pantagruel" that cleanse the spirit. They are strong-smelling stuff, assuredly, but carbolic acid does not exhale the soft odours of the attar of roses. And such writers as these are at the opposite pole to Byron, who infected all Europe with the cant of indelicacy, an even more odious mental disease than the cant of delicacy. One had thought that even schoolgirls had ceased to search the pages of "Don Juan" for delightful impropriety; but it seems that this tradition of the daring and outspoken Byron dies hard.

These matters, however, are not of the highest importance. They show that the author of the book is ignorant of history, letters, and life; still, ex ore infantum; and an unwise person may utter the truth. The writer says that women are rational beings, and that, since all rational beings are entitled to a vote, women should be given the suffrage. Is this a true and valid argument?

Unquestionably it would seem, if you admit the major—that every rational (that is, human) being is entitled to a share in the making of the laws of his country. This premise is the premise of all Liberalism; and no man has a logical right to call himself a Liberal and vote against "Votes for Women." The Liberal who has a grain of sense left in his head does vote against female suffrage; but this is a case of instinct overruling the rational faculty. In the same way the American colonists solemnly declared that all men are born free and equal. They did not except negroes in theory, but they did in practice. Hence Johnson was able to ask, "How is it that we hear the loudest yelps for liberty amongst the drivers of negroes?" Later in the history of the American Colonies a situation arose which made the enfranchisement of the negro a convenient stroke on the part of the Northern States; so Lincoln, with perfect consistency as an American citizen, with amazing folly as a human being, declared that every black man was a voter. Now let it be noted clearly that a negro is as much a human being as Plato, or Confucius, or St. Paul, or Alexander the Great, or St. Theresa; he may say truly and freely "Homo sum." So, by Lincoln's decree and under the protection of the armies of the North, he voted for four or five years, and controlled several States in the South. He brought these States to the verge of ruin and bankruptcy; the armies of the North went North—and the revolvers of the South did the rest. Liberal logic had worked itself out to its legitimate conclusion. This conclusion was perceived to be intolerable; and though Southern farmers may still say with their lips that all men are born free and equal, they take care to except in practice those men who have black faces.

It is probable that if women get the vote much the same results will follow—that the mass of female voters will fall under the influence of a set of scheming and ingenious male rascals, just as the poor blacks were made the tools of the Northern carpet-baggers, and that the false premise, here as in America, will work itself out through every kind of fantastic extravagance to its legitimate end of ruin and disaster.

The whole question of Women's Suffrage is so often debated on arguments that are no arguments that it seems permissible for once in a way to treat it on the ground of final principles. One is told that Miss This was a Senior Wrangler, that Mrs. That is a skilled surgeon, that many a man is a sot, that many a man is a criminal, that many a man is an evident fool. So one might propose the abolition of the sheep-dog because some collies are useless and others vicious, while sheep have never been known to bite. Then there are the "arguments" on the other side—that women should not have the vote because they are delicate creatures and can't fight, because if you want a good cook you get a male chef, because drapers' shops are kept by men, because ladies prefer dresses made by a man tailor. The "reasons" on the one side are as imbecile as those on the other, and some of them have no foundation in fact. On the bad side and the good women have fought as well as men—Joan of Arc and the Maid of Saragossa, the pétroleuses of the Commune and the raging female Nihilists are examples that women can wield weapons. And ability in the kitchen or in the tailor's workroom is in reality no evidence of political capacity.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

As has been said on the Liberal premise, the premise of democracy—one rational human being, one vote—the demand of the enraged female is irresistible. Practice, however, has shown that the Liberal premise is false. Every real democracy has come, and will come, to ruin and destruction. In ancient history great and glorious Athens gabbled itself into defeat and disaster; in modern history the United States, professedly democratic, has become corrupted into the most shameless plutocracy that the world has ever seen. Beginning with that famous "free and equal" declaration, it has worked out the syllogism so exquisitely that "politician" in America has every connotation of shame and scoundrelism and nameless wickedness. We may justly argue, therefore, that the Liberal supposition is shown to be false by a kind of catholic reductio ad nefandum et absurdum. And, therefore, the premise failing, the conclusion fails also; women should not have the vote simply because they are rational human beings. But it may be said that since, rightly or wrongly, the democratic theory is in possession, we should carry it out logically. Since John Styles the gardener can make a cross and help to determine the destinies of his country, should not Lady Clara Vere de Vere, John's mistress, have the same privilege? No; unless having a pretty bad indigestion you proceed to eat a few tenpenny nails; or, being very drunk, order a fresh bottle of brandy—on logical principles. Our state is bad; there is no reason why we should make it worse by adding to a voting-list chiefly composed of emotional and ignorant and puzzle-headed people a few hundred thousand more puzzle-headed, ignorant, and emotional people who happen to wear petticoats.

And then, again, there is another point, and an important one. In America, as we have seen, "politician" means rascal. It does not mean that in England, so far; but it does mean in the great majority of instances dreary and windy bore, sham logician, insincere and gabbling humbug. The great statesman can be a politician in public, and live in private amongst his friends his own life, which is quite unsuspected by the vulgar. But the ordinary man who gets this rabid nonsense of politics into his brain becomes the terror of his club or of his tavern; his whole being deteriorates, he neglects all the true interests of life for the dismal trash of political debate. The big man is like the actor who can play Iago and then proceed merrily to the Green Room Club and be the best of company; the little man is Iago for every hour of the twenty-four.

And it seems a pity to poison, and corrupt, and destroy the source of all beauty and every Art with the driest, dreariest of all the delusions with which the wretched race of men has been afflicted since it was driven from the flaming portals of the Lost Garden.

It has often been urged that women have accomplished singularly little in the region of the arts. This, in a sense, is true; there have been very few supreme women-musicians, poets, architects, painters, or sculptors. But those who know see beneath every masterpiece the words "femina fecit;" and it is this fountain of beauty that the foolish suffrage-manaics are endeavouring to pollute and destroy.

ARTHUR MACHEN.

A GROUP OF FRENCHWOMEN

Les Grandes Amoureuses. By GASTON DERYS. (Louis Michaud, Paris. 3f. 50c.)

Ninon de Lenclos. By ARNOULD GALOPIN. (Albin Michel, Paris. 3f. 50c.)

La Générale Bonaparte. By JOSEPH TURQUAND. (Tallandier, Paris. 6f.)

THE study of the lives of notable (and notorious) Frenchwomen of a bygone age has been of late years elevated almost to the proportions of a genre in literature. We are not quite sure to whom the personal credit of this phenomenon is due, but we are inclined to assign it, after making certain reservations in respect to chronology, to the brothers Goncourt. Genre-painting is admittedly not the loftiest kind of art, and there are few people who would place among the gods either the Goncourts or their precursor and perhaps master, Stendhal, for whose pen it is the custom of the modern biographer of this sort to long at least once in a volume. Another of his chers maîtres is naturally Sainte-Beuve, inventor of the modern genre of literary biography, though master of a far wider domain than most of his successors. More strangely we find the name of St. Augustine invoked over and over again by writers whose researches lead them into the kingdoms of love. In one of the present volumes, and the one that contains the warmest homage to this Father of the Church, we find held up for our admiration that extraordinary state of mind which may be described as being in love with the idea of love—a state of mind that Augustine, from the heights of his maturer wisdom, has explicitly condemned.

That the Frenchwoman should have been singled out from the whole of womankind to serve as model to a thousand artists of various capacities is a matter of history, and is, in a broad way, easily explicable. Vivacity and gaiety, characteristics of the whole French race, manifest themselves most graciously in the case of woman. In far-off pre-Suffragette days French women organised themselves not to compete with French men, but to civilise their common nation. The Hôtel de Rambouillet crystallised subsequently into the Salon, the salons became numerous, and an element of competition came to stimulate their energies; their civilising mission began to extend beyond the boundaries of France. English letters, for instance, owe a certain debt to the eighteenth-century salon. Literature was not the only field of feminine enterprise; the administration of the State, invaded in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, was conquered, in all but externals, in the eighteenth, to be lost again under the Empire. We are far from wishing to say that this was a satisfactory state of affairs. We find, on the contrary, that the increase of female power was made at the expense of male efficiency, and that the result was disastrous. Men were a commodity sadly lacking in eighteenth-century France; the few that make some stir in history largely owe their position to their relations with women.

"LES GRANDES AMOUREUSES."

M. Gaston Dery's work contains lives of Mlle. de Lespinasse, Marie Mancini, La Clairon, and Mme. de Tencin. The choice of subjects is characteristic; the method of dealing with them is more or less consecrated; it reminds us of a game of ninepins, with its complementary pleasures of setting up and knocking down. At least this may fairly be said of the last three, all perverse subjects, of various calibres. The choice of Julie de Lespinasse is more difficult to explain, except that she has become a sort of saint to the literary amorist. The present biographer seems to regard the more dispassionate of his numerous predecessors as guilty of sacrilege. We do not think the admirable work of M. de Ségur need fear his censures.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Ninon de Lenclos.

The story of Ninon de Lenclos has been told a good many times, but it is a story that deserves to be read once by every one, and M. Galopin's version is certainly readable. For one thing, it is very short, as far as the actual biography goes, and it is well and appositely illustrated. But the best feature of the volume is a collection of the letters of Ninon to the Marquis de Sévigné, letters of so admirable a quality that the good and talented Marquise might have found other grounds for rivalry with their writer than the affections of her son. The letters all deal with one subject—love: not as between the two correspondents; they are rather the opinions of an expert given to a novice who, having fallen in love, wishes to have the benefit of her experience. Ninon is not perverse; she has formed for herself a peculiar view of life, and she lived up to it with consistency and, we might almost say, with propriety. "Je me suis faite homme" is her own formula. Her wit was of the most brilliant order; Molière told her she could have bettered the "Tartufe," and he was probably sincere in his praise. Her maxims are as good as those of her friend La Rochefoucauld. She was in touch with all that was great in her century, and she helped to form Voltaire for the next.

La Générale Bonaparte.

M. Turquand's book on Joséphine de Beauharnais is a serious piece of history. He has a principle, which he proudly prints upon the title-page:—"L'Histoire et non la Légende." The Legend of which he wishes to dispose is the character of Joséphine as a pattern for devoted wives. But, unfortunately for Turquand's originality, others have been there before him; at the present stage of the controversy between Napoleon and his consort the balance is all in favour of the Corsican; book after book has appeared to point out the shortcomings of the first Empress of the French, the most noteworthy being M. Masson's "Napoléon et les Femmes," and the present enterprise seems rather like tilting at a mill. For all that the book is very interesting, as giving, within well-defined limits, the sequence of events which raised the frivolous, underbred, and under-educated Créole to be the wife of him who was first the great General of the Republic, then First Consul and then Consul for life. It also shows us how it became possible that she should fall from these heights, from the mere fact that they were so steep. M. Turquand does not take us as far as the Empire and the divorce; he also spares us the tedious account of the early years of Joséphine and her first marriage. He plunges in medias res with a slight but graphic description of Directoire society, a narrative of the wooing of Napoleon, and an analysis of the motives of the two parties to the marriage. Then follows the love-correspondence of the newly-wedded pair, and, though M. Turquand here joins hands rather too much for our liking with the Stendhal school, we cannot help feeling that it is the most interesting part of the book. "You!—and the rest of the world has no more existence for me than if it had been annihilated;" "The world is only beautiful to my eyes because you are in it"—such are some of the lyrical outpourings of the heart of Napoleon. Then comes disillusionment: "The whole world is but too happy if it can please you, and your husband alone is very unhappy." This is two or three days after Arcola!

There is little doubt that Napoleon was treated with extreme infidelity by his wife on more than one occasion. There is no doubt, moreover, that she would have ruined him subsequently with her extravagance had he not had the resources of the State to draw on. Her habit of taking bribes for the Army contracts nearly led to a disaster. She did more than this: she received a pension from Fouché to spy on her husband. What is strange is that this curious pair settled down eventually to an existence of solid affection, only to be broken by the raison d'état. Another surprising thing is the success of Joséphine at the head of a Court; but this success, strange as it may seem, is incontestable. She is one of the three principal factors in the realisation of a Consular Court; the others were the unexampled national prosperity and the efforts of that old courtier Talleyrand. It was a Court that might have been laughed out of existence at the outset. At first, for instance, there were no carriages; cabs, with the numbers covered over, served for the receptions. And yet out of it sprang the brilliant Imperial Court. M. Turquand is rather irritating when he continues to harp on the sarcastic string. Page after page we find the "elle était si bonne, cette Joséphine" at the end of some incident exhibiting her heartlessness. But he rejects stupid and useless scandals, and in such a way that we do not return to them to wonder if they are true. On the whole, he has written an interesting work and an undeniably painstaking one.

A DISILLUSIONED TRAVELLER

Japan for a Week. (Britain for Ever.) By A. M. Thompson. Illustrated. (John Lane. 5s.)

Mr. Thompson has chosen to write a necessary book in unnecessary language. That is to say, the standpoint from which he views his subject is considerably more bracing than the crude way he gives it expression. But not only is his style crude. Being this it might yet be the expression of some degree of dignity. It is cheap, which is a sufficiently condign punishment of any book. Whatever Mr. Thompson lacks, he does not lack temerity. To write, as he does, with the voice if not the substance of authority after but a week's hurried visit through a country full of problems is a "tripper's" exploit indeed. In extenuation for Mr. Thompson be it said that less than a hundred of his 250 pages are taken up with its title-subject of Japan. The greater bulk of it treats of the tour in which Japan was but a week's parenthesis.

Germany, Russia, Siberia, Japan, China, the route home by the Red Sea, Blatchfordism—that is the scope of this book, despite the Japanese insignia blazoning the cover, and its interest lies in the fact that the author has not borne with him the customary sentimentalities of the traveller. He has prejudices enough, but they are at least refreshing by reason of their novelty. As an instance of this happy detachment may be cited his description of the Cathedral of Basil the Happy in Moscow. To him it is an "architectural monstrosity." He will give it no tribute of sentimental rapture. "It violates every notion of harmony and beauty," he writes. "It is an artistic nightmare." The things, moreover, to which the hardened traveller is accustomed awake him to fury—such as, for instance, the indignities of Customs or the modern enormity of police surveillance of foreigners in Russia. Nor are these unimportant points. Such matters lend the personal note, and make the value of the volume. Moreover, they add a further value—a value, as one might say, en route—for they are earnest that when Mr. Thompson comes to the main theme of his book he will not be inclined to take things for granted. This cannot but whet the appetite of a reader, for Japanese subjects are beginning to be treated with such uniform sameness that one is driven to doubt the truth of the picture presented.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Nor is this earnest belied by subsequent discovery. It was not only a Japan of picturesque lanterns, graceful wistaria, significant temples, and pretty mousmés overhung by a perpetually awe-inspiring Fujiyama, that Mr. Thompson discovered in the Far East. He discovered a country working at high pressure from four o'clock in the morning till ten and eleven at night, its inhabitants miserably paid for the most part, the women doing the heaviest drudgery and receiving the poorest of remuneration; a country with an enormous percentage of prostitution, with accompanying disease; aping European civilisation but clinging to all the crudities of the Eastern social polity; with the mass of its population lacking even the simplest of education, and superstitious to a degree; a country in which a canker was at work, destroying the people's pristine love of beauty and simplicity, bringing with it the results of a culture alien to its own, without passing it through the processes that alone make those results worth the having.

It is as though a child were advanced suddenly into manhood without any of the tuition of experience. Instead of one beauty succeeding naturally to another beauty, it is beauty suddenly smitten to ugliness. In fact, the external fact regarding Japan as a nation has its ideograph in the very lives of its peoples. The keen pressure for premature maturity in national experience has not only destroyed Japan as a national expression, it is ruining the lives of its units. To use Mr. Thompson's own words:—

> The wrinkled, mummified, old, old faces and bent backs of the old people in the streets had begun, too, to prey upon my imagination. There appeared to be no middle-aged people in Japan. From the chattering, light-hearted, sturdy young rickshaw boys and giggling waitresses of the hotel. Japanese humanity seemed to drop in one sudden débâcle to senility and decrepitude. The workers here evidently cannot become "too old at forty," for none of them seem to attain to that age; those that have passed twenty, especially the women, look about a hundred.

Allowing for Mr. Thompson's unfortunately exaggerative manner of writing, there is deep truth in this; the units of a nation cannot have more than their national expression, and the nation itself has known no middle-age. It was found in its childhood's love of simple great things by the mature, not altogether wisely mature, civilisation of a different hemisphere. Japan determined to achieve that civilisation, and in a surpassingly short space of time succeeded. But it succeeded at the cost of all its naïveté, its health, its stature, and its just and proper national expression. These are things it is well to recognise about our ally in the East. Of the subtler and more invidious question of the disease that is corrupting the nation, Mr. Thompson does not speak. Indeed, it is very doubtful if his short visit would serve to bring this before him; but it is a deep and peculiar problem.

On the question of the degradation of woman (and its acutest feature, the extraordinary facility of divorce afforded to husbands) he has some fitting words to say. "In this one respect," he says, "Japan remains as Oriental as Turkey." This is a confusing sentence at best. The Oriental treatment of women, taken as extending from Asia Minor to the far Pacific, is a sufficiently varied one to require differentiation. In some ways the Japanese treatment is considerably lower in the scale than the Turkish. It could scarcely be said in Turkey, for instance, that a man divorced wife after wife to the number of ten "before finding the perfectly gentle and obedient slave demanded by his fastidious taste," having possibly burdened them all with the support of children. A nation that gives its women rank somewhere between cattle and men is foredoomed to failure unless it learns to mend the error of its ways.

Possibly because of the time of the year Mr. Thompson chose for his visit he does not appear to have been much taken with what is still beautiful in Japan. He does not give the charm of the Inland Sea less than its just due, but he is noticeably deficient with regard to the beauties elsewhere to be observed. He is right, however, in refusing to see beauty where social conditions are abject and miserable. It might have been that the writer of the following witticism was one scarcely temperamentally adapted to the discovery of natural beauty. He is on his return journey in the straits of Malacca, which prompts him to a display of humour: "The heat," he says, "at this point was so terrific that I was too sleepy to sit up to my meals, and on several occasions I had to hire deck-hands to smoke my cigars for me. According to Courtneidge, who is an old and experienced traveller, we were now 'within sight of the Equator,' but though I borrowed his new marine-glasses - and, by the way, forgot to return them—I am not really sure that I saw it!" The illustrations in this book are good, as far as they go, but they are somewhat incomplete.

LECKY'S "EUROPEAN MORALS"

History of European Morals from Augustus to Charlemagne. By W. E. H. Lecky. (Longmans, Green and Co. 2s. 6d. net.)

Nearly forty-two years have elapsed since this famous work came from Lecky's brilliant pen, and Messrs. Longmans have now issued it in a new edition at a purely nominal price. The two volumes are bound together in one, which, as it contains over nine hundred pages of print, is somewhat bulky, though at the same time we find it pleasantly light, and even easy, to handle.

The principal question to be considered on re-examining a work of this character, so many years after its original publication, is whether it has stood the test of time in such a way as to remain an adequate presentment of its subject, in spite of the advances made in historical knowledge and the progress of human thought. In that connection it may be mentioned that Lecky subjected his text to a minute and careful revision for an edition produced in 1877; and, in spite of the long period which has since gone by, we find, on now reperusing the revised text, that in all essential respects the book remains emphatically a live one, such, indeed, as no writer of the present time, dealing with any of the numerous subjects which it embraces, could possibly afford to ignore. It covers, as its title indicates, so vast a field that in some respects it could never, even under the best circumstances, completely satisfy the more zealous student and inquirer; but even in those instances it conveys a large variety of information and stimulates one to further and more precise research. By the light which it sheds on the morals, the religions, the philosophies, the manners and the customs of the ancient world, it comes well within the category of those works which Mr. Ellis Ashmead-Bartlett, in a recent brilliant article in this journal, so aptly defined as belonging to True History. Take, for instance, the long, but by no means too long, chapter on the Conversion of Rome. As you read it you feel yourself carried back to the very time when the events which are recounted were taking place.

There is just one matter on which, to our thinking, Lecky might well have enlarged, while he was picturing the morals of the pagan and Christian Empires. Dean Merivale once laid down the proposition that the bases of human society were money and matrimony, and that everything depended on the right use of money and the right relations of the sexes. Now the earlier editions of Mommsen's History of Rome had already appeared before this work of Lecky's was published, and Mommsen had pointed out how largely questions of finance and economics had influenced both social and political occurrences in the Roman world. Of more recent years several Italian scholars, notably Cicotti and Salvioli, have fully investigated that subject, and by the light of modern research and discovery, the decline and fall of Rome can no longer be pictured exactly as Gibbon pictured it. The relation between money and morals is obvious; but although Lecky by no means ignored it, we feel that in the work before us he did not allot to this particular part of his theme nearly so much space as it really deserved. On the relations of the sexes, however, he wrote amply, firmly, and precisely, though without any offensiveness; and his section on the position of women in ancient society is particularly illuminating. It was quoted by more than one witness at the sittings of the recent Commission on the Divorce Laws; and it should also appeal to all who are in any way interested in the various Feminist movements of the present time.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

On some other points one may not always agree with Lecky's views, but much that will enlighten the mind or stimulate it to think is to be found in the pages of this graphically written and learned book; and Messrs. Longmans are to be thanked for having now placed it within the reach of the great mass of the reading public.

MODERNISM AND THE RESURRECTION

The Resurrection Narratives and Modern Criticism. By Thomas James Thorburn, D.D., LL.D. (Kegan Paul and Co. 6s. net.)

This work is a masterly critique of Professor Schmiedel's article, "Resurrection Narratives," in the "Encyclopædia Biblica," on the theory of Subjective Hallucinations, based upon the Vision theory of Strauss and Renan. The writer, not without reason, traverses certain canons of modern criticism, and primarily that petitio principii involved in the assumption of "the impossibility, and therefore the utter unreality, of the (so-called) supernatural." But, as he justly observes, "if there be no 'supernatural,' what need for any discussion of such matters at all? In such a case we admit the necessary inference at once; quæstio cadit, and religion is an empty dream." So we are reminded of Professor Huxley's aphorism: "I am unaware of anything that has a right to the title of an 'impossibility,' except a contradiction in terms." But some of the German and other negative critics start with a syllogism after this sort: The Resurrection story involves the supernatural: there is no supernatural—ergo, it must be hallucination. Next, with great ingenuity and painful industry, they seek out every discrepancy that can be found in the various contemporary narratives. Schmiedel has "improved" upon Reimarus by discovering twenty to the ten of the "Wolfenbüttel Fragments." Dr. Thorburn shows that the majority of these, so far from being insurmountable, are valuable in themselves as evidence against that sort of collusion on the part of witnesses which belongs to a too carefully prepared accuracy. To our thinking, the differences among critics themselves are highly significant. They are ever shifting their ground. Some attack each other even more caustically than they impeach the Evangelists. If we set Neander and Renan against Paulus and Strauss, or the holders of the Apparition theory and those who believe in theories of Fraud or Conspiracy, we find that the criticisms "absurd" or "impossible" are used by critics of each others' views quite as readily as of the Gospel discrepancies. In considering the theory of Hallucination Dr. Thorburn discusses at some length the probable conditions of mind of the Apostles consequent upon the catastrophe of the Crucifixion, which he believes were "certainly not conditions favourable to that receptivity of mind, that ecstatic state, which is so fruitful in visions, and other creations of the 'subjective' mind. In short, we can see none of the conditions which might favour such an hypothesis. There is panic and confusion and doubt and anxiety—the only certainty being (apparently) that the Cause was lost—but no signs of even unconscious preparation for a complete system of self-delusion, and the reconstruction under new conditions of a shattered ideal."

Professor Schmiedel makes an amazing statement when he says: "There is to be drawn from the various accounts one deduction, which goes very deep—no words were heard from the risen Jesus." Dr. Thorburn supposes that he "means that the reported words are not credible." But surely reported words have as much claim to credibility, on the hallucination hypothesis, as reported visions. Professor Schmiedel's method of criticism becomes unsound, when he separates hallucinations of the ear from those of the eye. He also fails to grasp the distinction between the natural (ψυχικόν) body and the spiritual (πνευματικόν) body, for he argues "that Jesus was buried, and that He has been raised cannot be affirmed by any one who has not the re-animation of the body in view." That was the resurrection of Lazarus, with his identical material body, which subsequently died again. And, as Dr. Thorburn well points out, such a resurrection would be no phantasm of hallucination, but a mere revivification of the former body. Setting aside the alternative idea of resurrection of the spirit only, Dr. Thorburn states that Christian doctrine which Professor Schmiedel considers quite inconceivable—belief in the Pauline teaching of a spiritual body. And as Professor Mahaffy has observed, it was the preaching of that doctrine of the Resurrection which reformed the world.

In his able criticism, we think that Dr. Thorburn has fairly shown that certain of Professor Schmiedel's theories are destructive of each other, and that, "to be consistent, he should take his place amongst those who deny the very historic existence of Jesus."

FANTASY AND PARODY

Diminutive Dramas. By Maurice Baring. (Constable and Co. 4s. 6d. net.)

The author of the entertaining "Dead Letters" has an unerring touch on the keys of comedy—that delicate instrument which can be so mishandled and maltreated by inexpert or careless players—and throughout these dramas in miniature the reader is kept on the verge of laughter; is stimulated, as it were, to smiles, without ever being provoked to the crude, inopportune guffaw. Classical themes, treated in a style which we might term the jovial-academic were it not that "jovial" seems rather too rotund and rollicking a word for Mr. Baring's wit, form a fairly large proportion of the sketches in this volume, as might be anticipated; but the little modern dialogues and conversations which are interspersed leaven the whole and relieve it from any tendency to monotony.

Parodists have frequently attempted to dazzle our eyes with the flash of mirrors illumined by M. Maeterlinck's bright flame, but Mr. Baring intensifies the light of his

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

"Blue Harlequin" by the nearness of his approach to the original. The scene is a London street—foggy, of course; the properties are those of the antiquated harlequinade; policeman, pantaloon, clown and columbine meet and go through a solemn burlesque in the unmistakable Maeterlinck manner. Better than this, however, is the delightful satire entitled "The Member for Literature," in which Mr. Max Beerbohm, Mr. Hall Caine, Mr. Kipling and Mr. Jerome are supposed to be candidates for election to the House of Commons. They address an audience whose voting is to decide their fate. The speech of the inimitable "Max" is a very pretty bit of fooling; he is extremely anxious not to be elected, and his peroration is greeted by "discreet cheers:"—

> I think I have now lightly shaken by the hand those questions which, as the phrase goes, are at issue, and although I have not given you my reasons in clauses, headings, and sections, I hope I have made it perspicuous to you that I do not wish to be a Member of Parliament, and that were I to be chosen I should not lift my eye-glass to justify your choice; I would not sacrifice the whiff of a cigarette for all the perfumes of St. Stephen's.

Mr. Jerome makes the only popular joke of the evening, and captures a huge majority; the reader may "point the moral and adorn the tale" if he pleases.

Of the extravaganzas set in classic times we like best "Xantippe and Socrates." The idea of a clever but hen-pecked husband whose shrew of a wife distorts his most innocent observations into causes for quarrel, and "nags" him persistently until we wonder that he does not turn and rend her, is not new; but to make Socrates the hen-pecked one is just that touch which Mr. Baring delights to give; without this it might almost be a rarefied fantasy by Mr. Pett Ridge, spoken by a cockney virago and her partner. Some very modern conversations between ancient heroes and heroines are here presented in the same piquant mode. Those who have already seen these "Diminutive Dramas" in the columns of the Morning Post will be glad to glance through them again in this more permanent form, while readers to whom they are unfamiliar may be assured of a recreative hour.

FICTION

Denis Trench: A Plotless History of How He Followed the Gleam and Worked Out His Own Salvation. By Mrs. H. H. Penrose. (Alston Rivers. 6s.)

Mrs. Penrose calls her book a "plotless history," and the reader therefore looks to find one of those interminable chronicles of the smallest of small beer which are sometimes dignified by the name of "studies in prose." He is disappointed, however, and finds plenty of plot and incident, luxurious character-drawing, and a certain quantity of very pleasant humour, which might have been added with a much more liberal hand. Denis Trench and his sister Kitten were left virtual orphans when their father became a Roman Catholic priest and their mother died of the shock. How Denis made his gradual way to literary fame and domestic happiness ("following the gleam" Mrs. Penrose calls the process) is the subject of the book. The latter task proved the more difficult, as Denis sacrificed himself on the altar of matrimony to save the non-existent reputation of an Irish girl whom he met in revisiting the scenes of his childhood. This young lady afterwards gave him a great deal of trouble; but a street accident and a fondness for whiskey at length carried her off, and he was free to marry his poetess. Mrs. Penrose gushes a good deal about her hero's literary achievements, and her way of regarding such matters appears a little artless. In one place we get a charmingly, if unconsciously, humorous glimpse of an editor waiting patiently for—of all things in newspaperdom—a sonnet.

Hawtrey's Deputy. By Harold Bindloss. (Ward, Lock and Co. 6s.)

To whatever corner of the world Mr. Harold Bindloss brings us—and he seems to be familiar with most of them—he may always be trusted to spin a good yarn of adventure and hard work and love, for he is a born story-teller. There is a pleasing directness about his method of narration, and he shows a due regard for the common sense of his readers in drawing his characters, so that we do not feel that we are moving in a world inhabited only by angels and devils. Perhaps he makes too much use of coincidence, and in these sophisticated days it seems a little primitive to involve your male characters in accidents in order to prove the courage of your women; Mr. Bindloss performs this latter feat twice in the book under notice. But these are small strictures when the story as a whole is satisfactory, and we are sure that the author's readers will have no fault to find with "Hawtrey's Deputy" on that score. The scene is laid mainly in Western Canada and Kamtschatka, and there is enough local colour to give the book a convincing background. It should make the author some new friends.

Gilead Balm, Knight Errant: His Adventures in Search of the Truth. By Bernard Capes. Illustrated. (Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

Since he wrote the "Lake of Wine" Mr. Bernard Capes has come a long way, and, like too many of our novelists, he seems to have discarded part of his individuality on the road. "Gilead Balm" is one of those series of short stories linked together by a tenuous plot, of which we understand editors of popular magazines are excessively fond. As a matter of fact it is quite a good example of its class; but though Mr. Capes has had the happy idea of exploiting the agony column to provide his hero with fitting adventures, the volume as a whole does not escape the air of scrappiness that seems inseparable from books founded on this unhappy plan. Yet, considered separately, some of the stories are highly ingenious, and one at all events is thrilling, and we do not doubt that they will please a large number of excellent judges of fiction. On the plane of popular art we would have praised "Gilead Balm" without reserve; but we know that the author is capable of better things.

SHAW ON SHAKESPEARE: AN OPEN LETTER

My dear Shaw—

Once upon a time, it is said, Tolstoi and Turgenief quarrelled, and Tolstoi, the apostle of peace, proposed to decide the question with pistols. At this every one roared with laughter except the two protagonists. You and I, Shaw, had a little difference, and settled it in a round or two of words. Now, long after the heat of conflict has evaporated, you come out with an attack on me six columns long in The Nation, in the guise of a review of my Shakespeare play. Again I accept the challenge, for the game amuses me and the prize will be divided between us. Besides, you are too angry to do yourself justice; you cannot even hit straight. Fancy having to teach the peace-loving Shaw that no one conquers another by slandering and insulting him any more than by beating or killing him! The only way to conquer me, Shaw, is by being more generous to me than I can be to you; surpass me in that, and my arms fall of themselves. But you are angry; you first blow hot and then cold; you compare my book on Shakespeare to

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Darwin's "Origin of Species," and the next moment you talk of it as "a volume of criticism fifteen years late," whatever that may mean. You declare in one breath that everything I write is of "high and peculiar literary quality," and in the next that I have written nothing but "a few short stories" which were not even reviewed by the Philistines—as if that mattered even were it true.

As a critic, Shaw, you reach the nadir. "The treatment" (sic) in my play you assert is "neither modern nor Elizabethan"—or, rather, it is both by turns. Shakespeare sometimes quotes himself and sometimes says such things as "What wine of life you pour!" which comes right dramatically, but is impossible historically. (Shakespeare only once makes a metaphor of wine, when Macbeth, pretending to be horrified at the discovery of Duncan's bleeding corpse, says, "The wine of life is drawn; and the mere lees is left this vault to brag of.") That is, you assert that a saying I've put in Shakespeare's mouth is "impossible historically," and then prove that Shakespeare used the very words.

Now why not have told the truth, Shaw; the phrase "the wine of life" seemed to you "impossible historically," all too modern to be chronologically correct, but when you looked it up you found that I was right. Now if you had simply said this, simply told the truth, the generous acknowledgment would have done you good, freed your liver of the bilious, vain ill-humour which is blinding you, and done me good too; that would have been worthy of Shaw. You preferred the boomerang again: what you thought "impossible historically" merely proves your ill-will. That is what I call hitting your own fists, Shaw, and it is not the way of the great fighters.

Let us confine ourselves to fair hitting—in other words, keep to the facts. You wrote a play and called it "The Dark Lady of the Sonnets." You went out of your way to say in an interview that you owed the character of the "Dark Lady" to Tyler and to the sonnets, and not to me. Your words were, "All the honours must go to Tyler." Forced to defend myself, I proved beyond dispute that you owed the character of your "Dark Lady" not to Tyler nor to the sonnets, but to my work on Shakespeare, and that the title of your play was purposely misleading. You now acknowledge the fact and proceed to heap insults on me and pile mis-statements on mis-statements. You are superior to me, you say, because you read every word I write and crib from me, and my work is "impoverished" by my determination not to crib from you. You are resolved to miss the point, Shaw. I didn't protest against your cribbing from me in your playlet; you cribbed from me ten years ago, in almost every preface to your plays, and I said nothing. I always joyed to see you wearing my livery and doing homage to my intellect. I only protested when you declared in advance that the livery was not mine. Then I tucked your head under my arm and proceeded to demonstrate to you that to fight with your eyes shut to facts was to get hurt. You must not miss this point. It is not the cribbing that I object to—not even the cribbing without acknowledgment—but the cribbing buttressed by mis-statement. You say all able men must crib, and your coat is already a Jacob's coat of many colours; but you must not say that the patch on your coat taken from Darwin is taken from Chambers' "Vestiges of Creation," and you must not say that the trousers you have borrowed from me belonged first to Tyler and not to me; that is not cricket, Shaw, even as the game is played to-day.

That point being clear, we can get on. I've just read your article through again to see if there is anything serious in it, any word that flies straight and quivers arrow-like in the clout. Not one solitary word of criticism, if I'm a judge; here and there a word of praise seems right, but all too grudging—mean. Surely, Shaw, you could have done better than this, helped me a little, put your finger on some oversight or patent blunder. Still, here is your contention. You state that "Shakespeare is not to be found" in my play, but only "the melancholy Dane." I have represented Shakespeare, you declare, "as a snivelling, broken-hearted swain, dying because he was jilted." Shaw! Shaw! Do you really think that misrepresentation can hurt; or would it relieve you to call St. Francis a "snivelling swain"?

But in all your windmill-hitting and excitement you keep driving at this point—that I have presented Shakespeare as too melancholy and too gentle—weak. You don't take into consideration that I am dealing with the middle-aged Shakespeare, who is rallied at the beginning of the play for having lost much of his old gaiety and light-heartedness. But, putting aside the wild hitting, you stand opposed to me, and sum up all your objections in one straight phrase. You say, "All Shakespeare's heroes died game." Here, at any rate, we have a definite statement, not contradicted a paragraph later, but repeated and amplified with stout adjectives. You refer to Hamlet, and talk of Shakespeare as "bullying" and "reviling." Now let us take the tragedies of his maturity one by one and see if you are right.

Brutus is, of course, the hero of "Julius Cæsar," and Brutus dies game, according to Shaw. When Brutus takes farewell of his friends he says:—

> So fare you well at once; for Brutus' tongue
> Hath almost ended his life's history:
> Night hangs upon mine eyes; my bones would rest,
> That have but labour'd to attain this hour . . .

Is there no melancholy here, Shaw—despairing melancholy that longs for rest, that, finds no goal but the grave?

Then take his next speech:—

> I prithee, Strato, stay thou by thy lord:
> Thou are a fellow of a good respect;
> Thy life hath had some smatch of honour in it:
> Hold then my sword, and turn away thy face,
> While I do run upon it. Wilt thou, Strato? . . .

Now I say nothing about the snobbishness which requires Strato as an instrument of death to be honourable and of good respect, but Brutus is a great captain, and he asks his servant, "Wilt thou, Strato?" Surely in the supreme hour the general who dies game orders and does not beg. Brutus, however, is not obeyed by any of his servants, and has to kill himself by running on his own sword. and this is his final word:—

> . . . Cæsar, now be still:
> I killed thee not with half so good a will.

Is this the gentle, melancholy, humane Shakespeare I have painted, or the "bullying, reviling" Shakespeare, whose heroes all "die game," of Bernard Shaw?

Next comes "Hamlet." Hamlet dies, saying to his friend Horatio:—

> If thou didst ever hold me in thy heart,
> Absent thee from felicity awhile,
> And in this harsh world draw thy breath in pain,
> To tell my story . . .

Death is "felicity" then to Hamlet, and to live is "pain;" he will have his story told to the "harsh world." Is this Hamlet the melancholy, gentle-hearted, humane Shakespeare I have depicted, or the "bullying, reviling" Shakespeare who dies game of Shaw? Hamlet goes on:—

> The potent poison quite o'er-crows my spirit:
> The rest is silence.

I like your idea, Shaw, of dying game. Then comes Othello, and here, if anywhere, you should be justified.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Othello was a fighting man, a hero of the swashbuckler sort in the approved Shaw sense. Othello kills himself after a long, pathetic speech, in which he prays the world at large to speak of him as one—

> . . . that loved not wisely, but too well; and his very last words are :—

> . . . no way but this;
> Killing myself to die upon a kiss.

This is Bernard Shaw's idea of dying game. Antony is supposed to be another of the swashbucklering heroes, and Antony dies like Othello. Almost his last words are :—

> Of many thousand kisses the poor last,
> I lay upon thy lips.

All Shakespeare's favourite heroes seem to die on a kiss. And this is Shaw's idea of dying game. From one point of view there is something to be said for the contention; but that point of view is hardly Shaw's.

Poor Lear is killed by Cordelia's death. Kent tells us that he has followed Lear's "sad steps," and the old King dies gazing at his dead daughter :—

> . . . Thou'lt come no more.
> Never, never, never, never, never! . . .
> . . . Look at her, look, her lips.
> Look there, look there!

The lips again, and again Shaw's idea of dying game is to wag grey head in despair and cry, "Never, never, never." . . . This time, Shaw, it looks as if you had knocked yourself out. Or must I show you the melancholy despair of Macbeth and Troilus and Timon? "All Shakespeare's heroes died game." What ridiculous absurdity! All that letter-writing, Shaw, to the Times has dulled your quick intelligence.

In your insane desire to differ from me you have reached a pitch of still wilder madness. You say "to the end there was a mighty music in him (Shakespeare) and outrageous gaiety." Well, the Elizabethan stage, like, indeed, every stage in England, always asked for farce and tomfoolery, always demanded the so-called "comic-relief," as no one knows better than Shaw with his "Chocolate Soldiers" and "Brassbound Captains." Shakespeare tried to provide low farce for his audiences even at the end, even in his last play, "The Tempest." But would Shaw call Caliban, the poor earth-creature who adores the man as a god who gives him drink, a proof of "outrageous gaiety" or drunken Trinculo or Stephano? I think all these are the outcome of Shakespeare's bitterness; but after all the heart of "The Tempest" is not to be found in Caliban, but in Prospero. Now in Prospero one would think that Shakespeare would be at his gayest. Prospero has won his heart's desire; he is going back home to rule, going back to the library he loved "beyond his dukedom," going to witness the "nuptials" of his "dearly beloved" daughter. Surely his joy may now reach "outrageous gaiety." Well, here are his words :—

> And thence retire me to my Milan, where > Every thought shall be my grave.

Your idea of "outrageous gaiety" is funereal. And Prospero goes on in the famous Epilogue which contains Shakespeare's last word to men :—

> Now I want,
> Spirits to enforce, art to enchant,
> And my ending is despair,
> Unless I be relieved by prayer,
> Which pierces so that it assaults
> Mercy itself and frees all faults.
> As you from crimes would pardon'd be,
> Let your indulgence set me free.

This sad-hearted, hopeless appeal, this despairing prayer for mercy is Bernard Shaw's idea of "outrageous gaiety." Now every one can see how much I "impoverish" myself by obstinately refusing to borrow from you any of your ideas about Shakespeare. The truth is Shaw knows nothing about Shakespeare, and is too old, I am afraid, to learn about him from me. I love and honour Shakespeare, and have given years of my life to his service; Shaw tries to evolve him out of his internal consciousness and then jeers at his puppet.

Now a few words as to Shaw's view of Frank Harris. Shaw quotes a piece of my prose in which he says I give my own picture :—

> Whoever will be one of "God's spies," as Shakespeare called them, must spend years in some waste place, some solitude of desert or mountain, resolutely stripping himself of the time-garment of his own paltry ego, alone with the stars and night winds, giving himself to thoughts that torture, to a wrestling with the angel that baffles and exhausts. But at length the travail of his soul is rewarded; suddenly, without warning, the spirit that made the world uses him as a mouthpiece and speaks through him. In an ecstasy of humility and pride—"a reed shaken by the wind"—he takes down the message. Years later, when he gives the gospel to the world, he finds that men mock and jeer at him, tell him he is crazy, or, worse still, declare they know the fellow, and ascribe to him their own lusts and knaveries. No one believes him or will listen, and when he realises his own loneliness his heart turns to water, and he himself begins to doubt his inspiration. That is the lowest hell. Then, in his misery and despair, comes one man who accepts his message as authentic-true; one man who shows in the very words of his praise that he, too, has seen the Beatific Vision, has listened to the Divine voice. At once the prophet is saved: the sun irradiates his icy dungeon; the desert blossoms like a rose; his solitude sings with choirs invisible. Such a disciple is spoken of ever afterwards as the belovèd and set apart above all others.

Shaw's comment on this is :

> This remarkable portrait has every merit except that of resemblance to any Frank Harris known to me or to financial or journalistic London.

But which is the real Frank Harris—or rather, which is the real Shaw, the man as he sees himself or as others see him. That's the gift we men should pray for—that others might see us as we see ourselves. Shaw has given us the best picture of himself, I think, in the guise of Cæsar. His Cæsar speaks of himself as a Sphinx. I take it that it is Shaw speaking of himself, and it is the most interesting thing in any of his plays or writings so far. For nothing is so interesting as egotism when a man has an ego. Your ordinary egotist is a bore, because he will never talk about himself. He cannot; he has no self to talk about. He is under the impression that everything that has happened to him is personal and peculiar. Whereas the truth is, nearly everything that has happened to him has happened to everybody else, and to tell it bores everybody, for everybody would prefer to hear himself tell the same thing. But your egoist who possesses an ego talks about himself, tells things that are true to him and to no one else, unexpected, wonderful things, and thus becomes enormously interesting at once—more interesting than Peary and his North Pole, because he makes us see the Pole and centre of the world. His unique and powerful personality is in direct and intimate relation with the centre of gravity of the Universe. Shaw in German Jaeger clothing and unkempt beard, eating weeds and drinking water, only shocks old maids and young maids too with his unnecessary livid complexion. Shaw as a peripatetic Don Quixote running about from platform to platform for five-and-twenty years bragging that he is the cleverest men alive; Shaw the Fabian president pretending that the chopped straw of Mrs. Sidney Webb or the pseudo-science of Wells is nourishment for the soul; Shaw misrepresenting Shakespeare and maligning Harris—all these incarnations of Shaw only make the vulgar smile and the judicious grieve. I refuse obstinately and in spite of a thousand witnesses to take any of these for the real Shaw. All these are but the claws and tail of the monster. But the truth about the sphinx must be told as she tells it herself; she is half brute and half woman, she says, and as I have enough of the brute in me to know all about that half, I see Shaw as a woman, with all a woman's quick insight into shams and a woman's quick eye for little faults and conceits, and a woman's genius for romance, and a woman's sympathy with suffering, and a woman's intuition of all high things. That Shaw is very interesting to me, even though he has never shown me that soul-side and even though it is entirely unknown to the financiers and journalists of London. I only wish to God he would show us more of it and less of the flippertygibbet.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Each of us, Shaw, who live on the forehead of the time to come must not only educate our audience and our critics directly as you have done, or indirectly as I have tried to do in the passage you quote by creating my own "legend;" and if the "legend" is great enough and interesting enough, it will in its own good time create the critics and the audience as well. There is nothing the world wants so much as a new "legend." My "legend" you have tried to make fun of: I have done my best to see your "legend" as you see it yourself. Fancy Shaw telling the world that I have played financier and established weekly journals and go to and fro in the streets of London and got splashed with its fetid mud and warmed both hands at the fire of life, and other parts too, and yet have managed to write stories which he compares to those of de Maupassant, and a book of criticism which he compares to Darwin's "Origin of Species," and a play which he declares in characterisation is Shakespearean, and yet he will have every one believe I am a mere viveur who give my best powers to pleasure. That monster, Shaw, is wholly incredible. You say you have read every word I have written about Shakespeare; you tell me that my book is great, that you wrote pages and pages on it. What did Pascal say?—"If a book interests you, if it seems strong to you, you may be sure that the man who wrote it wrote it on his knees." My "legend" may be true, Shaw; think—or is Pascal's level too high for you? Even Boswell sees more than Johnson's gluttony and porpoise self-indulgence; even Boswell sees his honesty and leonine courage and truth, the soul of him; fancy Shaw content to see less than a Boswell, as little as "financial or journalistic London."

Take heed, Shaw; you are in the foremost files; yet you go about borrowing without assimilating; fighting without conquering; wasting your fine powers in skits and squibs. You need a fillip. You must not play the woman and run away from facts any longer.

Yet I cannot part from Shaw as if he had altogether missed his mission; it would not be fair to him. Others will give prominence to his little eccentricities and personal peculiarities; others will see that his feet are like other men's feet and stand in this world's mud. But I have admired and still admire and love the brave soul in Shaw, and the gleaming, keen sword with which this modern Jack the Giant-killer has slain stout English shams and may still be trusted to kill more of our giant English hypocrisies, and if he has mis-seen me as he has certainly mis-seen Shakespeare, perhaps after all the loss is more his than mine.

Yours faithfully,
FRANK HARRIS.

Nice, January 20th, 1911.

THE THEATRE

"THE WITNESS FOR THE DEFENCE" AT THE ST. JAMES'S THEATRE

Of all the managers in London Mr. George Alexander has done the most for, and the best by, English playwrights. He conducts his theatre on the most excellent business principles. It has an atmosphere entirely its own, and all the plays produced upon its stage are managed, mounted, and dressed in the most artistic and charming manner. In addition, Mr. Alexander is careful to surround himself with the ablest actors available. That being so, a first night at the St. James's is an interesting event to playgoers. The recent production of Mr. A. E. W. Mason's new play was exceptionally interesting for several reasons. Mr. Mason is of course, a deservedly popular novelist. He has "The Four Feathers," "The Broken Road," and many other good, sound, exciting, and well-written books to his credit. He has made several not too successful attempts to write plays—one or two without the assistance of a collaborator, two or three in collaboration. "The Witness for the Defence" is, however, a play to which Mr. Mason's name stands alone, and it is not, we are given to understand, an adaptation, but an original work—that is, a work written first of all, for acting purposes. We have before wondered, after having witnessed the performance of Mr. Mason's plays, whether he would be able to forget his excellent methods as a novelist and write a play in the manner of a playwright.

"The Witness for the Defence" provided us with an admirable opportunity of judging. There can be no possible question as to the verdict. Mr. Mason is not a playwright. While he has a very marked sense of dramatic effect, he entirely lacks that curious, inborn, unacquirable sense of the theatre which goes to the making of a wholly good play. He lacks, also, the trick of creating character without the aid of the useful chapter, and he has not mastered the difficult art, essential to the playwright, of holding tight to his plot. His latest play, although very interesting, suggests more than ever the hand of the novelist, and has the air of being a number of chapters torn from their binding and placed into the hands of a stage-manager with nothing to connect them together. Then, too, Mr. Mason the novelist has undermined Mr. Mason the dramatist by not having the knowledge of how to make convincing in his play what he would have had no trouble to have made convincing in a novel, and the result is that his scène à faire, the very centre of and reason for his play, very nearly goes for nothing.

Throughout his manipulation of his characters is peculiarly childlike and careless. He makes them do, not what they would do under the existing circumstances, but just what he wants them to do to bring about a situation. In short, Mr. Mason is not yet any nearer to the writing of a good play than he ever was, and but for the finished acting in "A Witness for the Defence" we cannot think that it would have gone safely through the ordeal of a first performance. In the hands of Miss Ethel Irving, Stella lived and breathed. We have not hitherto found much to admire in Miss Irving's work. Her unrestrained hysteria upon the stage got badly upon our nerves. But in Mr. Mason's play Miss Irving plays with an excellent restraint and a sincerity that convinces even against one's common sense. Her part was full of repetition, and all on one key, and yet Miss Irving handled it with an art which made it vital and human. Her big scene with Mr. Alexander was very moving, and although we cannot agree with those of the critics who find genius in her work we are able and delighted to give her the highest praise for an admirable performance. Mr. George Alexander brought all his ease of manner and sureness of touch to bear upon his unsympathetic part, and almost managed to render its inconsistencies consistent. All the other parts were in safe hands, and nothing could have been more excellent than the acting of that accomplished artist, Mr. Alfred Bishop, who made a tiresome old man quite lovable. It goes without saying that the play was beautifully produced. It remains to be seen whether playgoers will be so carried away by a clever story as to be blind to its obvious untruth and mechanism, and will forgive the imperfection of the dramatist for the astuteness of the novelist, or whether they will refuse to believe in the story owing to the amateurish construction of the play.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

THREE SHORT PLAYS BY THE STAGE SOCIETY

The Stage Society has been the means of producing so many interesting and valuable plays that would never otherwise have seen the footlights that we must not deal too unkindly with its latest programme. We are, however, bound to confess that we could see nothing either interesting or valuable in "Pride of Life," by Mr. Ashley Dukes, "The Little Stone House," by Mr. George Calderon, or "The Passing of Talma," by Mr. H. A. Hertz, from the German of Armin Friedmann and Alfred Polgar. We are aware that it is extremely difficult to find one-act plays of excellence which contain intelligent ideas, to say nothing of dramatic effect, but we should have thought that three might have been found which would have done greater credit both to the Society and its actors than those above named. Of them all the one which was certainly least worthy of representation was "The Passing of Talma." Well enough translated and tolerably enough played, it was nothing more than the death scene of a great ego-maniac. It lacked action, variety, and impressiveness, and merely presented a picture, very highly coloured, of an old actor during the last hour of his life. This person was an unconscionable time dying, and his abject terror at the approach of death was by no means a pleasant spectacle, nor were his bombastic ravings pleasant to hear. Mr. Henry Ainley, cleverly made-up, lacked the imagination necessary to lift the scene above mere theatricality. He was far too robust and loud, and energetic and commonplace, and never for a moment persuaded us that he felt or believed a word that he was saying. The whole thing was very tiresome and ugly. The other plays do not need any detailed criticism. We trust that the Committee of the Stage Society will be able to provide a better programme for their next venture.

"SUMURUN" AT THE COLISEUM

With outstretched hands, walking like a man under the subtle influence of enchantment, comes Nuz-al-Din. He comes step by step—slowly, dreamily, smilingly, his senses soothed by the fragrance of flowers. So exquisite is the place into which his feet have led him that it seems to him to be dominated by the presence of Allah, the Great Soul which is Beyond all Things. Prone upon his breast he flings himself, and lifts up his voice: "O Friend of All the World, O Friend of the Stars, Mighty King of Kings, Father of the Great Ones and the Poor, I am come, I a son of the Charm, I, a stranger from a great and wonderful land, whose ways and customs are unknown to Thee, as indeed am I, to do reverence to Him that showeth the way. From the Hills to the Sea, from the Sea to the Hills, have I come like one who tip-toes through a dream fearful of waking, to tell Thee my Story. Know then, O Master of my Soul, that my father, of whom the Creator of the Days had need while yet he was in all his strength, named me, your faithful servant Nuz-al-Din. A merchant of carpets, he dedicated me to walk in his footsteps, which the God of Merchandise had blessed with much prosperity. But I, Nuz-al-Din, was born under other stars than those that gleam upon carpets. As a butterfly is drawn to flowers, I was drawn to all that is beautiful in the wheel of life—to music, to the tender works of Mother Earth, to poetry. And when my father was led by the Beckoning Finger of the Great Seeker upon the everlasting search my soul fell into sadness for that I could not free myself from the tangled threads of multi-coloured wools by which my hands were tied. So thus my trade diminished and fell away, and I, Nuz-al-Din, Merchant of Carpets, turned more than ever from the commerce that I abhorred, and into my mind ran the words of the Poet of All Time, who sang of Life as barren and futile where Love is not. Know, further, O Sovereign, that my shop stood in the Bazaar of that Town which faces the East, and that my neighbour was a showman upon whose back the Wise One, who is above all human critisism, had thrust a Hump. Thus was he pointed at by the ignorant, and made the butt of jeers and ridicule. But to him his Hump meant all. What carpets were to me, so was this Hump to my neighbour.

Opposite to his booth there lived a Slave Dealer, bent beneath the weight of years, and my heart, that had not yet stepped a hair's breadth from the way of obedience, went out to them both—to him that bought and sold those that are Fair and soft, and him that gathered shekels by the display of his play-scenes and his affliction. My long pent-up imagination, ignorant of the Beyond that stretched itself away from the gates of the city, drew a likeness between these two—the Showman and the Slave-dealer to Life and the World. There came a day when into the Bazaar there stepped the beautiful Samurun; she that had caught the fancy of a mighty Prince. Followed by her women, her eyes fall upon me, and it was written that she should find amusement in my boyish sadness. I was bought by her as might she have bought a carpet whose colour and design gave pleasure to the eye. We are all the slaves of Chance, and in this purchase I saw the great gates opening upon the unknown. Know yet further, O King, that it was decreed that I, Nuz-al-Din, should be lifted into sanctity of the House, into the very apartments of the women of the Harem, and that I was carried thither in the basket into which had been placed him of the Hump, my neighbour. For the fuller details of that time, from those quiet hours when I sold carpets in the Bazaar, follow me into the living pictures of my Adventure, seen as in a Dream."

And with this young, wondering, ardent and poetic man you pass, entranced and bewildered. Through a kaleidoscopic series of exquisitely beautiful scenes, going from bazaar to palace, from the street dominated by great buildings all black against the night's cloudless sky to the apartments—a mass of clashing colours—of the harem. You go with him to the strains of delicious music, through the whole gamut of human emotions—curiosity, amazement, fright, despair, excitement, love, hatred, and horror. You meet the painted hunchback, grinning and gesticulating for the amusement of the crowd; his wife, old, gross, gibbering, and hairy; his slave, young, beautiful, and frail; the old Sheikh, greedy and lustful; the elfin-like Sumurun, favourite of the harem; and the thousand and one figures of the "Arabian Nights," all striving to gratify their desire for love or gain, revenge or hatred.

Never before has there been given to London audiences anything so real, vivid, beautiful, imaginative, and uncommon as this dream-play produced by Herr Max Reinhardt and interpreted by the famous company of German actors from the Deutches Theater, Berlin, to the music of Herr Victor Hollander. "Sumurun" should attract to the Coliseum all those to whom the simplicity of art makes any appeal, and who wish to become acquainted with acting such as cannot be found on the English stage. From the scenic point of view it is a revelation. The masterly and imaginative stage-management leaves our producers hopelessly in the background. It carries with it a spell and an atmosphere that are utterly new, and a sense of reality that takes the breath away. "Sumurun" must be seen to be appreciated, and seen not once but many times. The Coliseum is to be congratulated on its enterprise.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

MUSIC

THE performance of Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" by the London Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Richter, with the aid of the Hallé Choir from Manchester, and Mmes. Gleeson White, Marie Stuart, and Messrs. Coates and McInnes was something of a disappointment to one hearer at least. The name of Dr. Richter is above other names. It conjures up for us the splendid memory of many great performances. It would be vain to attempt to reckon up all that he has taught us, or to find adequate expression of the gratitude we feel for the inspiring influence which he has exercised on the course of music in England. His name stands for what is noble and sincere, and altogether worthy in the interpretation of masterpieces. "Authority, thy name is Richter," would be no exaggerated apostrophe from a musician. We feel a kind of guiltiness when we dare to dissent from his ruling, and, as for finding fault with him, we think that surely Apollo Citharœdus will send fire from heaven to consume the wight who rashly criticises his peerless servant. Yet must the truth be told. Birmingham knows it and London must guess it; Richter as a conductor of oratorio is not so supreme as Richter the conductor of opera and orchestral concerts. He made his choir obey him, no doubt; it sang correctly and without undue virtuosity. The tone of its soprani was good, but the weakness of the contralti upset the balance of tone, and the men were not more than fair chorus-singers. The singing was too mechanical. What we want for Bach is flexibility of phrasing, and we want to feel, too, that the singers are interpenetrated with a devout enthusiasm. With this Dr. Richter did not seem to have inspired them. It is but just to praise the singing of the chorales by the Hallé choir—this was tender and reverent. But there was too little of it. We would have stayed another hour in Queen's Hall rather than have lost "Break forth, O beauteous heavenly Light" and some of the others. The recitatives were much marred by the uncertainty of the accompanist at the organ and the airs by Dr. Richter's determination that the soloists should enjoy no liberty to broaden out a phrase if they wished. So fine a singer of Bach as Mr. McInnes might have been trusted to indulge in no merely sentimental or ad captandum slackenings of time. Discipline is a jewel, but over-rigidity defeats its object. Mr. Coates sang with much cleverness of vocalisation, but was too much inclined to emphasise his effects; Miss Gleeson-White sang always like a musician, but Miss Stuart, both in voice and style, left a good deal to be desired. The orchestra was of course admirable. In the Symphony, that miracle of pastoral sweetness, in such noble music as that of "Glory be to God," and generally in the large and free accompaniments, the players showed themselves masters.

Perhaps it is a mistake to give such a work as the "Christmas Oratorio" in a common concert-hall. It may seem a strange statement to make, but we would rather have the "St. Matthew Passion" in a hall than the "Christmas Oratorio," in spite of the fact that some of the Christmas music was originally written by Bach for secular purposes, and only adapted later for the service of the Church. There is that about the "Passion" music which can carry away the hearer from considerations of environment, but it is not the same with the "Christmas Oratorio." This should be sung, as intended, in church, on the six different evenings of the festival, and if there could be some reproduction of the innocent mediævalism of manger, cradle, angels, &c., so much the better. How differently would our feelings be impressed by the enchanting musical story! In church we should have no conductor and performers bowing their thanks to the same applause that might have been bestowed on a royalty-ballad a few hours before in the same building. An unavailing attempt had been made to check the interruption of hand-clapping. It seems as if the average audience enjoys the audible expression of its feelings as much as the music. In that remarkable book "The Foundations of the Nineteenth Century" Mr. Houston Chamberlain mentions this inability to enjoy solemn music in silence as an instance of the modern separation from the Greek spirit. In one of the capitals of Europe which is specially famed for its educated musical taste, he heard the "St. Matthew Passion"; "every number was followed by applause, and the chorale 'O Haupt voll Blut und Wunder' was actually received with cries of 'Da capo!'" Was this capital London?

Miss Gwynne Kimpton has the interest of the Young Person at heart, and she has organised a series of Orchestral Concerts for the Young at Steinway Hall, at which a careful analysis of the works to be performed is put into the hands of each backfisch, and a competent lecturer spends half an hour in making comments and explanations before the music begins. It seems that this plan has been adopted with useful results in Berlin, which is supposed to be a city "specially famed for its educated musical taste." Let us hope that Miss Kimpton will teach her young hearers to listen to oratorios with reverent silence. She herself conducts, and conducts very well, the orchestra, which consists of lady string-players from the Royal Academy, reinforced by professional and masculine performers where required. It can be no easy task to decide what music is best for the innocents to hear Certainly Miss Kimpton's choice of Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, the first movement of Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in C minor, and Schubert's "Rosamunde" Overture could not be too advanced for young persons who may very likely be playing Debussy at their High Schools. Miss Myrtle Panmure, in the play, would be only too likely to scoff at such simple music, and Miss Kimpton will not find everybody agreeing with her as to the wisdom of training the young idea by means of the "classics." An "advanced" musician of singular acuteness has recently told us that children ought not to be allowed to make the acquaintance of the musical ancients until they have been thoroughly familiarised with the thought and speech of present-day composers. This is the only way, he contends, to ensure the due march of progress, and he further maintains that musicians so educated will be much more competent to estimate aright the real value of bygone music than we are who were tumbled early into a closet of Bach and Handel and Mozart, and have thus the deadly poison of association and sentiment to interfere with our power of forming sane judgments. He looks forward cheerfully to the time when a generation so brought up will revise our present opinion of the "classics" and consign most of them to oblivion. If this view is ultimately to triumph over the view taken by Miss Kimpton, all we can do is to quote Arnold's lines to the innovators and say, if the musical spirit of man has found new roads, and if indeed we must leave the old faiths and walk therein—

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

> Quench then the altar-fires of your old God, > Quench not the fire within!

Mr. Plunket Greene goes on with his joyous lectures on Song, for joyous they are to the laughing audience, and packed full of sound sense expressed in language of singular felicity. Last Friday Mr. Greene had much to say about the bad songs and the dunces whose applause makes them possible. His statistics as to the mines of lyric wealth lying unworked by the vocalists while the "royalty" songs multiply like guinea-pigs were saddening. Of Schubert's six hundred songs, how many are we allowed to hear? And in one collection of Irish folk-songs there are at least one thousand eight hundred! While maintaining a scrupulously fair attitude towards the "royalty" system, as regards both publishers and vocalists, he stigmatised it as the chief "something" which keeps the musical taste of England at a low level. He gave an interesting analysis of the various kinds of song, and showed how the programme of a perfect recital should be made up. We could agree with all that he said, except as regards the propriety of singing all the songs in chronological order. This has always seemed to us unnecessary. If it be thought that the simpler songs of an earlier day would sound jejune at the end of a programme, after the rich groups of Brahms and Wolf and the intricacies of Ravel and Debussy, we will agree to no such supposition, and indeed we would rather choose to wend our way from the hall of song into the squalid world of dirt and ugliness that is called London with the strains of an Elizabethan folk-song in our ears than with the perplexing harmonies or discords of a modern "art song." Mr. Greene sang as inimitably as ever in illustration of his arguments. Specially fine was his "Kildrochit Fair," which he droned, first of all, in the style of a Galway peasant, with its curious agrémens, and then gave it in all its noble simplicity. What a magnificent melody it is! But may we beg Mr. Greene not to be too contemptuous about Tommy Moore. That little gentleman had his weaknesses, no doubt, but we owe him a good deal after all for his championship of Irish song, and certainly he gave Mr. Greene an opportunity in "This Life is All Chequered" of showing his skill of lightning-speed patter, which reminded us of the comment of the American, Mr. Shaler, on the speech of the Tuscan peasant, "whose tongue can whip a cubic inch of air into an amazing lather of sound."

Specimens of well-designed programmes have been given at the Classical Concert Society and the Queen's Hall Symphony Concerts. At these the "classics" were certainly in favour. Mr. Borwick's playing of one of Mozart's sonatas was purely delightful, as was the orchestra's of an early symphony of Mozart (Köchel, No. 201). This, composed at the age of nineteen, was like a flower of spring, like an early-morning poem, like the "Vanneur" of du Bellay. With themes almost childlike in their simple grace, Mozart knew how to construct a piece, elegant, aerial, in the perfect manner. This was followed at Queen's Hall by Beethoven's G major Concerto, which Mr. Emil Sauer played with very fine art, though with cadenzas that were too long. His success with the audience was very great, and he was obliged, after an appeal to Sir Henry Wood's indulgence, to give a solo, Chopin's Nocturne in C sharp minor. Even such an authority on the right succession of programme "numbers" as Mr. Greene could not have chosen better.

PAUL VERLAINE—II.

In 1869 Verlaine met Mademoiselle Mathilde Manté, whose candour and youthful innocence at once inflamed his poet's heart. We have it on the unimpeachable evidence of his friend and biographer M. Edmond Lepelletier that up to this time Verlaine had never experienced the joys of any lasting liaison with a woman. His pale Mongolian face, with its deep-sunk eyes, presented a picture of extreme ugliness, little calculated to attract the opposite sex. But Verlaine's morose character, his habitude of brooding, and his regrettable preference for absinthe had kept him from seeking liaisons, the which were only too frequent in the circle in which he lived. Hitherto, therefore, his love affairs had been mere fancies of the moment, of which he could hardly be proud. Verlaine asked for the hand of Mademoiselle Manté, and his request was accepted by her parents. It was as if a new sun of hope had dawned on the already darkening land of his dreams. He saw the vision of a new and regular life, spent in the arms of innocence, opening out before him. It was this aurora of hope which inspired the beautiful verses of his "Bonne Chanson," addressed to the future guardian of his happiness. Alas! one year of married life sufficed to wreck his dream of happiness, and the "Bonne Chanson" remained, a mocking commentary on the frailty of human hopes. We quote some verses chosen from among the poems of "La Bonne Chanson:"—

> Puisque l'aube grandit, puisque voici l'aurore,
> Puisque, après m'avoir fui longtemps, l'espoir veut bien
> Revoler devers moi qui l'appelle et l'implore,
> Puisque tout ce bonheur veut bien être le mien.
>
> C'en est fait à présent des funestes pensées,
> C'en est fait des mauvais rêves, ah! c'en est fait,
> Sortant de l'ironie et des lèvres pincées,
> Et des mots où l'esprit sans l'âme triomphait, etc.

And again the lovely song:—

> La lune blanche
> Luit dans les bois,
> De chaque branche
> Part une voix
> Sous la ramée;
> O bien aimée.
>
> L'étang reflète,
> Profond miroir,
> La silhouette
> Du saule noire
> Où le vent pleure.
> Rêvons c'est l'heure, etc.

Seldom has a wedding been celebrated to the strains of a more beautiful Epithalamium. Despite the beauty of his wedding-hymn, the poet's love was, perhaps, too sensual in its nature to offer much probability of a lasting union. Also, his Bohemian habits and love of artificial inspiration were too deeply ingrained in his character to make it probable that, the freshest blossoms of wedded life being plucked, he could settle down to the routine of the married state. The marriage was celebrated amid all the inauspicious omens of the 1870 war. As a result of the events of the "Commune" Verlaine left his municipal employment. This reduced his income, and necessitated the migration of the young couple to the home of M. and Madame Manté. The introduction of such a Bohemian as Paul Verlaine into a respectable bourgeois household was productive of fatal dissensions Within a year of his wedding, owing partly to fear of implication in the trials following on the events of the "Commune," and partly to the intolerable friction of his family life, Verlaine quitted Paris for London, in the company of his friend the young savage and poet Arthur Rimbaud. He was never destined to see again the woman who had shed a ray of happiness on his life. Shortly after his departure Madame Verlaine applied for a separation on the strength of her husband's alleged unnatural intimacy with Rimbaud.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

There can be little doubt that Verlaine was deeply grieved by the separation from his wife, and hoped until the divorce was obtained that a reconciliation might take place. The fruit of his stay in London were his "Romances sans Paroles." These contain some of the finest poems written in this first period of his life before he abandoned the objective for subjective poetry. Even in these poems we note the gradual darkening of the poet's mental horizon, and the increased feeling in his poetry is at once noticeable. Take, for example:—

Il pleure dans mon cœur
Comme il pleut sur la ville.
Quelle est cette langueur
Qui pénètre mon cœur?" etc.

Or again:—

Le piano que baise une main frêle
Luit dans le soir rose et gris vaguement.
Tandis qu'avec un très léger bruit d'aile
Un air bien vieux, bien faible et bien charmant
Rôde discret, épeuré quasiment
Par le boudoir longtemps parfumé d'Elle, etc.

On August 8th, 1873, Paul Verlaine was condemned to two years' imprisonment by the High Court at Brussels as a result of an attempt on the life of his friend and companion Arthur Rimbaud. He bore his imprisonment with calm and resignation until the news of the final separation from his wife was brought to him. Then, in a storm of grief, this scorner of the Christian Faith was driven to grasp the consoling hand of the Church. We are doubtful as to whether his conversion took place with quite the rapidity which he has described. A careful study of his life and works will show that he had been for some time drifting towards a state of religious enthusiasm. It must not be forgotten also that he was deprived of the consoling influence of absinthe, and hence was driven to seek other forms of consolation. His religion was one of emotion and not of conviction. However, this frame of mind was to last for some years, and to it we are indebted for the most beautiful, we may say almost the only, French religious poetry since the Middle Ages. Verlaine, in his collection of poems entitled "Sagesse," has entirely deserted the objective and unemotional verse of his youth, and his poetry becomes subjective and reflects the deepest depths of his poet's soul. We quote some verses to show the strength of his religious emotion:—

Seigneur, c'est trop! Vraiment je n'ose. Aimer qui?
Vous?
Oh non! je tremble et n'ose. Oh vous aimer je n'ose.
Je ne veux pas! je suis indigne. Vous la rose
Immense des purs vents de l'amour, ô vous tous, etc.

And again he addresses the Deity in the touching lines:—

Tendez-moi votre main, que je puisse lever
Cette chair accroupie et cet esprit malade, etc.

Then Verlaine gives us a charming picture of Nature in all her quiet simplicity, as she is seen on any summer day, and to this serene picture he opposes the bitterness of his tears at the thought of his wasted youth:—

Le ciel est par-dessus le toit
Si bleu, si calme!
Un arbre, par-dessus le toit,
Berce sa palme.
La cloche dans le ciel qu'on voit
Doucement tinte,
Un oiseau sur l'arbre qu'on voit
Chante sa plainte.
Mon Dieu, mon Dieu, la vie est là
Simple et tranquille,
Cette paisible rumeur là
Vient de la ville.
Qu'as-tu fait, ô toi que voilà
Pleurant sans cesse?
Dis, qu'as-tu fait, toi que voilà
De ta jeunesse?

The necessarily short nature of these articles will not permit of a close study of Verlaine's poetry or of long quotations. If we have been fortunate enough to interest any of our readers in the subject, and should they wish to pursue their study further, we recommend the "Choix de Poésies de Paul Verlaine" (Bibliothèque Charpentier). The story of Verlaine's life after his release from the prison at Mons must be told in the sombre language of tragedy. In 1875 he was once more turned adrift in the world. Forsaken by the woman that he still loved, shunned by his friends, and with his moral nature weakened by a life of excesses and a naturally feverish sensibility, there was little chance of peace for him in this world.

Nevertheless his meeting with young Lucien Letinois served to brighten his road for a while, and their friendship inspired his muse with some charming verses. But Lucien Letinois was destined for a premature grave, and, robbed of his friend, Verlaine seems to have abandoned all hope in life, and to have drifted aimlessly towards a dishonoured grave. He lamented his friend in verses copied from Job:—

Mon fils est mort. J'adore, ô mon Dieu, votre loi . . .
Vous châtiez bien fort. Mon fils est mort, hélas!
Vous me l'aviez donné, voici que votre droit
Me le reprend, à l'heure où mes pauvres pieds las Réclamaient ce cher guide en cette route étroite.
Vous me l'aviez donné, vous me le reprenez:
Gloire à vous! . . .

His "Sagesse," to which we have already alluded, and which contained perhaps his finest poems, was published in 1881. From this date onward Verlaine wrote little good poetry; his addiction to drink incapacitated him for serious work. True, he published three collections of poems—"Amour," "Jadis et Naguère," and "Parallèlement," but most of the poems contained in these were written before the emotional poetry of "Sagesse," and collected for publication when Verlaine began to feel the press of poverty. We may quote one peculiarly beautiful poem from his "Amour:"—

Je vois un groupe sur la mer.—
Quelle mer? Celle de mes larmes.
Mes yeux mouillés du vent amer,
Dans cette nuit d'ombre et d'alarmes.
Sont deux étoiles sur la mer.

C'est une toute jeune femme
Et son enfant déjà tout grand
Dans une barque où nul ne rame.
Sans mât ni voile, en plein courant
Un jeune garçon, une femme!

En plein courant dans l'ouragan!
L'enfant se cramponne à sa mère
Qui ne sait plus où, non plus qu'en
Ni plus rien, et qui, folle, espère
En le courant, en l'ouragan.

Espérez en Dieu, pauvre folle,
Crois en notre père, petit.
La tempête qui vous désole,
Mon cœur de là-haut vous prédit
Qu'elle va cesser, petit, folle.

Et paix au groupe sur la mer,
Sur cette mer de bonnes larmes
Mes yeux joyeux dans le ciel clair
Par cette nuit sans plus d'alarmes
Sont deux bons anges sur la mer

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

From 1883 Verlaine's life was spent between the "Hôtels garnis" of the Quartier Latin and the wards of public hospitals. His excesses had brought on chronic rheumatism. During the time spent out of the hospitals the unfortunate poet passed his hours in drinking, or in the arms of unworthy mistresses who haunted his lodging and generally left him about the same time as his last franc. Fortune made a final concession to the poet's pride, and when his last illness overtook him he was in possession of a small sum of money, and was thus spared the dishonour of a death in a public hospital.

On January 8th, 1896, he died, tended by Eugénie Kranz, the companion of his last years. It is in keeping with the rest of the tragedy of his life that this woman, who was quite incapable of appreciating his poetic genius and who was only attracted by the presence of a few louis in his purse, should have been the sole witness of his last agony.

Such is the story of Paul Verlaine, poet and vagabond, who amid the sordidness of his life found time to write some of the most musical, most acutely sensitive, and certainly the finest emotional religious poetry that has ever been penned.

S. A.-B.

THE DAY BEFORE YESTERDAY

IV.—THE STORY-TELLER

He changed with the seasons, and, like the seasons, was welcome in every mood. In spring he was forlorn and passionate in turn; now fiercely eloquent, now tuneful with these little cheerful songs that seem in terms of human emotion to be the saddest of all. In summer he dreamed in sensuous and unambitious idleness, gladly conscious of the sunshine and warm winds and flower-smells, and using only languorous and gentle words. In autumn, with the dead leaves of the world about his feet, he became strangely hopeful and generous of glad promises of adventure and conquest. It seemed as though he found it easier to triumph when Nature had abdicated her jealous throne. But it was in the winter-time when he came into his own kingdom, and mastered his environment and his passions to make the most joyful songs. Then he would lie at full length on the hearthrug, and we children, sitting in a rapt circle, fantastically lit by the fire, would listen to his stories, and know that they were the authentic wisdom.

It was in vain that the grown-ups warned us against the fascinations of his society, telling us that dreamers came to no good end in a practical world. As well might the townsfolk of Hamelin, in Brunswick, have ordered their children to turn a deaf ear to the tune of the Pied Piper. We had studied life from a practical point of view between our games, and found it unsatisfying; this man brought us something infinitely more desirable. He would come stepping with delicate feet, fearful of trampling on our own tender dreams, and he would tell us the enchanted stories that we had not heard since we were born. He told us the meaning of the stars and the significance of the sun and moon; and, listening to him, we remembered that we had known it all once before in another place. Sometimes even we would remind him of some trivial incident that he had forgotten, and then he would look at us oddly and murmur sadly that he was getting very old. When the stories were over, and all the room was still ringing with beautiful echoes, he would stand erect and ask us fiercely whether we saw any straws in his hair. We would climb up him to look (for he was very tall), and when we told him that we could not find any he would say: "The day you see them there will be no more stories." We knew what the stories were worth to us, so we were always afraid of looking at his head for fear that we should see the straws and all our gladdest hours should be finished.

His voice was all the music extant, and it was only by recalling it that our young ears could find that there was beauty in fine singing and melodiousness in the chaunt of birds. Yet when his words were eloquent we forgot the voice and the speaker, content to sacrifice our critical individualities to his inspiration till we were no more than dim and silent figures in the background of his tale. It was only in winter-time that he achieved this supreme illusion; perhaps the firelight helped him, and the chill shadows of the world. In the summer his stories had the witchery of dreams; their realism startled us, and yet we knew that they were not real. After listening to them through a hot afternoon we would stretch back into consciousness, as though we had been asleep; his drowsy fancies lulled our personalities, but did not conquer them. The winter magic was of a rarer kind. Then even his silences became significant, for he brought us to so close an intimacy with his mind that his very thoughts seemed like words.

It is idle to expect a child to believe that every grown-up person was a child once upon a time, for it is not credible that they could have forgotten so much. But this man was a child both in feeling and in understanding. He knew the incidents that perplexed us in those nursery legends that have become classics, and sometimes it was his pleasure to tell them to us again, having regard to our wakeful sympathies. He was the friend of all the poor lost creatures of romance—the giants whose humiliating lot it was to be defeated by any stripling lad, the dragons whose flaming strength was a derision when opposed to virtue in armour. He shared our pity for Antæus and Caliban and Goliath of Gath, and even treated sorcerers and wicked kings with reasonable humanity. Somehow, though we felt that it was wicked, we could not help being sorry for people when they were punished very severely. The very ease with which giants could be outwitted suggested that the great simple fellows might prove amiable enough if they were kindly treated, while it was always possible that dragons might turn out to be bewitched princes, if only the beautiful princesses would kiss them instead of sending heroes to kill them unfairly, without giving them an opportunity of explaining their motives. Our story-teller understood our scruples and sympathised with them, and in his versions every one had a chance, whether they were heroes or no. Even the best children are sometimes cruel, but they are never half so pitiless as the writers of fairy-stories.

But better than any fairy-stories were the stories that he told us of our own lives, which under his touch became the wonderful adventures which they really were. He showed us that it was marvellous to get out of bed in the morning, and marvellous to get into bed at night. He made us realise the imaginative value of common things, and the fun that could be derived even from the performance of duties, by aid of a little make-believe. The grown-up folk would probably have derided his system, but he made us tolerate our lessons, and endure the pangs of tooth-ache with some degree of fortitude. He had a short way with the ugly bogles with which thoughtless nurses and chance echoes from the horrors columns of newspapers had peopled the shadows of our life. We were no longer afraid of the dark when he had told us how friendly it could be to the distressed. Hitherto we had vainly sought to find the colours and sounds of romance in life, and, failing, had been tempted to sum up the whole business as tedious. After he had shown us how to do it, it was easy to see that life itself was a story as romantic as we cared to make it. Our daily official walks became gallant expeditions, and we approached arithmetic with a flaming sword.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Can any childhood ever have known a greater wizard than this? And yet since that state does not endure for ever, it must surely have happened to us to seek for straws in his towering head once too often, had not death taken our kindly enchanter from our company, and thus spared us the bitter discovery that the one man who reconciled us to life was considered rather more than eccentric by an obtuse world. It is true that we noticed that the grown-up people were apt to treat him sometimes as if he were one of us, but we felt that he merited this distinction, and did not find it strange. Nor did we wonder that he should tell stories aloud to himself lacking a wider audience, for we knew that if we had the power we should tell such stories to ourselves all day long. We did not only fail to realise that he was mad; we knew that he was the only reasonable creature of adult years who ever came near us. He understood us and paid us the supreme compliment of allowing us to understand him. The world called him fantastic for actions that convinced us that he was wise, and, thanks to a fate that seemed at the time insensately cruel, the spell was never broken.

RICHARD MIDDLETON.

INDIA: A SERIES

IV.—HIGH POLITICS, EXTERNAL AND INTERNAL—1876-1884

LYTTON

WHEN Lord Northbrook left India in 1876 the country was apparently in the enjoyment of peace, within and without. His successor, Lord Lytton, of the Diplomatic Service, took out full instructions from the Conservative Government in England to enter upon friendly relations with Afghanistan, with the object, stated briefly, of counteracting Russian influence in that country and the approach of Russia towards India. A free hand was left to Lord Lytton as to the time and manner of carrying out these instructions. His proposal to send an Envoy to Kabul to discuss matters of common interest to the two Governments was not accepted by the Amir, Sher Ali. A Conference, however, took place at Peshawar in January-February, 1877, between a Kabul Envoy and the British representative, but the former died and the Conference was fruitless. The Amir had committed himself to an alliance with Russia. While the relations with the Amir were strained, Indian troops were despatched to Malta in 1878. Russia retaliated by giving trouble to India through Afghanistan. When the Amir had received a Russian mission under Stoletoff, and declined to admit the English mission under Sir Neville Chamberlain in September, 1878, war with Afghanistan was the consequence. The main events of this war, leading up to the treaty of Gundamak in May, 1879, the murder of Cavagnari in the following September, and the subsequent occupation of Kabul are matters of history. In carrying out his instructions Lord Lytton had to contend with unforeseen situations, and the whole policy formed the subject of party controversy in England. The assumption by her Majesty Queen Victoria of the title "Empress of India" necessitated its proclamation by the Viceroy at the Imperial Assemblage at Delhi on January 1st, 1877. The rains of 1876 having failed badly in parts of India, Bombay, Madras, and Mysore were visited by severe famine in 1877, and Lord Lytton found it necessary to proceed personally to the Provinces affected in August-September; but, through inefficient local management in certain parts, there were considerable mortality and unnecessary expenditure. After the famine a Commission was appointed to record the experience of past famines and frame a system, which was subsequently formulated in Famine Codes, for future famine relief. A policy of insurance against famine was also inaugurated by providing an annual surplus of a specified sum for famine relief, or for the discharge or prevention of debt. This scheme was afterwards modified to allow of expenditure on railways and canals required for protection of districts liable to scarcity. In 1878 the Vernacular Press Act was passed to deal with seditious publications, the growth of which in India had become evident; the need of action had been strongly represented from Bengal. The Act was restricted to publications in Oriental languages; its object was preventive rather than punitive, and it authorised the taking of bonds from publishers and printers. Measures were adopted for the further decentralisation of the finances; the salt-tax was equalised throughout India. The Inland Customs Line, which still stretched across India for 1,500 miles, was abolished. Cesses for public works were imposed on the land, and a licence-tax was levied on traders. In pursuit of Free Trade the import duties on cotton goods were repealed partly in 1878, and more in 1879, leaving only the finer kinds taxable, and the House of Commons resolved on their total abolition. Other important matters engaged the attention of Government. An Army Commission sat in 1879 and fully considered every military question. A Press Commissioner was appointed to be the medium of communication between Government and the Press, and to report on the Vernacular Press. A measure was adopted for the admission of more natives of India to appointments hitherto reserved for the Indian Civil Service. The Frontiers were not neglected. A British Agency was established at Gilgit. The Jowaki Afridis and other tribes were punished for a series of outrages against British territory. Lord Lytton advocated the formation of a new Frontier Province beyond the Indus, a policy which was carried out by Lord Curzon. All these events and measures which occupied Lord Lytton rendered his Viceroyalty notable for its political excitement. The ability displayed in his public utterances, speeches, and writings has always been acknowledged, even by his opponents.

LOCAL SELF-GOVERNMENT: PHILO-INDIAN POLICY

RIPON

The Liberal Government in England were determined that peace with Afghanistan should be restored, and Lord Ripon was instructed to secure it. Abdurrahman, nephew of Sher Ali, was made Amir of Kabul on certain conditions. His cousin, Ayub Khan, defeated a British force at Maiwand on July 27th, but was himself defeated by Lord Roberts at Kandahar on September 1st. The Cabinet objected in the strongest terms to anything that could involve the permanent retention of a British force at Kandahar, from which accordingly, as well as from other parts of Afghanistan, all British troops were withdrawn in 1881. Before Lord Lytton left India in July, 1880, it was known that the Estimates of the cost of the Afghan War were erroneous, but the magnitude of the miscalculations appeared later. In preparing the Estimates, the Accountant-General of the Military Department had made no attempt to ascertain the actual expenditure on the war; he had only taken cognisance of the classified and duly audited accounts, ignoring the actual issues from the Civil treasuries on military drawings. The deficits proved to be considerable, but the English Treasury contributed five millions to the cost of the war, and the finances generally had been so well administered that financial prosperity was soon regained; and in 1882-83 arge reductions in taxation were effected; i mport duties, including those on cotton goods, were extensively abolished, the salt-tax was reduced, the native army was reorganised, regiments being disbanded and the men re-employed in other regiments. Stock Notes were issued to attract capital, but the system failed in its object; the Subordinate Civil Service also was reorganised.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

In 1882 Lord Ripon showed his Liberal tendencies by inaugurating the policy of Local Self-Government, which was intended to open up the path of self-government by the people themselves. The aim was to establish a network of local corporations, the members thereof to be elected, with non-official Chairmen, the officials to be charged with duties of supervision rather than of initiation and direction. After inquiry, Local Self-Government was nominally established throughout the country, through Local Boards and Municipalities with increased powers. The elective principle was widely extended: the new institutions were entrusted with greater power over local funds. Though immediate official supervision was diminished, still, in view of their eventual responsibility, some power of interference was reserved to Government and local official authorities. Lord Ripon anticipated that in the beginning there would be some faulty administration. Local Self-Government has not proved a complete success, and the responsibility of the officials remains practically unaltered.

An Education Commission was appointed in 1882 to inquire into the effect given to the Education despatch of 1854, the grant-in-aid system, inspection and payment by results, and other branches of public instruction. When the report was published it failed to produce results commensurate with the labour of the inquiry. In 1883 a project of law was framed in order to confer upon certain classes of native officers criminal jurisdiction over European British subjects. The Europeans, especially the non-officials, bitterly opposed the project, and much ill-feeling was aroused. Eventually a compromise was effected, and this jurisdiction was conferred on a more limited number of native officers, and the right to a European jury was secured to all accused Europeans. The controversy created such a storm that racial amalgamation was perceptibly retarded for years. The Vernacular Press Act was repealed under orders from England. The Agricultural Department and the Public Works Member of Council were revived. An International Exhibition was held at Calcutta in 1883-4. A Factory Act was passed and applied to regulate the employment of children. Mysore was, according to promise, restored to the Maharaja. With the development of Indian railways and the opening of docks, exports of produce largely increased. Indian stores were substituted for English wherever possible. Generally, Lord Ripon favoured a policy of advancing the natives in every way, which caused some resentment. On his retirement in 1884 there was an outburst of strong personal sentiment, the public opinion of the native population having been moved in his favour beyond all precedent.

A MATTER OF BLUFF

"Words, words, words," sighs Hamlet, in mockery of a very old diplomatist. But this was not to say that his creator knew not the virtue and value of words. For words are mystic emblems of much meaning, potent to unlock many secrets, or to advance their users, so they be deft and cunning, to places of high function. Shakespeare well knew that words are never empty. Assuredly Parolles did. It was the prime discovery of his life which he did not intend to let slip by without use and advantage.

He knew well how brave a show words can make in the gests of life, and he armed himself with them in their most valiant vesture. Somewhere he had discovered, if his original spirit of chicanery had not already divined it for him, that the difference in the value of their meanings and in the value of the facts they implied was one that could be covered by a juggle of the hand; that symbols could be used for realities with magnificent success with Life's novitiates. He knew, for example, that, did he but "make tolerable vent of his travel, it might pass." He knew it, and he played to it. He trod boldly forward, and the ready credence of others supported him through the part he had to play.

Nor did he play his part with any stint. An incorrigible coward in all else, he was no coward where appearances were concerned. His boasts flew to heaven; he shouldered the most impossible undertakings, never intending to fulfil them. He dressed his part, too, with superb abandon: in the boldness of saffron, and with scarfs and bannerets streaming about him. Moreover, he was not unaware of the excellent value of circumstantial knowledge and deft reference. Even his enemies have to admit that "he hath a smack of all neighbouring languages"—German, Danish, low Dutch, French, and Italian—in the graceful use of which it may safely be assumed he was not remiss. And when certain soldiers are off to the wars he does not fail to polish the opportunity to his advantage. "Noble heroes," says he, "my sword and yours are kin. You shall find in the regiment of the Spinii one Captain Spurio, with his cicatrice, an emblem of war, here on his sinister cheek; it was this very sword entrenched it; say to him, I live, and observe his report for me." Detection is impossible, that he knows well; and thus by the expenditure of a very few words he has added a substantial lustre to his glory. Which is at worst a feat of some skill, and at best a considerable achievement in artistry.

With the title of Captain Parolles he comes to Bertram, and is accepted by him at his own estimate as a "gallant militarist." Bertram, as the play only too well proves him, was something of an unlovable coxcomb; but there is this, at least, to say for him—that it was but little unlikely any one would proclaim himself as a "gallant militarist" in the presence of soldiers without being well assured of what he said. It seemed impossible to him that a man should claim so much without the shadow of a title to support it, leaving the wit of the occasion to resolve the rest. But Bertram was young; moreover, he was a coxcomb—which unhappy, yet too frequent combination of attributes makes him the natural prey of such as Monsieur Parolles masquerading in office of a captain.

It all seemed so fitting and proper. "That jackanapes with scarfs" Diana calls him as he passes her in the streets, making much ostentation of melancholy over the loss of some or other drum in a scuffle. Yet this very abandon seemed to Bertram only the natural swagger of the camps. He will not believe so emphatic a show to be but a mere counterfeit of worth. One of his friends says to him: "If your lordship finds him not a hilding, hold me no more in your respect." "On my life, a bubble!" says another. But he is only mystified. He can but reply: "Do you think I am so far deceived in him?" He cannot credit it that there can be so goodly a show with nothing to substantiate it.

He was young, and in love with shows. But even as youth is the natural prey of words so age is their natural exposer. Thus it was but fitting that he who should first have discovered Parolles should be astute old Lafeu. He has taunted Parolles, seeking to test his worth, and Parolles has bid him know, haughtily enough, that his language is one "not to be understood without bloody succeeding." Seeing, however, that Lafeu is not one that fears a contest—hails it, rather!—he tells him that he is too old to fight. "You are too old, Sir; let it satisfy you, you are too old." He will brush him aside; he will fend discovery; but Lafeu has found his man. "I did think thee," says he, "for two ordinaries, to be a pretty wise fellow. Yet the scarfs and bannerets about thee did manifoldly dissuade me from believing thee a vessel of too great a burden. I have now found thee." And again: "You are a vagabond, and no true traveller; you are more saucy with lords and honourable personages than the heraldry of your birth and virtue gives you commission." The natural because boastful exaggerations of truth he is not averse from; they are one thing; "a good traveller is something at the latter end of a meal; but one that lies three-thirds, and uses a known truth to pass a thousand nothings with, should once be heard and thrice beaten—God save you, captain!"

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Lafeu has discovered him, and his knowledge passes to the others. But Bertram resists discovery. He will yet cling to his faith in his "gallant militarist;" he will not admit him to be an egregious fraud, for that would be an admission of his own deficiency of wisdom. But he will permit a trial of his quality. So far he will go.

There has been this drum lost, over which, knowing it irrecoverable, Parolles has given vent to much chagrin, as though to his keen military sense so small a loss was a grievous dishonour. They urge him to its recovery. "It is to be recovered," says he; "but that the merit of service is seldom attributed to the true and exact performer, I would have that drum or another, or hic jacet." Bertram urges him, if he has "a stomach to't," to be "magnanimous in the enterprise," promising him the whole credit of the exploit, "even to the utmost syllable of your worthiness." "I'll about it this evening," says he; and therewith the very spirit of humour is toward.

The exploit is impossible of achievement; but this does not daunt Parolles. Even though it were possible he would yet have no intention of endeavouring it, for it could not be dangerous, and he has no stomach for danger. But what of that? Words will extract him. Sufficient to the occasion is its own wit. Nevertheless he is surprised at himself. "What the devil," asks he of himself, "should move me to undertake the recovery of the drum, being not ignorant of its impossibility, and knowing I had no such purpose? I must give myself some hurts, and say I got them in exploit." "I would I had any drum of the enemy's," he adds, however.

But he may not escape so easily this time, for there is a plot out for his exposure. Even as he roams the night in perplexity outside the enemy's lines, thus to fill up the necessary time to give his story point, Bertram's friends are on him with the cry of "Thoca movousus, cargo, cargo, cargo." Not understanding this wild and unseemly language, he imagines forthwith that he has fallen into the hands of the Muscovite hirelings, and is terrified at the thought. He calls out that he will give them any information if only his life be spared. A soldier comes forward to serve as interpreter, and he is haled off, blindfold, before Bertram to be served through an interrogatory as to Bertram's private character, the character of his friends, the disposition of his troops, and what else they may seek to ask him for their sport.

Who shall paint the humour of it? Bertram hears himself described as "a foolish, idle boy," "very ruttish," "a dangerous and lascivious boy," "a whale to virginity." He learns that his friends are defined as idle, worthless, and "swinedrunk." He hears his "manifold linguist and armipotent soldier" tell him, thinking him an enemy, how worthless his forces are and where they might fitly be attacked. No exposure could be more complete. He becomes indeed no more than a bubble. But when he is unbandaged and learns his exposure, seen for a "snipt-taffeta fellow," is he abashed? Is he nonplussed? No, not he! He philosophises:—

> Yet am I thankful; if my heart were great,
> 'Twould burst at this. Captain, I'll be no more;
> But I will eat and drink, and sleep as soft
> As captain shall.

DARRELL FIGGIS.

REVIEWS AND MAGAZINES

THE distinguishing feature of the magazines this month must needs be Lord Morley's article in the Nineteenth Century on "British Democracy and Indian Government." It is not too much to say that the problem of Indian Government, in all its history, before and since the days of the East India Company, never fell into more earnest, honest, thought-directed hands than Lord Morley's. Now he has won to his rest in the dignified sinecure of Lord President of the Council, it is good to see him let his thinking on the subject travel from the problems of actual administration to the enlightenment of the general. It is perhaps needless to say that the subject that has pricked him into speech is Valentine Chirol's book on "Indian Unrest," which has already been reviewed in these columns. But being so incited, his thought has embraced wider problems than are covered by that book—or rather, his thought has covered the same problems with wider outlook. His article deals with the subject in three main divisions—the relationship between the India Secretary at Westminster and the Viceroy at Simla or Calcutta; the relationship between the English electorate and its Indian Secretary; and the relationship between the English people and the peoples of India. It is of course impossible to deal fully with so comprehensive and thoughtful an article in the qualified space of this review. The following sentences, however, will give the spirit in which it is written, being no less than the spirit in which the writer achieved the duties of Indian Secretary. "Undoubtedly," he says, "the cheerful stoic's heart is a regal help to the responsible ruler. Saeva indignatio has its own due hour, but hope is the better vein; it is nearer the working daylight." In the same magazine Sir Robert Anderson has an article on "The Problem of the Criminal Alien." He is unfortunate in his manner. He puts forward suggestions that may be excellent enough in a manner sufficiently harsh to deter those who are most willing to agree with him. Dr. Hyslop writes on "Post-Illusionism and Art in the Insane." Apart from the fact that it lacks the virtue of accompanying illustration and example, it is an article that more than repays attention.

In the Fortnightly Mr. Garvin spreads himself "From Reval to Potsdam." Mr. Garvin is a strange man—what one might call an awkward man to have on one's side. But there is no doubt that he is very much in earnest in his Germanophobia. Unfortunately he neglects the one or two unanswerable arguments in favour of a controversial display. Mr. Swift MacNeill's constitutional lore is proverbial. Therefore when he deals with "Foreign Policy and Parliamentary Control" he commands attention. The sum of his argument is this: that at the last Election the single issue before the electorate was whether or not "the will as expressed by its representatives should, subject to certain safeguards to secure that the country had made up its mind, prevail." But, obviously, the people (whosoever and whatsoever that be) have no part or lot in two matters that most vitally concern its destiny—foreign policies and treaties, to wit—the latter of which are deliberately never signed while Parliament is sitting. Mr. MacNeill desires, and he quotes the late Mr. Bagehot in his favour, that all treaties should require ratification by the House of Commons. It is a matter that is bound to attract attention in the near future. In the Fortnightly also Mr. McKenna sends a prophet before his face to discuss the Naval Estimates in Mr. Archibald Hurd. He informs us frankly that they are to be between forty-four and forty-five millions, and then examines and discusses them in detail, defending them with skill. This sort of thing has hitherto been done in the House of Commons, but one lives to learn the increasing subtlety of the bureaucracy. The famous Declaration of London (which is destined to become yet more famous, especially after the next Colonial Conference) is examined closely by Lieutenant Monsel. We will not forestall subsequent discussion by elaboration now, but at the moment will only draw attention to the article. One of the most striking articles in this magazine is Mr. William Archer's account of the "Portuguese Republic." Another is Zinaida Vengerowa's account of "Tolstoy's Last Days." The churlish attempt in some quarters to minimise Tolstoy's greatness meets its sufficient refutation here.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

It is pleasant, in the English Review, to discover Arthur Symons' name heading its contents with a poem entitled "A Refrain," which is not so good as some we know of his, but which has this distinguishing feature in modern verse, that it utters its own authoritative note, and does not struggle to utter. The other two poems, by Margaret L. Woods and W. R. Titterton, are good so far as they go, but they miss the voice of authority. Mr. Frank Harris has an interesting article on "Talks with Carlyle," some of which is a little difficult to reconcile with internal probability. The article that must needs seem the chief feature, however, is that on "My Ideal John Bullesses," by Yoshio Markino. The illustrations are not so extraordinarily characteristic, and certainly their reproduction is disappointing. But the text of the article is charming. Its English is, happily, unedited, and consequently in the very lack of grammar we can hear the accents of the writer. It is a bold experiment, and altogether a successful one. Mr. Filson Young deals with "The Place of Music in Modern Life," but only succeeds in touching the fringe of a deeply interesting subject. Mrs. H. G. Wells has an extraordinary sketch entitled "Fear;" while Mr. Harrison himself deals with the library censorship and its late fatuous exhibition in the banning of Neil Lyons' "Cottage Pie." There is only one fault in this article, and that is that it attempts to reason with those that are beyond the pale of reason. A body that includes Elinor Glyn and bans one who bids fair to be the first of living humorists, is not a subject for reasonable treatment, but for explosive merriment or utter contempt.

The Edinburgh Review is still a stout adherent to unsigned articles. But one would like to know who is responsible for the article on English Prosody. It is an ostensible review of Professor Saintsbury's three volumes on that subject; but it is also an admirable corrective to that work, and should be read alongside it. Those who have read the work will remember Professor Saintsbury's lavish praise of Swinburne, and particularly of the "When the Hounds of Spring" chorus of "Atalanta in Calydon." While admitting the full value and sonorous music of that famous chorus, we cannot but agree with the Edinburgh Review writer when he says, "It is almost certain that of any one who has really been 'captured' by this literature the ear would no longer rightly respond to the delicacies of great blank verse, whether of the dramatists or of Milton, nor to the best of our lyric." Other excellent articles are on "Mary Stuart," "Our Tudor Kings," and "The Principles of Heredity." The International Journal of Ethics is another quarterly, and is chiefly remarkable in its present number for an excellent exposition by Professor Lovejoy of "William James as Philosopher." The best thing in Blackwood's is Mr. Farman on "Aviation in 1910;" while Harper's has an illuminative article on "General Lee as I Knew Him," by Major Ranson.

The current number of the Church Quarterly maintains its usual high standard of articles and reviews written especially for the ecclesiastical scholar. Of these perhaps the best is that on "The Policraticus of John of Salisbury," written by Mr. Clement Webb, of Magdalen College. The learned editor, Dr. Headlam, has a valuable article on Dr. Rendel Harris's publication from the Syriac version of "The Odes and Psalms of Solomon," in which he alludes to the curious "discovery" of the MS. by Dr. Harris on the shelves of his own library! The explanation is that it was one of a bundle of "late paper manuscripts in the Syriac language which came from the neighbourhood of the Tigris." Lady Laura Ridding contributes a temperate and convincing paper against divorce, based on a consideration of some aspects presented in certain novels, notably Mrs. Humphry Ward's "Daphne" and Mr. Winston Churchill's "Modern Chronicle." We anticipated some interest from the title of another article, "Democracy in English Fiction," but found much disappointment in its weak and rather limited literary criticism. The amazing fact that there is no reference to the masterpieces of Thomas Hardy can only be explained on the supposition of the narrow but well-known clerical bias which exists towards that great writer on humanistic democracy.

The Dublin Review opens with a clever article on Mr. William Monypenny's first volume of the life of Lord Beaconsfield, a Hebrew of the Hebrews, a "Christian by adoption" only for political reasons, "a card of admission to public life," and in Bismarck's opinion, when he said "Ach, der alte Jüd," "the ablest man at the Berlin Congress."

"The Decay of Fixed Ideals" is a striking estimate of that modern trend of thought, which, while tacitly rejecting Christianity, is still impelled by its momentum. Friedrich Foerster, on the other hand, whose books Mr. Meyrick Booth examines, is the leader in effect of a strong reactionary movement in Germany against materialism. There is an interesting article by Mr. F. McCullagh on the extreme anti-clerical nature of the Portuguese revolution on the part of the leaders. But he says that M. Poinsard, who in "Le Portugal Inconnu" gives a sociological study of the causes which have led to Portugal's decay, "makes no reference whatever either to the Church or to the Braganzas." An estimate of Elgar will delight musical readers, except perhaps the official leaders of English music, who are treated in a vein of whimsical irony. Queen Elizabeth from the View of the Spanish State Papers will interest students of the Reformation period.

THE LONDON INSTITUTION

"THE Art of Palæolithic Man" was the subject of the lecture given by Dr. Alfred C. Haddon, M.A., Sc.D., F.R.S., at the London Institution on Monday last. Before developing his theme, the lecturer outlined the periods of the Palæolithic Age, described the animals which appeared at various times, and the implements, finished in many ways, characteristic of the different phases of this extremely early art. Notions of design, he proceeded to explain, were very simple among savage peoples. Rude sculpture in the round preceded the rough, coarse engravings on bone, ivory, and steatite—although these efforts were not child's play, but represented the work of serious artists who studied carefully the outlines of the limbs and the human form. Slides were shown on the screen illustrating this, also many of the curious carvings discovered in the Grotte du Mas d'Azil, in the South of France, the Caverne des Espélugues-Lourdes, and the paintings from the Altamira Cave, in the North of Spain. The problem as to why these attempts to depict natural objects were made was a difficult one, since the most insignificant and apparently inexplicable marks must have meant something; some, perhaps, were achieved merely for pleasure; others, it is supposed, have a magical significance, and were intended as charms to ensure success in hunting, &c.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Dr. Haddon then discussed the degeneration of the primitive designs by the process of copying another man's work—the copy of a copy ended by bearing scarcely any resemblance to the original. Examples of the earliest known brush-work were shown, and it was notable that exactly as some modern artists hoped by copious employment of colour to mask bad drawing, so in Palæolithic Art there occurred a lamentable phase of falling-off, in which the drawing became wretched as the colour-scheme progressed. Engraving was often combined with colour to give precision to the detail, and it must be remembered, observed the lecturer, that nearly all these primitive pictures must have been drawn and painted practically in the dark of the caves or by the faint illumination of a little clay lamp. Views of many chased implements, such as spears and harpoons, were shown; also certain engraved bones, supposed by the French archæologists to be ceremonial staves, but which by English authorities were considered to be spears. Dr. Haddon concluded very aptly by quoting a stanza or two from Kipling's "Story of Ung."

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

Most of the stockbrokers are grumbling. They cannot persuade the public to gamble, and investment business is dull. There is a definite demand for really sound securities, but no one appears anxious either to buy or to subscribe for speculative stocks. For example, the amusing "Lake of Soda" Company landed its underwriters with 85 per cent. The issues of the past week have not been interesting. It seems extraordinary that underwriters can be found to take risks in such hazardous ventures as, for instance, the Oil Trust issue for the purpose of exploiting asphalt. "Profit-sharing Bonds" of the nominal value of two shillings is mere bucket-shop finance. Cuba is a rich island; it is liked by the British investor, who has sunk twenty millions in Cuban companies, but if we get many concerns like the Havana Exploration the hardy speculator will sniff when he hears the name of Cuba. An ingenious financier of the name of North, desirous of selling shares in an African Rubber Company that has planted Manihot, advertises that he will deposit cash with trustees to pay dividend for one year on all shares sold through the advertisement. He does not risk much. It is a quaint way of selling shares at a discount.

Money appears certain to become cheap. We now hear very little about that overpowering stringency that was to overwhelm us. India seems satisfied for the moment; New York does not require funds; the Argentine is likely to get through the harvest without calling upon us for any large amount. Brazil may obtain more gold if the speculative element can engineer a corner in rubber, but this is far from being the certainty so many people declare it to be. Egypt has exported about 4½ million cantars of cotton, and has 2½ million left in Alexandria; thus she cannot release all the gold she has in hand. The Banks are pressing the speculators to realise, and the position is becoming dangerous, but not of importance.

Consols seem to me an excellent purchase, for Lloyd George can lose nothing by popularising the national security, and he might do much good. A Government paper declares that he has his scheme ready. Consols in £5 bonds to bearer, with coupons attached, and purchasable at any post-office at the market price of the day, would be an admirable lock-up for poor people. There is no reason why Irish Land Stock should not be sold in the same way. Indeed, all securities issued by the Treasury should be obtainable at our post-offices at market prices. The Post Office might charge a small commission to recoup itself for the expense.

Foreigners look dull, and it is evident that we may get a still further reaction in Russians; this may last through the week, when it will be safe to buy again. The Socialists in Paris, always ready to skirmish along the flanks of the army of great financiers, are propounding questions relative to the Russian Loan about which I wrote. The agitation will come to nought, but it has scared a few bulls, and the price has drooped.

Home Rails gave us two surprises last week. One, the Midland dividend, which was magnificently generous, and the other the sale of the Tilbury line. Tilbury shares are still cheap. The Midland have made a good bargain, for the little line is profitable, and upon last year's net profits would give the Midland £5,000 a year after paying the preference dividend. The deal will go through, and Tilbury stock is certainly worth £150. The secret was well kept, but a few clever people bought some time back, and have taken their profits. There is not likely to be any boom in Home Rails, but we may expect a steady advance all through the year. The buying of Scotch stock still continues, but I am told that a bull account exists; therefore, those who have made a profit must now watch the market carefully; a reaction might come.

Yankees appear just ready for a slight fall. Norfolks did not increase the dividend, and the wise people in New York think that the price of the shares is too high. There has been some silly talk about Unions, and an attack has been made on the stock. The story went round that in an old balance-sheet huge blocks of assets had been duplicated. The Union accounts are not clear, and never were; but the tale had no sense in it. Unions are the cheapest of all the 10 per cent. Railway stocks. The Canadian Reciprocity Treaty caused a great rise in Hill stocks, but speculators were hardly wise, for much water will flow down the Hudson before the two nations come to terms. The speculative position in the States is not big, but it grows, and bankers may think a shake out necessary; therefore I should take a profit and get in again after the fall had run a few days. The main tendency will be upwards. Steels are bad on figures, but good on inside information, which tells of large orders placed or ready to be placed Gary says that the Conference will not take place, which means that he is strong enough to support the market and disregard those outside the Trust. These outside firms are working full time, and must be making money.

Rubbers are reported hard. The jobbers think that there are bears about. I am not so certain on this point. It is not a market in which to speculate for the moment, for there is no business, and prices are quite high enough, if judged from the standpoint of the investor. I again say that no one should buy rubber shares unless he can see a clear ten per cent. on his money. This is not a rule that can be applied wholesale. There are only about twenty shares in the rubber market that can be bought by the careful man. The rest are veritable gambles. Never touch anything outside the Federated Malay States.

Oil shares are such a limited market that, though we are promised a boom, I prefer to wait until the public come in and buy. Mr. Mitchell has come home from California, and his report upon Kern is now issued. The Company is over-capitalised, but Mr. Mitchell is a careful man and he takes a moderately sanguine view. He thinks that the output can be increased, and that the price at which the Company has sold its oil, though not as high as that foreshadowed in the prospectus, is nevertheless profitable.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

KAFFIRS.—The jobbers bid up City Deeps on the news of the crushing, and those who bought some time back thought it wise to take a profit. City Deep is a good mine, and at under 4 is a reasonable purchase. But the Kaffir market is so dull that prices may fall away in mere despair.

RHODESIANS.—All are awaiting the Chartered report. A solemn compact has been entered into by the big Rhodesian houses, who have promised not to sell shares, but to support each other. How far they will keep together remains to be seen. Some big options have been bought in Chartereds, but otherwise the market is rotten.

ELECTRICS.—Wise people have been buying. The bears declared that the metallic filament lamp would reduce profits. It has not had the bad effect that some people expected. Profits are as good as last year; in some cases they are better. Nearly all the shares have risen. I think that we shall see at least a couple of points advance in all Electric Lighting shares within the next few months. They are one of the soundest investments in the House.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

THEOSOPHY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In your issue of January 14th appears an account of a lecture on Theosophy delivered by the Rev. J. J. B. Coles, M.A., F.R.G.S., in which the subject was treated in a manner that does not recommend itself to the close student of the teachings classed under that heading. The lecturer briefly outlined the salient points of belief in a fairly impartial manner, but proceeded later to speak of "profane and ludicrous theosophical teaching." How can such hasty judgments come from persons of reasoned and balanced minds? And as a matter of fact it is Theosophists and not as a rule "professing Christians" who really more nearly approach a right understanding of the "fuller and deeper teaching" of the writings of St. Paul. St. Paul was an Initiate of the one great school of mystics to which certain members of the Theosophical Society belong, and he spoke from full knowledge, as they do also when they place before the modern world teachings of ancient days that are as real and potent now as in an age less sceptical, less intolerant in its ignorances.

Another speaker thought that Theosophy should be classed with things "unclean and insane." Why unclean? Why insane? To disagree with a body of teaching does not necessarily imply anything radically wrong with the doctrines, and it is not a reasoned conclusion that unwelcome ideas are insane even if here or there are found crazy exponents of them. And while it is highly probable that there are "muddle-headed mystics" discoverable in the ranks of the Theosophical Society, seeing it is an organisation of human proportions and limitations, yet that in no wise detracts from the possibility of the soundness of its basis of thought. As Mrs. Sharpe pointed out, it is a system which has engaged some of the finest intellects of many ages, including within its ranks the greatest philosophers of all times, whether they in any particular personality might have recognised themselves or not under the modern name. Pythagoras was a Theosophist, and so was Lao-Tsze, and so were Plato and Euclid; they held high places in the hierarchy of aspirants after the Greater Wisdom. For, as the lecturer at the Victoria Institute explained, Theosophy is the name given to the present-day exposition of Universal Wisdom, the wisdom embracing every atom in its all-comprehending knowledge, and neither the unclean, nor the insane, nor the muddle-headed are likely to make much headway in mastering its ethics.—Yours &c.,

E. P. F.

A Charming Companion to "White Heather."

A NEW VOLUME BY THE AUTHOR OF "WHITE HEATHER."

PURPLE HEATHER

Crown 8vo., cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

By ELLA MARY GORDON, F.R.S.L.

EXTRACTS FROM SOME OF THE REVIEWS OF "PURPLE HEATHER."

The Scotsman.—"These graceful and sympathetic lyrical pieces . . . are . . . earnest both in feeling and in their studious elevation of poetic diction . . . and the interest is . . . like that of the best known work of Longfellow."

The Aberdeen Daily Journal.—"Mrs. Gordon's new book of poems, which has been produced in a delightful form, is worthy both of her reputation and of her poetical idealism."

The Times.—"Mrs. Gordon, whose 'White Heather' was favourably received . . . versifies skilfully."

The Queen.—"Mrs. Gordon's style is invariably simple and natural, for her aim appears to be to write for people at large . . . and the quiet, gentle thoughts of the writer . . . appeal to the reader's love and sympathy."

The Aberdeen Free Press.—"Mrs. Gordon's new volume of poems is a book which has met with much appreciation."

The Oxford Times.—"The lover of Nature will find much to enjoy in these verses, and a sense of the peace and rest of a contented mind permeates the book."

Hearth and Home.—"An interesting companion to the writer's previous volume, 'White Heather.'"

PUBLISHED BY

ELLIOT STOCK, 61 & 62, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

BOOKS RECEIVED

FICTION

The Shadow on the Purple: Recollections of an Ex-Attaché. Recorded by a Peeress. Lynwood and Co. 6s.

Lady Fanny. By Mrs. George Norman. Methuen and Co. 6s.

Billy. By Paul Methven. Chatto and Windus. 6s.

Mac's Adventures. By Jane Barlow. Hutchinson and Co. 6s.

The Third Wife. By Herbert Flowerdew. Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.

A Lady of the Garter. By Frank Hamel. Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.

The White Peacock. By D. H. Lawrence. William Heinemann. 6s.

Declined with Thanks, because Polite but Discriminating Editors have Declined Most of the Tales in this Collection. By Una L. Silberrad. Second Impression. Constable and Co. 6s.

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND MEMOIRS

The Sanctuaries and Sanctuary Seekers of Mediæval England. By the Rev. J. Charles Cox, LL.D., F.S.A. Illustrated. George Allen and Sons. 15s.

Martha, Lady Giffard: Her Life and Correspondence (1664-1722). A Sequel to The Letters of Dorothy Osborne. Edited by Julia G. Longe. With Preface by his Honour Judge Parry. Illustrated. George Allen and Sons. 15s. net.

THEOLOGY

Man's Redemption of Man. A Lay Sermon by William Osler. Constable & Co. 1s. net.

PERIODICALS

The Open Window; Deutsche Rundschau; Revue Bleue; Mercure de France; The Literary Digest; People's Magazine; Popular Magazine; The Bibelot; Bookseller; Publishers' Circular; Travel and Exploration; Cambridge University Reporter; Empire Review; Bulletin of Metropolitan Museum of Art, N.Y.; Ainslee's Magazine; The Cosmopolitan; The Vineyard.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

VERSE

The Brahman's Wisdom. Translated from the German of Friedrich Rückert. By Eva M. Martin. Wm. Rider and Son. 1s. 6d. net.

Repetition and Parallelism in Tennyson. By Emile Lauvrière, Docteur-ès-lettres. Henry Frowde. 2s. 6d. net.

Puritan Pansies. By Claud Field. Headley Bros. 1s. 6d.

Manhood, a Plea for a Larger Faith. By David Scott Moncrieff. Kegan Paul and Co. 1s. net.

Their Wayward Round. A Poem by Sophia Lydia Walters. Greening and Co. 2s. 6d. net.

Purple Heather. By Ella Mary Gordon, F.R.S.L. With Portrait Frontispiece. Elliot Stock. 2s. 6d. net.

Souvenir. By Owen Haydn. Hugh Rees, 119, Pall Mall.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, LTD.,
30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET, W.C.
Only Branches } 48, Queen Victoria Street, E.C. 132, Kensington High Street, W.

NEW BOOKS LESS THAN HALF-PRICE.

		Offered at s.	d.	Published at s.	d.
CRISPI, FRANCESCO,	Italian Insurgent	1	9	7	6
GRAFTON, THIRD DUKE, AUTO. AND LETTERS		3	6	18	0
HARVARD, JOHN, AND HIS TIMES		3	3	7	6 net.
STEPHEN, SIR JAMES FITZJAMES, LIFE by his brother Leslie Stephen		5	0	16	0
THIEBAULT, BARON, MEMOIRS OF, 2 Vols. trans.		7	6	28	0
YOUNG, ARTHUR, AUTO. OF. Ed. M. Betham Edwards		4	9	12	6

Full List Free on Application.

BOOKS, Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold, and Exchanged. Monthly Catalogues Free. Libraries purchased, catalogued, arranged, or valued.—Thomas Thorp, 93, St. Martin's Lane, W.C. (and at Reading).

HOW TO WRITE FOR THE PRESS OR TO BECOME AN AUTHOR.
Interesting and useful Booklet free.
"H," LITERARY CORRESPONDENCE COLLEGE,
9, Arundel Street, W.C.

CONSULT
The Gresham
On all Matters of
LIFE, FIRE & ACCIDENT INSURANCE.
Many Special Features.
Write for Prospectus; it will pay you.
Liberal Terms to recognised Brokers and Agents.
HEAD OFFICES:
ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE, POULTRY, LONDON, E.C.
JAMES H. SCOTT, General Manager.

Free Insurance Coupon to readers of "The Academy." (Not to be detached.)
The Gresham Fire and Accident Insurance Society, Limited,
of
ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE, POULTRY, LONDON, E.C.,
will pay
£100 (One hundred pounds) to the legal personal representative of the bonâ fide holder of this Coupon, if he or she be killed solely and directly by an accident within the United Kingdom to any Railway Company's Train, a Tramcar, Omnibus, Cab, or other Licensed Vehicle plying for public hire, in which the holder is travelling as an ordinary ticket-bearing or fare-paying passenger, subject always to the following special conditions which are to be taken as incorporated in the contract:—
(a) That death result within thirty days after the accident (b) that notice thereof be given within seven days to the Society at its Head Office in London (c) that such reasonable evidence of the cause of death be given as the Society may require (d) that the holder shall have written in ink prior to the accident his or her usual signature in the space provided therefor (e) that the Society shall not be liable to any one person in respect of more than one Coupon in this or any other publication (f) that this insurance shall not be available to persons under twelve or over seventy years of age, and shall hold good for seven days from 12 o'clock noon of the day of issue.
Signature of Holder .....
Address .....

GERMAN wishes to correspond with ENGLISHMAN, to exchange German for English. Correction reciprocal. Write to Mr. G. Wolfram, Weingarten 3, Quedlinburg (Germany).

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references.—Address Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

"The Book Monthly is now enlarged and makes an exceedingly pleasant and readable publication."—CLAUDIUS CLEAR, in the British Weekly.

. . THE . .
BOOK MONTHLY.

You know the "Book Monthly" by name—you very often see it quoted in the papers. It is a brightly written, brightly illustrated magazine about the books and the literary affairs of the day. But as yet you have not taken it in! Well, you are missing something, and you should at once arrange to get it regularly. It is an instructing, entertaining "guide, philosopher and friend" for the reader near the centre of things or far away. Being now seven years old, and so grown up, it has just been enlarged, and made more popular and practical in contents and style. Read it and you will know what to read; what's what, and who's who in the book world.

THE BOOK MONTHLY is published on the 1st of each month, by Simpkin, Marshall & Co., Ltd., Stationers' Hall Court, London. It costs Sixpence, and it can be ordered from any Bookseller, Bookstall, or Newsagent. The Publishers will send it, post free, for a year, inland or abroad, on receipt of eight shillings. You can have a copy of the current number posted to you by forwarding 6d., or a specimen back number for nothing.

Edward Whistler,
II, Strand, Charing Cross, London.
DIAMOND MERCHANT :: :: JEWELLER & SILVERSMITH.
A large stock of New and Second-hand Diamond and Gem Jewellery, Antique and Modern Silver Plate, always on hand, at bargain prices, for cash.
Fine Pearls, Emeralds, Diamonds, and early specimens of Antique Silver Plate wanted. High Prices given in Cash. Full Value allowed in Exchange.
Valuations made for Probate and other purposes.
GUN DEPARTMENT.
HAMMERLESS SECOND-HAND GUNS,
British Made, from £6 10s.
Nitro Proof. The Cheapest Gun in the Market combined with Quality.
ALSO
HAMMERLESS EJECTORS,
By Best London Makers, at Greatly Reduced Prices.
CORDITE RIFLES, ·400, ·500, ·600 Bores.
Catalogue and Price List on Application Gratis.
Telephone No.: 2033 GERRARD.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE & BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC

OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO AND . . THROUGH CANADA. . .

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service viâ Vancouver.

For further particulars, apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,

62-65, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON, E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street, Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE

TO

SOUTH and EAST AFRICA.

WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.

Viâ the SUEZ CANAL.

Calling at MARSEILLES and NAPLES.

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.

(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS (and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—

DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.

Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE PLEASURE CRUISES

LIVERPOOL

to the

MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC

by the

"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"

Saxonia Leaves Liverpool 9 Feb., 1911.
Carpathia " " 2 Mch., 1911.

Ports of Call . . .

CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS, MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA, ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME, PALERMO, NAPLES.

• • •

For full particulars apply—

THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

THE

"EMPIRE ILLUSTRATED."

The Tariff Reform Monthly.

40 pages.

Profusely Illustrated.

Interesting to every Unionist and Imperialist and convincing to Liberals and Little Englanders.

Price 3d.

P & O Passenger Services.

EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA, JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports

(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)

Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises

Throughout the Year, according to Season.

AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE, NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.

Programme on Application.

For Passage, Freight and all information apply—

PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,

122 Leadenhall Street, E.C., or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours

R.M.S.P. THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY.

(Royal Charter dated 1839.)

Fortnightly Sailings from Southampton to—

ARGENTINA & BRAZIL

via SPAIN & PORTUGAL.

WEST INDIES, BRITISH GUIANA, SPANISH MAIN, CENTRAL AMERICA, NEW YORK.

From LONDON to—

MOROCCO & CANARY ISLANDS,

EGYPT, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA & JAPAN. (By Shire Line.)

For further particulars apply to

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY

18, Moorgate Street, E.C., & 32, Cockspur Street, S.W.

Printed and Published for the Proprietor by ODHAMS, LTD., 25, Floral Street, Covent Garden, and 67, Long Acre, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE

No. 2024 [Registered as a Newspaper.] FEBRUARY 18, 1911 PRICE THREEPENCE

THE CARNEGIE LIBRARY, STATE COLLEGE, PA.

ROLLS-ROYCE

THE BEST CAR.

WE HAVE PROVED IT

by creating the longest official NON-STOP record—viz., 14,371 miles—and obtaining the Royal Automobile Club's record for durability, 42s. 7d. for new parts to replace ALL worn parts after 15,000 miles.

OWNERS HAVE PROVED IT

by finally purchasing the Rolls-Royce after extensive and varied experience of the leading makes of cars.

One Owner writes:—"I am very pleased with my Rolls-Royce car. Even amongst high-class cars it, in my opinion, stands quite alone, and is quite different from anything I have driven before."

Another Owner writes:—"Your car is the most perfect thing of the kind I have ever been in; it is as Purdey's guns are to all other guns."

EXPERTS HAVE APPROVED IT

as being THE FINEST CAR IN THE WORLD, because of the superiority of its design and scientific construction.

ROLLS-ROYCE, LIMITED, 14 and 15, Conduit Street, London, W.

Telegrams: "Rolhead, London." Telephones: Gerrard 1654, 1655, and 1656.

And at PARIS: 56, Avenue Hoche.

Telegrams: "Rollsroyce, Paris."

The following firms who purchase direct from us have the sole selling rights of our cars in their respective districts:—LEICESTERSHIRE, DERBYSHIRE, NOTTINGHAMSHIRE, LINCOLNSHIRE, WARWICKSHIRE, NORTHAMPTONSHIRE, and RUTLANDSHIRE: The Midland Counties Motor Garage Co., Ltd., Granby St., Leicester; SCOTLAND: L. C. Seligmann and Co., 96, Renfrew St., Glasgow; MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT, including East Lancashire (as far north as a line drawn on the map due east from Cockerham) and East Cheshire: Joseph Cockshoot and Co., Ltd., New Bridge Street, Manchester; YORKSHIRE: A. B. Wardman and Sons, Ltd., Cambridge St., Harrogate; LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT, including West Lancashire (as far north as Cockerham), West Cheshire, and North Wales: W. Watson and Co., 56, Renshaw St., Liverpool: NORTHUMBERLAND, DURHAM, CUMBERLAND, WESTMORLAND, and NORTH LANCASHIRE: Sir Wm. Angus Sanderson and Co., St. Thomas' Street, Newcastle-on-Tyne; IRELAND: J. B. Ferguson, Ltd., Chichester St., Belfast. The following firms are appointed as Retailers of Rolls-Royce cars. LONDON: Messrs. Barker and Co. (Coachbuilders), Ltd., 66-68, South Audley St., W.; Messrs. Charles Jarrott, Ltd., 35, Sackville Street, W.; WESTERN AUSTRALIA: The Perth Motor House, 888, Hay Street, Perth, W.A.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

LONDON to EDINBURGH

ON

TOP GEAR

ALSO

NON-STOP ENGINE RUN

RECENTLY ACCOMPLISHED BY THE

GEAR - BOX - LESS

OFFICIALLY OBSERVED

BY THE

ROYAL AUTOMOBILE CLUB.

Catalogues post-free on application to Dept. "L."

The SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX MOTOR WORKS, Ltd.

TINSLEY, SHEFFIELD.

London Office: c/o MULLINERS, 132-135, LONG ACRE, W.C.

THE "EMPIRE ILLUSTRATED."

THE TARIFF REFORM MONTHLY.

40 pages. Profusely Illustrated.

Interesting to every Unionist and Imperialist and convincing to Liberals and Little Englanders.

PRICE THREEPENCE.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

CONTENTS

	Page
Review of the Week	187
The Golden Birds	188
Some New Features	188
Byron in French Verse	188
The Scheldt—II.	189
Reviews :—
The Case for Technique	190
History and Humanity	191
"The Oldest Music-room in Europe"	193
The Party System	193
Two Books of the Sea	194
The Shia World	195
The French in India	196
Shorter Reviews	196
Fiction	198
The Theatre	199
Music	201
Some New French Books	203
India: A Series—V.	204
The Poet Who Was	205
The Chesterton Manner	206
France under Louis Seize—I.	208
A High Priest of Truth: Thomas Huxley	209
The Leicester Galleries	210
In the Temple of Mammon	211
Correspondence	212
Books Received	213

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

THE ACADEMY is published by MESSRS. ODHAMS, LIMITED, 67, Long Acre, London, W.C., to whom all letters with reference to publication must be addressed.

Applications referring to Advertisements may be addressed to MESSRS. ODHAMS, as above.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

THE ACADEMY is now obtainable at Messrs. W. H. Smith & Sons, Messrs. Wyman's, and Messrs. Willing's bookstalls and shops.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

THERE are many ways of celebrating a famous man—we may name a street after him, publish a special edition of his books, give a dinner to his descendants, or erect a statue to his memory. Perhaps the idea of commemorating the centenary of the birth of Charles Dickens by issuing a plausible imitation of a postage-stamp, whereon the familiar face is displayed, is not particularly brilliant; but it is better than a statue, which as a rule is disregarded by all but the country cousins who take possession of London when "London is empty." At any rate we are all agreed, since as a nation we are rather fond of keeping up anniversaries, that Dickens must not be neglected now that an opportunity is at hand; but there is no reason to fear that the great Victorian novelist is in the slightest danger of being forgotten. His humour saves him from that fate. In the delightful company of Mr. and Mrs. Vincent Crummles, or of the Brothers Cheeryble, we forget the tearful tedium of Kate Nickleby, the tragic speechifying of Nicholas; immersed in the flood of jollity of "Pickwick" we are oblivious to the saturated sentiment of the "Old Curiosity Shop;" and listening to the hoarse voice of Captain Cuttle, or the genial imbecilities of Mr. Toots, we do not mind the emphasised pathos of Paul Dombey. Mr. William Archer truly says that if the name of Dickens and all it connotes could be struck out of the history of the nineteenth century, "the English-speaking race would be poorer to a degree not measurable in millions of money. We are all of us, every day, the happier for his work, and it is our own fault if we are not also the better." With regard to Mr. Archer's advice that we should put the "Dickens stamp" on letters, however, by way of advertising the affair and "keeping the name of Dickens constantly in the public eye," as is sometimes done in other countries, we are not quite in harmony with him. The celebration of a centenary too enthusiastically may easily become a bore, and the idea inspiring such a celebration as this is that the public should appreciate Charles Dickens more highly, not that they should become weary of the sight of his face. A little moderation will be wise, lest the object of the promoters be defeated.

The growth of a large city is always an interesting study; but, considered as a concrete fact, is apt to present embarrassing problems. At times, doubtless, those who have to deal with it find themselves wishing for the dark ages, when each town was enclosed by a wall, with gates which could be locked and drawbridges which could be raised. Overgrown London burst such bonds long ago, to flow in rivers of bricks and mortar through miles of fields and hedgerows, and, because this tremendous onset was not realised in time, our present-day Board of Trade has had to consider the question of roads and traffic very seriously. For two years the inquiry has been proceeding, and the conclusions arrived at, embodied in the Report just issued, seem to indicate that London is as yet but a sturdy youngster, not nearly full grown. "Every million spent at the present time," says the Committee, "would be a good investment, as there can be no reasonable doubt that it would result in the saving of an equal amount in the near future, irrespective of the gain in convenience and the saving of time which the prompt provision of better facilities would effect."

The "better facilities," it is suggested, should take the form of main arterial roads, a hundred feet wide, leading from London's suburbs well into the country, so that entrance to and exit from this complicated metropolis shall be a less difficult matter than it is at present. Such roads should of course be under the control of a central traffic board, and not at the mercy of half a-dozen different local authorities. The cost would be heavy, but, as the Report goes on to say, "it is difficult to see how it can be avoided if congestion is to be relieved and proper provision made for the needs of the future." The words which follow are perhaps the most significant of all: "Large as the expense may be, it should be remembered that the cost of inaction is also heavy. . . . It should further be borne in mind that the longer the improvements are postponed the more costly they will be." It is a pity that such a recommendation was not urgently made thirty or forty years ago. In matters of city administration we seem to be rather given to shutting the stable-door after the horse has gone, but the construction of 100 miles of new roads, and the widening of 25 miles of existing highways—which constitutes the scheme proposed—should do much to make us objects of intelligence and admiration to those who will occupy our place a hundred years hence. If, then, the age of flight has displaced the age of wheels, it will be a great joke; but probably we shall not be within earshot of the roars of laughter.

A most interesting lecture was delivered by Sir Sidney Colvin, M.A., D.Litt., on the 10th inst., at the Royal Institution, on "Robert Louis Stevenson." Sixteen years ago Professor Walter Raleigh discoursed on Stevenson and his work from the same chair, and asked whether that work would live; the fact that another discourse was now being given might be taken, said the lecturer, as a partial answer to that question. Sir Sidney Colvin's personal friendship with Stevenson, dating from 1873, gave his words an intimate note which is often lacking in the purely academic discussion of a writer. He expressed the opinion that Stevenson's masterpieces consisted rather of the shorter essays than of any lengthy romance, fascinating though some of the latter may be, and that the general work of this author, who made for himself so great a name as a stylist, was an instance of just balance between "things"—the material of life, and "words"—the material of language. Stevenson did not dazzle the reader by brilliant epigrams, but he "lived, felt, tested intensely, in reality or in imagination, all that he uttered before he uttered it." The only conclusion possibly to be arrived at, now that time has elapsed and something like a true perspective can be obtained, is that Stevenson's name is not only undiminished, but still growing; that he is, in fact, a living classic.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Another address, of less importance from a literary point of view but of great entertaining quality, was given by Mr. Leslie Moore, I.C.S., at the Royal Society of Arts on the previous day. Our first-hand knowledge of ghosts and astral affairs is in England rather scanty and vague, but Mr. Moore has gathered much information upon the subject of supernatural matters in India. He presented the results of his observations under the title of "Indian Superstitions," and hinted that there was much more material than he had time to deal with. From omens to mahatmas, from magic to the Djinn (who might be known, if encountered, by his inability to wink), Mr. Moore led his audience merrily. It seems to be unlucky among the Hindus to hear a woman sneeze; but no formula was given for frustrating the result of such a catastrophe. To the practical Englishman the business of avoiding the maleficent omens would seem rather a laborious one if corresponding notions prevailed in this country; the Hindu, however, seems to thrive in spite of unpropitious fates. The lecture, although of an unusually amusing nature, was provocative of thought, and emphasised the words of Kipling which insist upon the irreconcilable differences between East and West—"Never the twain shall meet."

It almost seems, according to the amusing speech of the Postmaster-General (Mr. Herbert Samuel) at the annual dinner of the Post Office Engineering Department last Tuesday, that in a few years Ministers will be able to settle our little international differences by a chat over the telephone. If, as the Engineer-in-Chief stated, "with proper adaptation and equipment" the loaded cable between England and France will some day enable us to speak from London to Astrakhan, endless possibilities are suggested. To ring up Timbuctoo and inquire what had become of a missionary would be exciting; to talk with Ceylon, where, according to a certain hymn (the writer of which had probably never been there) "every prospect pleases, and only man is vile," would be an adventure; to ask the Exchange to put us on to 2-double-5 Venezuela Central, and inquire kindly how the latest revolution was progressing—with perhaps the echo of a revolver-shot thrown in—would be unalloyed delight. Why stop at Astrakhan? But perhaps the engineer-in-chief was romancing, or Mr. Herbert Samuel was having his little joke. However that may be, the world is getting smaller, and our clever, busy Post Office people are responsible for a great deal of the lightning-like conveyance of news at the present day; they control the "biggest electrical business in the country," and none can tell to what triumphs of communication they may yet proceed.

THE GOLDEN BIRDS

Ah! the long hours of waiting
Before the blesséd Morn,
When Night broods on the tree-tops
And Nature sighs forlorn;
Ah! in these hours of darkness
Illusion's veil is torn,
And bats fly in the night-time
Before the blesséd Morn.

Ah! the dread hours of silence,
When Hope with drooping wings
Sits staring through the darkness,
While grey imaginings
Come creeping through the shadows;
When Sleep no longer brings
The opiate branch of comfort
To banish cruel things.

Ah! now the long-sought daybreak
Comes floating on the breeze,
And Hope looks up from weeping,
Rejoicing as she sees
The bats fly from the sunlight,
While joyful in the trees
The Golden Birds of morning
Make music with the bees.

C. S.

SOME NEW FEATURES

It is our intention to devote a portion of our space weekly to an authoritative exposition of foreign affairs, considered with sanity and devoid of hysteria. The affairs of the world are entering on phases which promise to be of surpassing interest to the studious and philosophical mind, and it would seem to be desirable that they should be weighed and mirrored with calmness and impartiality. It will be our endeavour to attain to an attitude of detachment apart from perpetual waving of the flag and removed from repeated aspersions on the good faith and honest intentions of other nations which constitute the fellowship of civilisation.

A journal which adopts an attitude of that kind will, we think, gradually be recognised abroad as an interpreter of the balanced judgment of large masses in this country, and the authority which it wields will have a potent influence for good.

India will claim our special attention. Able writers will deal with literature bearing on its history, laws, customs, and religion, and a thoroughly well-informed correspondent in Calcutta will supply a monthly letter tracing the progress and effects of the reforms recently introduced.

Japan has already been dealt with by able writers who know the country thoroughly, and whose criticisms and opinions have attracted much attention.

We can promise the addition of other exceptional features of interest from time to time.

BYRON IN FRENCH VERSE*

M. Leprévost's translation of "Childe Harold" is a work that is of extraordinary interest in more ways than one. It is the life's work of the translator; no mere academic exercise, but the medium through which he has contrived to utter his hopes and his sorrows. In the singularly touching

Le Pèlerinage de Childe Harold. Version en Vers avec Notes Explicatives.* By Gabriel Leprévost. Alphonse Lemerre, Paris.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

"Hommage à Lord Byron," which serves as invocation, we learn that the writer has been visited with blindness :—

Depuis de mon regard s'est éteinte la flamme
Et mes yeux ne voient plus les choses qu'en rêvant.

This terrible calamity was, it seems, the direct cause of the translation. Byron's verses, committed to memory, became part and parcel of the mind of the translator, to issue again in their present form, fulfilling his aspiration that they should reflect the mind of the poet :—

Comme une goutte d'eau reflète un ciel d'azur.

From the purely literary side, again, the translation is of unusual interest. It is rare to find a rhythmical version in French of a foreign poem. The translations in verse that have from time to time enriched the English language, notably in the sixteenth century, when they abounded both in quality and quantity, have no very exact counterpart in the French language. The versification of parts of the Bible is the only serious contribution of French poetical translators to French literature. Various plays of Shakespeare have, of course, been fitted to French metres; but in general the necessity for adapting them to French stage conventions has prevented a very conscientious rendering of the thought of the poet. The reason of this phenomenon may perhaps lie in the national character; a certain impatience combined with the desire to express new ideas; but what is indisputable is that the French system of metre is so peculiar—fitting certainly with the national genius, but ill-adapting itself to the requirements of alien poetry—that there are few poems that will bear the strain of translation. A French critic, appreciating the present work, has given it his ungrudging praise, but has insisted strongly that the author has struck out a path that is not to be followed: "Si nous admirons discrètement Prométhée lorsqu'il dérobe le feu du ciel, nous cachons vite les allumettes lorsqu'arrivent les enfants."

M. Leprévost is far from having made a literal translation; he claims to be an interpreter rather than a translator. At the same time all the ideas of Byron are there; an occasional redundancy is omitted; occasionally even the translator allows himself to embellish a little. For instance, in the lines to Inez Byron has written :—

To me no pleasure Beauty brings;
Thine eyes have scarce a charm for me.

M. Leprévost renders :—

Mon coeur pour la beauté n'a plus qu'indifférence,
Et pour moi tes doux yeux ont resplendi trop tard.

The metre chosen, the stanza of twelve lines of six feet, serves admirably to contain the thought of the English poet. M. Leprévost complains of the difficulty occasioned by the comparative prolixity of the French language; in some cases we find the balance on the other side—Byron is not without his redundancies. The smoothness and evenness of the French couplet reproduce very truthfully the harmonies of the Spenserian stanza. The misanthropical gall which so often in Byron's stanza seems to find its way into the last two lines, as if into the bottom of the cup, fits better, because more epigrammatically, into the concluding couplet of the French stanza. Where a more vigorous movement is needed, M. Leprévost has one ready; the song

Tamburgi! Tamburgi! thy 'larum afar begins thus in the translation :—

Tamburgi! Tamburgi! tes sonores alarmes
Pour les enfants des monts ont de tout-puissants charmes!

More than this we cannot say. For the countrymen of Byron the work of M. Leprévost is in the highest degree interesting; but the gift is to the French people, and it is for them to appraise and enjoy it.

THE SCHELDT—II.

By Hilaire Belloc

We saw in the first of these articles, published last week in The Academy, that the one main outstanding and most general truth about the fortification of the mouth of the Scheldt was the fact that that fortification was directed against a maritime enemy, and a maritime enemy alone.

In plain words, it is of military value to the German Empire only in connection with a struggle against England, or a struggle in which England was involved.

But, apart from this general truth, a number of particular questions must arise in the reader's mind: as, in the first place, what is the legal or defined standing of this country, or one of this country's allies, in protesting against the new facts? What Treaty can be cited or what public law invoked? The answer to that prime question is very simple. There is no legal or defined position available to Great Britain or her allies in the matter. No Treaty, no precedent, not so much as an understanding or exchange of views can be cited. Holland has an indefeasible right to erect there forts if she so feels inclined—she has erected fortifications on the same spot before; and the fact that these and their armament are now out of date is no sort of bar to their right to existence and to renewal.

Were all the Netherlands still united under one crown, from Luxemburg to Groningen, no objection could conceivably be maintained. As it is the Treaty of April 19th, 1839 (the Treaty of London), does insist on the commercial freedom of the Scheldt, but in the matter of fortification, or even of the use of the river in time of war, that Treaty is silent. That Treaty expressly leaves the mouth of the Scheldt in Dutch hands. The Dutch may even advance the moral truth that Antwerp was for some time a debatable point, and that a very powerful party within the town desired its retention by Holland. The navigation of the great international highway is fixed by the Ninth Article of the Treaty of London—subject to certain purchase of toll-rights and resettlements of a purely commercial character, designed to facilitate traffic between Antwerp and Flushing. Now this Ninth Article is particular and even minute in its insistence upon the free commercial use of the river in time of peace, but the very fact that it says not a word in restraint of Dutch rights in time of war is a sufficient proof that these rights were left open.

Holland, then, so far as international bonds are concerned is free to fortify the point at will. Next it may be asked Does such fortification effectively close the river? Undoubtedly it does.

The mouth of the Scheldt narrows from an indefinite width ("indefinite" because there is no foreland on the south from which to measure across to the West-Kapelle light) to a "gullet" of no more than just over five thousand yards—to be accurate, nearly five thousand one hundred. This narrowest passage lies between the point of the fort Frederick Henrick, just eastward of the green buoy on the Kadzand side and the pilot's beach in Flushing town. The proposed sites for the guns involve a somewhat longer range; but the point is immaterial, for under modern conditions a range of something under six thousand yards, commanded by heavy batteries upon either end of it, bars the passage utterly. It is true that the fair-way is at this narrow point almost as wide as the whole stream. There is 50ft. of water at low spring tides within a few yards of both on the Kadzand and the Walcheren shore, and even in the shoal-piece between you have over forty (except on the Spyker-plaat bank, where one small patch touches twenty-three). It is also true that the batteries must lie flush with the water-level from the flatness of the land. But, I repeat, where so short a range is concerned the channel, though everywhere navigable and nowhere dominated, is absolutely closed by heavy and protected guns.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

If the point needed further emphasis, that emphasis could be discovered in the ranges and direction of fire upon approach to the "gullet" and on receding from it up the river inland.

The banks at the mouth of the Scheldt divide the entry of that river into three channels. The northernmost, or "East gat," is very narrow, nearly straight, and hugs the Walcheren shore for miles. Guns to the east of Flushing command it absolutely. The second (or Deurloo) channel narrows as it approaches Flushing, and any vessel using it is compelled to pass right under the land as it goes eastward to pass that town. The third channel (which alone seriously concerns the problem) is wide and open. It is the Weilongen and its continuation, but guns emplaced at Fort Frederick Hendrick, on the one side, and east of Flushing on the other, command this main channel by a cross-fire well beyond the Sluische bank, and at an extreme range almost to the Knocke—the flatness of the land permits the southern batteries to come into play before a vessel has rounded the point, and to command the Fransche Pass.

The same command over the whole sheet of water is discoverable within the river eastward of this narrowest part. Here for a matter of five miles, between Borssele Point and Flushing town, is a deep and safe piece of water known as the Honte, and forming the northern part of the Scheldt where it widens landward of its narrows. Batteries to the west of Flushing would be useless against shipping in this reach; but guns to the east of the town would command the whole of it, and would cross their fire, at least in the western portion, with those of the batteries on the Kadzand bank—for there is no obstacle but flat shoals between.

If it be further asked whether, with the modern use of mines, permanent fortification at this point needs a particular protest from this country, the reply is that mines cannot be sown before an act of hostility and that their disposition is a matter of time. Protected guns are immediately available. Mines may be risked or swept; batteries are absolute until they are silenced or captured. Mines are an obstacle to either party; guns close the door to enemies, but permit it to be opened for friends.

An advocate of indifference in the whole matter might further point out that the time required for a Prussian force to reach and occupy the mouth of the Scheldt would be far greater than that which separates a vessel in Sheerness from the Walcheren coast. This is true; but not greater than the time required to ship and transport men across that sea in any numbers. A French force (supposing the operation to be one of French and English combined) would certainly bring matters to an issue in Belgium before Flushing could be reached from over the Meuse—which is the line of check to an invader. But Flushing would not be approached from Aix-la-Chapelle; that is not the calculation upon which those who have attempted to coerce Holland are working. They calculate to advance the small force required through Holland itself.

Should the French not enter into the problem at all, as in the future they may not, even should they be hostile, as in the future they may well be, the fortification of the mouth of the Scheldt, the establishment of permanent works to be used by an invading or even a local and neutral Power is aimed at this country. It is characteristic of the time in which we live that no alarm was raised here, and that permanent official and professional politician alike were ignorant of the whole matter until a foreign ally insisted upon our attention.

REVIEWS

THE CASE FOR TECHNIQUE

The City of Man. By A. Scott Matheson. (Fisher Unwin. 3s. 6d. net.)

There are many excellent and amiable things to be found in this suggestive book. The writer seems to have a thorough grasp of the beauty of the mediæval city:—

> The cathedral represented the spiritual aspirations of the citizens, while the town-hall represented the economic or industrial forces. In the mediæval period we find what Greek architecture lacked—the Gothic element, the aspiring impulse, communion with the unseen, aspiration toward heaven. The city was a living unity, just as temporal and spiritual elements were harmonised, and their common devotion to civic interests helped to produce good workmanship . . . Mediæval village churches were often built without the aid of any architect, because every workman was also an artist.

This is well and clearly put; it is to be welcomed as one of the many instances that the most liberal of liberal thinkers are coming gradually to recognise the gross absurdity of the phrase "the dark ages" as applied to the mediæval period.

The phrase in question, it may be surmised, is one of the many offensive results and remnants of the Protestant Reformation. It is interesting to note that in the eighteenth century, when the poison had had full time to work, when the old romance of England had been for two centuries drugged with Protestant and Puritan medicines, there seemed little sense of any vital reality left to the nation. Here and there we had individuals with some glimmering vision of true things; Dr. Johnson saw one or two realities clearly and distinctly. But Dr. Johnson belonged, theologically, to the school of the Caroline divines; and even Dr. Johnson thought that "Lycidas" was something very near to complete nonsense.

But with such occasional exceptions, the eighteenth century was in all but complete darkness. It did not know fine literature when it saw it; it did not know fine painting when it saw it; it did not know fine architecture when it saw it. There is a criticism in Smollett's "Humphrey Clinker" on York Cathedral which is quite typical of the average—indeed of the brilliant—eighteenth-century mind. Smollett, in the character of Matthew Bramble, denounces the barbarous absurdity of the "Saracenic" building, and wishes that it were replaced by a neat Grecian room. Characteristically enough, the good Tobias conjectures that Gothic architecture was invented in Spain, and that its peculiarities are due to a desire to keep out the heat. Depreciation of the Middle Ages is often accompanied by extreme ignorance of mediæval thought and art.

From the middle of the eighteenth century the tide began to turn, with eccentric whirlpools and cross-currents enough. Horace Walpole, who knew no more of the Middle Ages than he knew of any good thing, yet built himself a sham Gothic villa. The "Reliques" were published and Sir Walter Scott wrote of the old time with great affection, if not with deep knowledge. Abbotsford, where plaster pretends to be timber, could not have been designed by an understanding lover of a great art expressing a great life. Mediævalism, of a sort, became fashionable.

Still, if mediævalism was in fashion, it was a fashionable game; nobody seriously thought of our ancestors as anything but a set of picturesque savages, whose doings made amusing reading, whose architecture was as good as a scene at the play. It is only within the last twenty years that people have begun to ask themselves the serious question as to whether the Middle Ages did not understand the whole Ars Magna of life infinitely better than we ourselves understand it. There is but one answer to this question returned from many quarters. Thorold Rogers, the Radical political economist, shows that the mediæval village was an economic paradise. The Liberal politician, Mr. Masterman, contrasts the poor English peasant of to-day who cannot dig a well or graft a tree with his ancestor, who could dig wells and graft trees—and also carve the golden saints in glory on the roodbeam of his church in literature? Where is our romance-cycle to set beside the graal stories? In devotion, where is the twentieth-century equivalent for the "Imitatio"? As for the arts in general, Vernon Lee confesses that before a modern man can be a great artist he must by an almost superhuman effort sever himself from the thought and atmosphere of his own age; he must become a kind of artistic fakir. As for the ratiocinative faculty, a review which has appeared in these columns showed that a thirteenth-century whipper-snapper of a schoolboy would have received Herbert Spencer's "arguments" with loud and long shrieks of astounded and derisive laughter.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

It is interesting to welcome Mr. Scott Matheson as amongst those who perceive that the Middle Ages stand for something more than a picturesque game, a playing at life in suits of armour. It is, therefore, curious to find him writing as he does on the subject of religious instruction. He is quite aware of the important fact that religion is a human necessity. "Man," he says, "is a worshipping creature." Good; but then the author goes on to say:—

> In a national system there ought to be no sectarian creed; it should avoid technical language and be taught with the greatest possible simplicity. Tolstoi, who is in favour of religious teaching, and declares that children can easily understand it, says: "About the worship of God in others, I would have the children taught as follows: "Always remember that in every man dwells the same God that lives in you." . . . To this of Tolstoi a positive element of Christian teaching should be added, and it may be summed up in three sentences: "God is Love." "The Son of God loved me, and gave Himself for me." "A new commandment give I unto you: that ye love one another as I have loved you."

Now what is one to say to a passage like this? Mr. Matheson goes on to remark, very justly, that religion "is the biggest thing and the greatest thing and the widest thing of a man's life." And one wonders whether he is really of opinion that the Art of all Arts is the one art that can be learnt by the method—or lack of method—of loose and sloppy inexactitude.

In a paragraph full of dry humour, Archbisop Whately commented on an objection to formal logic, current in his day and probably in ours. It was said by those "advanced" thinkers who objected to the scholastic logic that the art was useless and supererogatory; men could reason very well by using their ordinary "common sense." Yes, answers in effect the Archbishop, a sea-captain will maintain that you can argue by common sense. But that captain would not trust himself on board a ship that was to be sailed by common sense. And perhaps a general in the Army might declare that navigation was mere pedantry, that any sensible man could sail a ship; but the general would not entrust his park of artillery to a mind stuffed with common sense, but wholly ignorant of the meaning of the word "trajectory." And so on; everybody thinks every business can be worked by common sense—always saving his own business, which, he is perfectly well aware, requires a careful and systematic—that is, technical—training. He excepts his own business because he understands it; when he speaks of other men's businesses he babbles of "common sense" because he doesn't in the least know what he is talking about. Mr. Scott Matheson is much too wise to think that a model municipality can be brought into being and carried through successfully by vague amiability and vaguer aspirations. He sees quite well that the thing demands expert knowledge and expert writing; not only the large general principles, but the small details must be subjected to skilled and technical examination. Here is Mr. Matheson writing about the method by which the sewage of Glasgow is treated: "The method of treatment is chemical precipitation by means of under-surface continuous flow." Both matter and manner seem technical enough; the author does not say that technique is wrong, that it is enough to teach the citizens of Glasgow three sentences—"Dirt is nasty," "Water is cleansing," "The current of the river Clyde is strong and fast." It is interesting to note that Mr. Matheson apparently believes that it is a simpler thing to build up the fair City of God in the heart of man than to build up the fair city of Glasgow by the Clyde.

Technical knowledge, as has been stated, is simply another term for exact knowledge exactly stated. One looks in vain for any reason, for any shadow of something like a reason, why religion, which is the sum of all life, should be exempt from the law of clear expression and clear instruction. Because religion, in the last resort, is a great mystery? Everything in the last resort is a great mystery. The writer of this article was talking the other day to an expert in wireless telegraphy. The expert explained how the ether was like a great ocean, pervading all things, that a Marconi "discharge" produced an effect on it comparable to that seen when a boy throws a pebble into a pool, and the water flows in ever-widening circles. He told, too, how the ether ocean is troubled by day and calm and still at night; but neither the expert nor any other man alive has the remotest notion as to what the ether is. It is a mystery; but wireless telegraphy is a highly technical business.

Or should we say that religion does not require to be taught systematically, because it is natural to man? Nothing is more natural to man than singing; children will sometimes make a tuneful noise before they can speak. And there is no art in which the necessary teaching is more intricate, laborious, or technical. Painting, too, is natural to man: there are Neolithic drawings on Neolithic weapons. Ask a painter if he produced his masterpieces by saying "That blue sky is pretty," or "That is a well-made man." So one waits for the author's reasons, and waits in vain.

And—taking another point of view—it seems a little odd that Mr. Matheson, who is full of enthusiasm for the Christian religion, should think himself better skilled in the method of imparting it than the Apostles, Evangelists, and Martyrs—in fine, than the whole Christian Church from the beginning. If we exclude the Church, and take the Protestant point of view, the Faith has to be learned out of four Gospels, twenty-one Epistles, a Book of Acts, and a Book of Revelation. Some of these memoirs and treatises are of a highly technical character; again, it is strange that Mr. Matheson should be wiser than the whole body of the inspired writers!

HISTORY AND HUMANITY

The Meaning of History. By Dr. Max Nordau. (Rebmans. 10s. 6d. net.)

The books that accost the book-lover generally fall into three main divisions: books that delight and charm, books that instruct, and books that challenge. It may so chance that the book that challenges also delights, and the book that charms may also challenge and instruct. Nevertheless, the distinction holds good. It is one that readily greets the most cursory or hard-pressed reader. It is not always permanent, of course; the book that delights the present age was doubtless one that challenged the previous age. But the distinction is valuable chiefly because the reading mind shapes itself to the book before it, and inevitably shapes itself in one or other of these categories. It will be expansive to the first, attentive to the second, and sharply, and very properly, critical to the third.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Therefore to say that Dr. Max Nordau's book belongs to the last category is to say that it invites a searching analysis. Its very opening sentence is provocative and challenging, inviting the like mind in the reader. He says, "The confusion almost everywhere prevalent between history and the writing of history will be firmly avoided in the course of the subsequent inquiry." That is certainly bracing, though one remembers others—as, for example, Nietzsche—who vaunted themselves as fearlessly facing logical conclusions, but whom one discovered as avoiding and burking logical conclusions at every turn; and therefore the attention becomes watchful. Nor is the first chapter any less provocative than its opening sentence. He would annul all history as hitherto written, and dismiss all historians with something of the same large contempt that the would-be practical man displays towards the fables and phantasies of the world. In so far as he tilts his lance at the merely picturesque in history he is bound to enlist sympathy (though, even so, he would do well to consider the virtue of symbolism in the picturesque); and in crying warfare on the effort to make the writing of history perpetuate outworn caste and race illusions he invites attention. For these reasons his first chapter raises hopes and pricks expectation indeed. How does he fulfil his promises, however?

Having dismissed all history as heretofore written, he proceeds to sketch the story of man as he conceives it. But it will be admitted that he is a little perplexing—even a little inconsistent. For example, he dismisses history as mythical, theoretical, and as possessing no assured date; but he begins his own account of events in an inter-glacial epoch of earth that was a garden of felicity and natural bounty—indeed, "a stage," as he puts it, "that may be called paradisical." He is even a little hazy himself as to the actual meaning of this paradisical stage; for there are times when he speaks of man at this remote date as being free, equal, individual, and prosperously happy; but at other times, as in the chapter "Man and Nature," he hints that it was at this time that Man first broke away from his Simian ancestry! But this is not all. He has also dismissed the writing of history as being mythical and fanciful; nevertheless he carries forward his sober account of the real meaning of history to an eschatology that discovers Man in a millennial age free again, happy again, but equipped moreover in each individual member with the full findings of progressive science! Looking about one—comparing a modern commercial age with a theocracy like that of Israel or with the beauty of Greece—one wonders. Nevertheless Dr. Nordau is entitled to his rosy optimism. He should not, however, pour anger and scorn on his opponents for their credulity or their inclination to myth.

But, again, this is not all. In between these two "paradisical stages" (this Garden of Eden and this Millennium, shall we say?) what proceeds? What is the feature of progress? The above exposition of his views has perhaps made it necessary to say that Dr. Nordau dismisses religion, with all that it means of higher faith and destiny for man, as a bundle of baseless superstitions. He will have none of it. With it go poetry, art, and all efforts of the imagination; for if his philosophy is fanciful it is at least logical; and he sees that if man is from the earth earthy, then he is not from the heavens heavenly; that ideal beauty, the goal of imaginative effort, is an incoherent dream of the night—that, in fact, it is not beauty. "The superior man," says he, "is marked by realism. He hardly knows the flattering delight of day-dreams. His fancy does not soar into cloudy regions, into a world remote from space and time. His thought does not occupy itself with any phantasmagoria of words, or with abstractions which, being devoid of any concrete content, can float above the real." Speaking later of men "who find their highest satisfaction in sacrificing themselves for their fellowmen," he says:—"It is painful" (though he does not say why it is painful) "to have to judge these radiant figures, who must attract the most profound love and admiration in all who behold them by the dry light of reason; but psychological analysis must eschew sensibility, and no piety should compromise its results."

Now this is admirable. If we come only from the tiger, as Tennyson had it, then we have no warrant but to continue to be tigers; that is the law of our being, and all other laws are merely a "phantasmagoria of words." Dr. Nordau's ideal man shapes himself in his hands as possessing the concentrated will, in contrast to the man of dreams, forgetting that the concentration demanded by the contemplation of imaginative beauty is the most exhausting of all concentration. Such a man is the man of action, the harsh egotist, the typically and supremely selfish man. "Great altruists," says he, "have no effective influence on the average man," which if faulty as truth is consistent as theory.

A logical entity of thought such as this cannot help but clear the air. Those who regard man as of Divine origin must needs rejoice, for it has been their experience hitherto to have the virtues that belong logically to their conception of Man stolen for the clothing of the opposite conception of Man as of brutal origin. Yet even Dr. Nordau himself cannot be consistent. It is true that he derides friendship and philanthropy, saying that neither "is a primitive instinct proving man naturally a social being." But he stumbles at what he calls the sex-instinct. "It had nothing," he says, "to do with love originally, and often has nothing to do with it now. Only a slow process of development has ennobled and elevated it." The words we have italicised make the quotation interesting. For obviously love and sex-instinct are two wholly distinct things. To use the schoolman's antithesis, one is ideal while the other is real. Now comes the interesting test. To ennoble and elevate a thing you must have the same thing as before the process, only better. It must not be a new thing; it must not add outside and therefore illogical elements to itself. That which "roused desire" before must still "rouse desire." The desire must still be only desire, though it may be stronger or less strong desire, more stable or less stable desire. But Dr. Nordau says "that which roused desire also roused far-reaching, lofty, and illuminating thoughts," which is not elevation of an old thing, but a new thing altogether. Or it might be said that love is not the sex-instinct ennobled, but that the sex-instinct rather is the debasement of ideal love—a theory that is consistent with facts, but which somewhat devastates his thesis.

In other words Dr. Nordau stumbles at the crisis of his argument, and therewith his materialism is destroyed. A multitude of minor instances could be given where he fails in a similar manner, because he cannot believe his consistency of argument. In fine, it is an admirable book to make zealous idealists. It is the true reduction to absurdity of materialism.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

"THE OLDEST MUSIC-ROOM IN EUROPE"

The Oldest Music-room in Europe: a Record of Eighteenth-Century Enterprise at Oxford. By JOHN H. MEE, M.A., Mus.D. Illustrated. (John Lane. 10s. 6d. net.)

THE REV. DR. MEE has written, and Mr. John Lane has published, a book bearing this very attractive title—for attractive it must be to those who love music thoroughly as distinguished from those who merely care to have their ears pleasantly tickled by it, and who also can say with Elia, "Antiquity, thou wondrous charm." It is not a volume for those readers of musical memoirs who only search therein for scraps of personal gossip connected with world-famous names, and for humorous anecdote; but for those who love to pursue curious and forgotten by-paths, especially if these skirt the main tracks which wind through the social life of the eighteenth century—age of enchantment for so many of us—it is a book which should surely become dear. People who "taste" Mr. Austin Dobson will taste Dr. Mee. He has not, it is true, any great pretentions to style. Perhaps he has less than we should have expected from such a son of Oxford; but he has been a most patient, careful investigator into the doings of musical Oxford during many vanished years, and he has set down the results of his research with admirable order and precision. His book is the history of that building known to all true Oxonians as the "Holywell Music-room." When the present writer knew it best it was the somewhat forlorn and dilapidated hall where the Philharmonic Society held its rehearsals, and where one sometimes attended a fencing-class. Little did we, ungenerate, uninstructed barbarians, dream that there, where mild Dr. Taylor practised us in Mozart and Mendelssohn, the sweet voices, and still sweeter faces of the Misses Linley had once ravished dons and undergraduates; that there Gainsborough's Abel and his Fischer and "the little miraculous Pinto" had played; that there Teuducci, last of the great sopranists who travelled, Benucci, first to sing "Non piu andrai" (who does not remember Kelly's description of that scene!), Catalani, for whom Lord Chesterfield once sent an express of four horses from Nottinghamshire to London to fetch the claret she preferred; Incledon (Colonel Newcome's Incledon), and Pasta (Fitzgerald's "my old Pasta")—that there all these great heroes and heroines of song had warbled liquid notes!

The Music-room was built for the purpose of weekly concerts in 1748. In that day architecture was one of every polite gentleman's tastes, so we are not surprised that the designer of so "elegant" a temple was the Rev. Vice-Principal of St. Edmund Hall. Had he studied in the school of Aldrich, perhaps? Dr. William Hayes, Professor of Music, wrote, in 1773, a delightful account of the Room. No detail that could interest curious posterity is left out. Thus we know that in winter, owing to the warmth from the fireplace, "there could be no Side Seats on the Right," but "in summer, when no Fire is requisite, and the Chimney Board fixed up," extra seats could be introduced. "Chimney-boards" were in use, we remember, in the days of "Sense and Sensibility," for Miss Steele charged her sister Lucy with never making any bones about hiding behind one in order to overhear secrets. The room was "chiefly lighted by two handsome Lustres of Cut Glass for which we are indebted to the Ladies," and here were "Weekly Performances of Vocal and Instrumental Music, every Monday Evening, except in Passion Week, all the month of September, and the Quarterly Choral Performances which are usually Oratorios, and these with very little foreign assistance."

A regular orchestra was engaged, great soloists came on special occasions, and the programmes were varied and extremely "up-to-date." As we read Dr. Mee's lists of the composers represented, we ask, What is Fame? Who now remembers the names of Abaco, Barasanti, Cartrucci, &c.? Who knows anything about Keller's "Sonatas for Common Flutes and Trumpets," or about Dr. Mudge's "Medley Concerto, with Horns" (unless this was the amateur Dr. Mudge, who at one of Mrs. Falconer's concerts, in "Patronage," was "Divine, absolutely Divine, in 'Buds of Roses'"), except the antiquaries who may have written about them in "Grove's Dictionary"? The frequent mention of compositions "with horns" recalls what Lord Rosebery, quoting Mrs. Montagu, has just told us about Chatham, that when he gave a tea-party in a tent he "bade his French horn breathe music like the unseen Genius of the Wood." Where are the horn-players now that would consent to play either in a medley or a wood? The weekly concerts were carried on without any break until 1789, when a short interruption took place, after which they were resumed and went on—now successful, now languishing—until 1840. Not that the Music-room's story was always harmonious in all senses. Dr. Mee says that "singers and critics were as tiresome as they are now;" he has several accounts of storms in teacups, and he gives them with a minute faithfulness which may be as tedious to some readers as it is admirable to others. He thinks that the Oxford Movement killed the weekly concerts! Strange this, as its leader, Dr. Newman, was so fond a musician, and a violinist too.

Evil days were now to come upon the old Music-room. It was let for various unworthy purposes. One year a "Performing Horse and Vixen" were exhibiting there, yet still occasional concerts, with great performers, revived its former glories, and Charles Kemble gave Shakespeare Readings. Later, and chiefly through the energy of Dr. Mee, it is again the home of sweet sound, at least we trust that the young gentlemen who belong to the "Musical Union" are not too much enamoured of discord. They must all read their founder's history of their home, and reverence the Room for the sake of the rare musicians who preceded them in the use of it. We began with a reference to dear, unmusical Elia, and will end with another. Mrs. Bland's name is in the list of singers at the Oxford Music-room. Did she sing there the old pathetic ballad I used to like in my youth, "She's sweet fifteen, I'm one year more"? "Mrs. Bland sang it in boy's clothes the first time I heard it. I sometimes think the lower notes in my voice are like Mrs. Bland's."

THE PARTY SYSTEM

The Party System. By HILAIRE BELLOC and CECIL CHESTERTON. (Stephen Swift. 3s. 6d. net.)

IT was expected by a good number of those who knew that Mr. Belloc would follow his retirement from Parliament by an active campaign against the Party System. Moreover, Mr. Cecil Chesterton had given pronouncement to certain opinions that lay so near to that perplexed question that their co-operation in a book, if not a foregone conclusion, at least is a matter which scarcely calls for surprise. It is always difficult in such cases of literary co-operation to avoid the temptation to dissect and dissever the several products of the two pens. Yet in this work it is not very difficult to see which way the influences lie; and Mr. Chesterton is scarcely the man to demur at our conclusion when we say that it is impossible to miss the incision of Mr. Belloc's pen in the more notable passages of the book. It is better nevertheless, to refer to the authors in the plural, and this we shall do.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Succinctly put their argument runs thus: that the whole constitutional procedure of our country's Government has been inverted; that this has proceeded (partly pari passu and partly by cause and effect) and progressed with corruption, whether of a gentler and less direct order or of a grosser and more direct order; that it is now, in fact, a pompous nonentity; and that what has caused this state of affairs has been what is generally known—and admired by countries that have not got it—as the Party System. In theory, at least, the method of representative government is that the electorate should choose 670 representatives to sit in St. Stephen's and legislate its will; that these 670 representatives should, if not choose, at least dominate a Select Committee drawn from itself and representative of its majority, which Committee in due course came to be known as a Cabinet. The actual procedure at the present moment now happens to be that that Select Committee rules the 670 representatives; and not only so, but through these 670 representatives rules the country at large in the interests of itself, its relatives, and its supporters.

Here it would seem that the very subject of our authors' indictment, the Party System, would step in to aid us. For it is the first principle of a Party System that there should be an official Opposition, representative of its minority, whose chief function should be to criticise, attack, oppose, and, if possible, turn out the Select Committee in question. So it should be, they argue, and so it once was. But things have altered, and it is partly the business of their book to examine the causes of the change. The facts to which they allude are, of course, notorious, and much that they say is axiomatic in well-informed circles. Lamentably, however, all circles are not well informed. For example, the historical fact is that in the forty years since 1870 the Opposition has but once succeeded in defeating the Government of the day, whereas in the forty years preceding 1870 it accomplished that feat nine times over!

Such a fact is extraordinary, and the cause of it is even more extraordinary. It is nothing more nor less than this, that the two Front Benches—that is to say, the Cabinet and the Opposition of tradition and theory—have begun to work, and are now in habitual practice working, in general agreement one with the other. Many things have accounted for this—reasons of convenience, reasons of social caste, and the reason to which our authors allot priority of place—intermarriage. They say, giving instances enough to point the moral, that we are ruled by a—

> General system of government by a small, friendly, and closely inter-related clique. We are not surprised at Romeo loving Juliet, though he is a Montague and she a Capulet. But if we found in addition that Lady Montague was the first cousin of old Capulet, that Mercutio was at once the nephew of a Capulet and the brother-in-law of a Montague, that County Paris was related on his father's side to one House and on his mother's side to the other, that Tybalt was Romeo's uncle's stepson, and that the friar who married Romeo and Juliet was Juliet's uncle and Romeo's first cousin once removed, we should probably conclude that the feud between the houses was being kept up mainly for the dramatic entertainment of the people of Verona.

Or, to give a more practical instance from recent history, they quote the "unbridgable gulf" which one of Mr. Asquith's "humbler salaried followers discovered in a notable speech to exist between the views of his uncle on the one hand and of his first cousin on the other."

It will be said, however, that this need not be the end of the matter; that there are yet the 670 representatives; can they not disrupt this Front Bench collusion? The reply is that they dare not; and if they dared, they would not be able to; and even so, that there are inducements enough to obviate their even wishing to do so. Offices and honours are the great rewards for faithful service; but if there are careless souls who set light regard on emoluments and distinction, and who determine to speak their mind, then the "Time-table of the House" is used to brush them aside (there are few pages more terrible to read in this book than those which deal with this important matter), and if they continue obstreperous, then the party support, including the party funds, are withdrawn from them, and they stand but little chance of finding re-election when next a ballot is taken. Thus they have nothing to gain by resistance to what may be called the Bossocracy; whereas loyal assistance will perhaps find them office, or, it may be, help to a peerage.

This is, of course, a state of affairs fairly well recognised. But there are some indictments in this book that are arresting and searching. The sale of honours, and the consequent vulgarisation of what was once a self-respecting aristocracy, is notorious; but the sale of policies, with all that that means, gives one furiously and earnestly to think. Another matter that our authors deal with is one that strikes directly at the present position. There are many issues that demand discussion, but which cannot be discussed because "the Front Benches, by their control of the House of Commons, control also the effective programmes submitted to the electors." They quote the Drink Question, upon which they say:—

> The people are from time to time allowed to choose between the suppression of public-houses and their endowment out of the public money, but are not allowed to vote on any other policy, least of all are they allowed to vote, as they certainly would vote if they got the chance, for the removal of some or all of the intricate and mostly senseless regulations which interfere at every point with the habits and festivities of the poor.

Why? Because the Brewers are large subscribers to one party's purse, and the Cocoa Magnates to the other, and each side recognises the other's treaties.

It is, of course, impossible always to agree with the authors. But they win their right to speak for the hearing of earnest men who have at heart their country's welfare; and the things they speak of are grave matters, and if such matters awake controversy, as they are bound to do, then the controversy should not proceed on party lines, for one of the worthiest attributes of this book is that, however hardly the blow is dealt, it is not dealt in any party spirit, nor is there any party axe to grind by it. Earnestness must needs greet earnestness. They state their problem fairly (though sometimes far too diffusely), and they propound remedies for its palliation and rectification. The reading of the book is depressing sometimes; but it is the depression that precedes resolution. It cannot but cause clearer thinking and sounder recognition of the difficulties that must soon be dealt with.

DARRELL FIGGIS.

TWO BOOKS OF THE SEA

Ships and Men. By DAVID HANNAY. (Wm. Blackwood and Sons. 6s. net.)

Fighting Admirals. By JOHN BARNETT. (Smith, Elder and Co. 6s.)

IT is natural to treat these two books under one heading, yet, as a matter of fact, they are of a very different calibre.

"SHIPS AND MEN."

THE large majority of the papers contained in "Ships and Men" hail from Blackwood's Magazine, and after reading the volume we feel moved to congratulate our monthly contemporary on securing Mr. Hannay's extraordinarily interesting articles. Mr. Hannay writes with a light-hearted erudition that reminds us of Mr. Andrew Lang at his best, and with his knowledge he combines the indispensable understanding of human nature that proves fact indeed stranger than fiction by displaying it in its true light. In those of us for whom the sea yet preserves its glamour the titles of Mr. Hannay's essays fall like the refrains of old songs. "Smollett and the Old Sea-dogs," "The Pirate," "The Galleon," "A Corsair of Saint-Malo," "Some Naval Mutinies." The state of mind of the person who is not attracted by such titles as these must be worse than that of the gentleman who has no music in his soul. A paper on the execution of Doughty by Drake is no less interesting, though perhaps less welcome, for this is not the Drake of the boys' books and Mr. Newbolt's stirring poems. Doughty, it would seem, was a chatterbox, and Drake had to prove to his piratical crew that their leader had a firm way with him; he proved his case, but, as the author justly remarks, "it was not an amiable action."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Very interesting, too, is the melancholy history of the little English colony that strove for ten uneasy years to combine sound commerce and high Puritanism on two diminutive islands in the Caribbean Sea, to be ultimately blotted out by the Spaniards. We hardly know which to admire most—the courage of the settlers who carried out the forlorn experiment or the commercial enterprise of the noblemen and others who financed it. Nowadays, when novelists explore history and the world for new settings for their stories, one of them might very well consider the possibilities of the tragic story of Old Providence, as outlined in Mr. Hannay's volume.

Perhaps the most notable, certainly the most disputable, of these papers is that entitled "The Folly of Napoleon," in which the author drops his leisured manner, and attacks Napoleon with eloquence and ability. It is especially as a commander that he denies the consummate skill of the man who "threw away one army in Egypt, led another to destruction in Russia, wasted a third in Germany, brought two ruinous invasions on France, and died the death of a mad rat in a hole at St. Helena." Vulgarity is the only satisfactory explanation he can find for the greatness of Napoleon's reputation; the vulgarity that admires large enterprises, regardless of their aims or even of their success. He even goes so far as to approve of Sir Hudson Lowe, beyond which no detestation of the Emperor could carry a man. All this is no doubt of value, taken in judicious doses, to counteract the visions of the hero-worshippers, but we are of opinion that Mr. Hannay errs as much in one direction as they do in the other. And his passion leads him into contradictions. On page 217 and after he shows that Napoleon's intellect has been immensely overrated; yet on page 234 he says that his intellect was of the greatest. On page 241 he credits Napoleon with the realisation of Nelson's energy; two pages later he writes that Napoleon habitually underrated it. These slips suggest to us that Mr. Hannay is not in the same judicial frame of mind in writing of Bonaparte as he is, for instance, in estimating the merits of Smollett's seamen. But we would not take leave of this admirable book on a note of adverse criticism, and we will acknowledge that it is long since we have read a novel as thrilling as Mr. Hannay's true tales of the sea. They are illustrated with some good reproductions of old naval pictures.

"FIGHTING ADMIRALS"

is a volume of essays on famous English seamen of which several have previously appeared in the Cornhill. They are written with commendable spirit, and are illustrated with some very interesting portraits. We wish, however, that the author would cultivate a more sober style. The essay on "Raleigh's Last Voyage" shows how easy it is to achieve affectation in endeavouring to be vivid; of all mannerisms in writing, the abuse of dashes and dots and exclamation marks is perhaps the most irritating. Fortunately, boys are not sensitive in such matters, and it is to them that Mr. Barnett's book will make its confident appeal. It is very necessary that the next generation should be instructed concerning their noble inheritance of naval honour, and if their fathers look between the covers of "Fighting Admirals" they too will probably be the wiser for their pains.

THE SHIA WORLD

The Glory of the Shia World: the Tale of a Pilgrimage. Translated and Edited from a Persian Manuscript by MAJOR P. M. SYKES, C.M.G., his Britannic Majesty's Consul-General and Agent to the Government of India in Khorasan, &c., assisted by KHAN BAHADUR AHMAD DIN KHAN, Attaché to the British Consulate-General. With many Illustrations in the Text and Four Coloured Reproductions from Persian Paintings. (Macmillan and Co. 10s. net.)

THE mistake into which many critics have fallen, so as to necessitate a disclaimer by Major Sykes, that this narrative is the autobiography of a Persian of position and influence, is quite excusable, for we ourselves felt, mingled with the delight which we experienced when reading the book, that this was indeed something so unique and more than usually entrancing that it was hardly conceivable that it could in its entirety have emanated from the brain of a European. So thoroughly has the author entered into the Oriental mind, so perfectly has he imbued himself with the thoughts, the aspirations, the very inmost life of the people from whom his hero is drawn, that to have taken Major Sykes, who describes himself as the translator and editor, literally, is not only pardonable, but is, moreover, as great a compliment as can possibly be paid to him. Books on Persia, Persian politics, and Persian life have become relatively plentiful, and many of them give considerable insight into the life of the people with whom they deal. The present book, however, differs from all these by the abundant light which it throws on the ideals, the thoughts, the customs, and the life of the Persian people. The book is in the form of an autobiography, but the hero of his own story does not confine his narrative merely to the supposed events of his life. Therefore, those who might find little or no attraction in the thoughts and adventures of Nusrullah Khan will yet delight in his curious pages, which narrate many a custom which must appear strange, yet withal attractive, to European ears. Added to the substance of Nusrullah's story are the additional attractions of numerous illustrations, both European and Oriental, and a weird, unreal style, proper only to the East, which appears so strange and yet so pleasing to English ears.

The hero of the story, Nusrullah Khan, is quite a modern—he was born in 1859—and his narrative, although it smacks strongly of an "Arabian Nights" flavour, consequently deals with modern conditions and customs existing to-day, or rather just before the opening of the present Constitutional era. The incidents which he relates in his inimitable style include a campaign, a pilgrimage, and an encounter with brigands, so that it will be seen that there is food in the book for varied tastes. Even the boy in search of tales of adventure might find cause for delight, although we do not recommend the volume as a suitable gift-book for children. Many anecdotes are told in the course of these pages. From a passing reference in one it would appear that one method of punishing servants in Persia is to order them to eat sticks. The chapter on the Persian New Year celebrations is especially interesting, and it is difficult to select any one passage for quotation in preference to the others. Yet we may venture on the following. It is considered unfortunate to look upon an ugly man at the opening of any undertaking. It is said that Shah Abbas once, when starting on a hunting expedition, looked upon an ugly man. As was to be expected, the expedition was a failure, and when the Shah returned he sent for the evil visaged one in order that he might be put to death. The man asked the reason for his sentence, and the Shah replied, "Because thy ill-omened visage has spoilt my hunting." The retort of the intended victim was, "May I be thy Sacrifice! but thy visage will be still more ill-omened if it brings death with it." Then Shah Abbas, in true Oriental fashion, laughed and dismissed the man with a gift.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

THE FRENCH IN INDIA

Dupleix. By Colonel John Biddulph. (F. V. White and Co. 5s.)

The career of Dupleix is one of the most interesting in Indian history. In his time the fate of the French bid for Empire in the East was practically decided against his nation, though the struggle continued for a few years after his departure from the scene. Colonel Biddulph aims at correcting some of the statements made in the late Colonel Malleson's little volume on Dupleix, and is able to rely upon new material, unknown to Colonel Malleson, published at Paris in 1901, by M. Cultru, on "Dupleix, ses Plans Politiques, sa Disgrâce," based on original documents.

Dupleix's Indian life extended over thirty-two years. He was member of Council at Pondicherry in 1722, Chief at Chandernagore in Bengal in 1731, Governor of Pondicherry, 1742-1754, when he was superseded by Godeheu, recalled, and badly treated, as the French usually treated their Indian officers. He was absorbed in commercial pursuits before he became Governor; in that position he was in the thick of the wars between the French and English in and about Madras, while the national duel for supremacy was fought out, though nominally they contended in support of the different native candidates for the Nizamship of the Hyderabad Deccan, and the subordinate Nawabship of the Carnatic. The French were very near winning the contest when Labourdonnais took Madras in 1746; it was restored to the English after the peace of Aix-La-Chapelle in 1748. On the renewal of the war the genius of Clive, the military ability of Stringer Lawrence, and English prowess prevailed over Dupleix. Colonel Biddulph, following M. Cultru, dispels various illusions hitherto held. It is a mythical story, he shows, that Dupleix within three years of his arrival in India formed plans for founding a French empire in India. The causes of Dupleix's fall were his insubordination, his studied silence as to what was going on in India, his failure to contribute to the Company's revenues, and the Company's insolvency; no financial benefit accrued to the Company, in spite of great acquisitions of territory. The financial connection between the State and the Compagnie des Indes was fatal to both. Dupleix first brought India within the scope of European politics; he played the game with boldness, some success, and dexterity, but boldness became recklessness, and his attempts to establish the French domination in the East led directly to the despatch of superior English forces to India. But Colonel Biddulph shows that it was not through want of support from France that Dupleix failed, for his masters sent him plenty of soldiers. The conclusion is contained in a sentence—"So long as the English had the superiority at sea French predominance in India was impossible." Dupleix staked everything on the success of his political schemes. He was emphatically not a soldier; he was a very capable administrator, but made mistakes; among others, he allowed his wife, a woman of country descent, whom he used as an interpreter, to be mixed up in official business. When he was recalled his treasury was empty, his soldiers were mutinous for want of pay, his Provinces were ruined, his own fortune was exhausted, his subordinates were alienated by his arrogance, and the directors would not tolerate his neglect of their interests. Colonel Biddulph's monograph brings out clearly the points in which some correction of the generally received view of this distinguished Frenchman's career was required. But his country should not have allowed Dupleix to die in disgrace and poverty.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Religions and Philosophies of the East. By J. M. Kennedy. (T. Werner Laurie. 6s.)

We are told that the author's object is to give "a concise history of the religions and philosophies which have influenced the thought of the great Eastern nations, special emphasis being laid upon the different religions which have swayed the vast Empire of India."

Mr. Kennedy has not been content to pursue this ambitious aim with singleness of purpose, but is obsessed with an almost vindictive animus, which frequently asserts itself, against the Christian religion. To begin with, the dedication of the book is cynically profane, and consists in the substitution of the name "Nietzsche" for "Dei," in the well-known inscription "Ad majorem Dei gloriam." Hence we are not surprised to find that the crude opinions of Mr. Kennedy's deity are quoted at length with approval. The value of a writer's views on comparative religion are somewhat discounted if he holds the opinion that "Christianity is a degenerative movement, consisting of all kinds of decaying and excremental elements," or that "Nietzsche and his school have come to stay;" or that "Christ started a class warfare which has endured in Christian countries to this day;" or that the nineteen long centuries of Christianity have been "centuries of bigotry and superstition never before equalled in the history of the world." Mr. Kennedy writes of Brahminism, Buddhism, Judaism, and Mohamedanism, but we doubt if he has added anything particularly new or original to general knowledge of these subjects except some of his own personal opinions, which are occasionally good and sometimes very amusing.

Should this book reach Harvard, we wonder whether Americans will forgive this paragraph:—

> There is a modern assumption, particularly prevalent in the United States of America, that by intermarriage among different nationalities a new and strong nation will eventually arise. The wish in this case is certainly father to the theory, for a more noxious combination of races, or rather tribes, than those in the United States of America it would be difficult to find.

In the last chapter, on the relations of East and West, there are some shrewd observations on the "great mistake" made in endeavouring to rule India according to Western and so-called "Liberal" principles. But these difficulties may eventually be righted "if only the Brahminical caste system could be introduced into Europe and maintained in a pure form for three or four thousand years."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

America—Through English Eyes. By "RITA." (Stanley Paul and Co. 2s. 6d. net.)

"RITA" has whirled through America—that is to say, she has visited a few of the big cities of the United States—with her eyes wide open, and has set down in this volume some very superficial but very entertaining results of her limited travels. She admits that "a brief two months' experience of American cities, life, manners, habits, and hospitality is scarce equipment for criticism," and then proceeds to criticise; but her style is vivid, and occasionally she hits the mark neatly enough, as in her discussion of "Christian Science" and its methods. Her chapter on the American Press and Literature is good, although she detracts severely from the value of her remarks when she naïvely confesses that the work of Edith Wharton (among others) bores her "beyond description."

So brief and hurried a visit could hardly result in a work of any value from a critical point of view; but it was a pity that the author did not take a little more trouble in her actual writing. She speaks of Boston's "near proximity to the ocean," she says of the Americans and English that "each in their own country is admirable," and she misuses the dash to gain an emphasis which any intelligent reader should be able to supply for himself. Perhaps these things go far to explain why the fine and artistic work of Edith Wharton "bores" her. However we need not be too critical with "Rita," since she gives us many interesting observations and swift pen-pictures, drawn, as it were, in flight. Some of her more sweeping statements—such as, for instance, "politeness has no value in the States"—may be qualified by a future visit, when possibly the author may go a little deeper into American affairs and use her opportunities to better advantage.

French Composition: comprising the Grammar of French Composition and English Prose for Reading and Translation. By PROFESSORS F. GUILLOTEL and H. PROIX. (Ralph, Holland and Co. 2s. 6d. net.)

A KNOWLEDGE of the French language would soon be widespread in this country if its dissemination depended solely on the enterprise of professors and publishers, for there is no end nowadays to the number of good manuals. None is better adapted for secondary schools and those private students who already have some notion of French than the excellent little volume produced by two of the most distinguished Parisian professors, Messrs. Guillotel and Proix. It is a work on a new plan, by which the art of writing good, sound, idiomatic French may easily be mastered. The differences between French and English idioms are illustrated by hundreds of examples, such as should stimulate and quicken even the slowest mind. The grammatical rules are also set out with great clarity. Particularly good is the treatment of those so-called minor parts of speech—prepositions, conjunctions, &c.—which may entirely modify the meaning of a sentence. The pupil at once sees in which of many different ways such little yet important words as "to," "in," "for," "at," "by," should be translated in order that a sentence may be quite clear and idiomatically accurate. This is a useful feature, for the present reviewer, in discharging his duties as an examiner in French, constantly finds the wrong prepositions used by students whose substantives and verbs are correct. The second part of Messrs. Guillotel and Proix's volume comprises a large number of well-selected and fully annotated examples of English prose for translation, these being taken from contemporary as well as classical authors. The book is one which may be strongly recommended to all who are teaching or studying the French language.

An Account of My Life. By her Highness NAWÁB SULTAN JAHÁN BEGAM, Ruler of Bhopál. Translated by C. H. PAYNE. Vol. I. Illustrated. (John Murray.)

BHOPÁL is the principal Muhammadan State in Central India, and ranks next in importance to Hyderabad among the Muhammadan States in India. The last three rulers of this State have been Begams, this being the title for the wife of a Nawab. Sikandar Begam (1847-1868) was succeeded by her daughter Shah Jahán Begam (1868-1901), whose daughter again is the present Sultan Jahán Begam, now in her fifty-third year. Authorship runs in the family. The two predecessors brought the history of the State up to 1872; the present writer's task has been increased by the careless destruction of collected material. Her educational adviser, Mr. Payne, has translated into English what she wrote in Urdu. This Volume I., besides its historical aspect, contains a free expression of her own observations and opinions. Her grandmother, Sikandar Begam, was a vigorous ruler, and showed great ability and loyalty to the British Government during the Mutiny, which were properly rewarded. She also made the pilgrimage to Mecca, a journey fraught with risk and difficulty nearly fifty years ago. The writer assigns to her grandmother the same place in Bhopál that Akbar held in India—high praise indeed. Sultan Jahán Begam was carefully educated, and at ten years old made her first speech in Durbar. Though she appears veiled in public, the pictures in the book show her face. She dwells at length on her marriage, and the important considerations attaching to the selection of a bridegroom, the ceremony and the festivities; on family troubles caused by second marriages, journeys to Calcutta, the interchange of visits and gifts in 1875 with the then Prince of Wales, the Imperial Assemblage at Delhi, the visits of Viceroys and return visits, also of Lord Roberts (wrongly called Lord Frederick), the political officers and their official relations with the State, the Bhopál railway, and domestic events—the death of Queen Victoria being the last event recorded. Her two daughters have died. The eldest of her three sons is thirty-four years old.

The book has been excellently produced, and contains forty-six interesting pictures of Viceroys and Vicereines, distinguished persons, and the principal buildings. It is welcome as the personal history of a native State in which loyalty to the British Crown is the tradition and practice of the rulers.

One and All Gardening, 1911. Edited by EDWARD OWEN GREENING, F.R.H.S. Illustrated. (Agricultural and Horticultural Association. 2d.)

THERE is no healthier, more pleasant, and interesting occupation than gardening, and he "that in trim gardens takes his pleasure" is one to be envied. We heartily welcome the sixteenth issue of this most useful annual, which from its inception has been so very ably edited by Mr. Greening with all the enthusiasm of a lover of the beautiful and an expert horticulturist. Despite the labour it entails, gardening is to the many a genuine relaxation—as Mr. Joseph

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Moody, a Crimean veteran in his eighty-second year and a contributor to this year's "One and All" Annual, says, "It is a rest for the weary and a joy to the aged." The little volume before us contains much practical information, with many delightful illustrations. Among the subjects dealt with are "Pruning Roses," "Pruning Trees and Shrubs," "Uses of Spring Flowers," "Cooking Qualities in Potatoes," "Some Valuable Salads," and the vindication, based on scientific research, of that much-maligned creature the earthworm. A very interesting and curiously illustrated article is "Microscopic Gardens: the Wonders of Tiny Fungi." Altogether the little volume is a treasury of knowledge on matters horticultural. "From the first," says the editor, "I have ardently wished to make the 'Annuals' messengers of a gospel of health and happiness," and now, after sixteen years, he can boast of a hundred thousand sympathetic readers. His great aim to-day is the conversion of our country into "A Garden Land" with the aid of the numerous existing horticultural societies; and we cordially wish him every success in his laudable undertaking.

FICTION

Billy. By PAUL METHVEN. (Chatto and Windus. 6s.)

MR. PAUL METHVEN'S second venture in the over-tilled field of fiction has resulted in one of the most striking novels of the present publishing season. There was a time when a novel was really a novel—"a fictitious tale, assuming to portray real life and actual emotions in the characters depicted;" but nowadays we have so-called novels turned out by the score—or should we not rather say the ton?—90 per cent. of which are not worth the paper upon which they are printed. Although Mr. Methven is comparatively a new recruit in the ranks of novelists, he has nevertheless had the good sense to be guided by the old traditions, with the result that he is head and shoulders above the motley crew which supplies the ever-grinding maw of the ragged Press. With his first novel, "Influences," Mr. Methven scored a distinct success, with "Billy" we think he has at least "gone one better." After the more or less objectionable problem plays by which we have of late been so satiated, it is an undoubted pleasure to take up a problem novel which in every respect is absolutely clean from start to finish.

The story lies in a nutshell, and is true to life, yet it is not an everyday happening. A young couple agree to marry—he because his family, and especially a rather overbearing sister, thinks he ought to; she for the sake of acquiring more liberty. They are to be "pals and nothing more," in fact husband and wife in name only. The Honourable Gerald—Jerry for short—was "diminutive in stature and feeble of body . . . a sandy-haired, round-faced young man with an anæmic moustache." Moreover, he wore spectacles and was a fossilist. Miss Wilhelmina, otherwise Billy, "was very near being a physically perfect specimen of the sex which is conventionally labelled 'weak.' She was immensely strong for a girl, and tall into the bargain . . . with the face of a pretty girl and the figure of a handsome boy . . . and apparently entirely sexless." She naturally preferred golf and tennis to matrimony, and talked slang.

They are married in due course, and for a while the compact is adhered to. But a time comes when Jerry actually falls in love with his wife, who prefers the more sportive society of other men, and especially of one man, to that of her humdrum husband and his fossils. There is naturally a scandal, followed by a suit for divorce brought by Jerry at the instigation of the aforesaid sister. The description of the trial, which is brought to a most unforeseen and dramatic ending, is worthy to rank with the famous one in "Pickwick." Through Jerry's generous, not to say noble, behaviour afterwards Billy is brought to see the errors of her ways, which were no more than the foolish indiscretions a young wife so situated might fall into, and she ends by loving her husband quite as much as he loves her. The story is sure to entertain all who read it; it is sprightly told, the dialogue sparkles with wit and is replete with epigrams and home truths.

Demeter's Daughter. By EDEN PHILLPOTTS. (Methuen and Co. 6s.)

DEVONSHIRE, as usual, is the scene of Mr. Eden Phillpotts's latest story, but it is Devonshire in rather a wintry mood, if there is any relation between the characters and their surroundings. Almost from the first tragedy follows the footsteps of poor Alison Cleave, the real heroine of this chaotic little Dartmoor colony. She is married to a lazy, argumentative, good-for-nothing, who evades work continuously on the pretext of a "terrible shattering accident" which had occurred to him years ago—the accident being a mere broken leg, which left him as well and strong as he ever was, saving only a slight limp. Their eldest son, Giles, ruins a girl and runs away; their second son, Frank, the idol of his mother's heart, is killed in the Boer War; finally, Aaron Cleave himself, husband and father, is inflamed by the attractions of a neighbour, and completes the misery which had begun with the cowardly behaviour of Giles. Bravely Alison still fights on, with her heart wellnigh broken; but in the endeavour to cross a dangerously swollen stream one dark night she is drowned, and her husband, who was intoxicated and responsible for the attempt, is saved, so that the book ends with a promise of some sort of happiness for him, and the reader's sense of justice is unsatisfied.

Such is the barest outline of the plot, but to stop here would be to do the author an injustice. With Mr. Phillpotts's work a considerable portion of the effect is due to the relations he establishes between a certain little community—the keeper of the inn, the baker, the labouring men—who express their opinions on weighty matters in halting language, and whose utterances from time to time contain much of that common sense which comes from the lips of those who think down to essentials, unconfused by books and scholarship. These types are drawn as accurately as is possible, and any one familiar with the speech of the bonnie West Country can almost hear their amiable wrangling, see them standing in the twilight deep in their confabulations upon local or universal affairs. The scenery, too, is described exquisitely, but it does not form an inevitable part of the tale as in the Wessex novels. Mr. Hardy alone possesses that secret. As a piece of really memorable writing, however, Mr. Phillpotts has done nothing better than the opening chapter of "Demeter's Daughter." The total impression left by the book is undeniably sad, since Alison Cleave, in spite of her religion and her faith, seemed, like Tess, to be the sport of the gods. But it is a book which cannot fail to enhance the author's reputation as an exponent of life in the county which he has chosen for his principal labours.

Defender of the Faith. By MARJORIE BOWEN. (Methuen and Co. 6s.)

HISTORY, intrigue, love, and war form the materials from which Miss Marjorie Bowen weaves her pretty patterns of romance, and if she is rather fond of the crimson thread of tragedy, she relieves its vividness very cleverly before it becomes wearisome. William of Orange is the hero of this novel, and we find ourselves less interested in the progress of his love-affair—his politically engineered love-affair—with the Princess Mary of England than in his constant troubles with his States of Holland and his relationship with certain rebels and plotters against his life and dominion. The story of Don Ramon de la Rosa—Cornelius de Witt—and his hatred of William, and the manner in which that wonderful Prince brought him to fight for Holland at the battle of St. Denis, is capitally told. A little more care would improve Miss Bowen's style considerably. She now and then splits an infinitive so desperately that we almost conclude she does it of malice aforethought. "He blamed the King for allowing his brother to so accurately plumb his intention," is one instance. Several misprints suggest carelessness on the part of somebody; we noticed "withdrawl," "unobstrusive," and "how" instead of "now;" it is a pity to annoy readers unnecessarily by these slips. On the whole, however, "Defender of the Faith" is exciting, well-written, and, being more restrained, is certainly an improvement on Miss Bowen's previous books.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Declined with Thanks. By UNA L. SILBERRAD. (Constable and Co. 6s.)

THIS volume of short stories should please the writer who was regretting in these columns a few weeks ago that authors no longer express themselves on their title-pages; for Miss Silberrad qualifies her title with the genial explanation, "Because polite but discriminating editors have declined most of the tales in this collection." To have made this method of protest really effective the author should have attached to each story the names of the periodicals that had refused it; then we should have been in a position to judge, as we fancy we are now expected to do, the degree of competence of the offending editors. As it is, we can only judge the book on its merits, which are considerable. Of the eight stories contained in it, two are exceptionally good, three are very good indeed, and three—the three shortest—leave us cold. "The Wreck of the Merry Rose" is a courageous and highly successful experiment in the gruesome. "The Thaw" is even better in a less sensational vein; the description of the coming of a flood is admirable, and there is a cat in it worthy to take his place among the notable cats of fiction. Some of the other stories allow Miss Silberrad to display a very pleasant sense of humour, and, taking them altogether, we cannot escape the conviction that some of those editors must have blundered. Nevertheless, we cannot help thinking that it was a pity to burden a volume of stories much above the average with a title that may be considered either unduly modest or unduly arrogant.

The Affairs of Ashleigh. By STEPHEN KNOTT. (Andrew Melrose. 6s.)

IN this tale we are reintroduced to our very old acquaintances, the landed family impoverished by extravagance, the young heir who would retrieve all, and the rich parvenu who has a pocket full of mortgages on the family estate, but will burn them if the young man will marry his impossible daughter. We also meet the wealthy widow, sweet and twenty-one, whom the hero loves but will not marry while he is so poor; also the careless young officer who calls the hero "old bird" and "Dustbin," his name being Ashleigh; also the rich parvenu's wife with her penny-novelette French; also the aged villainous lord who, too old to be a roué any more, turns for gentle relaxation to shady commercial enterprise. These folk and others of their kind move colourlessly through a commonplace and mildly readable story.

Jack Archer. By G. A. HENTY. (Bennett, The Century Press. 4d. net.)

Snowshoes and Canoes. By W. H. G. KINGSTON. (Bennett, The Century Press. 4d. net.)

Cormorant Crag. By G. MANVILLE FENN. (Bennett, The Century Press. 4d. net.)

EVERY encouragement should be given to this series. It is edited by Lieutenant-General Sir Robert Baden-Powell, K.C.B., of Mafeking and Boy-Scout fame. The books are well and clearly printed, and are intended, being cheap at the same time, as an antidote to the cheap "dreadfuls" and "shockers" which, in General Baden-Powell's opinion, are "responsible for half the crime and brutality among young offenders." With this opinion we are heartily in accord. The mind and character of a boy are necessarily affected by what he reads; and, to quote the editor again, "I am not squeamish, but when I took up the other day one out of three of the cheap biographies of a celebrated criminal, and read the morbid, dirty detail thus pushed into the minds of our little lads, I marvelled what kind of a beast the writer could be who could prostitute his abilities to such an end." And this was a typical book. We welcome these cheap reprints because, whilst exciting, they are likewise clean and wholesome.

THE THEATRE

"ALL THAT MATTERS" AT THE HAYMARKET THEATRE

WE spent a curious evening at the Haymarket Theatre when Mr. McEvoy's new play had its first public performance. We underwent the same uncomfortable sensations that have before now been inflicted upon us when we were obliged to listen to an after-dinner speech delivered by an able man who has had no practice in after-dinner speaking, and is called upon without any warning. As in such an effort, the play had no form, no beginning, no end, no middle. Moments of great seriousness were jumbled up with moments of screaming farce. Life and Death were monotoned about in what appeared to be blank verse. Love was dilated upon in mysterious terms. Monologues were delivered in caves. A young woman who has acquired a superficial smattering of education delivered Shavian essays upon marriage, and Shavian outbursts of cynicism on the methods of parents. Small farmers and farm hands played cunning tricks upon each other in order to acquire land, and their wives and women-folk demonstrated the meanness and smallness of their nature by performing extravagant acts of snobbishness, and a party of impossible Cockneys came and went intermittently, causing less amusement than amazement. A certain section of the audience—the smallest section—constantly assured themselves that the play was "Oh, so clever," the while they yawned surreptitiously and craned their necks forward to see how one of the regular first-nighters had done her hair. The critics were restless and unspeakably bored. Mere playgoers in the stalls sat with raised eyebrows and an air of accumulating suspicion, and their humbler brothers and sisters in the pit and gallery bore it all with exemplary patience for several acts, until politeness gave way, and they laughed, and cried "Speak up," and finally booed.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The truth is this. Mr. Charles McEvoy is a man of ideas. He is also a man with a pretty pen. He is a great lover of Nature and simple things, and is therefore a satirist when he deals with humanity. Unfortunately he belongs to the school of super-men founded by Mr. George Bernard Shaw, and he has caught the disastrous affliction of self-approval and self-consciousness—the affliction which ran through all the work of the recent effort to start a Repertory Theatre, and brought it quickly to an ignominious end. Like Mr. Bernard Shaw and Mr. Granville Barker, and the less well-advertised and well-advertising fry, Mr. McEvoy evidently considers it infra dig. and contemptible to write for the great public. His "works" are intended for the consumption and adulation of that extremely small, strenuously peculiar, cultivatedly perverse set of persons in whose parrot mouths that horrid word "clever" is turned and turned. He disdains, therefore, to master the difficult technique of play-writing, or to cast his plays in the mould that has been used by the master, or, as he would no doubt call him, the great commercial dramatist. He is like the man who says "Ah! an excellent idea. People live in houses. There is obviously a demand for houses. I know nothing about building, but I am I, and if I build a house people will rush to buy it." So, simply because able builders have made use of stone or bricks, he, obsessed by an ardent desire to be uncommon and different, makes one of papier-maché. All his admirers stand in front of it in their queer clothes and cry "Oh, how clever, how original, how subtle!" but the public, the intelligent public, cursed by that most banal of all inflictions, common sense, burst out laughing and pass by, and the first strong, healthy wind blows the abortive building away.

If Mr. McEvoy had never read Mr. Shaw, or sat at the perverse feet of Mr. Barker, "All That Matters" might have matured a good deal more. There are moments in it that are both delicious and excellent, characterisation that is delightful and true, patches of dialogue that are full of humour and pathos. There is in the play also the right atmosphere of the country, and there are, buried among the verbiage of self-conscious fine writing, one or two new ideas. But as a play, as an actable thing, as a piece of work offered to the practical stage, it is altogether and utterly hopeless. Worst of all, it is tedious and tiring, and leads to ribaldry and ridicule just as did Mr. Shaw's "Getting Married" and Mr. Barker's "Madras House," and both these authors' future work will continue to do so as long as they labour under the erroneous belief that they are not playwrights but seers and Apostles, not journalists with the gift of the dramatic instinct, but leaders of men and pioneers. What a pity it all is! What a waste of talent this overweening superiority brings about! Shakespeare was content to cast his wonderful sonnets in the approved form. Sheridan was humble enough and wise enough to follow the prescribed rules of play-writing as they were then laid down. All masters submit to form and style, and it is left to the charlatan to dazzle the peculiar minority with specious miscarriages. In Mr. McEvoy's work there is much that is true, well-observed and alive. He draws his types from life and not from the Fabian Society. He breathes the pure, strong, clear breezes of the country, and does not fill his starved lungs with the miesmic air of the Adelphi Terrace, or the used-up air of debating societies, the cultured drawing-room and the Mutual Admiration Society. But obviously he has been seduced from the country, and has just as obviously been told that he is clever, and so has overlooked the fact that he is able. His former play (delightfully played by Miss Horniman's company) "When the Devil was Sick," was written in what we may be permitted to call his pre-self-conscious days, and is infinitely immeasurably better than "All that Matters," the very title of which stamps it with the exotic hall-mark of Adelphism. We therefore implore Mr. McEvoy to go back to Nature, to rid himself of the niggling little microbe of Shavianism, to forget that he ever was called clever, and write plays, not pamphlets. We have got Mr. Shaw and Mr. Barker already.

The story of "All that Matters" is not worth telling. Suffice it to say, the play has the benefit of scenery quite un-English in its beauty and in many instances of acting almost German in its excellence. It is, however, handicapped by stage-management of the most amateurish description. Any suburban club would have produced it better. Tiresome restlessness, irritating pauses, evidences of the "real pump," in the way of bird-whistles and cow-bells and water abounded, and there was Miss Phyllis Neilson-Terry. Mr. Fisher White's old shepherd was beyond praise. He gave the part all the dignity, tenderness, optimism, and poetry intended by the author. It was a pure gem of acting. Mr. Charles Maude was unrecognisable as a cockney hair-dresser on holiday, and he gave an altogether wonderful character-study, never overdone, never out of the picture. Miss Greet compelled laughter, and stepped out of a Westminster-bridge tram-car, whose terminus was Tooting-bec. Miss Helen Haye, an actress almost new to the London stage, realised to perfection the snobbish, capable wife of a small farmer, and brought to bear upon her part a hundred evidences of humour and intuition. Miss Sidney Farebrother was as good as ever, and Miss Carlotta Addison quite charming. Mr. Norman Trevor was, however, stiff, cold, unconvincing, and uninspired. The terrible word adequate is the only one to apply to him. Mr. Lyall Swete was sadly miscast. Several other performers did very well, and there was Miss Phyllis Neilson-Terry.

Now, of Miss Phyllis Neilson-Terry, whose name has only to be mentioned to the daily newspaper critics to be followed by a pæan of praise, we have just this to say. If she were to be sent to the School for Acting for several years, and were to live away from home, she might develop into a very charming and capable actress. Miss Terry has everything in her favour—a good presence, a good voice, and abounding self-confidence. What she suffers from is an overwhelming desire to act, and an incitative faculty that has led her to reproduce all the worst mechanical tricks of the worst of all possible schools. She has at present no sincerity. She turns on all the various stops with fatal facility. She intones her speeches in the manner of the hardened leading lady. She listens to her voice, sings, makes curious breathing noises, breathes convulsively to slow emotion, and employs a bent-knee walk that is most ungainly and unbeautiful. She was to us as unlike the small farmer's daughter, struggling under an unrealised maternal instinct drawn by Mr. McEvoy, as it was possible for her to be.

We shall look forward to Mr. McEvoy's future work with immense interest, because we feel that if he will make his escape from Bernard Barkainea immediately, and take himself seriously, he will write fine plays. It will not, after all, take him long to live down Mr. Herbert Trench's unfortunate letter to the Press. Homeric laughter soon dies away, and memories are short.

"THE WITCH" AT THE ROYAL COURT THEATRE

THE Censor is to be congratulated on allowing "The Witch" to be staged. It may be that that wonderful person Anne Pedersdotter did away with the holy horror that good gentleman usually experiences when a dramatist deals with the unconventional. Witches in themselves are unconventional, and when we add to that a good-looking young man's liaison with his father's pretty wife we certainly get a very unconventional play indeed. But the Censor is not only to be congratulated for passing such incidents on to the general playgoer, but also for the fact that he should have recognised the enormous value of this play from a psychological point of view. It is evidently a play after Mr. John Masefield's own heart. He loves tense situations, and to weave a huge merciless Fate crashing down on his central figure with the final fall of the curtain. Mr. Masefield has adapted this striking play, written by Wiers-Jennsen, of Norway. We must frankly admit that as a play it is a very long way behind Mr. Masefield's "The Tragedy of Nan," though there is something in common between Nan Hardwick and Anne Pedersdotter. Both women hunger after a very human love, and both women experience, from at least one of their own sex, extreme cruelty and misrepresentation.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

"The Witch" deals with the sixteenth century, and the action takes place in Bergen. Anne Pedersdotter marries a widower, Master Absolon, a dignitary of the local church. From the opening scene we see in Anne a woman moving about her household duties under the critical surveillance of her aged mother-in-law. From the very commencement we see unruly fires burning within this young housewife, in spite of the meek devotion and the continual pressure of hands above the knees. We feel that here is a woman merely waiting her time when she may be able to kick over the traces and live, if only for one bright but dangerous moment, instead of going about like a sort of timid domestic ghost. Our supposition proves correct with the unexpected home-coming of Martin, Absolon's son by his first marriage. As a little boy Martin had met Anne. They talk over old times till Master Absolon joins them. Father and son have both followed the same vocation and they exchange notes on college life. In the meantime there is another fire a-brewing—a fire for the burning of Herlofs-Marte. Her house is being besieged by the mob. When Anne is alone, Herlofs-Marte, a strange, scarcely human creature, staggers to her side and begs for protection. Anne hides this miserable woman in a loft. But the mad mob, thirsting for the sight of flames about her poor old carcass, finally discover her. The witch's pleadings and curses avail nothing, and she is lifted shoulder-high and carried away to the burning.

In the second Act we find the Synod assembled in Absolon's house. Its members, true to their fanatical creed, discuss with infinite relish the burning of the witch. But Absolon experiences no religious joy. To him the burning of Herlofs-Marte awakens old memories, and he confesses to his wife and son that he had purposely drowned the poor sufferer's confession and implication of others with psalm-singing, because he knew that Anne's dead mother had been an accomplice of Herlofs-Marte. He knew of this matter before he married Anne, and kept his secret for the simple reason that an outward expression of his religious zeal at that time would have prevented him from marrying her. This confession has a curious effect upon Anne. It does not shock her. It fascinates her, and she prays that the miraculous power of her mother may be given to her too. When she is alone she invokes this power for no other reason than that she may have the witchery of love; that she may, with a soft call, even with the concentrated effect of her emotions, bring Martin, in spite of his theology, to her arms. And this calling upon the dark powers of witchcraft is the finest piece of acting we have seen for a very long time. Miss Lillah McCarthy as Anne invokes the devil to some purpose. As she sits before us we see the various emotions flit across her beautiful face—a face reminding us so strongly of one of D. G. Rossetti's women. The emotions are intense, passionate. Her smiles are a continual whispering of the one word, "Come." We see the burning fire of her body seeking for expression when her hands glide over her bosom. Softly the door behind her opens—Martin enters. She goes to him. They cling together. . . . It happens so without a word, because Anne has become a beautiful witch, because love that has been starved for five years is a great and surging and victorious thing when it comes into existence.

Another shadow falls across Absolon's path—the last shadow of all. He feels that Death has plucked him by the sleeve. The very shape and colour of the clouds seem a prophetic warning of the end. Half humorously, he asks Anne if she has ever wished him dead. He remembers her laughter. He heard it when she and Martin were together, and it was the first time he had ever heard his wife laugh. Anne answers his question with a storm of reproach. She tells him that she has given him five wasted years of her life; tells him that where he has given his aged and respectable kindness she has cried out for fleshly love. Bending low over her husband, and in a voice that rings with mocking triumph, Anne tells him that she has given herself to Martin. Her lips curl over a malign smile as she hisses, "I wish you dead!" Anne utters a shriek of horror. She has killed her husband. But there is no remorse. Anne is a woman who, once launched in a torrent of witchcraft, is oblivious to everything save her passionate love.

There is a funeral ceremony in the Cathedral. A coffin containing the earthly remains of Absolon stands in front of the altar, surrounded with lighted candles. There is a sound of singing. But it brings no peace, even in the presence of Death. Martin stands by the coffin and extols his father, and hides Anne's guilt by proclaiming that Absolon died a natural death. He is ruthlessly interrupted by his grandmother, who denounces Anne and bids her speak the truth while placing her hand upon the coffin. Anne staggers up the altar-steps. Her shaking hand is poised above the shrouded figure beneath her. She lies till her hand falls, till her white fingers tap the coffin-led. Then her mind gives way, and in her awful babbling she speaks the truth.

MUSIC

THERE is no doubt that in this age—which some folk are never tired of trouncing because of its degeneracy as compared with past ages—there are some very clever people. Among these we must certainly place Mr. Paul Reimers and Mr. Hamilton Harty, whose song-recital on Saturday was an afternoon of pure pleasure. Beethoven and Schubert made their age great, and no doubt they had good singers and players around them; but we cannot be sure that we should have heard their songs more beautifully chanted by the Reimers and the Hartys of those days had we been alive then. London is not an agreeable place of residence since the invention of motor-cars and their horns. In Vienna a hundred years ago a leisurely, quiet life may have been much more possible, but, for all that, we felt grateful, as we listened to our artists the other day, to the Providence which had seen fit that we should be running our course contemporaneously with them. We are none too well provided with such artful singers as Mr. Reimers. We could, we think, count their number on the fingers of one hand. Why is it that there are always so many more ladies who sing lieder beautifully than gentlemen? Mr. Reimers has not the voice of a Caruso or a Ben Davies; he has not the haunting timbre of Mr. Gervase Elwes; he has no great command of profound emotion; but he is almost miraculous in the use he makes of such means as Nature has given him. It seems as if we might as well ask for the moon as for a singer more entirely agreeable in his way. If criticism is to have its say, we might be disposed to suggest that Mr. Reimers's cleverness is just a little too apparent. Does he sometimes convey an impression that he knows how clever he is, and is glad that his hearers know it; that his own skill is affording him more real pleasure than the music itself? Mr. Hamilton Harty leaves no impression of this kind upon us. Like all the truly great, he is unequal in his performance of accompaniments. We have known the day when he has played as if he were bored, and did not care how soon the concert was over. Again—and it was so on Saturday—he applies himself to his delicate duty with the affectionate interest of an Isaak Walton threading a frog or worm. He plays through the song so consummately, that at the end you feel that you have listened to a masterpiece of playing, and there were passages which you feel it gave the pianist extreme delight to play. Yet was he doing them with such perfection for their own sake as well as for the pleasure any honest artist takes in doing a piece of work as well as it can be done. So, we believe, did Mr. Walton bend himself to his task of bait-arrangement, engrossed in it, without anticipatory consideration of the chub or trout which might or might not swim greedily to its neatly-served breakfast—and its death. But let us not be too hard upon Mr. Reimers because he seems to like that Venator and his other companions should admire his unmistakable skill. He could not sing as he does did his own craft not delight him. Let us rather praise him ungrudgingly for his exquisite neatness, his invariable propriety, his graceful turnings of phrase, also for his choice of songs. We would not have missed his "Adelaida" for a great deal. Did it not recall our first "Monday Pop," at which Sims Reeves sang it, and we read with aweful gratitude the special announcement: "Mme. Arabella Goddard has kindly consented to play the accompaniment." Such was the reverence in those days for great Beethoven, and that which was universally held to be the greatest song in the world, that the Carreño of her time was ready to take her place meekly at the instrument when "Adelaida" was to be sung. We do not remember that Sims Reeves sang the lovely cycle "An die ferne Geliebte" which Mr. Reimers warbled so tenderly at the Classical Society's Concert, but if he did, Mr. Zerbini or Mr. Lindsay Sloper would probably have accompanied it. About "Adelaida" only was there the mystic wonder which called for the aid of a Mme. Goddard. Mr. Reimers cultivates Schubert not less than Beethoven. He sang the "Nachtsück" from Schubert's Op. 36 and the "Jüngling und der Tod" and "Der Zwerg," which do not come from every tenor's mouth; and, delightful as he was in "Im Grünen" he was still more perfect (and so was Mr. Harty) in "Der Musensohn." In Wolf's "Elfenlied" the artists were impayable, as they were also in Saint-Saëns's "Guitares et Mandolines" and Debussy's "Chevaux de bois." We recommend all lovers of a good song-recital to look out anxiously for the next concert to be given by Messrs. Reimers and Harty.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The concert of the Classical Society just mentioned was specially interesting owing to the performance by Mr. Maurice Sons of Bach's Partita in D minor for solo violin, which is known to most people only by its last movement, the famous "Chaconne," and perhaps by its "Gique," which one sometimes hears as an "encore" piece. To listen to the noble "Chaconne" in its proper place was an unusual experience. The four dances which precede it are in Bach's finest manner, and would by themselves afford a rich treat. But when they are concluded and completed by the stupendous "Chaconne" it is as when, having enjoyed a week in the Jura, one reaches the Col de la Faucille and sees the view of giant peaks, as Ruskin saw them, in the light of a clear evening. That is equivalent to saying that it is overwhelming in its grandeur. Mr. Sons is probably serving his generation best as the leader of Sir Henry Wood's orchestra. But he will always be welcomed when he finds opportunity to show his skill as a solo-player, as those well know who have heard him as a concerto-player at Queen's Hall. It used to be said—perhaps it is said still—that organists were no good as pianists, and that orchestral violinists made inferior soloists Mr. Sons gives us an instance of the futility of such generalisations. He played with dignity, authority, individuality, and, of course, with irreproachable technique. Beethoven's early String Trio in G major, heard at this concert, is one of those compositions of exceeding cleverness which would enchain one's attention even were they deficient in imagination, which this Trio most certainly is not. Its freshness and ease were in strong contrast with the laboured heaviness of Brahms' Piano Trio in C minor, in which the Andante is the only really good-tempered movement.

We said that there were many very clever people in these days. Were there ever so many clever quartett-players? There is the Rosé Quartett, which has been playing delightfully at Broadwood's; there are the Parisian and the Flonzaley Quartetts, which made us marvel last year; there are our old friends the Bohemian Players, whom we should be glad to hear again, and there is the Brussels Quartett, which cannot, surely, be surpassed for brilliance and certainty. This company of artists gave a concert last Thursday, at which the Quartett of Schubert in G major, no easy task, was played with a champagne-like effervescence, and the beautiful, strange Quartett in F of Maurice Ravel had all its charm revealed. Ravel has not so far convinced us that he is a born poet among poets as Debussy is. But that he has truly poetical instincts, that he is, before all things, musical, and that the modern idioms are his natural mode of speech we have no doubt whatever. The quartett is dedicated to his master, Gabriel Fauré, and it is said that the master did not hesitate to accept the dedication, though later, as is alleged, he declared that he could have nothing to do with the composer of the "natural history" songs.

"Fantastic" is the epithet that one hears used to describe such music as this. We think the word quite unsuitable. There is much that is grave, a good deal that might even be called austere, in the quartett, and to classically-nurtured ears it is undeniably strange. But its thought and the texture of its weaving are so harmonious, so well-weighed, nothing in it seems haphazard, that the music has not the note of true fantasy. It is too serious; though it is strange, it is not fantastic. We were reminded, as we listened to it, of many passages in Pater's essay on Leonardo, the painter who sought curious beauty, that remote beauty apprehended only by those who have searched for it carefully; the painter who was "clairvoyant of occult gifts in common or uncommon things – in the reed at the brook-side, or the star which draws near to us but once in a century." It should be needless to say that we are far from proposing to acclaim M. Ravel as a genius of the order of Leonardo, but we do suggest that the form of beauty sought by the Frenchman may not be unprofitably illustrated by a reference to the new dreams of the great Florentine: "Out of the secret places of a unique temperament he brought strange blossoms and fruits hitherto unknown, and for him the novel impression conveyed, the exquisite effect woven, counted as an end in itself—a perfect end." Might not some of this apply to the aims of M. Ravel?

We have many admirable quartett-parties which are at home in London. The doyen of these is surely the Wesseley Quartett, which has been playing chamber-music to us for ten years. At the last Wesseley Concert the players were kind enough to let us hear some Haydn. In this, as in Schubert's G major, they were vigorous and a little rough. They were more at their best in César Franck's Piano

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Quintett, though in this work their pianist, Mr. York Bowen, might have helped the general effect more than he did.

Besides M. Rosenthal, who played at the Philharmonic Concert, and of whose merits we hope to write later, M. Pugno and Miss Adele Verne have been the chief pianists of the week. At the Sunday concert in the Palladium of the London Symphony Orchestra, M. Pugno was in his most brilliant form. Never can the presto of Mozart's Concerto in E flat have been played with a more unerring swiftness and delicacy, or with steadier scholarship. One thinks that pianists of the Hummel and the Herz kind must have had fingers like those of M. Pugno. Miss Adele Verne has returned, as pianists are wont to do, from a "triumphant tour" through the New World. She is a powerful player—we almost tremble when she is smiting the piano with the air of a Moses smiting the rock. Perhaps her manner approaches the virile too closely to be completely satisfactory. Sophie Menter and Carreño play like strong men because, as it seems, they cannot play otherwise. But Miss Verne plays as if she were doing her utmost to attain a masculine force of utterance, and that is by no means the same thing. She pleases us much more in her quieter mood than in her vigorous onslaughts upon the keys. She did her best to convince us that Brahms' early Sonata in F minor is a work worthy to be dragged out into comparison with the mature works of that great master, but without success. It must always be a work of great interest to the student, as the earnest effort of an ugly duckling who was going to be a swan, to be beautiful before his time. But it is a pity to bring it forward as if it were a worthy expression of Brahms' genius. Miss Verne has brought with her from Cuba some dances by a composer who bears the wonderful name of Cervantes. They are very bright and charming, and they were charmingly played. She had a large and a very enthusiastic audience.

Since the last sentence was written two announcements of great moment to musical people have been made. One is a cause of rejoicing. The King has graciously agreed to lend his musical library to the British Museum, and it will in due time be available for the use of students. This collection is one of the most valuable and interesting in existence, and musicians of all countries will bless his Majesty for thus making it accessible. The other announcement will be the cause of grief to thousands. Dr. Richter is to retire from the active exercise of his profession in April, and will spend his remaining years (we trust that they will be many and happy) in Germany or Austria. Verily the Daughters of Music will be brought low in the day of his retirement. What he has been to music in England can hardly be expressed. There are many fine conductors; but for us there can only be one Richter.

SOME NEW FRENCH BOOKS

"La Demoiselle de la Rue des Notaires"

Another novelist has dawned on the French literary horizon—M. Louis Latzarus, whose first novel is undoubtedly, with "Marie-Claire," the best work of its kind as yet published this season.

M. Louis Latzarus has chosen as theme of his remarkable book the life, thought, and morals of a small, ancient, and picturesque provincial city. He shows us the inhabitants of Vertault-sur-Seine with all their shallowness, meanness, and slyness, and their insatiable love for calumny and slander.

M. de Ramelet, a retired officer, lives with his wife and children in their old ancestral dwelling of the Rue des Notaires, near the ramparts, the aristocratic quarter of the city. M. de Ramelet possesses most of the prejudices supposed to be characteristic of his class; to occupy his leisure hours he takes in hand the education of his son Robert, a boy of twelve or more years, and engages Jean Falibert, the son of a locksmith, to give some lessons to Robert. Jean is a bright, clever lad, whose sole ambition is to become a journalist in Paris. He accepts M. de Ramelet's offer with alacrity, as it may give him the means of fulfilling his cherished dream.

M. de Ramelet, who, though terribly arriéré in his ideas, is at heart an excellent man, goes over Robert's lessons each night, so as not to appear an ignoramus in the eyes of his son. What he thus discovers in the course of his readings fills him with a sudden enthusiasm for the beauties of education. He, who had till then professed the most disdainful disregard for culture, resolves that the jewels of French literature, and the glorious episodes of French history, shall also be revealed to his daughter Etiennette, aged twenty-two. And to Jean Falibert is confided the task of awakening Mademoiselle de Ramelet's soul to the appreciation of the great classics.

But Etiennette is not easily aroused. She is an insignificant, apathetic young person, whose retrograde education has reduced her to a state of tranquil boredom. It having been thoroughly ground into her what a jeune demoiselle of her class and position should not do, she has never felt the slightest desire or will to do anything. Her existence passes in a quiet monotomy which should be desperate for a girl of her age; indeed, any unlooked-for event ought to prove a boon. Yet when Jean gives her her first lesson, the mere effort to understand is too painful for her, and she does not even try to follow his arguments. Jean feels piqued; he had flattered himself that his eloquence would ruffle the cold placidity of Etiennette's heart and win her favour.

But months go by; she remains as indifferent as ever, and things would continue as they are indefinitely were it not for the arrival of Sophie de Boissicourt, a young cousin of the de Ramelets. She is an absolute contrast to Etiennette: pretty, gay, frolicsome. She takes a mischievous delight in troubling poor Etiennette's ignorant mind by idle chatter. She assists at the lessons, and soon the austere classics are banished for works ranging from the most high-flown productions of the romantic school to the most violent and ridiculous romans-feuilletons. Sophie is amused by Jean's sentiment for her cousin, and encourages him in it. Her sole excuse in thus acting with such thoughtlessness is that she cannot believe that Etiennette could possibly think seriously of the locksmith's son; she considers the intrigue a harmless flirtation, which Etiennette will know how and when to check. Alas! Mademoiselle de Ramelet is not an emancipated young "Parisienne." She is an unsophisticated, romantic damsel, who has been slumbering far too long, unconscious of life's realities and dangers, and who suddenly awakens to the fact that she is young, in love, and, as she confidently believes, loved in her turn. She disregards all the severe principles which have hitherto surrounded her as a wall, and responds to Jean's sentiment in all sincerity. Sophie is thoroughly frightened and dismayed, realises suddenly all the harm she has done, and, being a coward, flees from Vertault-sur-Seine, leaving her cousin to her fate.

A few days later Jean announces to Etiennette that a situation has been obtained for him on the staff of a Parisian newspaper, at 150 francs a month, and they agree to run away together. But once in the dingy third-class carriage of the train bearing them towards the metropolis, the scales fall from Etiennette's eyes. She observes for the first time her companion's vulgarity, the poverty of his aspect and clothes; she remarks how easily he gets along with a workman, their fellow-traveller; naturally—Jean belongs to his class! She sees her lover as he really is—poor, untidy, vain, bereft of the slightest distinction, the son of a locksmith. In Paris, at the miserable hotel, she breaks down. When Jean enters the room to inquire how she is feeling, her disgust is so great that she skrinks from him. He goes without much regret. Etiennette, whilst living in the noble old dwelling on the ramparts, had been adorned to his admiring gaze with all the prestige of her noble birth and position. But in the sordid hotel bedroom, dishevelled and dusty from the journey, she appears only a very ordinary young person, of whom he is most thankful to be relieved. Deprived of her natural environment, she strikes him as being undesirable in every respect. He therefore departs, banging the door.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Poor Etiennette has now but one idea—to return home. She flees from Paris and arrives at the Rue des Notaires drenched and bedraggled. Her parents are horrified, and when, in the delirium of the brain fever she has contracted, they learn from their daughter's lips the whole extent of her fault, their pride receives a wound which never heals. Etiennette recovers; she resumes her old dispirited existence, having lost her honour, her parents' love, and the esteem of the town. Whenever she appears, smiles hover on the lips of the scandal-mongers, and their eyes twinkle with a satisfied malice. The foolish Demoiselle de la Rue des Notaires will thus drag out her ruined life, disdained by both father and mother, who never speak to her save in the presence of the servants.

The character of Etiennette is wonderfully well drawn. It should be said that no one assists at the lessons given by the young Falibert to Mlle. de Ramelet. Indeed, this last detail is one of the defects of the book; for it is utterly contrary to the ideas and principles of the French provincial nobility to leave a young girl unchaperoned with a man. It would be considered of the greatest impropriety, as, even when they are betrothed, young ladies of Etiennette's class and education are never left alone with their fiancé. Another imperfection of M. Louis Latzarus's otherwise most interesting work is the too incomplete delineation of Mme. de Ramelet's character; she appears only as a shade—the shade of a weak bigot. It is positive that the novel would have gained greatly if the author had traced this personage with rather bolder strokes.

"La Demoiselle de la Rue des Notaires," written in a clear, concise, and delightfully satirical style, is not the description of one particular town, or of some special individuals; it is a faithful painting of a whole category of ancient provincial cities, slumbering on the banks of placid rivers, under the shade of trees. And the personages which revolve around the action of M. Louis Latzarus's charming and original work are the exact portraits of the exceedingly unsympathetic inhabitants of some such sleepy old towns. Therein resides the real secret of this novel's interest.

"Le Roman d'une Neurasthénique," by M. Paul de Laget, transports us into the painful, morbid atmosphere of a sanatorium for persons affected by divers nervous diseases. If the description given by the author is correct, it firmly strengthens one's resolution never, if possible, to go to a French hydropathic establishment, where patients suffering from various affections are huddled pell-mell together in a promiscuity which must prove as painful as it is harmful. The sanatorium of Sombreuil, which is the scene of action of this very modern novel, has amongst its inmates a would-be satyr, represented in the guise of a presumed English baronet, the Baron de Stard. This "gentleman" pursues in the morning, in the park of the establishment, a nervous and virtuous damsel, who in her fright fires a pistol in his face, and who is rescued by a Don Quixote in the person of a romantic and irresistible French nobleman, suffering from fulgurating pains in the spine. The sanatorium shelters also a few harmless lunatics—such as Mme. Merlet, who spends her time in ablutions; M. Tamison, the spiritualist, who insists on always carrying an open parasol; Mlle. Tardieu, a most alarming and uncomfortable spinster; and the pathetic old Mlle. Amic, "in whose eyes, full of anguish, the last vestige of reason seems to come and sob. . . . ."

There is a great deal of penetrating observation in "Le Roman d'une Neurasthénique." Lucie de Vercors, the heroine, is charmingly drawn. Certain details of M. de Laget's work are scrupulously exact, such as the fact of the doctor of the establishment giving shower-baths indiscriminately to men or women; and also the manner in which de Prieux's death is dissimulated, by a skilful mise-en-scène, so as not to alarm the other patients. The characters of all the inmates of the sanatorium are very well drawn, with their thirst for new treatments, their touching confidence in the not yet tried, and their pitiful absurdities and foibles. But "Le Roman d'une Neurasthénique" is a very painful story, and the spectacle of the lugubrious "danse macabre" executed by all the personages of the novel is exceedingly depressing and melancholy. Let us hope that M. de Laget, whose style is both elegant and sober, will choose as theme of his next work a less painful subject.

Marc Logé.

INDIA: A SERIES

V.—DIPLOMACY AND EXTENSION OF TERRITORY

Dufferin, 1884-1888

Lord Ripon's policy and expressed sentiments having caused much excitement and race-feeling, culminating in the "Ilbert Bill" agitation, Lord Dufferin's tact, suavity and personal influence were required to restore internal peace and quiet. In attaining this object he was successful. His diplomatic skill was soon exhibited. He had immediately to deal with the Bengal Tenancy Bill, which raised important and contentious questions between the landowners and tenants. He arbitrated with conclusive authority between the parties, and disallowed the main assertion of the landlords that Lord Cornwallis's Permanent Settlement would be infringed. Corresponding Rent Acts, mutatis mutandis, were passed for Oudh and the Panjab, which materially improved the laws and benefited the proprietary and cultivating classes. When the Russo-Afghan frontier was being delimitated by an International Commission, a Russian force, in March, 1885, attacked and defeated a considerable body of Afghans, near Penjdeh, on the North-Western Frontier of Afghanistan. At this critical juncture the Amir was visiting the Viceroy at Rawalpindi. Further fighting was averted, partly by the Amir abandoning his claim to certain territory. Negotiations were resumed, and final arrangements for the demarcation of the frontier were in due course agreed upon between England and Russia. These complications necessitated immediate military preparations, which included the despatch, if required, of 25,000 men to Quetta in order to garrison Herat, the mobilisation of another corps d'armée, and the construction of a railway to Quetta. These preparations were made with firmness and vigour, but peace was maintained. The Native Chiefs voluntarily offered military assistance, the eventual outcome of which was the enrolment of Imperial Service troops furnished by the Native States Military manœuvres on a large scale showed the efficiency and readiness of the Army in India.

In 1885 three thousand men were despatched from India to support the operations against the dervishes under Osman Digna round Suakim. The British Resident had been withdrawn from Mandalay, in Upper Burma, on account of the unsatisfactory nature of his position and the unfriendliness of the Burmese Government; attempts to revive cordial relations up to 1885 had failed. In that year the Burmese Government quarrelled with the Bombay-Burma Trading Company, and condemned the latter to pay an enormous fine, declining the arbitration proposed. The terms of the Viceroy's ultimatum to the King of Burma being rejected, an expedition of ten thousand men was despatched; Mandalay was occupied, the King deported, and Upper Burma, an area larger than France, was annexed to the British dominions from January 1st, 1886. Lord Dufferin himself visited Mandalay. The annexation of Upper Burma was essential to prevent its falling into the hands of another European Power. In 1885-86 a Commercial Mission from India to Lhasa was sanctioned by the Secretary of State, but the Tibetan authorities were alarmed, and intended to oppose its crossing the frontier. Lord Dufferin arranged diplomatically with China, the Suzerain of Tibet, that the Mission should not be pressed if China's claims on Upper Burma were withdrawn. A Convention was signed with China, and the Mission was dissolved. Subsequently the Tibetans invaded Sikkim, and constructed a fort there, from which they were easily dislodged in September, 1888, and driven across the frontier. Besides little expeditions in the Naga Hills in Assam, there was the first Hazara Expedition, in which 12,500 troops operated on the Black Mountain to punish the tribes of that locality for raids on British territory and the deaths of British officers. To provide for the greater employment of Indians in the administration the Public Service Commission was appointed, which, after full inquiry, resulted in the division of the Public Service into three parts—the Imperial Public Service, the Provincial and the Subordinate Services, to the Provincial being allotted many appointments previously occupied by the Covenanted Civil Service. Lord Dufferin also proposed the extension of the Legislative Councils, which was enacted later, with the holding of Budget debates, whether financial legislation were required or not. In 1885 the Indian National Congress held its first meeting, to discuss and formulate demands on the Government in furtherance of the political aspirations of the educated classes. The restoration of the Gwalior fortress to the Maharaja Sindhia was greatly appreciated. The Jubilee of Queen Victoria was celebrated throughout India on February 16th, 1887, with profuse demonstrations of loyalty. The establishment of the Countess of Dufferin's Fund for the medical relief of native women was a new and popular departure. Lord Dufferin left India tranquil and conciliated by his personal efforts.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

General Peace and Internal Development

Lansdowne, 1888-1904

To consolidate friendship with the independent kingdoms beyond the frontier, to define our sphere of influence over the petty States and the wild tribes on the border, and to demarcate distinctly the boundaries which separate us from our neighbours were important features in Lord Lansdowne's external policy. A mission was sent to Kabul to induce the Amir to withdraw his troops from certain frontier districts of Trans-Oxiana, which were outside the territory we were pledged to defend from external aggression. A friendly understanding was also effected as to the limits of his jurisdiction on the Indo-Afghan frontier, which was afterwards demarcated. Chitral, Hunza and Nagar, and some of the tribes on the North-West were brought under political influence. All the passes leading from India through the highlands into Afghanistan, Badakshan, and the Pamirs were taken into guardianship. The Burmo-Chinese frontier was aligned, and relations with Siam were adjusted, as also with the Chin hill tribes and the Shan States, the Karens and the Kachins. Frontier expeditions were required in the Lushai Hills, in the Zhob, Mranzai, Black Mountain, Isazai territories, and among the Bor Abors of Assam. A Convention was made in 1890 with China regarding Tibet, and Trade Regulations were formulated in 1893. Internal anarchy in the Manipur State called for the Viceroy's interference in 1891. In the proceedings for the restoration of order British officers were treacherously assassinated; punishments were inflicted for the murders, but the State was not annexed. The loyalty of the Native Princes throughout India was strengthened by friendly intercourse. The finances of India were seriously affected by the great and increasing fluctuations in the gold value of silver and the heavy fall in the exchange value of the rupee. A gold standard for India was proposed, but not then adopted. The mints were closed to the unrestricted coinage of silver and orders were issued for the receipt of gold in exchange for rupees at 1s. 4d. per rupee. From these measures dates the establishment of stability in the Indian currency.

The Legislative Councils were enlarged and reconstituted, and the members were given the right of financial discussion and of interpellation; the elective system was partly introduced. A Factory Act was passed to restrict the hours of employment of women and children. The protection of animals from cruelty was improved. Another Act raised, from ten to twelve years of age, the limit of protection of young girls; and the important principle was established that the Queen's Proclamation of 1858 did not, in the name of religion, sanction practices inconsistent with individual safety, the public peace, and morality. A proposal to reform the Jury system in Bengal, and restrict its application to certain districts, greatly disturbed public opinion, and led to the appointment of a Commission, with the result that the changes contemplated were withdrawn. An anti-cow-killing movement, organised by religious propagandists and political agitators, produced riots in Bombay, Bengal and the North-West Provinces, on which Lord Lansdowne publicly declared the right of the great religious denominations to freedom from molestation or persecution in the exercise of their religious observances, and the determination of Government to permit no disturbance of the peace. The Presidential Army system was abolished by statute, and one Army for the whole of India organised, divided into four commands. The Indian Staff Corps was replaced by the Indian Army. Measures were taken for the mobilisation of the Army, for improvements in the position of European and Native soldiers, and the organisation of Imperial Service troops in Native States. The police force of every Province was reformed, gaol discipline and management received attention; so also education in all branches; the decennial census was carried out in 1891; agricultural and statistical inquiries were greatly advanced; an Imperial Library of 60,000 volumes was established, and an Imperial Record Office constituted. Railways, productive irrigation-works, telegraph lines, land settlements, sanitation, water-works were all extended under well-considered programmes. Without any high-flown policy, or eagerness for precipitate reform, the country was well ruled, and advanced in prosperity.

THE POET WHO WAS

There are some illusions which no man who has formed a high conception of life will readily allow to die. We cling to them because we realise that there is a wisdom that lies beyond the truth as we can see it—a wisdom that holds itself aloof from our timid doubts and reasonings. Of these immortal illusions there is one that is of special value to the artist; he must believe, however often circumstances appear to give him the lie, that great work can only be done by great men. The first work of every creative artist is to create his own character, and if he fails here through weakness or carelessness, that failure will be expressed and emphasised in his artistic work. So if admiring grapes we find ourselves confronted with the bramble that has produced them, we must form one of two conclusions—either the grapes are not true grapes, but Dead Sea fruit, bloom without and ashes within, or we lack the sympathetic insight that would enable us to detect the authentic vine in the heart of a briar.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Years ago there appeared a volume of poems for which I have ever had a great admiration, and, holding this illusion beyond all others, I always wished to meet the man who wrote them. He was, I knew, engaged in work that could hardly be grateful to a poet, and he was not to be encountered in ordinary literary circles; still, whenever I read his book I felt sure that sooner or later I should meet this man and like him. His poetry appealed to my more individual emotions, expressing moods with which I was personally familiar. Meanwhile, till I might know him better, I contented myself with writing in praise of his poems whenever I had the opportunity.

Then one day I found a distinguished man of letters and the most enthusiastic of English editors sitting together in a Regent-street café. We fell to talking of the man and his poems. We all admired his work, and, therefore, we all wished to meet him. "It's easy enough," cried the man of letters, and "after all we know the man through his book. We'll write him a mutual invitation to-night, and take him out to lunch to-morrow." There was something gallant in the idea, for we risked being snubbed, which is the last adventure an Englishman cares to have. We wrote the letter and sent it off.

The next morning was one of those rare and splendid days of which only England seems to have the secret—days when the wind is sweet and cool like a russet apple, and the warm sunshine follows close at its heels before one has time to be chilled. It seemed a good day on which to make a new friend. We called for our poet, and received a message that he would be pleased to come with us in an hour's time; so we went into Regent's Park and watched the squirrels playing with the nursemaids, and thrusting their inquisitive noses into the flowing hair of little girls. We felt that it was a generous world that gave us sunshine and little squirrels and men who wrote fine songs.

It is perhaps foolish to expect men of talent to be either very handsome or very ugly, but I confess that I was disappointed with my first impression of the poet. He looked elderly and insignificant and suggested in some subtle way an undertaker's mute, the kind of man who wears black kid-gloves too long in the fingers, and generally has a cold in the head. I thought, however, that his eyes might be rather fine in repose, but the whole body and speech of the man were twittering with nervousness, and he affected me like an actor in a cinematograph picture. All Nature is the friend of the shy man, and behind this superficial unease we divined qualities of enthusiasm and amiability that would no doubt be patent when this overwhelming timidity had passed away.

Looking back it seems to me that we all worked rather hard to set the man at his ease, and find him worthy of his own work. We told him stories, we found mutual friends, we encouraged him to talk, we sympathised with him over his luckless environment, and when called upon we praised and quoted his poetry without stint; but still he fluttered like a bird caught in a snare. He took his food without enjoyment, the sunny wine of France did not warm him a degree. We piped to him his own tunes, all the tunes of the world, and yet he would not dance. It was not that he was embarrassed by our compliments; he took them for his due, as a poet should. But he seemed to think that our enthusiasm must have a sinister motive, that it was impossible that any one should have discrimination enough to wish to meet the author of his book for the book's sake. Nevertheless, being optimists in matters of art our faith in the man held true; if only we could persuade him to drop the mask of his nervousness we thought——.

At the end of lunch we succeeded, and then I think we were all sorry. He stood there leaning gently against the table, while soured vanity spoke with a stammering tongue. It seemed that our little luncheon-party was a conspiracy to persuade him to publish some of his poems in the editor's paper, and therefore he found it necessary to be rude. Had his suspicions been true, a more modest man might have thought such a plot pardonable, or even rather flattering. But the terms in which our poet expressed himself placed him beyond argument or sympathy. We shook hands and said goodbye, and he went away out of our world of sunshine and tame squirrels for ever and ever.

So far as my companions were concerned the matter ended there. Their kingdoms were secure, and they could afford to laugh at our honourable discomfiture. But my kingdom was yet to win, and I could not spare the smallest of my illusions. If such a man as I had met that day could do the big things, Art became of a sudden an unworthy mistress to serve. I went home and nervously took his book from the shelf, wondering how far my new knowledge of the man's personality would spoil my enjoyment of his work. I need not have been anxious; they were real grapes, though perhaps I acknowledged for the first time that their distinctive bitter flavour prevented them from being of the first quality. Still, they were admirable of their kind, and I had to satisfy myself how such fruit could have grown on such a vine.

And then with a flash of intuition I saw the truth. The flesh, the features, the mortal part of the man might survive, but I knew as surely as if I had been present at his death-bed that the youth who had written those poems was dead. Needless to wonder what thwarting of emotion, what starvation of appetite had produced that burst of song; the important thing to me was to realise that the man himself, as we reckon men in the hopeful world, had perished in the singing. With this knowledge to aid me, I could sympathise with the rudeness of the man we had sought to honour. For in his heart he knew himself little better than a changeling, and with the giant's robe of his splendid hour of youth hanging loosely about his shrunken bones, he must have found our enthusiasm no more than mockery.

I have not yet been fortunate enough to meet the author of that book of poems which I have admired so long, yet I feel sure that sooner or later I shall meet the man and like him. I know that he will be young, and I think that on his lips his songs will have lost their bitterness; for it is a hard thing if we must carry our concern for the roses and our sorrow for the spring-tide lightness of girls beyond the gateway of the grave.

RICHARD MIDDLETON.

THE CHESTERTON MANNER*

THE appearance in a neat shilling edition of that remarkably clever and enjoyable volume of essays entitled "Twelve Types," together with the issue of a "Chesterton Calendar," may be taken as a suitable excuse for discussing briefly Mr.

* Twelve Types. By G. K. Chesterton. (Arthur L. Humphreys. 1s. net.)
A Chesterton Calendar. (Kegan Paul and Co. 5s. net.)

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

Chesterton's general work. For some years we have followed his writings with interest, and, knowing the range of his artillery, are disinclined to group these remarks under the heading of "advice." Perhaps "genial remonstrance" is a more suitable label for our feelings at the moment, but if at times we remonstrate rather strongly, our plaint will not lose the tone of the friendliness by which we are strongly moved.

Mr. Chesterton's style of writing reminds us sometimes of the thunderous, declamatory sentences of Swinburne hurling his elaborate anathemas at Walt Whitman; sometimes, even in the same column, of the primitive, incoherent vapourings of a youngster's essay. This formlessness was all very well a few years ago, but now that we know that he has nearly always good things to say, things worth hearing, we are concerned about his manner of saying them. He will not accuse us of unduly exploiting "temperament" when we protest that a fine wine brims more sweetly from a shapely glass than from a battered tin mug; champagne in pewter pots is incongruous and inartistic. Our estimate of the value of all literary work is determined almost entirely by the rules of its expression, and men criticise involuntarily as they read, so that they resent the straits of language into which a too great exuberance leads, for they encounter strange currents whose tendency is not fully realised.

In spite of this, Mr. Chesterton possesses in a high degree the excellent quality of suggestion. As with true poetry, so with prose—if it brings that peculiar, indescribable thrill, that sense of elation and spiritual recognition of its essential truth, it is often due to something hardly expressed, but strongly felt, which by a mysterious power communicates itself sublimely and potently to the soul of the reader. The reader cannot put his finger upon the divine word, or turn of a phrase, which has moved him so strangely; he only knows that somehow, in one breathless instant, another barrier has been broken down between him and the gods. This has happened to us more than once when in Mr. Chesterton's company, and it argues not verbosity, but restraint, in the writer. Restraint, however, is the very last attribute with which our author can be credited; therefore we contend that its employment would immensely enhance the effect he wishes to produce. When, as in a recent volume, "the wildest Wesleyanism tears the soul" of the Rev. Brown, and "all the evil passions of a curate are roaring within" the Rev. Smith, the machinery of the showman is too visible for our pleasure.

For a long time people have associated his name with the exhibition of paradox as a literary force. Now, paradox as an embellishment is distinctly entertaining and often profitable. It may be compared to the cracker in fireworks—there is a flash, a rousing bang, and one's ears are left tingling, But crackers, whether pyrotechnic or edible, become monotonous when taken in large quantities. To change the metaphor, there are signs that Mr. Chesterton is in danger of becoming regarded as the clown of journalism. With all due respect to the gentlemen of cap and bells—for they are worthy, innocent folk, and we should miss their painted red-hot pokers—they also are monotonous: and monotony is precisely the fault he believes to have avoided. After monotony in a writer comes apathy to the reader—very surely.

There are people who desire to sample the wisdom of a favourite author on every day of the year, to retire to rest with an epigram echoing in their brains—to shave in the morning, perchance, with the added keenness of a sharp saying. For such persons the "Chesterton Calendar" has been compiled—a distinction which few living authors attain. It contains many of Mr. Chesterton's best paragraphs, and although we do not profess to have read straight through the 420 pages (three-score and ten years being the allotted span), we think that all who admire this general work will say that a judicious and tasteful selection has been made. A different form of fame fell to Mr. Chesterton's lot some years ago—that of being parodied in the pages of a literary review. This is a blessed event in the career of an author, for he who has no style cannot be parodied. But Mr. Chesterton is parodied because of his exaggerations. Does it never occur to him that frequently a dignity, a justness, a clarity might be obtained by the elimination of some, at first sight, brilliant remark? He has a debonair way of throwing into articles and essays such irrelevant items as cows, maiden aunts, lamp-posts, and stars, until we are left gasping and "winded" in the race after his meaning. Ergo, we sit down half-way there—wherever "there" may be—laugh with what breath is left in us, and watch Mr. Chesterton plunging splendidly along until he is a mere speck in the distance. From "Twelve Types," for example, we take at hazard the following sentence: "When William Morris says that 'love is enough,' it is obvious that he asserts in those words that art, science, politics, ambition, money, houses, carriages, concerts, gloves, walking-sticks, door-knockers, railway-stations, cathedrals, and any other things one may choose to tabulate, are unnecessary." It is exhilarating and great fun, but it is not literature. There may be a subtle relationship between the ashes in the reader's pipe and the Assyrian Empire; it is interesting to think so; but it is most uninteresting to labour a proof thereof.

Quite legitimately Mr. Chesterton might retort that his style has made him, and is part of himself. True, doubtless; but the line of demarcation between style and affectation, the real and the spurious, is faint. Could he not do with a little less . . . gunpowder, shall we say? A heavy charge spreads the shots, and at present he is so busy loading and discharging his ammunition that he grows careless with regard to the important question of aim. Fewer shots, well trained and directed, would be more effective, although we are far from suggesting that he never hits the mark. On the contrary, there are sentences and whole paragraphs of his which grip, as we have already noted. "Heaven, so infinite is its care, may shake with anger from bound to bound at the sight of a caged bird." That appeals; it is passionate and challenging—one of the splendid indiscretions which compensate for a deal of loose firing. The charming digression—and his digressions are often charming—on railway-signals and language in "G. F. Watts;" the chapter vi. in "Robert Browning," with its insight and fascinating comparison of the probable manner in which Meredith and Browning would treat a given subject; his description of the old bric-à-brac shop in "The Ball and the Cross," and many other detached portions of his writings, move us to willing admiration. Occasionally we find a phrase incomparably fine, such as "Morning lifted itself laboriously over London," or "The long tide of sunset-light;" or, as in his last Daily News article, discussing the desolation of a Lancashire moorland, we get an inspiring thought—"It is not the ugliness that I criticise. I don't mind being ugly, but I have a strong objection to being sad." When we read "Defendants" or "Twelve Types," we ask for more; but when, for the sake of a weekly article, we discover arguments upon the relation of Byzantine architecture to penny loaves, fishes, bicycles, or whatever whimsy enters the writer's mind we cry off—distortion has limits.

Several times we have had the joy of hearing Mr. Chesterton lecture in London, but once in the provinces, during the discussion which followed his paper, we were vastly amused at the way in which he spiked the local big-guns. Not until afterwards, when considering the matter coolly, did we understand that many of his opponents' arguments were perfectly reasonable, and that it was the surprising rapidity and smiling readiness of his reprisals which left them temporarily helpless. Then we realised that he owns two very valuable possessions—an alert, swiftly-working mind, and an inherent, irrepressible boyishness. When the former takes the reins we are pleasantly exercised and mentally renewed; when the latter dominates we are amused in rather a sad fashion. When the two work harmoniously together we are thrilled.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Let him employ them, then, judiciously; let him clip some of those lusty, irrelevant (and occasionally irreverent) ejaculations; let him aim a bit straighter, with a charge suited to the weight and destination of his projectile. And then let him fire as often as he likes. So shall we get more work of the quality of "Twelve Types," and matter for an even better "Chesterton Calendar" than the one just issued.

W. L. R.

FRANCE UNDER LOUIS SEIZE—I.

HISTORIES of the French Revolution are apt to begin with the assembly of the States General in May, 1789. For this reason the ninth volume of M. Lavisse's "Histoire de France" (Hachette and Co.) is of especial interest, as dealing in a manner at once masterful and keenly interesting with the events immediately preceding the overthrow of the Bourbons. M. Lavisse, aided by MM. H. Carré and Paul Sagnac, has in this volume given us the history of Louis XVI.'s reign from 1774 to 1789.

The abuses of the despotic monarchical system in France had reached a maximum in the corruption of Louis XV.'s reign. When his successor ascended the throne a new spirit of Liberalism and reform was growing up in France. Voltaire had ridiculed the vices of the Court and the intolerance of the Church, and had preached the gospel of liberty. Jean Jacques Rousseau had raised the vision of primitive equality, and preached the rights of man. The road of reform had, therefore, been paved for Louis XVI., whose accession was greeted with much enthusiasm. He enjoyed a great reputation for virtue, which was not altogether undeserved. Had he been called upon to play the rôle of one of the lesser "Bourgeoisie" he would probably have earned the esteem and affection of his fellow-men. But he was called upon to rule France at the most critical period of her history, and in this task he showed fatal lack of character, weakness, and even stupidity. The King was kind-hearted, and felt for the sufferings of the lower orders; further, his mind was not closed to new and Liberal ideas, but he invariably sacrificed his reforming Ministers before the opposition of the noblesse and the haut clergé. The final cause of the collapse of his Government was the bankruptcy of the State. This is not surprising when we consider that the greater part of taxation fell on the poorest classes of the realm, who were the least able to bear it, while the nobles and, to a great extent, the clergy were exempted from contribution to the revenue. Not only were they exempt from taxation, but a large number of them lived on the national exchequer. The Court of France presented an extraordinary spectacle of corruption and extravagance at this time. Hundreds, thousands even, of idle courtiers, drawn from the noblest families, sauntered away life, squandering the resources of the country. Nearly every one who frequented the Court was in receipt of some pension or salary attached to a purely nominal office. When great families found themselves ruined by their extravagances or at the tables it was usual for the King to pay their debts. The family of the "Noailles" were in receipt of 2,000,000 livres per year from the Treasury, Madame de Lamballe received 100,000 livres, while the Polignacs cost the nation 700,000 livres per annum, and this for no other reason than their friendship with the Queen. When the Guêménées went bankrupt the King bought their estates for 12,000,000 livres, although at the highest estimate they were not worth more than 4,000,000. The Duc de Montemart, the Duc de Liancourt, and the Prince de Soubise were succoured in the same way. We may say that it was the Court which ruined France and caused the downfall of the Bourbons. It was by Court intrigues that Ministers were made and dismissed, that incompetent sons of noble families were appointed to ambassadorships.

The higher grades in the Army were only open to the haute noblesse, and most of the principal offices of State were filled from the same source. The intendants of provinces were, for the most part, nobles, as also were the Judges in the numerous "Parlements," or courts. Personal merit and learning were superfluous; young nobles became colonels of regiments which they never left Paris to command, or Governors of provinces which needed the rule of a practical economist. The households of the different members of the Royal Family alone cost the country some 32,000,000 livres annually, and this did not include any of their additional expenses, which amounted to a much larger sum. "La grande et la petite écurie" of the King had a total of 750 officers appointed from among the courtiers. Fifty doctors, all with large salaries, were attached to the King's household, not to mention a number of servants. The Queen's household was on a similar scale. Marie Antoinette was never popular in France. At the Court her exclusive friendship for a few families, such as the Polignacs and the Princesse de Lamballe, and the favours and huge sums of money which she lavished on these favourites, caused universal jealousy. Outside the Court she was disliked for the part she played in bringing about the dismissal of the two great reforming Ministers, Turgot and Malesherbes, and for her well-known extravagances. Her losses at cards were enormous, and these and her other financial excesses earned for her the sobriquet of "Madame Déficit." The affair of the diamond necklace, and the acquittal of the Cardinal de Rohan by the "Parlement" of Paris served to show the extent of her unpopularity.

The abuses of the haut clergé were hardly less scandalous than those of the Court. The Bishops and Archbishops were chosen almost exclusively from among the haute noblesse, no spiritual qualifications being necessary. Young nobles passed straight from a life of dissipation at Versailles to the dignity of a bishopric or rich abbacy. The higher clergy enjoyed enormous revenues, and were practically exempt from all taxation. The Archbishop of Strasbourg, the Cardinal de Rohan, had a revenue of 400,000 livres, not to mention many additional large perquisites. This sum, it should be remembered, must be doubled in order to give the equivalent to-day. For the most part these dignitaries of the Church led lives of luxury and material ease; they were seldom in their dioceses, preferring the gaieties of Paris, and their moral lives were often hardly compatible with the episcopal dignity. Some even went as far as to proclaim their unbelief in the Christian religion. The curés of Nancy were obliged to petition their Bishop to suspend his balls, concerts, and evening parties during Lent, as the sight of such festivities rendered the people indisposed to fast. The lower clergy, on the contrary, lived in a state of extreme poverty, and learned to hate their gilded idle superiors. When we realise this it is easy to understand why later the clergy almost always voted with the "third estate" in the "States General."

The most blatant immorality prevailed in Court circles; husbands and wives appear seldom to have exacted or even expected any degree of mutual fidelity. When the strong hand of Louis XIV. was removed, the great Court which had grown up around him rapidly degenerated. The corruption of the Court had reached its worst point at the end of Louis XV.'s reign. In the words of Chamfort, love had become only "L'échange de deux fantaisies, et le contact de deux epidermes."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

S. A.-B.

A HIGH PRIEST OF TRUTH: THOMAS HUXLEY

By Frank Harris

I ought to write this week about the late Francis Galton, and tell of his personality, of the things he saw in this world, and of the things he did, for I knew him and his work. But the estimate of him put forth in the Press since his death is higher than mine, so I prefer to say nothing, over-estimates being less injurious than under-estimates.

I prefer to tell of Thomas Huxley, perhaps the greatest English biologist of the nineteenth century, except Darwin. I do not pretend to deep or intimate knowledge of Huxley: he belonged to the previous generation, always the hardest to know; and yet by reason of his transparent sincerity and frankness I came near enough now and again to honour and love him, and therefore may be able to picture him with sufficient fidelity.

Huxley was of medium height, broad-shouldered, spare, of energetic, quick movements; a man with a leonine face; the keen, dark eyes stared out under shaggy, over-hanging brows; the nose was broad, with wide nostrils, and fleshy, in profile cocked-pugnacious; the upper lip long, the mouth large, the shaven lips clamped together; the chin broad and bony, the jaws heavy, a strong, square face with spacious, broad forehead; an out-thrust, challenging chin—a fighter, this man, if ever there was one.

Unpretentious withal, the long hair is brushed back from the forehead without parting, the whiskers, growing grey now, are carelessly kept; the face would be better framed if they, too, were shaved away; clearly there is little thought wasted on personal appearance; the collar is comfortably turned down, the tie a narrow bow. Yet there is a certain neatness in the dress—no desire to win notice by peculiarity—a high pride here; a good twinkle, too, in the small, deeply-set eyes; a sort of valiant good-humour in the resolute lips and alert air. A well-proportioned, though irregular face, a true British, good-tempered, undefeated, fighting face; the eyes front you searching, probing, yet genial.

At first when we met he used to fence with me; a careless statement would be met with a flat contradiction; an exaggerated estimate sharply corrected; he was eager to argue at all times—too eager, indeed; for dialectic is the method of the combatant, and is distrusted by the lover of Truth, detested by the lover of Beauty. The first time we passed from fencing to thinking was in the garden of his own house. He had been arguing with Gladstone in the Nineteenth Century about the Gadarene swine, and Gladstone had displayed astonishing adroitness in the combat, turning the quarrel perpetually from things to words. Huxley was eager to explain to me how he intended in the next paper to "pin" him to a certain position. He saw at length that I was listening with strained patience.

"I forgot," he broke off courteously; "you don't care for argument, do you?"

"Not much," I admitted, "at any time, and least of all about Gadarene swine. You'll never 'pin' him as you hope. Why go into the arena to wrestle with a naked savage whose body gleams with grease?"

"A good simile," he cried, laughing, "an excellent simile; but I must wrestle with him, man; I can't run away and leave the arena, can I?"

"You could state temperately what you think of the mind which at the end of the nineteenth century still believes in pigs possessed with suicidal mania, and there leave him," I rejoined.

"No, no," he replied, "I could not treat him like that. It is an honour for any of us to cross swords with him. You must remember he is Gladstone after all; he has been twice Prime Minister, fills a far larger space in the world's eye than any of us, writers or thinkers."

"That is just the reason," I went on, "why I should like you to apply the true theory of values to him. We are hag-ridden now by windy politicians and Pressmen of all sorts. If a Huxley refused contemptuously to argue with a Gladstone it would clear the air."

But he would not hear of it; Gladstone must be "pinned;" you might have thought a bull-terrier was talking.

One can discover Huxley's combativeness in his eminently lucid, incisive style—sharp, pointed, bright as a sword—a style, like most modern styles, admirably suited for controversy, but not for literature. It is not amiable enough or graceful enough to belong to an art; it has no indwelling charm either, no rhythmical beat of soaring pinions, no eagle-vision.

English Morality

It says a good deal for the innate essential morality of English life that this eager and stubborn controversialist should have come quickly to every imaginable honour, for he was at daggers drawn with nearly every English convention and English prejudice. Born in the middle class and disdainful of privilege, he was offered a peerage; in an aristocratic society where the Archbishop of Canterbury still takes precedence of a Duke, he declared that "doubt was a beneficent demon," and that orthodox Christianity was a "varying compound of some of the best and some of the worst elements of paganism and Judaism moulded in practice by the innate character of certain peoples of the Western world," and yet he was made a Privy Councillor; in a mealy-mouthed and prudish time under the petticoat-rule of an illiterate and unintelligent Mrs. Grundy he spoke his mind plainly on all occasions, and yet was put on Royal Commission after Royal Commission, and became President of the Royal Society. Nor could it be said that he was consistent in his dogmatic opinions; he began by opposing Darwinism, then defended it, and towards the end of his life seemed to wish to limit its sphere and importance. He professed himself a sceptic at all times, and yet as a member of the London School Board insisted on the necessity of teaching the Bible not merely as fine literature, but for "the religious feeling" it fosters, which is "the essential basis of conduct." It can hardly be denied that the respect of the ruling classes in England was won by Huxley's transparent outspokenness and honesty. High character and intelligence can still come to honour in England. The defect is not in the heart but in the head of our governors, a defect not of will but of intelligence, which may, therefore, more easily be amended.

Huxley was not rich, I believe, yet he maintained a good style of living and seemed comfortably off. I mention this because he always showed a high independence and even a certain contempt for money. I wanted him to write a series of articles for the Fortnightly Review on "The Creed of Science." He admitted that the project appealed to him; admitted, too, that the price proposed was unusually high; yet he could not make up his mind to accept the offer. He was too old, he said, to undertake such a task; some younger man would do it better; and when I urged him further he excused himself by saying that it seemed a little disloyal to Mr. Knowles, of the Nineteenth Century, whom he had "known for many years," who "had always shown him great kindness. . . . Knowles is a wonderful editor, you know; he always praises one lavishly, and as we grow older and become perhaps a little doubtful of our achievements, we long to be praised extravagantly. We old fellows love praise as children love sugar." In this charming, ingenuous way Huxley sought to defend and excuse a loyalty which is all too rare; but, perhaps, because of its rarity and chivalry, all the more lovable.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

I happened to meet him once at a funeral, the funeral of a friend and a contemporary of his. The Church of England service was read over the grave, and as we all turned to go, I noticed that tears were falling down Huxley's face. I walked beside him for some time in silence; suddenly he shook his head and dashed away the tears with his hand.

"What good are tears," he cried, "or sorrow, or regret? Death comes and ends everything—the hateful executioner."

"You don't believe, then," I asked, "in Walt Whitman's 'beautiful, beneficent Death'?"

"No, I don't," he replied half savagely. "Do you? Does any one? Here we are, gifted with an intellectual being, 'thoughts that wander through eternity,' far-reaching projects, impersonal ambitions—all to be cut short and wasted. It is terrible. Just when we have learnt how to work, and might be of some use in the world, we are tossed on the dust-heap. Death is hateful and stupid—stupid! When I think of one's affections . . . " and he turned away again to hide the streaming tears.

A most soft-hearted, generous man, whose life-task it was before the dawn to fight the powers of Darkness.

Huxley's Limitations

More than once I found the limit of his vision. I remember one day telling him how I had talked with Carlyle about Darwin, and how the great Scotchman threw aside "the survival of the fittest" as a base and cowardly "evasion" of the ethical problem, and I asked Huxley for his view of the value of Darwinism in morals.

He was not very eager to give his opinion, perhaps because he was not clear on the matter himself. He saw that "law and morals" were "restraints upon the struggle for existence between men in society," and that therefore "the ethical process is in opposition to the cosmic process." But Shakespeare saw as far as that when he was thirty.

In 1892, three years before his death, Huxley wrote:—"The moral sense is a very complex affair, dependent in part upon associations of pleasure and pain, approbation and disapprobation, formed by education in early youth, but in part also on an innate sense of moral beauty and ugliness (how originated need not be discussed) which is possessed by some people in great strength, while some are totally devoid of it." Here, at any rate, in the words which I have put in italics Huxley appears to recognise an intuitional fount of moral influence—a fount which must be sought for outside experience. Yet at another time he asserted categorically that "morality commenced with society."

At his best, however, he swung to securer moorings. In 1885, when sixty years of age, he declared that "the perfect ideal of religion" was set forth by "the Hebrew prophets in the eighth century B.C., 'And what doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?'" Such a declaration on the part of Thomas Huxley required the very rarest moral courage and very considerable insight.

Huxley the Agnostic

The inventor of the word "agnostic," Huxley was a sceptic all his life, a natural product of the age. It never seemed to occur to him that the moralist or saint of our time had in his own heart the same fount of living water which the great seers and prophets of the past had drawn upon, or at least he never in his writings or in his speech, so far as I know, gave expression to the belief. His mind was constitutionally anchored on evidence, chained to certainty, or what his reason regarded as the stronger probability, and this extravagant rationality marks the defect of his intelligence. He did not see and would not admit that Jesus had brought a new spirit into life, had lifted, so to speak, the horizon of the soul. In clear words, every one of which deserves to be weighed, Huxley set forth his own shortcomings. He said: "The exact nature of the teachings and the convictions of Jesus is extremely uncertain." The emphasis laid on "exact" and "uncertain" where "exact certainty" is impossible and perhaps, therefore, undesirable, gives one Huxley's whole mind. As a boy, he tells us, he wanted to be a "mechanical engineer," as a man he spent his life, to use his own words again, in studying "the mechanical engineering of living machines." No wonder he wanted exact knowledge of "the teachings and convictions of Jesus"! And because such knowledge as we have is "extremely uncertain" he preferred to do without it. In the same spirit one would journey by night rather than by day, for the "exact" amount of light we can reckon on from the sun is "extremely uncertain." Accordingly, poor Thomas Huxley stumbled along life's road in the darkness, taking many painful bruises by the way, whereas had he used even the best light available he would have made a better journey of it.

But if no new word was to be expected from him Huxley's life and being were in themselves an encouragement and an inspiration. In a fat hypocritical and thoughtless time he was always fearless, outspoken, generous; if he could not believe, he at least would not attempt to cover himself with his baby-clothes and pretend that they fitted; he would rather go naked through the world, and so bravely, manfully, with clenched jaws and eyes staring into the darkness he struggled painfully on, and at the end faced the arch-fear with stubborn, pious courage, and passed into the valiant-true silence—a very valiant-true and worthy Englishman.

THE LEICESTER GALLERIES

The principal attraction at the Leicester Galleries, judging from the crowded state of the first room at the private view, will be Mr. George Belcher's drawings of "London Types and Characters." They possess, of course, the humour of a keen observer of life, and humour is an attribute usually absent from exhibitions—unless it be of the kind known as "unintentional." Mr. Belcher's work has become familiar to most people through the medium of the better-class illustrated papers, but we strongly advise any who have not yet made acquaintance with it to do so without delay. Many of the drawings are irresistibly laughter-provoking; many of them again contain that suggestion of pathos behind the superficial comedy which was so characteristic of Phil May's work. The meeting of a broken-down man and a bedraggled woman in a dreary road, with the greeting "What cheer, old sport!" is a triumph of facial expression—grimly humorous, hopelessly sad, extraordinarily realistic. The humour of many sketches lies as much in the lines of print which describe them as in the actual work—as with No. 34, when the "Professor" speaks to his wife: "I really think there must be something peculiar about my hat, for this morning some little boys inquired where I had purchased it, and do you know, Marion, for the life of me I couldn't remember." A touch of pale colour in some of the drawings adds delicately to their effect, but it is in the line-work and the depiction of trifling incidents in the life of the London streets that Mr. Belcher excels.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

One is hardly in the right mood, perhaps, after leaving these lively conceptions of a fertile brain, to consider critically the charming series of water-colours to which Mr. Hugh Norris has given the title "In and Around a Painter's Garden." The contrast is rather sharp; it is something like a transition from "Pickwick," or "Three Men in a Boat," to the placid pages of "Selborne." None the less, however, the beauty of these often exquisite flower-studies is apparent. Mr. Norris is at his best, we think, when he introduces a slight effect of landscape, as in "Primrose-time," a stretch of woodland studded with clumps of primroses, and in "Bluebells," where the wild hyacinths lie as patches of fallen skies in the shadow of the trees. A few actual landscapes relieve any tendency to monotony; one entitled "A Bend in the Stream," is a beautiful study in tones of brown, while "New and Old Sarum" attracts the eye by its subtle atmosphere, obtained by an intelligent use of very delicate shades of blue and green.

In the Hogarth Room Mr. James Aumonier, R.I., exhibits a series of landscapes in oil and water-colour. Sussex has claimed much of his attention, and he renders the quiet beauty of the county very faithfully. The district of Corfe is also portrayed in several paintings. "Corfe Castle" (No. 43) shows signs of hasty work, but several aspects of Corfe Castle Village are memorable bits of composition—notably "Sandy Lane" (No. 2), where the eye is led beneath an arch of foliage to the scene beyond, and the sunlight on the road is full of life. A painting of a wheatfield in full sunlight, backed by hills in shadow, entitled "Harvest at Fettercairn," is exceptionally luminous and effective. The three rooms of these cosy galleries form, in fact, an excellent exhibition of three totally different styles of artistic work.

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

It cannot be said with any truth that the City is overwhelmed with business, yet we are all sanguine. The great game now is to find out a cheap stock, buy as much as is both convenient and safe, then scream out the news. A few months ago both dealers and brokers listened with unthinking mind to stories of safe 6 per cent. investments. To-day you are sure of an eager audience if you can produce a moderate 5 per cent. lock-up. Men go on voyages of discovery. They will rummage amongst the lumber at Somerset House; they will dig up old files of the Statist; they will even go to the trouble of calculating yields. They are hungry for facts. By the way, anything is a fact in the City the moment it is printed. We are like prospectors about the truth, but honestly impressed with the value of our discoveries. A great many people know to-day for the first time that our leading Home Railways return over $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. A few have found out that Electric Light shares are cheap. One or two are impressed by the fact that the leading Brewery debenture and preference stocks are safe. There is hardly a market that has not some nugget hidden among the dirt. And we are busy washing and panning. Philanthropy does not form part of our scheme. We intend to sell our nuggets when we have found them. We expect a reasonable profit for the trouble we have taken in cleaning them up for sale. Some time back I pointed out the beauties of the Convertible Bond. To-day all the jobbers in the American Market have a few that they hope to sell. So with Brewery debentures and Electric Light shares. This game has always been played by the rich, played in silence and with profit. To-day it is being played somewhat noisily by the whole House.

Consols are even attracting attention. The Bank rate must come down, for the demand for money is not extravagant, and not even the Court of Directors and all its satellites can uphold a 4 per cent. rate for many more weeks. India requires a certain amount of gold, but she will soon be supplied from Egypt, where the gold is eating its head off. In six weeks' time the cotton campaign will come to an end, and all the Levantine speculators will know their fate; the banks will then be glad to release the balance of the gold they now hold. With a low Bank rate Consols become an attractive feature in the City landscape. They should rise to 85.

Foreigners are now worth going for. Russian Fours may see par, but there is little else worth buying. The plague in China must have a bad effect upon the whole of the East, and Japan should suffer. She is not in a position to stand any serious strain. Paris is dull and disinclined to gamble, even in her favourite Tintos.

Home Rails have been bought all the week. The dealers are short of stock, and the demand from the country investor, though small, has been steady. I have not failed to point out each week the absurd price at which our leading Home Railways stood. The rise has been general, yet to-day prices are much too low. Great Westerns, which were quite neglected at 117, are now eagerly bought at over 130. This price is moderate in view of the fact that the line has all to gain from its new line to Birmingham and has not developed its Fishguard trade. It has spent money, sowed the seed, and will soon begin to reap the harvest. London and North Western are not expensive. North Easterns have had a big rise, but they are worth the money. No one should sell any English railway stock to-day, for if the buying continues the dealers will not be able to find the stock. The market has been one of the busiest and most excited in the House.

Yankees have risen so steadily that a small reaction seems almost necessary. Wall Street has bought in view of the various decisions which are expected within a few weeks. If by any chance these decisions are unfavourable, which I do not anticipate will be the case, we shall see a smart fall. Unions will require about two hundred millions of dollars for their double tracking scheme. This money will be spread over six years. An issue of fifty millions of bonds may be made shortly. Therefore Kuhn Loeb may be relied upon to keep Unions steady. Chesapeakes are earning about 10 per cent. on their common stock and paying five. They are worth buying, for I hear well of the line. Another improving but little-known line is the Seaboard Air Line, which has increased its net revenue 76 per cent. in the year. It will be remembered that the line went into Receivership in 1908, but has improved rapidly of late. The bonds are cheap and safe. Steels might droop if the Wall Street bulls get tired. The buying of Eries and Rocks continues. These are, of course, pure gambles; but they will come off if all goes well in Wall Street. Although I personally think that a reaction is possible, I must admit that my New York friends do not say this. They speak with complete confidence, and, I may add, with a certain authority, of a good time coming in all American railroad stocks.

Rubber still keeps strong. The jobbers declare that the market was never stronger. They are remarkably bullish. But none of them can tell me of any business. This makes me think that the only bulls about are the jobbers themselves—a position that does not make for strength. In my opinion prices are a few shillings too high for the outsider.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Oil.—The Shell Company now being in funds, the Royal Dutch proposes to obtain money. The desire for so much additional capital is ominous. It would appear that these companies want the money for war. Now warfare is not profitable. Therefore I cannot advise a purchase of Shells. Mexican Eagles seem dull. They have risen rapidly since the fountain was struck, and no doubt the Pearson division has taken its profit. Spies, that well-managed Grosny Company, has been sold. Kerns do not seem expensive. Mitchell has made an arrangement whereby the company sells all its output at the market price of the day, a sounder and less speculative business than making a contract at a high price which would be broken if the price fell and would be very annoying if the price rose still higher. Californias are weak, for the contract with the Standard Oil must be running out, and the new contract will hardly be so profitable as the old one. There is still talk of this company refining its own oil. Burmahs seem high in view of the war in the East. Lobitos are a reasonable gamble. Maikop companies must be left alone till the field is on a payable basis.

Kaffirs.—The dealers appeared to think that the Goldfields scheme was good before it appeared, but the cold print frightened them. They wisely sold. The Goldfields have a very poor lot of Kaffirs. They therefore went into the Jungle, a discouraging spot out of which to make money. Now they go into partnership with Hays Hammond, who knows all one ought to know in this world. They are in Rhodesia up to their eyelids. I trust they enjoy the position. The mere fact that they want so much money is disconcerting. Personally, I cannot pretend to any enthusiasm over the way the Goldfields manage their business, and the new circulars make me sorry for the shareholders.

Rhodesians are in the doldrums. The Chartered report will be out before these lines are in print. It will be good. But will it help the market? We all hope so. Some large options exist on Chartereds, and the dealers will naturally make every effort to keep the price down. Options cut both ways; as soon as a dealer sells an option he buys half the stock. This puts the price up. From that moment he is hard at work trying to prevent the purchaser of the option from calling upon him for the balance of the stock.

Miscellaneous.—Omnibus shares look weak. I do not believe the tales I hear, and I am told a new one each day. Electric Light shares must be bought. The dealers are getting nervous, and a little buying should have a very great effect. As I have said before, it is a safe thing to buy Brewery debentures or preference shares in Bass, James Eadie, Mitchells and Butler, Peter Walker, Georges Bristol, Worthingtons, but be careful not to get landed in any of the big and over-capitalised London companies.

Raymond Radclyffe.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE COMING PARLIAMENT BILL

To the Editor of The Academy

Sir,—There is no doubt that the only possible attitude for the Conservative party to adopt with regard to the coming Parliament Bill is a flat non possumus, unless that Bill be introduced and dealt with in a constitutional fashion.

Moreover, the grounds of that opposition are easy to be set forth, if there be any accuracy in the fundamental principles laid down by lawyers, or any honourable consistency with regard to principles which have been acknowledged and accepted by both Houses of Parliament.

In the first place, the action of the Government with regard to finance since 1860 has been a breach of an agreement made between the two Houses rather more than two hundred years. For there has been no power to create or develop privileges, except by Act of Parliament, since the year 1705. At a Conference then held between the two Houses, dealing with the question of appeal, the Lords communicated to the Commons a resolution that "neither House of Parliament had power, by any vote or declaration, to create themselves any new privilege that is not warranted by the known laws and customs of Parliament." It is noteworthy that in the course of this Conference on Tuesday, March 13th, 1704-5, the Peers made use of the following argument: "That every part of the Body politick, as well as the body natural, ought to be kept within due bounds. An Excess in any Member will weaken the whole." The terms in which the Commons' assent was conveyed, on that same date, were clear but grudging. "The First (resolution, quoted above) is not to be excepted against; only is an Insinuation, as if the Commons had practised the contrary, which they are not conscious of." (See Journal of House of Commons, Vol. XIV., under dates February 28th and March 13th, 1704-5.)

But the same is not true to-day. They did so consciously in the Palmerston Resolutions after the rejection of the Paper Duties' Repeal Bill; they persisted in doing so in the sessional resolution declaring the interference of Peers in elections to be a breach of their privileges, a resolution which has only just been consigned to the limbo of unavailing aggressive Acts; and they did so of malice prepense and deliberately in the passing of the Veto Resolutions and the introduction of the Parliament Bill during the last Parliament. It is perfectly clear that, even with regard to finance, the Commons are hopelessly in the wrong, for the Peers have never, as a body, admitted the claim of the Commons which prevents the amendment of a Finance Bill, the supporters of the Commons' view resting their case solely upon the resolutions of that House.

Our Constitution not being written, but having been gradually evolved, and the relations between the two Houses settled after controversy, the judicial functions of the "High Court of Parliament" have, "by the known law and custom of Parliament," been left in the hands of the House of Lords, and are discharged by eminent judges and lawyers appointed ad hoc. With regard to finance there is the existing controversy, and each side makes certain claims, on which the Commons have passed certain resolutions in breach of the agreement already quoted. The matter, therefore, can only be settled either by agreement after a Conference or by legislation.

To deal with the latter course first. According to "Stephen's Commentaries" (Fifteenth Edition, Vol. II., p. 452). "All Bills that may in their consequences affect the rights of the peerage are, by the custom of Parliament, to have their first rise and beginning in the House of Peers, and they are to suffer no changes or amendments in the House of Commons, though the latter House has the power of rejecting them altogether." Thus the House of Commons has erred in a twofold direction. It has broken the agreement of March 13th, 1704-5, and has introduced into the Commons, contrary to "the known law and custom of Parliament," the Parliament Bill, commonly known as the Veto Bill. It is perfectly clear, from the foregoing facts, that no Bill for diminishing the powers and privileges of the Peers can have its source anywhere but in that House, and that the House of Lords cannot be reformed except on the lines which they themselves formulate.

To this it may be replied that the Government recognised that fact by introducing the Parliament Bill into the Upper House during the closing weeks of last session—that in itself being contrary to Parliamentary usage, seeing that the measure was technically before the Lower House. But there is this to be remembered. Successive Governments, by means of successive Closure Bills, have effectually choked the freedom of debate in the Lower House; and when the Parliament Bill was introduced into the Upper House the Earl of Crewe, speaking as the mouthpiece of the Cabinet, tried to override the Standing Orders and Rules of Procedure. Even if the Government Bill be introduced first, as it should be, into the House of Lords, there must be absolute freedom of discussion, the Peers must retain their right of amendment; and the Commons can only accept or reject the measure finally sent down to them.

That being the case, we come once more to a deadlock. The extreme Radicals, the Socialists, and the Nationalists cry out for a single Chamber; the more moderate Radicals say they desire two-Chamber Government, but—though they "have all the time there is"—say that they have not time at present to devise a reform of the Upper House. The Conservatives say—what? If their name means anything they are supposed to conserve the Constitution, while making such changes as are called for by a changed environment. But, if they are to conserve and to reform, they must play the game according to the existing rules—that is, according to "the known law and custom of Parliament." Dare the leaders of the party state the facts plainly in both Houses, claim that the procedure outlined above shall be followed, or, failing the adoption of this method, that a Conference of the two Houses shall be held? Were this policy adopted, if the Prime Minister refused, he would be forced to ask for the creation of his shoddy Peers at once, and the tactical advantage would be all on the side of the Unionists.—Yours, &c., E. HANNAN.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

35, Mecklenburg Square, W.C.

A TRIO: THEMISTOCLES, POMPEY, MAHAN

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I do not know at all that you will print this, but I do know that, as it speaks plain, nobody else will. The Press of England has grown mumchance, and anything that ought to be said is on that account immediately suppressed.

I only want to say that Sea-Power in the old world was by long-headed men known to be what gave supremacy to the man holding it. It was a remark of Cicero's, that Pompey thought with Themistocles, that command of the sea gave supremacy also on land.

Admiral Mahan, a quite competent authority, has been for years—long years—teaching two numbskull democracies (those of England and America) that this is so. It is lost upon them. But Germany has learnt it. She intends to be quite able to seize the Sea-Power any minute she thinks fit to do so. She will spend a hundred millions by taxation or by loan to get the needful cash. But no matter how, she means to be capable at the right minute to seize the sea, just as Bismarck was ready to snatch the land from France when the "stroke of Knock" was due.

It will be a short arbitrament, and England will lose the sea as la belle France the land. The choice is "prepare or perish!"

C. A. WARD.

Chalecot, Walthamstow.

[We are pleased to print this letter without identifying ourselves with it in its entirety.—ED.]

"WHO" OR "WHOM"?

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Printers are often in difficulties with these words, and seem unable to grasp the difference between "who I thought would go" and "whom I expected to go." A sentence in Mr. Belloc's article last week brings up the difficulty in a very specious form. He is made to say that Antwerp "would be of the utmost value to whomever [sic] might be its Sovereign." Surely this is wrong. The relative pronoun here must be connected with the words that follow, not with those which precede. What is governed by "to" is not the pronoun, but the entire clause, "whoever might be its Sovereign." As printed, the sentence seems to me no more grammatical than the one which I append as my signature.

"THEM'S MY SENTIMENTS."

[We prefer Mr. Belloc's idea of grammar.—ED.]

BENTLEY'S STANDARD NOVELS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Some of the introductions to "Bentley's Standard Novels" were written by some one who signed the initials of "O. C." The only dictionaries of initials and pseudonyms that I have been able to consult throw no light on the authorship of them. Perhaps you, or some of your readers, may know the name of the author, and if you can assist me to learn it you will greatly oblige.—Sincerely yours,

DANIEL EDWARDS KENNEDY.

Chestnut Hill, Mass., U.S.A., January 28, 1911.

BOOKS RECEIVED

FICTION

"Half a Truth." By "Rita." Hutchinson and Co. 6s.
The Bourgeois Queen of Paris. By Janet M. Clark. Greening and Co. 6s.
When Woman Loves. By Rathmell Wilson. Greening and Co. 6s.
The Lass with the Delicate Air. By A. R. Goring-Thomas. John Lane. 6s.
The Broad Highway: a Romance of Kent. By Jeffery Farnol. Sampson Low and Co. 6s.
Bravest of All, and other Tales. By Mabel Mackness. Illustrated. Blackie and Son. 9d.
A Fair House. By Hugh de Sélincourt. John Lane. 6s.
The Gold-Makers. By N. P. McCoy. F. V. White and Co. 6s.
The Day After To-morrow. By Cora Minnett. F. V. White and Co. 6s.
Rosanne. By Algernon Gissing. F. V. White and Co. 6s.
Passers-By. By Anthony Partridge. Ward, Lock and Co. 6s.
Fedora of the Halls. By Arthur Applin. F. V. White and Co. 6s.
Love or Lucre. By Edith C. Gerrard. F. V. White and Co. 6s.
A Queen's Error. By Captain Henry Curties. F. V. White and Co. 6s.
Splendid Zipporah. By Maud Stepney Rawson. Methuen and Co. 6s.
A Woman on the Threshold. By Maude Little. Chatto and Windus. 6s.
Zoë the Dancer. By Ida Wild. John Lane. 6s.
High Water Mark. By Fergus Hume. F. V. White and Co. 6s.
Lucky. By Cora Minnett and Pellew Hawker. Illustrated by A. MacNeill-Barbour. F. V. White and Co. 6s.
Wilson's. By Desmond Coke. Chapman and Hall. 6s.
John Westacott. By James Barker. Popular Edition. Chapman and Hall. 2s. net.
Where Truth Lies: A Study in the Improbable. By O. Madox Hueffer (Jane Wardle). Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.
The Lion's Skin. By Rafael Sabatini. Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.
Flamsted Quarries. By Mary E. Waller. Andrew Melrose. 6s.
A Gentleman of the Road. By Horace Bleackley. John Lane. 6s.
The Pearl Necklace. By Arthur Applin. Ward, Lock and Co. 6s.
A Russian Judas. By Fred. Whishaw. C. H. White. 6s.
The Ring of Ug, and Other Weird Tales. By E. Elliot Stock. John Ouseley. 2s. 6d.
The Coil of Carne. By John Oxenham. Methuen and Co. 6s.
The Camera Fiend. By E. W. Hornung. Illustrated. T. Fisher Unwin. 6s.
Account Rendered. By E. F. Benson. William Heinemann. 6s.

MISCELLANEOUS

Modern Mysticism, and other Essays. By Francis Grierson. Constable and Co. 2s. 6d. net.
Common Sense in Politics. By Job E. Hedges. Moffat, Yard and Co., New York, $1.25 net.
Mr. Chamberlain's Speeches, 1903. Alexander Moring. 1s. net.
More Philosophical Meditations. Intended as a Sequel to "Catholicism on a Philosophical Basis." By Various Authors. Compiled by an Old Etonian. Revised by Dr. Leonard Arthur Parry. Volume I. Swan Sonnenschein and Co. 2s. 6d. net.
The Reform of the House of Lords: Three Speeches delivered in that House on June 20th, 1884; March 19th, 1888; and March 14th, 1910. By Lord Rosebery. A. L. Humphreys. 1s. net.
A Concise Guide to the Town and University of Cambridge. In an Introduction and Four Walks. By John Willis Clark, M.A. Bowes and Bowes, Cambridge. 1s. net.
The Evolution of Surgery. By William Thorburn, F.R.C.S. University Press, Manchester. 6d. net.
A Practical Guide to Form IV., and Other Forms. By J. H Whitworth. Sherratt and Hughes. 1s. net.
Junior Labour Exchanges. By G. W. Knowles, M.A., B.Sc. Sherratt and Hughes. 6d. net.
The Everyday Pudding Book: A Tasty Recipe for Every Day in the Year. By F. K. Stanley Paul and Co. 1s. net.
Five Hundred Miles in Somerset. By B. Parker Willcox. J. Baker and Son, Clifton. 1s. net.
I Wonder: Essays for the Young People. By the Writer of "Confessio Medici." Macmillan and Co. 3s. 6d. net.
Guide to Palestine and Syria. With Maps. Fifth Edition Macmillan and Co. 5s. net.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

Mid-Channel. A Play in Four Acts. By Arthur Pinero. William Heinemann. 1s. 6d.
Trade Unions and the Law. By Walter V. Osborne and Mark H. Judge. P. S. King and Son. 6d. net.
The Study of Celtic Literature. By Matthew Arnold. Authorised Edition. With Introduction, Notes, and Appendix by Alfred Nutt. David Nutt. 3s. 6d. net.
England's Foundation: Agriculture and the State. By J. Saxon Mills. With a Preface by the Earl of Denbigh. P. S. King and Co. 1s. net.
Siberia: a Record of Travel, Climbing, and Exploration. By Samuel Turner, F.R.G.S. With an Introduction by Baron Heyking. Illustrated. T. Fisher Unwin. 5s.
An Adventure. The Extraordinary Experiences of Two Ladies who Visited Versailles in 1901 and 1902. Macmillan and Co. 3s. 6d. net.
An Imperial-Democratic Policy. By Francis Francis. Constable and Co. 1s. 6d. net.
The New Spirit in Egypt. By H. Hamilton Fyfe. Wm. Blackwood and Sons. 5s. net.
A Holiday with a Hegelian. By Francis Sedlák. A. C. Fifield. 3s. 6d. net.
Beowulf and the Finnsburg Fragment. A Translation into Modern English Prose by J. R. Clark Hall, M.A., Ph.D. Illustrated. Swan Sonnenschein and Co. 7s. 6d. net.
Land Problems and National Welfare. By Christopher Turnor. With an Introduction by the Right Hon. Viscount Milner, G.C.B., G.C.M.G. John Lane. 7s. 6d. net.
An Account. By Erica Cotterill. W. T. Pike and Co.
The Encyclopædia of Sport and Games. Edited by the Earl of Suffolk and Berkshire. New and enlarged edition. Vol. II. Crocodile Shooting—Hound Breeding. Illustrated. Wm. Heinemann. 10s. 6d. net.
The Adolescent. By J. W. Slaughter. With an Introduction by J. J. Findlay. Swan Sonnenschein and Co. 2s. 6d.
Modern Tendencies and Old Standards in Musical Art. By J. Alfred Johnstone. Wm. Reeves. 6s.
How to Write Music in Shorthand. By Professor Taylor. William Reeves. 6d.
The Key to the Brontë Works. By John Malham-Dembleby. Walter Scott Publishing Co. 6s.
Getting On: The Confessions of a Publisher. By J. A. Thayer. T. Werner Laurie.
Across the Roof of the World: A Record of Sport and Travel through Kashmir, Gilgit, Hunza, The Pamirs, Chinese Turkestan, Mongolia, and Siberia. By Lieut. P. T. Etherton, F.R.G.S. Illustrated. Constable and Co. 16s. net.
Twelve Types: A Book of Essays. By G. K. Chesterton. Arthur L. Humphreys. 1s. net.
Scrambles in Storm and Sunshine among the Swiss and English Alps. By E. Elliot Stock. Illustrated. John Ouseley. 6s. net.
Contemporary Social Problems: A Course of Lectures delivered at the University of Padua. By Achille Loria. Translated from the Italian by J. L. Garner. Swan Sonnenschein and Co. 2s. 6d.
A Dictionary of Oriental Quotations (Arabic and Persian). By Claud Field, M.A. Swan Sonnenschein and Co. 7s. 6d.
The New Order: Social Revolution by Free Groups. By W. Allen Macdonald and Helen M. Macdonald. Questall Press. 3d. net.
A History of British Mammals. By G. E. H. Barrett-Hamilton, B.A. Illustrated by E. A. Wilson, B.A. Part IV. Gurney and Jackson. 2s. 6d. net.

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND MEMOIRS

An Account of My Life. By Her Highness Nawáb Sultan Jahán Begam, G.C.S.I., G.C.I.E., Ruler of Bhopál. Translated by C. H. Payne, M.A. Vol. I. Illustrated. John Murray.
Annals of a Yorkshire House, from the Papers of a Macaroni and his Kindred. By A. M. W. Stirling. Two Vols. Illustrated. John Lane. 32s. net.
Les Maîtres de l'Art—Le Bernin. By Marcel Reymond. Illustrated. Plon-Nourrit and Co., Paris. 3f. 50c.
The Picture-Printer of the Nineteenth Century: George Baxter, 1804-1867. By C. T. Courtney Lewis. Illustrated. Sampson Low and Co. 21s. net.
France under the Republic. By Jean Charlemagne Bracq, Litt.D. T. Werner Laurie. 7s. 6d. net.
What America is Doing: Letters from the New World. By Annette M. B. Meakin. Wm. Blackwood and Sons. 10s. 6d. net.
Leaves from My Diary, 1894-1896. By the Right Rev. Abbot Gasquet, O.S.B. Burns and Oates. 2s. 6d. net.

TWO INTERESTING BOOKS BY NEW AUTHORS.

VELDSINGERS' VERSE.

WITH A FOREWORD BY
OLIVE SCHREINER.
Square fcap. 8vo., 2s. 6d. net.

The Verses of a small South African Society of Verse Lovers. The Poems are noteworthy, especially when it is remembered that the whole white population of the Cape, Transvaal, Free State, and Natal is not larger than that of some North Country towns in England.

"This little book of verses, written by fourteen members of the Veldsingers' Club (which meets at Johannesburg), would have been a thing of joy to Mr. Swinburne."—MORNING POST.

"Some South African poets have banded themselves together into the Veldsingers' Club, and their first official publication contains work by fourteen writers, of whom Mrs. Allhusen is the best known to English readers. An individual note is sounded by Miss Alice M. Alder, and two writers who use the pseudonyms 'Nome' and 'Syned' are remarkable for the vigour of their work, and for the successful way in which they handle local colour."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

MIDNIGHT HOUSE & OTHER TALES.

By W. F. HARVEY.
Globe 8vo., 2s. 6d. net.

"Messrs. Dent are to be congratulated in introducing a new story-teller of much merit . . . whose talent is as unusual as his style is terse. The variety of scenes and situations in 'Midnight House and other Tales' testifies to the author's having a fertile and lively mind, and his outlook is healthily unconventional and tinged with a pleasing irony."—NATION.

J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD.,
ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

The International Law and Custom of Ancient Greece and Rome By Coleman Phillipson, M.A., LL.D. 2 Vols. Macmillan and Co. 21s. net.
The American Colonies, 1583-1763. (The English People Overseas. Vol. I.) By A. Wyatt Tilby. Second Edition, revised. Constable and Co. 4s. 6d. net.
In the Land of the Pharaohs: A Short History of Egypt from the Fall of Ismail to the Assassination of Boutros Pasha. By Duse Mohamed. Illustrated. Stanley Paul and Co. 10s. 6d. net.
American Commercial Legislation before 1789. By Albert A. Giesecke, Ph.D. D. Appleton and Co. $1.50.
Études d'Histoire et d'Art. By E. Bertaux. Illustrated. Hachette and Co. 3fr. 50c.
The Story of the Carol. By Edmondstoune Duncan. Illustrated. Walter Scott Publishing Co. 3s. 6d. net.
Conversations with Napoleon at St. Helena. By Henry Meynell (H.M.S. Newcastle). With Portrait. Arthur L. Humphreys. 2s. 6d. net.
The Sources of the British Chronicle History in Spenser's "Faerie Queene." (Bryn Mawr College Monograph Series, Vol. VII.) By Carrie A. Harper. Bryn Mawr College, Penn., U.S.A. $1.

THEOLOGY

Thoughts on Ultimate Problems: Being a Series of Short Studies on Theological and Metaphysical Subjects (Chiefly on Specially Controverted Points). By F. W. Frankland. Fourth and Enlarged Edition. David Nutt. 1s. 6d. net.

VERSE

The Way of the Soul: a Legend in Line and Verse. By Wm. T. Horton. Wm. Rider & Son. 6s. net.
Gay Gods and Merry Mortals: Some Excursions in Verse. By Robert J. Shores. Broadway Publishing Co., New York.
Selections from Ancient Irish Poetry. Translated by Karno Meyer. Constable and Co. 3s. 6d. net.
Songs of Myself. By Thomas Macdonagh. Hodges, Figgis, and Co., Dublin. 1s. net.
Vermont. By Wendell Phillips Stafford, Litt.D. Elm Tree Press, Woodstock, Vermont, U.S.A.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

EDUCATIONAL

The Story of England: A History for Junior Forms. Part II., from 1272 to 1603. By W. S. Robinson, M.A. Illustrated, Rivingtons. 2s.

Junior British History Notes. Part IV., 1783-1901. By William Edwards, M.A. Rivingtons. 2s. net.

Elementary Algebra Exercises. Book II., with Answers. By A. E. Layng, M.A. Blackie and Son. 2s.

PERIODICALS

The Newspaper Press Directory, 1911; The American Historical Review; Revue Bleue; Publishers' Circular; Bookseller; L'Œuvre; All the World; M.A.B.; London University Gazette; Cambridge University Reporter; Scotia; Smith's Magazine; Top Notch; Manchester Quarterly; The Selborne Magazine.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, LTD.,

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET, W.C.

Only } 48, Queen Victoria Street, E.C.
Branches } 132, Kensington High Street, W.

NEW BOOKS LESS THAN HALF-PRICE.

		Offered at		Published at
CRISPI, FRANCESCO,	Italian Insurgent	s. 1	d. 9	s. 7	d. 6
GRAFTON, THIRD DUKE, AUTO. AND LETTERS		3	6	18	0
HARVARD, JOHN, AND HIS TIMES		3	3	7	6 net.
STEPHEN, SIR JAMES FITZJAMES, LIFE by his brother Leslie Stephen		5	0	16	0
THIEBAULT, BARON, MEMOIRS OF, 2 Vols. trans.		7	6	28	0
YOUNG, ARTHUR, AUTO. OF, Ed. M. Betham Edwards		4	9	12	6

Full List Free on Application.

BOOKS, Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold, and Exchanged. Monthly Catalogues Free. Libraries purchased, catalogued, arranged, or valued.—Thomas Thorp, 93, St. Martin's Lane, W.C. (and at Reading).

HOW TO WRITE FOR THE PRESS OR TO BECOME AN AUTHOR.

Interesting and useful Booklet free.

"H," LITERARY CORRESPONDENCE COLLEGE, 9, Arundel Street, W.C.

CONSULT

The Gresham

On all Matters of

LIFE, FIRE & ACCIDENT INSURANCE.

Many Special Features.

Write for Prospectus; it will pay you.

Liberal Terms to recognised Brokers and Agents.

HEAD OFFICES:

ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE, POULTRY, LONDON, E.C.

JAMES H. SCOTT, General Manager.

Free Insurance Coupon to readers of "The Academy." (Not to be detached.)

The Gresham Fire and Accident Insurance Society, Limited,

of

ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE, POULTRY, LONDON, E.C.,

will pay

£100 (One hundred pounds) to the legal personal representative of the bonâ fide holder of this Coupon, if he or she be killed solely and directly by an accident within the United Kingdom to any Railway Company's Train, a Tramcar, Omnibus, Cab, or other Licensed Vehicle plying for public hire, in which the holder is travelling as an ordinary ticket-bearing or fare-paying passenger, subject always to the following special conditions which are to be taken as incorporated in the contract:—

(a) That death result within thirty days after the accident (b) that notice thereof be given within seven days to the Society at its Head Office in London (c) that such reasonable evidence of the cause of death be given as the Society may require (d) that the holder shall have written in ink prior to the accident his or her usual signature in the space provided therefor (e) that the Society shall not be liable to any one person in respect of more than one Coupon in this or any other publication (f) that this insurance shall not be available to persons under twelve or over seventy years of age, and shall hold good for seven days from 12 o'clock noon of the day of issue.

Signature of Holder .....

Address .....

GERMAN wishes to correspond with ENGLISHMAN, to exchange German for English. Correction reciprocal. Write to Mr. G. Wolfram, Weingarten 3, Quedlinburg (Germany).

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references. — Address Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

"The Book Monthly is now enlarged and makes an exceedingly pleasant and readable publication."—CLAUDIUS CLEAR, in the British Weekly.

. . THE . .

BOOK MONTHLY.

You know the "Book Monthly" by name—you very often see it quoted in the papers. It is a brightly written, brightly illustrated magazine about the books and the literary affairs of the day. But as yet you have not taken it in! Well, you are missing something, and you should at once arrange to get it regularly. It is an instructing, entertaining "guide, philosopher and friend" for the reader near the centre of things or far away. Being now seven years old, and so grown up, it has just been enlarged, and made more popular and practical in contents and style. Read it and you will know what to read; what's what, and who's who in the book world.

THE BOOK MONTHLY is published on the 1st of each month, by Simpkin, Marshall & Co., Ltd., Stationers' Hall Court, London. It costs Sixpence, and it can be ordered from any Bookseller, Bookstall, or Newsagent. The Publishers will send it, post free, for a year, inland or abroad, on receipt of eight shillings. You can have a copy of the current number posted to you by forwarding 6d., or a specimen back number for nothing.

Edward Whistler,

II, Strand, Charing Cross, London.

DIAMOND MERCHANT :: :: JEWELLER & SILVERSMITH.

A large stock of New and Second-hand Diamond and Gem Jewellery, Antique and Modern Silver Plate, always on hand, at bargain prices, for cash.

Fine Pearls, Emeralds, Diamonds, and early specimens of Antique Silver Plate wanted. High Prices given in Cash. Full Value allowed in Exchange.

Valuations made for Probate and other purposes.

GUN DEPARTMENT.

HAMMERLESS SECOND-HAND GUNS,

British Made, from £6 10s.

Nitro Proof. The Cheapest Gun in the Market combined with Quality.

ALSO

HAMMERLESS EJECTORS,

By Best London Makers, at Greatly Reduced Prices.

CORDITE RIFLES, ·400, ·500, ·600 Bores.

Catalogue and Price List on Application Gratis.

Telephone No.: 2033 GERRARD.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE & BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC

OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO AND . . THROUGH CANADA. . .

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service vid Vancouver.

For further particulars, apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,

62-65, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON, E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street, Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE

TO

SOUTH and EAST AFRICA.

WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.

Viâ the SUEZ CANAL.

Calling at MARSEILLES and NAPLES.

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.

(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—

DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.

Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE PLEASURE CRUISES

LIVERPOOL

to the

MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC

by the

"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"

Saxonia Leaves Liverpool 9 Feb., 1911.
Carpathia " " 2 Mch., 1911.

Ports of Call . . .

CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS, MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA, ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME, PALERMO, NAPLES.

For full particulars apply—

THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

George Odell,

31, KING STREET, ST. JAMES', LONDON, S.W.

Ophthalmic and Mathematical Optician

Inventor of the Porter-Odell Patent Lens.

SPECTACLES AND EYEGLASSES

made to the individual facial measurements, thereby assuring accuracy and comfort. To enable the fitting of the innumerable variety of faces my different patterns have already run into the hundreds.

LORGNETTES in Gold, Metal and Tortoiseshell.

BAROMETERS. THERMOMETERS.
FIELD AND OPERA GLASSES.

The ODELL LUMEX PRISM BINOCULAR
pronounced by Naval and Military Officers to be the best (see testimonials).

P & O Passenger Services.

EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA, JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports

(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)

Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises

Throughout the Year, according to Season.

AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE, NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.

Programme on Application.

For Passage, Freight and all information apply—

PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,

122 Leadenhall Street, E.C., or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours

R.M.S.P.

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY.

(Royal Charter dated 1839.)

Fortnightly Sailings from Southampton to—

ARGENTINA & BRAZIL

via SPAIN & PORTUGAL.

WEST INDIES, BRITISH GUIANA, SPANISH MAIN, CENTRAL AMERICA, NEW YORK.

From LONDON to—

MOROCCO & CANARY ISLANDS,

EGYPT, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA & JAPAN.
(By Shire Line.)

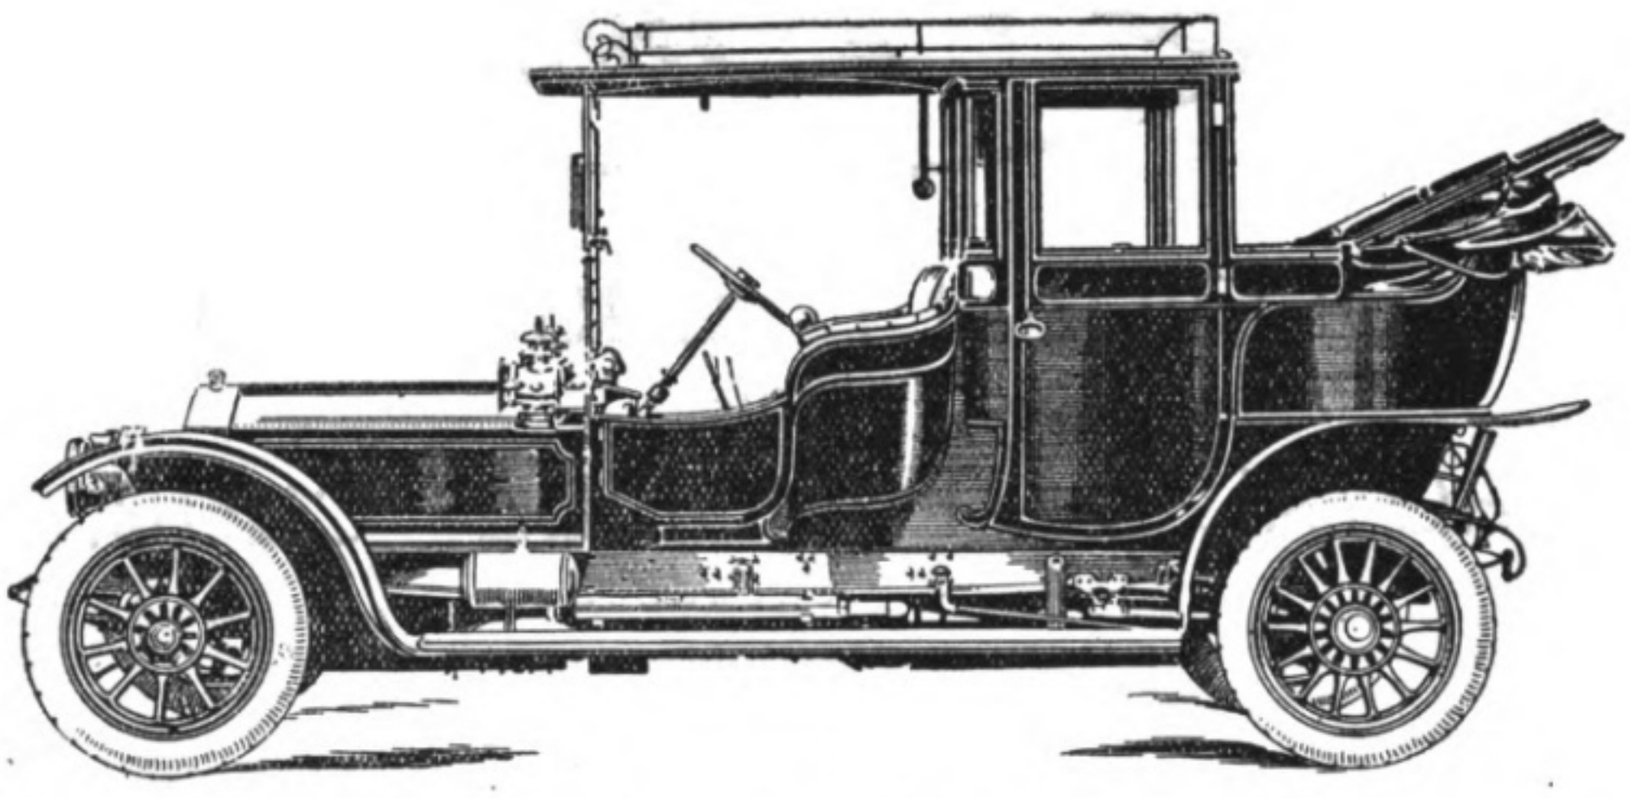
For further particulars apply to

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY

18, Moorgate Street, E.C., & 32, Cockspur Street, S.W.

Printed and Published for the Proprietor by ODHAMS LTD., 25, Floral Street, Covent Garden, and 167, Long Acre, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google



Original from PENN STATE

STATE COLLEGE, PA.
THE PA. STATE COLLEGE,
THE CARNEGIE LIBRARY,

THE ACADEMY
AND LITERATURE

No. 2025 [Registered as a Newspaper.] FEBRUARY 25, 1911 PRICE THREEPENCE

ROLLS-ROYCE

"That incomparable Car which stands alone as a representative of all that is best in British design."—Motor World, Jan. 26th, 1911.

ROLLS-ROYCE, LIMITED, 14 and 15, Conduit Street, London, W.

Telegrams: "Rolhead, London." Telephones: Gerrard 1654, 1655, and 1656.

And at PARIS: 56, Avenue Hoche.

Telegrams: "Rollsroyce, Paris."

The following firms who purchase direct from us have the sole selling rights of our cars in their respective districts:—LEICESTERSHIRE, DERBYSHIRE, NOTTINGHAMSHIRE, LINCOLNSHIRE, WARWICKSHIRE, NORTHAMPTONSHIRE, and RUTLANDSHIRE: The Midland Counties Motor Garage Co., Ltd., Granby St., Leicester; SCOTLAND: L. C. Seligmann and Co., 96, Renfrew St., Glasgow; MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT, including East Lancashire (as far north as a line drawn on the map due east from Cockerham) and East Cheshire: Joseph Cockshoot and Co., Ltd., New Bridge Street, Manchester; YORKSHIRE: A. B. Wardman and Sons, Ltd., Cambridge St., Harrogate; LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT, including West Lancashire (as far north as Cockerham), West Cheshire, and North Wales: W. Watson and Co., 56, Renshaw St., Liverpool: NORTHUMBERLAND, DURHAM, CUMBERLAND, WESTMORLAND, and NORTH LANCASHIRE: Sir Wm. Angus Sanderson and Co., St. Thomas' Street, Newcastle-on-Tyne; IRELAND: J. B. Ferguson, Ltd., Chichester St., Belfast. The following firms are appointed as Retailers of Rolls-Royce cars. LONDON: Messrs. Barker and Co. (Coachbuilders), Ltd., 66-68, South Audley St., W.; Messrs. Charles Jarrott, Ltd., 35, Sackville Street, W.; WESTERN AUSTRALIA: The Perth Motor House, 888, Hay Street, Perth, W.A.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

LONDON to EDINBURGH

ON

TOP GEAR

ALSO

NON-STOP ENGINE RUN

RECENTLY ACCOMPLISHED BY THE

GEAR - BOX - LESS

Sheffield Simplex

OFFICIALLY OBSERVED

BY THE

ROYAL AUTOMOBILE CLUB.

Catalogues post-free on application to Dept. "L."

The SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX MOTOR WORKS, Ltd.

TINSLEY, SHEFFIELD.

London Office: c/o MULLINERS, 132-135, LONG ACRE, W.C.

THE "EMPIRE ILLUSTRATED."

THE TARIFF REFORM MONTHLY.

40 pages. Profusely Illustrated.

Interesting to every Unionist and Imperialist and convincing to Liberals and Little Englanders.

PRICE THREEPENCE.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

CONTENTS

	Page
Review of the Week	219
Apotheosis	220
Literary Journalism?	220
The Lords and the Crown —Part I.	220
Reviews:—
The Chief Aim in Education	222
Mr. Noyes' Poems	223
East-Bourne—and "The Times"	224
An Ancient Saga	225
South African Ethnography	226
The Philosophy of History	227
Essays in Biography	228
Shorter Reviews	228
Fiction	229
Music	231
Unionist Organisation	232
France under Louis Seize—II.	234
India: A Series—VI.	235
The Theatre	236
A Strong Man Futile	238
Time-worn Riddles	239
Royal Society of Arts	240
Foreign Affairs	241
In the Temple of Mammon	242
Correspondence	243
Books Received	246

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

THE ACADEMY is published by MESSRS. ODHAMS, LIMITED' 67, Long Acre, London, W.C., to whom all letters with reference to publication must be addressed.

Applications referring to Advertisements may be addressed to MESSRS. ODHAMS, as above.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

THE ACADEMY is now obtainable at Messrs. W. H. Smith & Sons, Messrs. Wyman's, and Messrs. Willing's bookstalls and shops.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

THE article on Conservative Organisation which appears in another column is worthy of careful attention, and it will, we hope, provoke criticism. Sir Charles Walpole, as Chairman for several years of the Chertsey Conservative Association, a seat which was regained at the General Election of January, 1910, has had much experience of organisation. As Deputy-Chairman of the Surrey Sessions, Sir Charles is well qualified to suggest changes in the law. It is not in the interest of the State that either party should be inadequately represented merely by reason of defective organisation, and, therefore, the subject is one which, we think, will be discussed from various points of view by our readers.

The unpleasant incident which led to the unusual procedure of relieving Mr. Ginnell, the Nationalist Member of Parliament for North Westmeath, of his Parliamentary duties for the space of a week has shown once more how keen the House is as a whole to resent any imputation upon the honour of the Speaker. Mr. Wedgwood, Liberal Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme, who wrote the letter accusing the Speaker of partiality, took the sensible and creditable course of apologising unreservedly; Mr. Ginnell, who published the letter in an Irish paper, refused to retract a word, and spoke in a manner which emphasised the baseless charge. To his speech the House listened, as Mr. Asquith said, "with patience, but also with disappointment;" Mr. A. Chamberlain supported Mr. Asquith's remarks of grave censure thoroughly; Mr. Redmond commented upon the "courtesy, fairness, justice, and impartiality" which he and his colleagues had always received from the hands of the Speaker; other Members on both sides paid tribute to the Chair. By a large majority the motion was carried that the offender's punishment should be suspension from the service of the House for a week—a mild punishment, considering the aggravated nature of the offence, but, it is to be hoped, an effective lesson. On such occasions the House is at its best, and the whole affair was carried out in a temperate and sane spirit which we could wish was more frequently applied to matters of party debate.

Exiles from civilisation, those who are engaged in guarding our commerce or keeping watch over English interests in far corners of the world, will smile grimly when they read the discussion on London's dulness which is proceeding, at quite a Silly Season pace, in one of the papers. Of course, as with any subject where all depends upon the point of view, argument on such a theme may continue ad infinitum—or until everybody is tired. To the man who has been accustomed to spend his nights going the rounds of the ever-open Berlin cafés, London, with its curious regulations as to hours when human beings shall eat and drink in exchange for money, may well seem dull; and to the woman who is used to the inspiriting vivacity of Paris our more stolid Metropolis may appear slightly triste. The enthusiast who loves to haunt the forests of Africa in search of big game, or the man who enjoys the hustling methods of New York, may find himself soon out of patience with London; but the plain fact is that we all become bored with London sometimes. In the depth of winter, in the height of summer, it is liable to "get on our nerves;" it is so big, so oppressive in its dreariness or in its heat. For a little while—maybe only a week or two, or even a week-end—we leave it behind; but that is where London scores. No other city calls us back so insistently; to no other city do we return with such delight. The roaring streets which we so detested welcome us; we take a long breath of exhilaration and plunge once more into the vortex, vowing that never will we dwell far away from the sound of this tremendous voice. "London dull?" we exclaim. "Lives there a man with soul so dead" as to maintain such a heresy?

Dr. Henri Fauvel, a well-known Normandy poet in France, and formerly a leading medical practitioner in Havre, has just brought out a translation of "Cymbeline" in rhymed verse for the French stage, published by the Libraire Paul Rosier at three francs. Messieurs Amédé Coignet and Georges Ackain supply the Preface, in which they refer to Doctor Henri Fauvel as "the first of our poets after Rostand," and state that in thus adapting "Cymbeline" for the French stage the former is carrying out the original project of M. Albert Glatigny, the deceased poet of Lillebonne. Dr. Fauvel dedicates this drama in its French dress to Mr. Algernon Warren, a brother of Dr. T. H. Warren, President of Magdalen College, Oxford. As far back as 1892 Mr. Algernon Warren was instrumental in drawing attention to a French translation of Tennyson's "Maud," by Dr. Fauvel, who is a profound lover of English literature, and specially admires Shakespeare, Shelley, and Tennyson. According to the Preface, this "Cymbeline" rendering will in all likelihood be staged shortly.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

APOTHEOSIS

Up from the weltering plain the mountain way
  He toiled, what time the icy Vestal lured
  And made him fain of suffering ;—yea, endured
His heart's impatience and the crags' delay
Till, dead to swarmers of the lower clay,
  He stood upon the dizzy peak, immured
  In vasty silence, and all uninured
To lonely Godhead lived his lofty day.

Then as the lingering beams forsook the height,
  Forth to the void there leapt a cry, "Ah! Thou
    Who uncompanioned sitt'st among Thy spheres,
Grant me the prattle of a child—the light
  Caress of human lips upon my brow—
    A woman's hand to wipe away my tears!"

P. J. F.

LITERARY JOURNALISM?

WHY people are invited to pay sixpence for twaddle which is in no way superior to what is valued in other quarters at one-halfpenny is a puzzle of the times. It may be that certain people value twaddle highly, and it may be that certain editors have gauged the mental capacity of that portion of the public which is at all likely to purchase their wares. We wonder!

Babbling twaddle, however, is one thing and vulgar twaddle is another. A very bad example of the latter appears in a weekly journal which, perhaps, has some circulation. Under the heading of "Present-day Problems" some fifteen hundred words of insolence and utter vulgarity are offered in part exchange for the sixpences of the unwary. It is, of course, possible that in cocoa circles, where sixpences are numerous and righteousness, as opposed to veracity, a stock commodity, this sort of fustian may be thought immensely diverting:—

> Quum pars Niliacae plebis, quum verna canopi
> Crispinus, Tyrias humero revocante lacernas
> Ventilet æstivum digitis sudantibus aurum
> Nec sufferre queat majoris pondera gemmae.

We think it is sinning against literature that a journal—however poorly printed on common paper—which professes to be a leader of opinion should publish matter which is absolutely devoid of literary merit and merely enfolds an unmannerly and vitriolic attack on an aristocracy which, in the past at least, has deserved well of all classes in the country.

We will not elaborate our last thesis at this moment, because the learned author may wish to consult a primer before laying the vast resources of his knowledge before his limited public.

We will now proceed to cull a few floral gems from the string of words we have referred to:—

> We hope and believe that a majority of the men—for, after all, they are men—who stand before their looking-glasses draped in their robes, and adorned with even a water-gilt coronet, will say when they see themselves, "I look an awful fool in this get-up."

Examine the gracefulness and rhythm of the writing; recall for one moment the axioms of literary style which the poor literary dunce Horace laid down in "Ars Poetica," and then sit at the feet of the master who penned the passage we have quoted.

The great scribe warms to his subject as he proceeds to speak, with apparent authority, of the opportunities in life which fall "to the dirtiest little wastrel born in the slums;" and, incapable apparently of research in any of the available books of reference to inform himself as to the achievements of those who belong to the upper classes, calmly writes with pontifical pomposity:—

> The chance of achievement, indeed, for those brought up in such an atmosphere as this is slight, and the opportunity for service is diminishing, because the democracy is demanding a higher level of ability, a rational training, and, above all things, better education for those who fill positions of trust and authority.

We hope that the democracy will also demand the better education of those who invite them to part with their sixpences.

If the learned author ever has the advantage of access to a library, he will probably find a volume entitled "Who's Who," and he will be able to revise his estimate of the achievements of the class which he vilifies. He will also observe nearly two inches of quite interesting matter about his editor, whose career has been one of honourable advancement from small beginnings—or, at least, cheap beginnings—to, at all events, an expensive climax.

Limehouse in oratory, Limehouse in journalism—such is the stock-in-trade of the once respectable Liberal party.

We fear that old saw describing the results of evil communications is being verified with remarkable accuracy in the downward track of Liberal methods. If the House of Lords is a bad institution it ought not to be so very difficult to demonstrate the fact. There is the glorious majority of one hundred and twenty, and there is a powerful—or at least numerous—Press, and yet neither the one nor the other relies upon argument and proof.

It is curious! The case is so good, you know! The poor Peers are cornered. They have not an argument, a plea, or a hope of redemption It does seem a little mean, in such circumstances, to fling mud, abuse, and not very literate literature at them. The poor creatures are on their knees.

> "Parcere subjectis, et debellare superbos."

So wrote Virgil. The Nation—the great organ of the conquering hosts—adopts a standard of conduct which is peculiarly suited to the cause which it champions, and it perhaps believes that it is the only course which will accomplish success.

CECIL COWPER.

THE LORDS AND THE CROWN

BY MONTAGUE WOOD.

PART I.

THE whole theory of the Constitution as it applies to certainly two of the three factors that go to compose it, is so befogged and befuddled in the Radical brain that it calls for some wholesome attempt at elucidation.

In the first place, Radical theorists lay down the assertion that a Second Chamber should be subordinate to the Elected

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Chamber. That proposition is now by way of being accepted by most political sections with the immense reservation that a Second Chamber if subordinate in practice must by no means be subordinate in legal and technical power. That is all the difference. For what is the meaning of a Second Chamber? Let us consider it from the point of view of those who who have set themselves to fashion Constitutions. It is in its very essence a check on the one hand against revolutionary legislation based upon some chance victory, or victories, of the extremist element in the community or a combination of groups who by nefarious bargaining for mutual support are able to override the voice of more sober constituents of a nation, and on the other hand (and this is most especially vital), against legislation subversive of the Constitution itself. Of the latter it is of all things set to be the inviolable guard and custodian.

The necessity of checks upon popular government is not, as heated exponents of tub oratory are prone to insist, merely a fusty survival of mediæval patricianism, the last shackle of feudality upon the free, untrammelled march of an enfranchised people, but a requisition in the political structure of every State, however new-fangled. Recognition of its necessity is abundantly illustrated in every civilised area, but is nowhere more unequivocally marked than in the United States of America. There is a Constitution not in any way transmitted from the twilight of the Middle Ages to be subject to the accusation of outworn anomalies and anachronisms, or of initiation by old-world class domination. It sprang straight from a sheer democracy, fresh from an exultant revolt against thrones and oligarchies. Nevertheless the American Constitution bristles with checks not only of such a character that they possess a Second Chamber through which little or no legislation can ever manage to percolate, but they have devised such impregnable safeguards for the Constitution itself that no conceivable power on earth, save an overwhelming and incredible unanimity of parties, can possibly transform one iota or tittle of its original disposition. The American Constitution is as it is, and will remain as it is till the crack of doom, for unless a two-thirds majority in both Houses, backed by a subsequent two-thirds majority in the different States, unitedly favour any modification in its tenor, no such modification can be carried into effect, and such a combination of requirements can hardly be reconciled with the conceivable. Thus is the provision of sheer democracy devising for itself, and if this provision is good enough for the Republican American people, why is it not good enough for us, especially as the American Constitution, thus unalterable, cannot be said to have worked altogether well for the party of progress, whereas our Constitution, also, I submit, unalterable, has, on the whole, worked extremely well in the interests of civic advancement.

The question will at once arise, "Is our Constitution unalterable save by consent of both Legislatures"? And the further query, "Has the House of Lords, on the whole, worked well in the interests of civic advancement?" that is to say, has our Second Chamber, although legally and technically co-equal with the Lower House, been sufficiently subordinate in its actual methods? It is better to deal with the last question first and to point out that a Second Chamber must in its essence be defined as a retarding and Conservative Chamber, otherwise its existence must of itself be indefensible, and it can have no conceivable apology for continuance. The function, therefore, of an ideal Upper House is to reject legislation, especially should it be of any violent suggestion in any department of public affairs, and this is what the American Second Chamber ideally does, but ours does not. It is, in fact, a barrier through which processes of change are to filter slowly and gradually, if at all, and slowly and gradually except in a very few undesirable instances do they in reality so filter. The function, therefore, of a Second Chamber, the function for which it exists, is to reject legislation, except of course, in a case—(and this is the crux of the whole argument)—where the people have not as a party but as a nation, grimly, firmly and by an overwhelming numerical decision set their minds upon a measure. Does any one pretend that the present House of Lords in such a case has ever in action or theory represented itself as not inevitably bound to give way? The contrary under such circumstances is literally unthinkable. Does any one also pretend that any such measure corresponding to the above definition has been passed through the Commons during the last five years? A great many moderate Conservatives were opposed to the rejection by the House of Lords of the Budget of 1909 and of the Education Bill of 1907; but will anybody have the hardihood to assert that either of those measures comes within the scope of the formula above suggested—that they were enactments upon which the people, not as a party but as a nation, had grimly, firmly, and by an overwhelming numerical decision set their minds?

I do not wish to disregard the Radical objection that the House of Lords fail to fulfil their function because they accept Tory legislation, seeing that the answer is this: If the said legislation is progressive—and I maintain that Tory legislation is bound in these days to be progressive—so much the better for the cause of progress; that one party is in the position to induce the barrier to give way. If, on the other hand, the legislation is reactionary, so much the worse; but will any one have the temerity to assert that Tory legislation is reactionary? I do not know of a single instance, however much Mr. Balfour's Education Bill may be called into question. I therefore maintain that our Second Chamber has worked ideally in practice, and our two Chambers have facilitated legislation in a manner unequalled in any country in the world, just as our Constitution has been generally applauded in every latitude of the globe. Under these circumstances, knowing we have a Constitution that all the world combines to envy, we might not unnaturally imagine we had a possession no one could filch from us. But now most amazingly in 1910 we are told this is not the case. We were indeed, as we thought happily, aware that all the fury and malignity and greed of power of the Radical party were impotent to effect this change, but the remarkable premise is now sprung upon us that the power of all powers that can affect this revolution is the Throne.

It is needless to say that the original powers of the Throne were fought against centuries ago and jealously curtailed, not to say extinguished, as a danger to the power of the people, and now at this belated hour an unknown, unthought-of, sweeping, arbitrary, obsolete remnant of possible, but disputed, Crown authority is actually suggested by the Radical party as a means of carrying the most perilous, the most violent, the most gratuitous political upheaval of the last two centuries. Just imagine if the Tory party had attempted to revive for their immediate ends some abeyant prerogative of the Crown, what an infinity of clamour would have assailed their ears. However, in this controversy let us come to stubborn facts. It has been impudently asserted in Radical papers "that no one disputes the proposition that the Crown has the right to create peers to terminate a deadlock between the two Houses." The proposition is most vehemently disputed. The Crown has no such power—it has no such power constitutionally, and it has no such power legally. Let us look into this.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

REVIEWS

THE CHIEF AIM IN EDUCATION

The Unfolding of Personality as the Chief Aim n Education. By THISELTON MARK, M.A., B.Sc. (Fisher Unwin. 2s. net.)

THERE is something almost pathetic in the contrast between this laborious, conscientious, and minute examination of the child's mind and the educational methods that prevailed in former times. Johnson's master, if one remembers rightly, used to call upon a boy suddenly to give the Latin for "candlestick;" the boy did not know. The dominie thereupon told him the Latin equivalent, and gave him a severe beating. Even Johnson, who was far from sentimentalism, found this method both cruel and absurd. One learned the Latin for candlestick certainly, and never forgot it; but the operation was horribly unjust. Here, on the other hand, is Mr. Mark, who unfolds the whole philosophy of human nature so that a little child may be taught its lessons in the best possible way. You are to give, let us say, some simple lesson on coal; before you do so properly you should read such passages as—

> "The inmost secret of each man's heart is the secret of the whole world," says Caird. And Spencer speaks of "the 'I' which continuously survives" and is the subject of our various experiences as a portion of the unknowable Power. This Spencer urges in order to meet the need of a principle of unity and continuity within human personality, for he sees that "the aggregate of subjective states constituting the mental 'I' have not in themselves the principle of cohesion holding them together as a whole." Behind the "mental I," the acts and facts of mind which made up our experience, there must be some primary nucleus or soul, one in nature with the universe, as Caird says, or, as Spencer, a "portion of the unknowable Power."

What a contrast between the savage old pedant, with stick following on candlestick, and this patient and devout approach to the very antechambers of the eternal before a little girl can be taught that coal was once forests!

Which is right? Let us be bold to say neither. The old way is a wicked way; that is certain. And we may be sure that Johnson was not great because of it, but in spite of it; for one man of genius it bred a thousand dunderheads. Or rather it bred dunderheads and nothing but dunderheads, a few of them carrying away a mechanical knowledge of grammar and dictionary, most of them carrying away nothing at all. Johnson, being a great man, survived the process, as to-day men of obstinate originality survive the foolishness of Public School teaching, and manage to be something, and somewhat in spite of all that their masters have endeavoured in the path of pure idiocy and vacancy. And then, on the other hand, this new way, this way of reaching the A B C through Caird and Spencer, and "difficulty of an Infinite Ideal combined with a finite consciousness." What is to be said of it? Simply this—that nothing could be more excellent or more amiable than the intention, nothing more feeble or null than the results. The old Lichfield boys, or some of them, did remember "candelabrum;" the new Manchester boys remember nothing at all. To use a popular but expressive idiom, they "don't know enough to come in out of the rain." Some time ago it was demonstrated in these columns that the modern race of Englishmen, speaking generally, have achieved the quite astounding feat of divesting themselves of the faculty of logical perception; logically, we are no longer firmly convinced that two and two make four. Practically, as recent events have shown in letters of blood and fire and death, we have come as a nation to the mental condition of a resident in the tropics who should with patient care attract swamp-adders to his kitchen-garden, tempt tigers to his bungalow with plentiful and palatable food, and occupy himself with the nesting of the scorpion in the children's nursery. Logically, theoretically we are very near to the Ward of the weak-minded; practically, "we don't know enough to come in out of the rain." A few weeks ago our rulers were instructed, by the experiment of death, that there are certain things called "automatic pistols;" these pistols being deadly at 1,000yds. Therefore—O rare ergo!—having to deal once more with the wielders of these weapons, they sent against them a force of detectives armed with revolvers which kill, in practised hands, at thirty yards. Really, one almost wishes that savage old Hunter of Lichfield were permitted to return for a season, to work his incantations per modum baculi; beginning on the bodies of Cabinet Ministers, and proceeding to the corpuses of permanent officials. And if these things are done in the green tree of high position, what about the dry wood of the average "man in the street"? Education? But when a people has reached such a stage of theoretical and practical mania as this, what is the use of talking of education? You might as well talk Binomial Theorem to the wild ass, and choric metres to the giant sloth as prattle of educational theories to a generation that has forgotten alike how to spell "winder" and how to clean it.

How has it all come to pass? Chiefly through acts of National Apostasy from right-thinking and right-acting preconised in the sixteenth and seventeenth century, and since then solemnly ratified again and again in thought, word, and deed by the whole people. The theorem would sound quaint enough and extravagant enough in all conscience if it were stated in detail; yet it is inevitably true. Your American rebel of the late eighteenth century states his proposition that all men are born free and equal, and by stern decree of high justice the proposition works itself out in practical affairs. The newspaper of a few weeks ago contained the intelligence that President Taft had refused to pardon a millionaire condemned to gaol for the offence of keeping men in a state of "peonage," which is polite for slavery. So it is, and so it will be; though all the "Liberal thinkers" of all the earth should protest and cry together with one voice, gunpowder will still blow up if you set light to it, and two and two will make four unto ages of ages, whatever the Peckham Protestants may say. If you say that vipers are harmless, that we should practise toleration towards vipers, that vipers are made viperous because they are natives of the rocks, that vipers will cease to be viperous if we let them sleep in feather-beds and eat mutton-chops, that if vipers attack us we should reply with a rose-water spray, then our heel shall be pierced by the viper's fang, and our bodies shall suffer the anguish and corruption of the viper's venom. The premises are—in a rude logic—"England is a free country;" "All opinions should be tolerated." And the conclusion is in modo mauser, in figura sanguinis et flammæ ardentis. We reap what we have sown; we shall gather in yet more of these terrific harvests of fire and blood-shedding.

So much for the general standpoint; we are, in the proper sense of the term "uneducated," because we have voluntarily and resolutely withdrawn ourselves from that region in which alone true education is possible. Leaving the clear heights and the blue ether, we have gone down into the black fog; in it we wander, uttering confused cries, not knowing any more the way of Syon. But, specifically, the vice of all education—of common instruction even—in these days is the dream that everything in general, and learning in particular, ought to be simple and easy. The Gospel must be simplified; the A B C must be simplified; we are to get all the goods of the world, physical, spiritual, and intellectual, without bother, without worry, without pain. Pain is an evil; we are Liberals, and we mean to abolish evil, and so little boys and girls are going to learn their Latin grammar and their French verbs without any trouble at all. Yes; they will accomplish this feat when "chickens get teeth," as the negroes say; or at "next Nevermas," as the Scots used to say.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

When Mark Twain commenced Mississippi piloting, his chief and instructor, Mr. Bixby, asked him an innocent question:—

"What is the shape of Walnut Bend?"

Mark replied that he didn't know that it had any particular shape, and he consequently got into trouble. And the following conversation took place:—

> "Do you mean to say that I've got to know all the million trifling variations of shape in the banks of this interminable river as well as I know the shape of the front hall at home?"
>
> "On my honour, you've got to know them better than any men ever did know the shapes of the halls in his own house."
>
> "I wish I was dead!"
>
> "Now, I don't want to discourage you, but——"
>
> "Well, pile it on me; I might as well have it now as another time."
>
> "You see, this has got to be learned: there isn't any getting around it."

That phrase of Mr. Bixby's states the real facts of the Mississippi piloting business, and, incidentally, the real facts of the whole universe. "There isn't any getting around it." You may try to get around it by Protestant Reformations, French Revolutions, Declarations of the Rights of Man, and by Grammar made Easy; but the fact still remains, not to be circumvented, not to be removed from its sure place while the strong heavens endure. Everything that is worth doing has to be done at the cost of endless pains and interminable labours. It was in the fervent heat of the cosmic process that the splendour of the diamond was fashioned—beauty came, as it were, from burning torments. And so from torment and from the fire of the soul come all the fair works and accomplishments of men; it is the law of the world, and "there isn't any getting around it."

MR. NOYES' POEMS

Collected Poems. By ALFRED NOYES. (Wm. Blackwood and Sons. 10s. net.)

Two handsome volumes and seven hundred pages for a poet at his thirtieth year in this much-maligned twentieth century is something to muse on indeed. Yet here is the irrefragable fact before us, will we or will we not. But, as in most other things, the fact is one thing, and the deductions we may choose to make from the fact are wholly another. It would be churlish to look askance at a poet simply because he has achieved an uncomfortable bulk of work at an extraordinarily early age, even as it would be a token of smugness to grumble because he has hit popularity despite the fact that most of the best poetry has always been unpopular in its own day. Mr. Noyes cannot complain if these things set up a prejudice in his disfavour; a large bulk of work at an early age, together with a suddenly earned popularity, can but suggest one thing, and that is the peculiarly deadly thing—a derived voice of song. Historic examples show that most poets' early years have been taken up with the effort to shake free from the influence of the voices that sung before them, and to individualise their own song. This makes against a large body of work, and it also makes against popularity, since tentative efforts can never be popular.

Mr. Noyes, however, by the very use of the word "collected," denies that these volumes contain tentative work. In a manner that wins admiration he takes his stand by them, and avows them as his own to all the world. Therefore the critic must needs take him at his own word and judge these volumes as a serious and seemingly permanent contribution. This is a pity, for by that standard it must be said that he fails, though his failure is far indeed from ignominy. One can trace in his work, from the early poems to the latest, strata upon strata of influence. In a sense all poetry is derivative, since none of us can disavow the Great Memory, but in the highest sense the truest art is the most purely individualistic. That is to say, the fact that Mr. Noyes derives his ancestry from Shelley, Keats, and Swinburne only implies that he comes after them; but the fact that he echoes them is in itself a denial of his own song. Witness such a stanza as the following out of "Orpheus and Eurydice:"—

> And over the cold white body of love and delight
> Orpheus arose in the terrible storm of his grief,
> With quivering, up-clutched hands, deadly and white,
> And his whole soul wavered and shook like a wind-swept leaf!

To say that this is derivative of Swinburne is to make a statement short of the fact. It is the actual and authentic Swinburne itself.

There is this much in Mr. Noyes' favour on this head, however, that such unhappy derivation partly arises because he wishes to sing concerning the same type of subject that Swinburne chose, and it is undeniable that certain subjects can only be sung in certain manners. Swinburne was forced to his manner by his subject, and Mr. Noyes has been forced to the same manner after him. There are poems in these two volumes in which he has shaken free from his influences, and given us something from his own founts of song. Such a poem is "The Progress of Love." A certain sonnet of his—which does not appear in these two volumes—addressed to Fiona McLeod, discovers for us the artistic ancestry of its idea. "The Progress of Love" is not merely good in spite of the ancestry of idea, but actually because of it. The conception is richer in Mr. Noyes' poem than it ever was, or could have been, in the hazy twilight of the earlier writer.

Such another poem is "Forty Singing Seamen," which enables us to strike on one of his dominant notes of song, one of those things that belong to Mr. Noyes and to no other. It is easily discoverable in the following stanza from the poem quoted:—

> So we thought we'd up and seek it, but that forest fair defied us—
> First a crimson leopard laughs at us most horrible to see,
> Then a sea-green lion came and sniffed and licked his chops and eyed us,
> While a red and yellow unicorn was dancing round a tree!
> We was trying to look thinner,
> Which was hard, because our dinner
> Must ha' made us very tempting to a cat o' high degree!
>
> Chorus—Must ha' made us very tempting to the whole menarjeree.

Some would find this an echo of Kipling, but it is not so, despite the fact that Kipling led the way with this kind of thing. It has, for example, quite a delicate beauty that is essential not only to its manner but also to its inception. In "A Tramp Transfigured" this effort after beauty is more pronounced, in the same kind of song; but there the beauty, being less robust, and therefore more foreign to the subject, is too attenuate. It seems more an effort, and less a native product. It is certainly not a very lofty manner of song (it is not poetry), but it has a ringing and quite worthy melody.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Another subject that Mr. Noyes makes to serve the purposes of song is children's fairy lore. From first to last it threads his work with perennial interest, while it is the cause of being of two long poems, "The Flower of Old Japan" and "The Forest of Wild Thyme." This is not the world of fairies that interests Mr. W. B. Yeats' poetry, not a world within worlds of which the outer is symbolical, it is a genuine world of fancy and make-believe. Mr. Noyes endeavours, it is true, to attach a deeper meaning to it sometimes, but it cannot be said that success attends his efforts. It is a world for the love of children, and its talisman and goal is Japan. Indeed, he often conjures with the word "Japan" to upcall mystical meaning, with sad failure, it must be confessed, to those who know of a Japan in which a very unpoetical commerce is enthroned as supreme Deity, with tyranny to match it, and with sweated labour and vice as fit accompaniments.

Mr. Noyes' greatest, though not his best, effort is "Drake." It is an epic, and if ever a poem deserves to succeed this poem does. Apart from every other consideration, the poet who writes an epic in this age is one who deserves well at the hands of every lover of the highest of Arts. The poem is written with extraordinary spirit and with prodigal colour. The colour of jewels, the romance of adventure, the love of seemingly impossible deeds, the characteristic English love of the sea and the splendour of seamanship, the tropical refulgence of lands at the ends of the earth are all called in to advance the interest. There is no failure of interest in it from first to last. On its claims of excitement of adventure alone it is better worth reading than many an excellent book that rests on this only. He does actually call round his hero the halo of the heroic, no mean achievement. When Sidney, "the king of courtesy," comes to offer himself for service in the fleet that is to oppose the Armada this is how Drake rejects him:—

> With grim eyes
> He scanned the silken knight from head to foot,
> While Sidney, smiling graciously, besought
> Some place in their adventure. Drake's clenched fist
> Crashed down on the old oak table like a rock,
> Splintering the wood and dashing his rough wrist
> With blood, as he thundered, "By the living God
> No! We've no room for courtiers, now! We leave
> All that to Spain."

When Drake captures a galleon in the far West, this is how the treasure is described:—

> The hold like one great elfin orchard gleamed
> With dusky globes and tawny glories piled;
> Hesperian apples, heap on mellow heap,
> Rich with the hues of sunset, rich and ripe
> And ready for the enchanted cider-press;
> An Emperor's ransom in each burning orb;
> A kingdom's purchase is each clustered bough;
> The freedom of all slaves in every chain.

Between this love of colour and the splendid spirit in which he attempts the heroic, sometimes the fabulously heroic, the poem is sustained in interest. But as a poem, in the realm of poetry, it does not succeed. An epic demands three things—form (meaning unity of structure and architectonic ability), metrical skill, and the strength of reserve. None of these Mr. Noyes has, or let us rather say hopefully, he has none of them as yet.

The new poems contained in this collection are largely of the type that is written to order on State occasions; and it is not well to judge of a poet when his muse is, as he should never let it be, perfunctory. "Mount Ida" is among them, however, and this, in spite of its echoing of Keats and Shelley, is a fine poem.

EAST-BOURNE—AND "THE TIMES"

East-Bourne Memories (1845 to 1901). By George F. Chambers, F.R.A.S., Barrister-at-Law, &c. Illustrated. (East-Bourne: V. T. Sumfield. 12s. 6d. net.)

No reviewer can well resist the appeal of a book which treats of the locality where he spent the happiest days of his life, and which, by transporting him once more among scenes and people well known to him in his boyhood, makes him feel nearly half a century younger than he actually is. The name of East-Bourne is doubtless more familiar to the general reader of the present day when it is written as one word; but the author of the book before us gives various reasons for dividing it into two. East-Bourne is certainly the older form, and that to which the Dukes of Devonshire and the Gilbert family, who chiefly own the soil of the well-known Sussex watering-place, have always adhered. In Domesday Book, however, the village (such it was at the Conquest) is simply called Borne.

Mr. Chambers is a many-sided man. His name is well known to all who are interested in astronomical science, on which he has written several text-books; he has also long been connected with the Parliamentary Bar, and has discharged important duties under Government; further, he was at one time a Captain in the Sussex Engineer Volunteers, and for a great many years he played an important part in East-Bourne's municipal life. To put the matter in a hackneyed but none the less appropriate way, what he does not know of the town and its surroundings and their extremely interesting history is scarcely worth knowing at all, and he has here gathered together a vast amount of information which is often of much more than mere local interest. In some respects he has stayed his hand, from a desire to avoid repeating anything previously said in his own handbook to the town, or in the works of East-Bourne's other historians, such as Mr. R. J. Graham and Mr. J. C. Wright. Nevertheless we here have several interesting pictures of East-Bourne in the past, and are shown how the town gradually expanded and became a place of importance.

Both Mr. Chambers and the present reviewer were partly educated there, going to the same school, though not at the same period. Mr. Chambers's term of instruction under the worthy James Anthony Bown was confined, indeed, to the first "'fifties," whereas ours came in the next decade, extending from the beginning of 1861 to the summer of 1865. The school-house was originally known as "The Gables," but Mr. Chambers says that in his time no particular name was given to Mr. Bown's academy. In ours, as is shown by the inscriptions in half a dozen "prizes" which we were lucky enough to wrest from our schoolfellows, "The Gables" had become "Eastbourne School," an appellation to which the establishment was fairly entitled, for with its sixty boarders or more it was in all respects the town's chief place of education. The population of East-Bourne was then, however, under 6,000, whereas to-day it is nearly 45,000; and instead of their being, as in our time, only four or five schools all told, there are now, in addition to East-Bourne College, founded in 1867, between two and three hundred educational establishments of various degrees.

It may perhaps interest Mr. Chambers to know that we once did our best to immortalise "The Gables" in a novel of ours, and we may also tell him that the school produced several literary men and journalists. Among them was the late Mr. Horace Voules, who was long Mr. Labouchere's coadjutor on Truth, in which journal he laudably exposed several egregious swindles. Three of the brothers Vizetelly, authors, war correspondents, and journalists, were also among Mr. Bown's pupils. Mr. George R. Sims is another literary man who received his early education at East-Bourne, but he attended a different school.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

We have said that Mr. Chambers's book is of more than local interest. This is largely because he came in contact at East-Bourne, at one or another time, with a very large number of notable people, respecting whom he tells a variety of anecdotes. King Edward and Queen Alexandra (when Prince and Princess of Wales) figure in his pages. There is frequent mention of successive Dukes of Devonshire and other members of the Cavendish family. Two Dukes of Rutland are also here, together with Lord Randolph Churchill, Sir Ellis Ashmead-Bartlett, the late Lord Nelson, Lord Willingdon, and many others who have figured prominently in public life, and Mr. Chambers often has something interesting to say about them. Some stories told him by the third Earl Nelson, the well-known Churchman, were amusing. Here is one of them:—

> Lord Nelson once found himself in possession of a spurious sovereign. He put it, as he thought, into an out-of-the-way corner of his waistcoat pocket, where it would not get mixed up with other coins. He afterwards hired a cab, and when the trip was over put his hand into his pocket for the fare, one shilling. Forgetting all about the bad sovereign, he pulled that out of his pocket, and feeling the coin without looking at it, gave it to the cabman as a shilling. Cabby drove off quite satisfied. He had only got a little way, however, when Lord Nelson discovered that he had given the man the bad sovereign, so he shouted after him to stop. Cabby heard the shout, turned round, and derisively flourished the coin in the air. History has not recorded his feelings at a later time in the day.

Another of Lord Nelson's stories was this:—

> In a certain year (I think 1844) he went into the country to stay with a friend who accosted him thus: "There will be in church to-morrow an old lady who is very anxious to make your acquaintance. I told her that I would introduce you to her; and what do you think she said? 'Oh! you need not do that. I shall be able to recognise his lordship easily; I remember that he has only one arm!'"

Almost at the end of Mr. Chambers's book we made an unexpected discovery, which will explain to the reader the perhaps somewhat peculiar title given to this review. Our author tells us that his grandmother, Mrs Brodie (wife of the Rev. Dr. Brodie, Vicar of East-Bourne from 1810 to 1828), was a daughter of the John Walter who founded the Times, and that she inherited from him a two-sixteenth share in that famous newspaper. At her death the share in question was subdivided, and in due course Mr. Chambers himself became the holder of one-ninth of two-sixteenths in the Times. "But," says he, "there were smaller sub-divisions than this. Several of my cousins held one-fourteenth of two-thirds of one-ninth of two-sixteenths." A holding of that kind certainly necessitated a good knowledge of arithmetic whenever dividend day came round. Mr. Chambers adds that he has known a great deal about the inner history of the Times throughout his life; and although he feels that this is not the time or place to say all he could say on the subject, he appends a variety of information which will be useful to future historians of the English Press. He points out that the third John Walter and his son and successor, Mr. Arthur Walter, were by no means chief proprietors of the Times, as was often thought, but were simply minority shareholders, their holdings being no more than about one-eighth, leaving seven-eighths held by other people, brothers, and cousins, &c.

Mr. Chambers roundly blames the third John Walter and the Times manager (Mr. J. C. Macdonald) for embarking in the famous Parnell affair without holding any consultation with the co-proprietors of the paper. Walter, moreover, made a mistake, Mr. Chambers declares, in refusing "the offer of the Government of the day to provide out of the public funds the official expenses of the Parnell Commission, as distinguished from the personal expenses of the Times. This would have eased the main burden on the proprietors very considerably." As it was, the affair cost them no less than £180,000, of which, says Mr. Chambers, only a small proportion fell on John Walter personally. "The non-acceptance of the [Government's] offer was the more blameworthy because others, and not himself, were to be the chief sufferers."

Mr. Chambers, who is a strong Conservative (a member of the Carlton Club), sums up what he calls "the Parnell escapade" as a "praiseworthy and patriotic move in its conception," but one which "lacked an adequate basis for success." It undoubtedly "shook the credit of the Times, and precipitated the decay of its influence and circulation." Then came Mr. Arthur Walter's unsuccessful management, the whole ending "in the necessity of reconstructing the concern, and turning it into a limited company, with the Walter control reduced almost to zero." Mr. Chambers then goes on to say:—

> In the hands of the new management, under a board of directors of up-to-date journalistic experience . . . I still think the paper has a great future before it, and I have shown my confidence by retaining a considerable share in it, though my income from it will never be even one-tenth of what it once was. Whether it will ever regain its old financial position is another matter. For many years between 1868 and 1885 the annual dividends paid to the proprietors exceeded £80,000, and in 1876 amounted to £93,000. Great wars always had the effect of lowering the profits. The Franco-German War caused a drop of nearly £5,000 in the next year's dividends. The Russo-Turkish War of 1877 was still more disastrous; the drop was £18,000, but the next following years in each case showed a full recovery. The actual causa causans of these great fluctuations was the determination of the management to get the best obtainable news with the greatest possible promptitude, regardless of cost.

Those last remarks should help to dispel the popular fallacy that war is a source of profit to the newspaper press. It always entails a great increase of expenditure, rendered imperative by the public eagerness or anxiety for news, and by the keen competition existing between different journals. Increase of circulation can scarcely ever compensate for the increase in expenditure, and if the latter were not incurred a paper would be ousted from public favour by more enterprising rivals. On the other hand, of course, a newspaper's reputation is often consolidated by its enterprise in war time, and, in the case of a new journal, the foundations of its success may be laid.

Our quotations from Mr. Chambers's book will have shown that it is by no means restricted to the subject of East-Bourne. Besides appealing to the inhabitants of that prosperous and delightful watering-place, it contains numerous pages of interest to the general reader. It is embellished with fifty-four plates from old engravings, drawings, and photographs, many of them views of parts of old East-Bourne and neighbouring spots, such as they were in the long ago, or as they remain to-day.

AN ANCIENT SAGA

Beowulf and the Finnsburg Fragment. A Translation into Modern English Prose by JOHN R. CLARK HALL, M.A., Ph.D. (Swan Sonnenschein and Co. 7s. 6d. net.)

THE translator of this important work has rendered all students a great service by his conscientious and thorough treatment of a poem which is one of the most precious treasures of English literature, concerning which, notwithstanding the countless books and articles that have been written on this favourite Early English and Gothic hero, fresh and even still more interesting discoveries will assuredly be made, probably in Bohuslän, the scene of the last exploits of Beowulf.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

It is indeed remarkable that one of the earliest Scandinavian sagas, with its incongruous Christian additions, should have been handed down to us in such a perfect state full of local colour, not thanks to a Scandinavian scald, but to some unknown Saxon, Anglian, or Mercian gleeman, who imbued his work with such zeal and poetic skill that his "amended" version of Beowulf is probably far more interesting and human than the rough original Gothic or Jutish sagas which probably formed the body of the work. Thanks to the conscientious rendering of this priceless treasure into modern English and to the copious notes and illustrations with which it is illustrated, the English people have now placed before them a faithful picture of the life and ideals of their Viking forefathers, the Goths of Viken (South Sweden), the Danes of Skane (East Denmark, now South Sweden), of Zeland and Funen (West Denmark), so far back as the fifth century. We see their great halls ("Haller" and "Up Salar") hung with gold embroidered tapestry, their carved and gilded war-vessels (Drake), their gold inlaid and enamelled weapons, their beautiful jewellery, hardly surpassed even in our days, their ornate drinking-vessels, their splendid armour and other war-gear, the rich and costly harness of their horses. All these are described with astonishing accuracy in this grand old poem Mr. Clark Hall has so ably translated into pure, vigorous, simple English.

Judging from internal evidence, an impartial critic might take it for granted that Beowulf was no Dane, but a Goth or Jute, from the old province of Viken (Bohuslän), and resided near Hronenaes, near Gothenburg (pronounced in English "Jutteborg"). His abuse of the Danes, and his praise of "the vengeful Swedes, vigorous and keen on fighting across the lakes" (Wener and Wetter), also the distinction drawn between his own people and them, is strong evidence of this assumption. The present poem, as handed down to us, is, however, the finished work of some early English poet (gleeman), or minstrel, whose home was England; for the language, with few exceptions, is Early English, and not Norse or Gothic. The bragging about Gaetish (Gothic) pluck as compared with that of the Danes is very significant. The use of such a term as Wyrd instead of "The Fates" in an English translation is to be regretted, as it only mystifies the reader.

The translator's contention that Beowulf, notwithstanding his Munchausen adventures, was an historical personage is, in the writer's opinion, thoroughly justified, for not only are the place-names, localities, and tribes mentioned in Beowulf familiar to Scandinavian archæologists, but the armour, weapons, jewellery, and other articles found in the tumuli of Sweden and Denmark so strikingly resemble the objects described in Beowulf that one cannot doubt that the Gothic hero actually existed, and performed many remarkable exploits which in process of time have been exaggerated by his admirers until we have them at last in their present surprising form.

Bohuslän, with its rocky headlands, deep and gloomy fiords, and wild skerries, and not Jutland, as the translator affirms, is probably the scene of the last feats of the brave and noble Beowulf against the dragon. What the monster could be no one seems to know, but that the inhabitants of the skerries in Sweden believe in sea-monsters to this day there is not the least question, for one appeared, or is alleged to have appeared, last summer at Saltsyöbad, near Stockholm, and scared many simple folks almost out of their wits. This strange incident brings Beowulf very near to us.

The saga was probably introduced into England by the Jutes of Kent, or by the Viking Jutes, or Goths from Viken, in South Sweden, who had settlements in East Yorkshire and Lincolnshire. From them it could easily have passed over to some skilled Anglian or Mercian minstrel, who, with true artistic craft, collected the scattered jewels, and wove them into a costly vestment of rich brocade, which will last for many centuries.

Whilst praising the thorough erudition of Mr. Hall—for he has consulted about two hundred works on Beowulf alone, dating from 1815 to 1910—we must confess that we hold with Professor Bugge that the Gaets were not a different, but practically the same, race as the Götar, or Jutes, and were likewise Goths. In Swedish the English "g" is generally pronounced as a soft "j," almost a "y," and the words Gothenburg, East Gothland, West Gothland, Gotha Elf are pronounced in the South of Sweden "Jöteborg," "Östra Jötland," "Westra Jötland," and "Jöta Elf;" whilst the people are called "Jötar," not "Gaetar." The Danes who inhabited the peninsula of Jutland originally belonged to the same race, and were also Jutes or Jötes. This being the case, it would perhaps be easier for English readers if Mr. Hall had called the Gothic followers of Beowulf Jötes, or Goths, since we know from the lay that they belonged to Gothland, in contradistinction to the Danes, who inhabited Skane and the isles of Denmark; whilst the Svea folk (the Swedes) dwelt on the other side of the Lakes Wener and Wetter.

SOUTH AFRICAN ETHNOGRAPHY

The Yellow and Dark-Skinned People of Africa South of the Zambesi. A Description of the Bushmen, the Hottentots, and particularly the Bantu. With Numerous Folklore Tales of these Different People. By George McCall Theal, Litt.D., LL.D. Illustrated. (Swan Sonnenschein and Co. 10s. 6d.)

Even to those who have merely a cursory acquaintance with the literature of South Africa Dr. Theal will need no introduction. As the standard historian of Africa south of the Zambesi, his name and his work are equally well known to all who show any interest in the past of South Africa. His great history of that region has just been completed, and, recognising that the students of South African ethnography have some grievance in finding that the chapters on their subject are scattered throughout the eight volumes of his masterpiece, he has collected them and, with the addition of further material, constructed another volume, which will not only prove invaluable to students of the native races of South Africa, but which should, if only as a piece of general literature, secure a wide public. Dr. Theal has written a book of absorbing interest. His narrative is in many parts entrancing; and, although his literary style is easy and encouraging to the reader no matter how abstruse the topic on which he writes, he has sacrificed nothing of the sound scholarship, the wide reading, and the clear judgment which form the basis of his work. It is no exaggeration to say that Dr. Theal has written a book which will for long contain the last word on the South African native races.

The extent of ground covered in this book is for the most part indicated in the full title given at the head of this notice. The Bushmen, the Hottentots, and the Bantus are treated in succession. The different theories concerning the origin of these races is discussed: their history, built up step by step from widely scattered records, is related; the life of the different peoples, their customs, their habits, their beliefs, and even their thoughts are described. A fair proportion of the volume is, moreover, devoted to the folklore of these tribes raised by Dr. Theal far in the scale of interest, and the many tales which he relates if collected and illustrated would of themselves make a volume of fairy-tales certain to gain favour with the children.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The Bushmen are the earliest race of which any trace can be found in South Africa. Dr. Theal considers them identical with the palæolithic pygmies, of whom traces are still found in Europe and elsewhere. Their original home, he believes, was in Central Asia, and from that source one section moved towards Europe and another into Africa. All relics of this earliest of European races which still survive he finds almost identical with the corresponding implements and utensils of the Bushmen, and he adds that the prehistoric paintings recently discovered in a centuries-hidden cave near Pau are indistinguishable from the work of the Bushmen in South Africa. These very rudimentary people were still more widely spread than over Europe and Africa. Traces of a similar race have been found in Australia and among the Mongols, and, moreover, the existing aborigines of the Philippines, the Andaman Islands, and Penang in the Malay Peninsula "are so like the Bushmen that it is almost certain they are of the same stock."

After the Bushmen came the Hottentots. The former were forced through the length of Africa by more powerful races. The latter also came in from the North-east, and from the same quarter came centuries later other races whose descendants, more or less pure, held within recent times sway in different regions of Africa. Despite the great pressure from the North, the whole of the earliest race now known as Bushmen—that is to say, the minority who survived the onslaughts of the invaders—did not make its way to the South. Isolated fragments remained behind, and probably the last of these is the pygmies of the Central African forest. The Hottentots Dr. Theal derives from light-coloured Hamites, soldiers in the Egyptian service who mutinied and marched into Somaliland about 650 B.C., and the women—Bushmen—whom they found there. In order to explain the persistence of the differences which still exist between the Hottentots and the Bushmen, Dr. Theal suggests that further immigrations of men of the superior stock were made at later periods so that the predominance of that stock was assured. The Bantus, of whom all the races of South Africa, except the Hottentots and the Bushmen, are branches, also came from the North, and to them far more detailed attention is given by Dr. Theal; but it must not, however, be thought that the treatment meted out to the two earlier races is by any means inadequate. This he was enabled to do by the far more voluminous material at his disposal when he came to consider the relatively modern settlements of the race which was predominant in South Africa prior to the advent of the Portuguese, the Dutch, and the English. One chapter, the last, is entitled "The Mystery of South Africa." It relates to the mighty ruins of Mashonaland, and Dr. Theal leaves it where he found it—an unsolved mystery.

In the course of his pages the author has many opportunities for turning aside to discuss and linger over subjects not in the direct line of the march to which he has set himself. For the most part Dr. Theal keeps rigidly ahead, turning neither to the right nor to the left. Knowing this, it is probably quite unconsciously that he throws a lurid light on the efficacy of the conversion to Christianity of many of the natives of South Africa. The following quotation relates to Bantu converts, the most highly-developed, intellectually, of the natives, and consequently the most favourable material for leading towards Christianity and civilisation:—

> When I first went to Lovedale nothing impressed me more forcibly with the futility of much of the educational work than the sight of boys in the senior classes learning Latin and reading Shakespeare while their minds were steeped in the crudest superstitions. There was one boy in particular. . . . He was in the Matriculation class, a Christian, and a member of the Christian Association, in connection with which he used to go out to preach on Sundays to the "Red" Kaffirs in the surrounding kraals. Through overwork his health broke down, and, seeing no ostensible cause of his illness, he immediately thought he was bewitched, a belief shared by all his friends at the Institution. He consulted a native witch doctor in the district, who advised him that he was being bewitched by an enemy in Basutoland, and a few days later he left the school to seek out his would-be murderer.

This quotation by Dr. Theal is from a pamphlet by Mr. K. A. Hobart Houghton, a teacher at the Lovedale College.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF HISTORY

The Foundations of the Nineteenth Century. By HOUSTON STEWART CHAMBERLAIN. A Translation from the German by JOHN LEES, M.A., D.Litt. (Edin.). With an Introduction by LORD REDESDALE, G.C.V.O., K.C.B., &c. In Two Volumes. (John Lane. 25s. net.)

ON one point, and on one point only, will there be general agreement regarding Mr. Chamberlain's work, which, although published some years ago in Germany, has but recently been translated into English. That point is the importance and wide interest of the subject on which he has written. There will be, in addition, a widespread appreciation of the very extensive reading with which Mr. Chamberlain equipped himself before he proceeded to his task. Beyond this, however, opinions on the views put forward in these two volumes will be very varied, and the majority of thoughtful readers will, without doubt, rise from the perusal of this work unconvinced, despite the earnestness which the author has thrown into it and the eloquence with which he has expressed himself. The book is a production of an essentially heterodox description, and this, of course, would immediately prejudice those conservative elements which always predominate in English intellectual circles against it.

But apart from this ingrained antipathy to new ideas, almost universal in the latter half of life, considerable hostility to Mr. Chamberlain's conclusions is well justified; for, divested of the verbiage which surrounds them, they are for the most part found to be crude, ill-digested, and, it is to be feared, warped by prejudice. The two volumes may, in fact, be compressed into a dual sentiment—the apotheosis of Teutonism and the denunciation of Semitism. The work is essentially German and un-English. No fact is allowed to interfere with the glorification of Germanism or with the vilification of Judaism. Cleansed of its Semitic influences, which Mr. Chamberlain is unable entirely to deny, although he strains every nerve in order to belittle them, modern civilisation, we are led to believe, would be perfect. The only dross in the alloy of modern Europe is due to the Jews and their ancestors, the Judæans. If modern civilisation had been based upon the culture of the Greeks and the statesmanship of the Romans alone, perfection would now be installed in the world. The intrusion of Jewish ideas, however, marred the otherwise perfect picture. Hence all the ills to which modern civilised flesh is heir are directly due to the Jews and their ancestors. This is the substance of Mr. Chamberlain's teaching, and by its very extravagance it defeats his own ends, for his readers must pass it by as the ordinary German Anti-Semitism, which has hitherto failed to gain any foothold in this country, and is unlikely to do in the future as it has been in the past.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Although permeated to a considerable extent by this unconsidered prejudice, it must not be thought that the Jewish spectre appears upon every page of the book. Other matters are also discussed, and on them also many startling theories are raised. For instance, Mr. Chamberlain's readers, if they accept his teachings as gospel, will have to revise their opinions concerning the Romans. To describe them as invaders or conquerors is a libel. The Roman never went to war for the purpose of conquest or aggrandisement. He did so always in self-defence. In order to preserve his home he was compelled always to fight, and thus in the end he subdued the world. So says Mr. Chamberlain, but one reader at any rate has not been convinced.

ESSAYS IN BIOGRAPHY

Studies of a Biographer. By Leslie Stephen. (Duckworth and Co. 2s. 6d. net.)

This volume, the first of a series of four, contains essays reprinted from various periodicals—chiefly from the "National Review." All but one of the subjects dealt with are connected with the eighteenth century. The introductory essay on "National Biography" serves incidentally as an apology for the Preface which Sir Leslie Stephen did not prefix to the first volume of the famous Dictionary. In a few pleasant and vivid pages we realise the gigantic nature of the task achieved in that monumental work. The standard to be aimed at, the special qualifications required of contributors to the Dictionary, and the practical utility of such a work are all considered. With regard to the last point, the pith of the matter is given in the following short paragraph:—

> The first office of the biographer is to facilitate what I may call the proper reaction between biography and history; to make each study throw all possible light on the other, and so to give fresh vitality to two different lines of study, which, though their mutual dependence is obvious, can yet be divorced so effectually by the mere Dryasdust.

The writer himself exhibits in the whole of these papers some of those ideal qualifications he has laid down as desirable in critical and biographical work. In his account of John Byrom, author of the well-known hymn "Christians, Awake!" we are introduced to a quaint, kindly, and gentle eighteenth-century figure, who attracts us, in this sketch, by pursuits in life far removed from the sphere of hymnology. Born of an old Manchester family, educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, during the mastership of the famous Bentley, whose goodwill he enjoyed; a writer of a few memorable epigrams, with a facility for turning odd personal experiences into ingenious verse, an enthusiastic teacher of a self-invented system of shorthand in London, and later on in life a devoted believer in the religious mysticism of William Law, he moves through the first half of his century, a curious lay compound of Parson Adams and the Vicar of Wakefield. Two other essays, "Johnsoniana" and "Wordsworth's Youth," are founded respectively on works by the late Dr. George Birkbeck Hill, and the French critic M. Emile Legouis. They have this much in common—in each full justice is done to an aspect of the subject which lends itself to mistaken notions and erroneous judgments.

The two remaining essays give us contrasted types of eighteenth-century writers—the man of enthusiasm and the man who would have regarded that quality as a sham inspiration. In the study of Gibbon, founded upon his autobiography, we have a brilliant analysis and description of the conditions which made possible that concurrence of the man and the moment necessary for the production of a masterpiece like the "Decline and Fall." The essay is of absorbing interest, and gives one an increased sense of the dignity of history and the greatness of the historian's task. "Arthur Young," traveller, farmer, economist, pamphleteer, and reformer, is an enthusiast, wayward and impulsive, who enunciated views that marked him out as a man in advance of his times. Young kept up his restless activity and enthusiasm to the end of a long life, and was an attractive and, in some respects, pathetic personality. These essays, written in a terse and vigorous style, full of sympathetic insight combined with a power of masterly analysis, and enlivened by touches of genial humour, should appeal to a wide circle of cultivated readers.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Attitudes and Avowals. By Richard le Gallienne. (John Lane. 5s. net.)

Between a bowl of roses and a vase of lilies Mr. le Gallienne continues to gaze upon a pleasantly sunlit world from a study window which we feel sure must be framed in honeysuckle. "Books as Doctors," "Concerning a Woman's Smile," "Clouds," "The World and the Lover," "Dream Children," "The Profession of Poet"—how well we know the dulcet voice in which Mr. le Gallienne will descant to us upon these ethereal themes! This, of course, is equivalent to saying that he has an individuality and a style, and, if we are constrained now and then to poke a little sly fun at him, we freely admit that there are occasions when his rosy reasonings take us captive; when we can wander contentedly with him through the flowery uplands of fancy, hearing the golden songs of happy birds, hoping to meet some sophisticated Phyllis of the dewy dells who shall inspire us to a rondeau or, perchance, a sonnet. But let us forbear; for in this volume is much matter cast in a sterner mould. Part II. is devoted to some "Retrospective Reviews," and the introductory essay on Grant Allen and his work is well worth careful reading. Mr. le Gallienne was a personal friend and a warm admirer of Grant Allen, and his reminiscences and comments are extremely interesting.

We remember Mr. le Gallienne's book on George Meredith with considerable pleasure; here we have three articles on Meredith's poetry, full of good things. Surely, however, the author makes a serious critical slip in the following passage, where he alludes to Carlyle, Browning, and Meredith:—

> . . . The more we demand this expressive finality and universality of literature, the more we realise that these three writers I have classed together are inspired prophetic journalists, moulders of the spiritual aspiration of their time, rather than enduring voices of the eternal meanings. It is exceedingly improbable that any one of them will be read, or even understood, a hundred years from now; for they write, so to speak, in the spiritual slang of the day.

We differ entirely from this curiously perverse summing-up of possibilities, and differ all the more strongly because on other pages Mr. le Gallienne proves himself a critic of acute insight. But why, in his note on Mr. Maurice Hewlett, does he write "different than"?

The other essays are written with discrimination and care, and if we are at times tempted to call Mr. le Gallienne names for failing, in the years that have lapsed since "Young

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Lives" and "The Romance of Zion Chapel," to climb to the highest peaks of the enchanted land of literature, we are bound to confess that with all his faults we love him still.

Lord Clive's Right-hand Man: A Memoir of Colonel Francis Forde. By COLONEL LIONEL FORDE. (James Nisbet and Co. 5s. net.)

FORDE'S whole military career in India, in Clive's time, lasted only from 1754 to 1760: his present biographer describes it as meteoric. Worsted in his first detached encounter at Nellore, north of Madras, he gained subsequently three victories, which stamped him as an officer of unusual ability: he amply justified the confidence which Clive invariably reposed in him, selecting him for any arduous service there was on hand. Forde was a King's Service officer, and there was some difficulty—pecuniary compensation was in fact required—to induce him to accept, on Clive's nomination, the command of the Company's troops in Bengal at the commencement of 1758, the year after the victory of Plassey. That same year Clive despatched Forde to assist Ananda Raj, the Vizianagram Raja, against the French. The force consisted of 500 Europeans, including the artillery, 2,000 Sepoys, and 100 Lascars. The object of the expedition was to expel the French from the Northern Circars, or to create a diversion in the Carnatic. He soon met the French force commanded by the Marquis de Conflans; it consisted of 500 European infantry, numerous artillery, 500 horse and 6,000 Sepoys. The French were utterly defeated. This was "the battle of Condore, one of the most brilliant actions on military record, generally little known or mentioned." Exactly four months later, Forde took Masulipatam, a fort standing a mile and a half from the sea, where the French had rallied. His force of 315 Europeans and 1,500 Sepoys encamped on the sandhills, and advancing across difficult, swampy ground made a night attack which was completely successful. It was splendid audacity, admirably planned, brilliantly executed. The third victory, in 1759, is mentioned, though not by name, in Macaulay's essay on Lord Clive. The Dutch sent seven ships with 1,500 men from Java, after secret communications with the Bengal Nabob at Murshidabad, to attack the English in Bengal. They were soundly beaten, both by land and water. Macaulay records that Clive "took his resolution with characteristic boldness, and was most ably seconded by his officers, particularly by Colonel Forde, to whom the most important part of the operations was intrusted." This was the victory of Badara, near Chinsura on the Hooghly, which Broome calls a brilliant one, and Malleson includes among the decisive battles of India. Notwithstanding his success and Clive's support, the Court of Directors refused to confirm Forde in the Bengal command. So Forde had to leave India, and was not re-employed until 1769, when he was selected with two other Commissioners to investigate Bengal affairs. They reached the Cape, and were afterwards lost at sea.

Forde was clearly a very remarkable officer, and was hardly treated. The author tells his tale simply, without much embellishment of style. As it stands it should be in every regimental and military library, as a chronicle of bravery and of skilful leading. Opportunities for gaining distinction were, perhaps, more frequent in India a hundred and fifty years ago than they are now, but it is still open to officers to profit by the examples of their predecessors and to take advantage of chances that present themselves.

Phlox. By CHARLES H. CURTIS, F.R.H.S. (Agricultural and Horticultural Association. 1d.)

THE author of this remarkably cheap and useful little handbook, which forms No. 30 of the popular "One and All Garden Series," is assistant editor of the "Gardener's Magazine," and Hon. Secretary of the National Sweet-Pea Society, and he writes with all the authority of a keen horticulturist, and one well-versed in his subject. His directions for the cultivation of this charming flower will therefore be found most valuable, especially by the amateur gardener who takes a pride in obtaining the best results from such plants as it may be his hobby to grow. The phlox is not a flower that demands a great deal of attention; given a moist—but not wet—and slightly shaded position, with an occasional application of liquid manure during the flowering season, phloxes will grow to perfection. There are hundreds upon hundreds of florists' varieties, of which the excellent illustrations which adorn this booklet will give some idea. With the exception of the beautiful Phlox Drummondii all are perennial, some flowering early, others late.

Matriculation Geometry. Books I.-IV.

Conic Sections Made Easy. By SARADAKANTA GANGOPADHYAYA, M.A. (The Student's Library. Calcutta and Dacca.)

IN these days, when hustle is king, an elementary student of science becomes more and more forced to utilise text-books which are written specially for particular examinations. The result to the student is often one of mental stagnation and narrow vision, usually accompanied by a knowledge built up on very insecure foundations. Writers of text-books may be divided into two classes, differing in a manner analogous to the popularly-supposed difference between journalists and littérateurs. Just as the journalist is imagined to keep as his stock-in-trade a scrap-book, a pair of scissors, and a bottle of paste, the former being called into use whenever an article has to be written; so the writer of examination text-books may be expected to work in a study surrounded by examination-papers and syllabuses. The scientific expert, like the true literary man, writes because he must.

The books under notice were specially written for the examinations of the University of Calcutta; but both nevertheless may be utilised as sound general text-books on the subjects with which they respectively deal. As a good introduction to Geometrical Conics we may recommend the second book of the author, who was formerly a professor of mathematics in India. "Matriculation Geometry" contains some very interesting notes, such as the proof that the theorem of Pythagoras, better known as the forty-seventh proposition of Euclid, Book I., was understood by the Hindus in very ancient times. But we feel that the author has not allowed sufficiently for the mental development of his students. If the book is used in class-work the teacher will become a mere corrector of exercises. For instance, a complete page is occupied by the description of the method of drawing parallel straight lines by means of a set-square! Such thoroughness verges on the ridiculous. The book will be of great assistance to private students.

FICTION

The Latent Force. By LIEUT.-COLONEL E. C. THWAYTES. (John Ouseley. 6s.)

ONE approaches the criticism of this book with a certain reluctance. It is difficult to avoid saying too much or too little. But one comes across all too often a novel about which one asks oneself—Why was this ever published? What is there in it which appealed to the publisher's reader and decided him upon a favourable verdict? "The Latent Force," by Lieut.-Colonel E. C. Thwaytes, is such an one. The author lures the reader on by a little Arab story, serving as a prologue to his novel, which is grammatically and interestingly told. Curiously enough, however, the writer seems to have forgotten all knowledge both of grammar and punctuation as soon as he wrote Chapter I. at the head of his paper. Commas are flung in defiantly where their presence is highly objectionable ; semi-colons and present participles suddenly appear in the middle of a line for no apparent rhyme or reason. In consequence the reviewer forgets all about the story in an unholy joy at watching for the apparition of an elementary blunder. A single sentence meanders through some sixteen lines. At the end of it the reader is forced to retrace his steps in order to dislodge the verb which makes sense of the whole. On many of the pages one sentence alone constitutes a paragraph. As to plot, atmosphere, or characterisation, one seeks for them in vain. Of native life the occasional glimpses one has are buried under a mass of meticulous detail and well-meant explanation. The writer has an annoying trick, too, of using native Indian words and then translating them. There is no intention in this criticism of being unnecessarily harsh; evidently the author is a beginner, and as such should appreciate a few straightforward remarks on the question of what to do and what not to do. Lieut.-Colonel Thwaytes writes as a soldier who is concerned rather with polishing his gun-barrel than with the men he must shoot. He taxes patience and forbearance to the utmost.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The Love of Kusuma. By Bal Krishna. With an Introduction by Victoria Cross. (T. Werner Laurie. 6s.)

The Foreword which Miss Victoria Cross has written for Mr. Bal Krishna's book is not only absurdly excessive in its praise, but it belauds the author for quite the wrong things. We could quarrel with almost every sentence of it, but we must content ourselves with contradicting two or three. At the very beginning Miss Victoria Cross says : "One of the greatest points of difference between the outlook of the Eastern and the Western upon Life is the way in which they regard Love, and this difference is very strongly marked in the following love-story." We do not know exactly what Miss Cross means by "the Western," but if, as is natural, she includes the Italian and the Spaniard, then we can only say that the passionate love of Mohan and Kusuma, with its sleepless nights, pallors, faintings, and telepathic dreams, is just the sort of emotion we have always understood to be characteristic of Southern European peoples. Again, "As a mere piece of photography of Indian life, manners, customs, and scenes it (the book) is most valuable." If there is one thing more than another which the book is not, that is a photograph of Indian life and manners. We are not very fond of literary photographs, but we are surprised that Mr. Krishna tells us so little, and that little so ordinary, about Indian life. Surely as a native of India he might have told us a few things hidden even from the devouring eye of a Kipling. But no, he gives us an artless tale of love at first sight which did not run very smoothly ; he describes very pleasantly a little natural scenery ; he gives us slight and commonplace glimpses of two or three Indian households of the wealthy class ; and he finishes up with an account of attack and abduction by robbers in the Rajputana desert, which might perhaps have been dramatic if Mr. Krishna's way of writing were not unusually quiet and matter-of-fact. His material is certainly slight, but he is obviously much occupied with the task of writing neat and correct English, which he does mostly with great success. Sometimes his style takes on a little of what is called "Oriental colour." His moralising is rather too naïve for English readers, but it is certainly well precedented in an Eastern tale. Mr. Krishna's greatest achievement is that he has written a love story without gushing. A writer who can do this ought to be capable of a great deal more than we see in "The Love of Kusuma."

The Card. By Arnold Bennett. (Methuen and Co. 6s. net.)

Compared with "Clayhanger," "The Card" is as a pencil-sketch by the side of a fine, detailed etching ; from the hand of a true artist, however, the sketch may be full of humour and suggestive qualities, and as acceptable in its way as the more elaborate work. "Denry" Machin, the queer "card" who is the hero of this lively story, is one of Mr. Bennett's happiest achievements in lighter vein. Eager to get on, not too scrupulous, quick to profit by the ideas which flash into his brain at critical moments, Edward Henry (called by his mother "Denry") progressed from an insignificant member of the classic Five Towns community to the dignity of Mayor of Bursley. How this crowning glory was accomplished we will not here relate ; nor is "The Card" a book which demands a lengthy review. As an instance of Machin's methods, however, we may mention his golden idea of purchasing for a mere song the old lifeboat at Llandudno which had rescued the crew of a wreck. This craft, he advertised, would make hourly trips to the scene of the wreck at half-a-crown a head ; and the enterprising young man, who had merely purposed a holiday at the watering-place with his best girl, remained to line his pockets—and to fill a hat-box—with sovereigns. Laughter runs through the whole story, and the catastrophic preliminary love-affairs of Denry make good comedy, "The Card" is a very entertaining interlude while we are awaiting the promised sequel to "Clayhanger."

A Lady of the Garter. By Frank Hamel. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)

Mr. Hamel has chosen for the clou of his romantic novel a quotation from Elizabeth Barrett Browning, "The world's male chivalry has perished out, but women are knight-errant to the last." From this standpoint he takes his heroine, Lady Katherine Merivale, through a stirring career full of adventure and excitement to the moment when she is invested with the Order of the Garter. It is regrettable that the book opens somewhat tediously. One has to wade through very many chapters before arriving at the entertaining moments, but, once there, Mr. Hamel's sword-blades clash right vigorously, and death is looked upon by all his characters with a smile. Lady Katherine, married to a soldier, follows him over to France, pursued by the villain, Sir John de Grailly, who, in his way, is greatly enamoured of her. The battles and daring deeds which follow are handled with force and abruptness, leaving the reader gasping and a little bewildered. The reign of Edward III. offers great scope to the historical novelist, and Mr. Frank Hamel may be said to know his history thoroughly.

SPECIAL ISSUES

The "Mid-Winter Number" of the Century Magazine is an especially interesting issue to students of the dramatic art. It opens well with an excellent retrospective paper entitled "Shakespeare on the Stage," the first of a series, in which various interpreters of Hamlet are discussed, both male and female. The contrasts that are drawn are very illuminating, whether we regard differences in style or variations in appearance. "Acting in the Lyric Drama," an article by Mary Garden, deals rather too much in the obvious, as may be inferred from the following sentence:—"In studying the dramatic side of an operatic rôle, it seems to me one often needs to go further than the mere lines of the part set forth by the librettist." Of course! Any knowledge of the stage will show how much more the capable actor puts into his part than was given by the actual words which he utters. In spite of this, however, the article is of great interest, and contains some peculiarly significant passages concerning the psychology of an interpretation of an emotional scene. The fiction, poetry, and humour of this number are of the usual high standard, and the illustrations in colour set an example which many of our own magazines might well emulate.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

United Empire, the journal of the Royal Colonial Institute, has for its principal article "The Next Imperial Conference," by Mr. L. H. Hordern, in which the writer discusses the difficulties which lie in the path of consolidation, and makes several interesting but not always practicable suggestions in furtherance of that Imperial unity which still seems far in the distance. Organisation is the leading note of this clever and well-considered essay, and all who have the welfare of the Empire at heart should read it carefully.

MUSIC

Forty years ago on Maundy Thursday Bach's "Passion according to St. Matthew" was sung for the first time in Westminster Abbey, the performance being mainly due, we believe, to the zeal of Dr. Troutbeck and Mr. Barnby, whose energies were cordially approved by good Dean Stanley, in spite of the fact that he was, as his biographer puts it, entirely destitute of musical feeling. Fierce controversy raged round the Abbey walls in consequence. Many a "Handel Commemoration" had been held in times past within them, but any movement blessed by Dean Stanley was anathema to most of his brethren. It was supposed that some of them would not unwillingly have led him to the stake the year before, which was that of what they called the "Vance Smith Scandal," and after the "Passion" had been sung Mr. Barnby wrote to Sir Frederick Ouseley, "My life is hardly safe within the precincts of Westminster." We have become wiser and more tolerant. For many years the "Passion" music has been devoutly performed in St. Paul's Cathedral, and there is hardly a church where such performances would be condemned. Once more have the reverend walls of Westminster echoed to the solemn, beautiful music. Permission was granted by the Dean to the Bach Choir, and on February 17th they sang it in the nave. We decided to hear it from a place in Poets' Corner, and were truly thankful that we had done so. Many people cannot enjoy music unless they can see those who are making it, though the sight is not always an impressive one. At Queen's Hall, on Saturday, half the occupants of the stalls stood up, the better to delight in Herr Rosenthal's feats on the pianoforte. We ourselves prefer not to look at the performers; the enjoyment of music to us is multiplied tenfold if we can hear it in tranquillity, without having our sight or our senses disturbed by the movements of the exécutants. Here, then, was an opportunity of indulging our fancy that was on no account to be lost. It was probable that we should have heard all the details of the performance more clearly had we been in the nave; perhaps its beauties might have been more apparent, but so would have been its imperfections, and we should have been able to find fault, and to go away dissatisfied with this and that. We are sure that we chose the better part. Distance lent its enchantment as we listened from near the spot where Handel sleeps. We were told afterwards that some of the singers had not always sung in tune, that the orchestra had now and then committed a crime, that the choir was feeble at some points. But of all this we were blissfully unconscious. We could hear as well as we wished. The sweet, grave music floated up among the arches with all the added effect of mystery, as we could not tell from whence it came; and the faults, if faults there were, had been purged away before they reached our ears. The transept was dimly lighted by candles, and a great stillness fell upon the vast audience the moment that the music began. We might almost have been alone among the dead as we listened to the eternal story unfolded in Bach's "dignified musical prose." The world was only recalled to us when we looked up from our score and along the transept to where through the north door, which has panels of glass, we could see the hurrying lights of motor-cars, and the form of a policeman passing and repassing.

Lamps and policemen are not easily to he compared with swallows and butterflies, but the note of life which they struck reminded us forcibly of the curious effect of the birds and insects which came fluttering about one in the theatre at Ober-Ammergau, unconscious of the scenes on which our minds were rapt. It is true that except from Mr. McInnes, who sang the music of the Saviour, and who was in every respect the most distinctly heard, the words were not clear; but then we knew the words. It is true that the effect of the wind-instruments was not always apparent (perhaps there were not enough of them compared with the strings), but our score told us that they were playing, which was a great help, and frequently (as in the case of the oboe da caccia accompaniment to "Ach, Golgotha," and the oboe in "Ich will bei meinem Jesu wachen") their distant melody was touched by an ethereal beauty. It is true that the dramatic music was more blurred than the lyric, and that the organ sometimes played the part of a too predominant partner; but all this was as dust in the balance. We have heard some fine and many moving perfomances of the "Matthew Passion," one of them under Herr Mengelberg, at Amsterdam, was by very much that which most nearly approached perfection, but we can truthfully say that, owing to the environment of Poets' Corner perhaps, we had never heard a more appealing performance than that given by the Bach Choir in Westminster Abbey. We think it must be the case that the performers were one and all animated by the right spirit; that the great work was really well done; that we were not deceived by the glamour of our corner into thinking so. The choir surely sang with tenderness and great feeling the orchestra played with sobriety; the ladies, Miss von Glehn and Miss Dilys Jones, showed purity of voice and right phrasing. Mr. Bertram Mills, the bass, was always good, and as for Mr. Gervase Elwes and Mr. McInnes, it is not easy, without seeming exaggeration, to express one's gratitude for the so finely-controlled fervour with which they sang. We wished that Purcell could have heard it all, even though he be in that place where his harmony (and Bach's, too) is exceeded, and Handel, and all the poets and musicians, among whose tombs we sat. Milton, we felt, would have approved the fair music that these creatures were making. He does not lie in the Abbey; there is only the monument in whose inscription "Mr. Benzon has bestowed more words upon himself than upon Milton." But could his spirit have returned to wander under that "high embowed roof," and hear the "full-voiced quire below," we think that even that "too proud and too sensitive" man might for once have been tranquil and happy.

How shall we fitly commend the liberal spirit shown by the directors of the Classical Concert Society? Devoted as they are to Bach, Beethoven, and Brahms, they have yet had the self-sacrifice to filch one of their precious afternoons from their trinity, and give it up to the moderns of France! The result was a concert of the very first order of interest and beauty. Of interest, because it taught us that the young players who call themselves "The English String Quartett," Messrs. Thomas Morris, Herbert Kinze, Frank Bridge, and Ivor James, can actually play Debussy's Quartett as it ought to be played. We will frankly own that we had not expected English players to show such a fine power of expressing the delicate art of Debussy. We do not say that Messrs. Morris and Co. surpassed some of the wonderful foreign quartett-parties who have probably played Debussy a great many more times, and who have doubtless lived in an atmosphere more penetrated with the modern French spirit, but we could hardly have desired to hear the second and third movements of Debussy's enchanting quartett more charmingly played. The first movement was a little harsh. It is marked très décidé, and the performers' decision was a little too imperious. The rhythms of the last movement were not quite successfully marked; but even in these two movements there was very much to praise, and the great thing is that the young artists had got deeply into the meaning of the music. We would willingly have heard it all over again. Then we had solos by Mr. Percy Grainger. We cannot think that his touch is suitable for Ravel's homage to the "Dieu fluvial riant de l'eau qui le chatouille," or for Debussy's "L'Ile Joyeuse." It is glittering enough, but too hard. He was much more to our liking in two brilliant and amusing pieces from the "Iberia" of Albeniz. These he dashed off with much dexterity and force. César Franck's magnificent Piano Quintett came last. Perhaps this is at present too great a piece of music to be thoroughly explained to us by these players. At any rate, they did not speak Franck's language "in its depths."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Why is it that so few artists pay composers the compliment of carrying out their instructions to the letter? At the last London Symphony Concert a new pianist, Miss Tina Lerner, played Chopin's Concerto in F minor with a lovely touch and the clearest and cleanest technique, and with a frequent grace which made up for a certain want of warmth and power. But any one who knew the score well could have put his finger on many, many passages marked by Chopin to be played in a particular way which Miss Lerner played in quite another way! Now, no composer has left more careful indications of the manner in which he wishes his music to be played than Franck. Yet time after time one hears his music marred by the wilfulness of players who will not regard his directions. He is particularly fond of the effect of sudden changes of tone, dolce subito, dim. subito, and so forth; he loves to suggest a nuance—piano ma drammatico, pianissimo ma marcato, &c. But his interpreters too often play as if they had not read him. This was the case on the occasion of which we write, and we cannot say that the splendidly-pregnant themes were given with all their significance, or that the climaxes were built up with perfectly graduated steps. The second movement was the most successful, though Mr. Grainger did not murmur his part as most of it ought to be murmured.

Mr. Holbrooke promised us a new Clarinet Quintett at his concert, which one hoped to find a worthy pendant to the masterpieces in that form of Mozart and Brahms. But it had not been sufficiently rehearsed, so that the composer fell back upon his "Diabolique." With Mr. Gammon he essayed C. Franck's Sonata for P.F. and Violin, but he played it almost as if he were doing so for the first time, omitting many notes, scrambling through difficult passages, and playing so loud that his colleague was overwhelmed. Mr. Holbrooke's programme notes are generally interesting; but they, too, give the impression that they have been dashed off in a hurry. Why should Franck's personality be characterised as "timid"? Mr. Holbrooke probably meant nothing more than that the great Frenchman had the rare virtue of tone humility. He did well in allowing us to hear Richard Strauss' early effort in chamber music, the P. F. Quartett in C, Op. 13. We do not wish to hear it again, and are unable to agree with Mr. Ernest Newman that in its slow movement Strauss "sings himself into that ideal world of ecstasy and enchantment in which the older musicians spent their most golden hours," or that the movement "stands unique among Strauss' work both in its pure beauty and in its æsthetic purpose." We seem to detect the "note of provinciality" in such criticism. But the work was interesting as showing us, as Strauss' other early attempts have shown, how little was this Boy the Father of the Man. Wagner's symphony, written when he was eighteen, which Sir Henry Wood revived on Saturday, was interesting for the same reason, but not otherwise, in spite of its clever imitation of earlier models, and its undeniably bright scherzo. At this concert Mr. Rosenthal's playing of Schumann's Concerto was of memorable beauty, though he did not always seem on the happiest terms with the orchestra. His playing of the brilliant passages was spotlessly perfect, and on the interpretative side he must be given abundant praise. Always romantic, he never overdid the sentiment. To match his feats of dexterity in his Fantasia on old Strauss' waltz-tunes ("Tausend und Eine Nachts" the best of them) one would have to arrange the piece for at least six pianolas to be played simultaneously, and then we do not think they could do it! We must not omit to record that Mr. Frank Bridges' Symphonic Poem "Isabella" was performed at the London Symphony Orchestra's concert under its composer's direction. A first hearing made us anxious to know it better, for it was at once apparent that here was a work of serious aim and real power which would be worth repeating, not a mere clever student's exercise, but the composition of a musician with something of his own to say.

UNIONIST ORGANISATION

By Sir Charles Walpole

There is no doubt that the want of proper organisation accounts for the lack of greater success of the Unionist Party at the two General Elections held in 1910.

The present outcry is against the Central Office, and I doubt not that much is wanting to make headquarters efficient; but though reform may to advantage be effected there, the radical need for reform is in the constituencies

This is by no means the case in all constituencies; but, I fear, in a very great number, not only faulty, but absence of organisation is at the root of the mischief, and I venture to say that if every constituency was organised throughout Great Britain as some are organised with which I am acquainted, the Unionists would sweep the country, including London, and not excluding a large percentage in Wales and Scotland.

Each constituency is a unit, is self-governing, and is very jealous of outside interference, especially from headquarters. In many there are local magnates who are wedded to the old methods, and who resent any attempt to bring fresh blood into the governing clique. In some cases they will neither do the work themselves nor allow any one else to do it for them. The Central Office may have all the will, all the knowledge, and all the ability to show them the way they should go, but it is a matter of extreme delicacy to get changes made without giving offence to influential personages, and so doing more harm than good.

In these democratic days a constituency must be organised on a democratic basis, and every Unionist in every class of life who is anxious to help (and they have only to be looked for to be found in thousands) should be enlisted in the cause and made to feel that he has an interest and a share in the wellbeing and eventual success of the party.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Each constituency should be subdivided into branches.

In urban districts the whole area should be parcelled out according to wards, in country districts according to parishes. Each ward or branch should have its own committee, elected, like a parish council, at a parish meeting, with its chairman, vice-chairman, secretary, and treasurer. Each branch should send elected representatives to the central council, and its chosen delegates to the executive committee of the constituency, and should also have its own executive committee, the greater in number the better, so chosen that its active members should be planted about in every corner of the ward, and every populous part of a branch in a rural constituency.

It should be the business of each one of these members to send information from time to time to the local secretary of the arrival of the newcomers and the departure and destination (where possible) of residents leaving, to spread the light amongst his neighbours in his own immediate area, and on polling-day to do his best to bring the sound voter to the poll. The local executive should consist of all classes, high and low; the best workers and the best canvassers will be found among the artisan, servant and small shop-keeping class, and the information they will give is always reliable.

The executive committee of the constituency, elected by the branches, must be kept in touch with the sub-areas. The Central Council is responsible for the choosing of a suitable candidate from those whom it is the business of the executive to select for choice and adoption. The Central Council should elect its own officers, and especially the Chairman of the Association, whose business it is, with the help of his chief agent or Organising Secretary and his Executive Committee, to superintend and vitalise the thoroughly organised structure of the constituency.

Your unit is then a complete and complex whole, ready at the pressing of a button to take the field.

The next most important thing is that each constituency should be self-supporting. Every effort should be made to collect sufficient revenue (the smaller the sums subscribed the better, if sufficient in number) to pay the salary of the organising secretary, and the expenses of registration, rent of offices, printing, postages, and such like, so that the constituency when looking for a candidate shall be able to go to him and say, "We run the machine for you year in and year out—we do not ask you for any assistance, we only leave it to you to pay your election expenses and meet the current subscriptions which are usually looked for."

Each branch also in a country constituency should have its own little fund, raised by local subscription, to pay its current expenses and a small salary to its secretary.

If all the constituencies were organised in this way, the Central Offices would be free to conduct the campaign like ths General Staff of an army.

Happily a great number of the constituencies are organised efficiently, more or less, in the way I have described; but, unhappily, a great number are not. I am acquainted with one constituency, where there was recently a by-election with literally no shadow of an organisation. All was absolute chaos. There were no ward committees, no Central Council, no executive body until at the last moment matters were taken in hand and agents drafted in from outside; there was no organised body of workers, though many willing hands were soon found; there was no marked register, no sources of local knowledge to guide the canvassers, no record of the removals. In another constituency (which was won at the General Election of January by a substantial majority), when the General Election of December arrived everything had been allowed to go to sleep; even the sitting Member appeared not to have troubled to see that his organisation was efficiently maintained—all was confusion, no one had his own line of country allotted to him, and those who thought themselves to be pillars were wrangling instead of working in unison and concord.

I need not say what was the result in both these divisions.

Of course in many cases a shortness of funds is one of the great difficulties. A poor constituency finds itself unable to be self-supporting, and, instead of making an effort, looks out for a rich candidate to pay the piper. This is one of the very worst conditions of things. It is all-important that the constituency should be independent of the candidate or Member, and in such cases it would be wiser for the Central Office to assist with a subsidy, or pay the salary of the organising secretary, at least for a time; it would then be in a position to insist on the organisation being efficiently conducted in the most up-to-date-manner.

Where the fault of the Central Office lies is in its not persisting in compelling the proper organisation of constituencies which are in a parlous state, and in keeping well-organised constituencies up to the mark.

As I have already said, this is a very delicate work to carry out in a great many cases—and in many it would, perhaps, be quite impossible for the chief agent to effect his object, however strong and tactful a man he might be. In such cases I would suggest that a strong front-bench man, such as an ex-Cabinet Minister, should take matters in hand and visit the constituency, assemble the unmanageable magnates, and put the case so forcibly before them from the patriotic point of view, that with some self-sacrifice and self-denial the desired end might be achieved.

If statesmen of this calibre would take such cases up on the lines which the chief agent would himself have adopted the trouble might be vanquished. It is worth any amount of painstaking and patience to weld the units into a composite whole. Until this is done, and the constituencies are rendered healthy, the Chief Whip and the Central Office and the National Union are merely wasting their time.

There is one other thing to be remembered—viz., that when once the work has been done it must be kept going and not allowed to fall to pieces; the organisation should be constant, the work never-ending.

The mainspring in each unit must, of course, be the agent or organising secretary, the whole of whose time should be devoted to the work, and it is the business of the chairman and the executive committee to see that he does his work well, and does not get slack. It is, then, all-important that the agent should be hard working, intelligent, tactful, and enthusiastic, with a fairly good knowledge of registration and election law.

Good agents do not grow on the blackberry-bushes, and the lack of good agents is one of the weak spots in the party.

It would be most valuable if the Central Office were to institute a school for agents, and if possible create a sort of service for agents, with a system of pensions. The salary of an agent must vary according to the importance of the constituency, and it would be an incentive to the agent to know that there were prizes to be won in the profession, especially in the Central Office, to which the humblest student in agency could aspire. Merit should be the only ground for promotion, and patronage of the unworthy duffer should be a deadly sin. It will be objected that this will all cost money; but doubtless there might be many economies practised by a chief agent with financial instincts, and, of course, anything like a pension scheme would be founded on a contributory basis.

One of the most vital things which contribute to success is the selection of a suitable candidate.

Each constituency should select its own candidate, and only

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Foreign Affairs. On the North-West frontier he adopted what was practically a compromise between Lord Lawrence's principle of non-interference and the Forward Policy of later times: he cultivated friendly relations with the frontier tribes, and from Chitral to Seistan withdrew the regular troops, and substituted for them as frontier garrisons tribal militia or levies, commanded by British officers. This plan was so successful that there were no military operations, except one blockade against the Mahsud-Waziris, which brought them to reason. On the death of Abdurrahman, Amir of Afghanistan, in October, 1901, the succession devolved without disturbance on his son Habibullah, who maintained the same friendly relations with India, and received a British Mission in 1904-05 to renew the former agreement made with his father. After ineffectual attempts to get into correspondence with the Dalai Lama of Lhasa, in order to improve political and trade relations with Tibet, Lord Curzon was allowed in 1903 to despatch a Mission to Tibet, to carry out the previous Anglo-Chinese Convention and the existing Trade Regulations; war with Tibet resulted, the Mission being opposed, and, on the defeat of the Tibetans, a Treaty was negotiated with the de facto Government—the Dalai Lama having fled. By these operations the late Russian intrigues at Lhasa were counteracted and terminated. Besides availing himself of opportunities to cultivate amicable relations with Persia, Lord Curzon, late in 1903, took a cruise up the Persian Gulf, touching at the principal ports of commerce, to make acquaintance with the local potentates. He explained in Durbar the principles of British supervision over the peace of the Gulf, the intention of preventing any encroachment on British interests, and the desire to increase trade and maintain the sphere of British influence in Southern Persia.

Lord Curzon also made important speeches to the border chiefs and clans at Quetta and Peshawar, and forwarded the development of the Nushki-Seistan trade route, which avoids Afghanistan. In 1899 the prompt despatch of troops from India to South Africa saved Natal from the Boers; Indian troops were also employed in Somaliland against the Mullah, and in China for the protection of the European Legations at Peking. From the Native Princes of India, whom he claimed as his colleagues and partners in the task of administration, Lord Curzon, while addressing them on their duties and responsibilities, required improvements in their government, and their personal attention to the affairs of their States. With the Nizam of Hyderabad he concluded an agreement by which, for an annual payment of twenty-five lakhs to the Nizam, the Government of India obtained a perpetual lease of Berar, and were able to place it under the Chief Commissioner of the Central Provinces. The Chief's Colleges at Rajkot, in Kattiawar, Indore, Lahore, and Ajmere were reformed, and the Imperial Cadet Corps was established, which gave hopes of some opening in military service for the scions of the noble families. The Coronation Durbar at Delhi on January 1st, 1903, attended by the Duke and Duchess of Connaught, held to celebrate the accession of the first Emperor of India, was a gorgeous pageant, calculated to impress deeply the numerous Native Princes, who came to show their loyalty, and the representatives of all classes, Europeans and Indians, officials and non-officials, there assembled. Its cost, about £200,000, was criticised by some, but with no effect. The incidence of taxation in India, Lord Curzon explained, is among the lightest in any nation in the world. He travelled extensively throughout India, leaving no part unvisited, from Quetta to Manipur and Mandalay, from Peshawar to the South, including all the important Native States; he held constant durbars and made eloquent speeches. His activity in the internal administration was no less marked, and requires separate notice.

THE THEATRE

"MR. JARVIS" AT WYNDHAM'S THEATRE

An inn. Fielding's at Rochester, which might just as well be Fielding's anywhere else, or, for the matter of that, Smith's, Brown's, or Robinson's. People everywhere—ladies of quality, men of fashion, porters, postboys, pedlars, ostlers, valets, ladies'-maids, and a fiddler who keeps his back towards us. Much noise. Loud laughter and chatter. Shouting of plebeians. The half-mad ravings of a seventeenth-century John Burns, and, above all, the thin note of the mysterious fiddler's violin. More noise and the entrance of two soldiers, which leads to nothing. Much broken conversation, of a type which ought not to be overheard—but which is delivered loudly enough to become the property of porters, postboys, pedlars, ostlers, valets, ladies'-maids, and especially of the mysterious fiddler—between the ladies of quality and the men of fashion, who are labelled Henry St. John, Viscount Bolingbroke, Sir Lionel Pilkington, Captain Drummond, Lady Betty Acton, and Lord Peter Wildmore, a person who has a Lancashire accent, although he hails from Ireland. Above it all two sounds—the thin note of the violin and the creaking of the play's machinery. Then the entrance of the man Fielding and the enforced exit of the seventeenth-century John Burns, still shouting, still yelling execration at the lazy rich after the manner of his kind. The coach is waiting for the gentry and the audience for something to happen. With the departure of the coach the audience is temporarily appeased. The stage is empty. No, there are two legs visible under a table in a recess. They belong to the mysterious fiddler. No sound is heard by way of a change, except the creaking of the play's machinery, which now creaks more loudly than ever. The mysterious fiddler yawns, stretches, comes out backwards, fully aware of the fact that he is being watched by the audience. He throws off his hat, removes a large pair of goggles, and stands convicted. Good heavens! it is Gerald Du Maurier. How versatile! . . .

A slight mistake. The stage was not empty. We have forgotten Lady Margaret Beauchamp, who had come from nowhere to be on in time to see the mysterious fiddler seize hungrily upon some broken meats. The creaking grows louder. A gasp from Lady Margaret, a widening of the eyes, and a falling open of the mouth. Ah! what have we here forsooth? Another gasp and more widening and an unexpected genuflection on the part of the young lady from nowhere, whose movements are manipulated by the authors, who are pulling on strings from the flies. "My liege! my liege!" quo' she tremulously. Some surprise on the part of the mysterious fiddler, who, nevertheless, mutters "Rise" right royally. Further loud creaking. In the gallery above stands Captain Drummond, secretary to Sarah Duchess of Marlborough. "God save the King," saith Lady Margaret. "Not at all," from the mysterious fiddler. Raised eyebrows and rolling eyes from the gallery. In another instant, to appropriate music from the orchestra, Captain Drummond is face to face with the still more mysterious fiddler. But the sound which dominates everything is the creaking of the machinery. Hailing from nowhere, Lady Margaret then returns thither, lingeringly, for the eyes of the mysterious fiddler are upon her hungrily. Bursts of "I' faith!" and "Gadzooks!" and other historical expressions from Captain Drummond, who adds, in a voice loud enough to rise temporarily above the creaking, "The likeness! 'Tis exact." Irritation on the part of the mysterious fiddler, who has been told before ad nauseam that he might be a twin to Mr. Jarvis, the Pretender—the usual Pretender, the old, old Pretender. He is, however, not Mr.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Jarvis—if he had been the sound of the creaking of the machinery would never have been heard.

He is a Charles Lebrun, natural son of some one or other, possibly a Charles, possibly a James, a person, however, with a profound knowledge of languages, who has served in many wars, and who is in Rochester for no other reason than that he may be used by the authors and acted by Mr. Du Maurier. Whoever he is, he bears so striking a resemblance to the Pretender in question as presently, when dressed in Drummond's clothes (who himself appears to masquerade as the Pretender at odd moments, for his wig and costumes are exactly like those of Mr. Jarvis), to bring a gasp from Sarah Duchess of Marlborough, and Lord Godolphin. This is precisely what Captain Drummond hoped to achieve, for he had bought the mysterious fiddler's face for four hundred crowns, his intention being to make Lebrun masquerade as Mr. Jarvis for no other reason than that he may wring from Bolingbroke and his friends written expressions of their loyalty to the Pretender, which afterwards may be handed to Queen Anne to the discomfiture of the writers, and the return to favouritism of Sarah Duchess of Marlborough. We have, however, anticipated events, such as they are. Something must obviously happen on the stage while the mysterious fiddler turns himself into Mr. Jarvis. So it is given up to Sarah, who herself does a turn. She curses and throws food about, spits and boxes people's ears, issues termagantian cries, and, in the curious but descriptive language of the Americans, "makes things hum some." Altogether a rather entertaining interlude, conducted with great spirit by Miss Henrietta Watson.

And then the hidden orchestra, employed by innkeeper Fielding, strikes up softly. The machinery creaks again, and along the gallery and down the stairs comes the mysterious fiddler. He is, however, no longer the mysterious. fiddler, with unkempt hair, and worn, ill-fitting clothes. He is the Royal Pretender, who passes under the name of Mr Jarvis. We have already said that at sight of him Sarah gasps. Without any prompting from Captain Drummond, with the marvellous intuition of all Pretenders, the mysterious fiddler shows his teeth in the mirthless Stuart way, and holds out his hand to be kissed. Captain Drummond's infantile plan is hailed with acclamation by Sarah, who is labelled Duchess of Marlborough, but who might just as well be Sarah Gamp. And presently, to the creaking of machinery, the curtain falls.

Lady Margaret Beauchamp's house in London. Two weeks elapse. Discovered in a room with a noticeably excellent carved-wood fireplace, real wainscoting, and a dummy spinet, two wooden figures—Mistress Cochrane and the Lady Margaret before mentioned, who, it will be remembered, came from nowhere into the first Act in riding-clothes, unattended, and sat on an inn table in the common parlour among the broken meats. Talk of loyalty to his Majesty, ecstatic talk, quite unbelievable in the mouths of those who are supposed to be in the favour of Queen Anne. White roses and a letter from Captain Drummond, and a further talk of loyalty to the King. The entrance of Captain Drummond, fully disguised under a nom de guerre. Mr. Fielding's private orchestra has evidently been removed from Rochester to Lady Margaret Beauchamp's house in London, for, just as the doors open wide and the temporary Mr. Jarvis makes his appearance, it breaks into soft music, the same soft music. Can it be that it has been employed by Lady Margaret to drown the sound of the creaking of the machinery? If so, the intention, though excellent, is abortive. Deep genuflections, more imitations of the mirthless Stuart smile, and two kisses. In the background raised eyebrows and rolling eyes. How to pass the Act? Ah! there is the spinet forsooth, or i' faith, it matters not. But the Lady Margaret Beauchamp can neither sing nor play. What matter? This is a machine-made play, and so there is a spinet "off" and a lady with her mouth to a convenient trap-door.

The long-suffering audience, fully aware of the mild trick that is being played upon them, listen to the song, to the spinet accompaniment, sung and played by the Lady Margaret without any apparent effort. At the end of this somewhat childish display enter Henry St. John, Viscount Bolingbroke, who might just as well be Charles St. James, Viscount Brokeingbol. Minor things happen, for this person gives the gasp we have expected of him on coming face to face with Mr. Jarvis. Further exhibitions of the mirthless Stuart smile and the promise from Bolingbroke of his letter of loyalty which is so urgently desired by the disguised Captain Drummond, whom it is impossible to recognise under his nom de guerre. Exit the easily gullible, so-called Viscount Bolingbroke, who, evidently not a master of the three R's, is given a fortnight in which to write his letter. There being still ten minutes or so before the curtain usually falls, Mr. Jarvis kindly obliges by giving an exhibition of royal love-making. He wishes to kiss the Lady Margaret, and she, swearing she will ne'er consent, consents. The kiss is about to be consummated when—Ah! What have we here? Who is that sitting in the window-recess, with raised eyebrows and rolling eyes? 'Tis Drummond, alias McNeil. It is one part of his bargain with the mysterious fiddler that he shall kiss the Lady Margaret, so, spoil sport that he is, he edges to the door, opens it, shuts it with a bang, comes down centre and reminds his "Royal Highness" that the hour has arrived when he must attend to affairs of State. Oh, how the machinery creaks and how the orchestra swells! Mr. Jarvis turns angrily, like the wolf despoiled of his prey, raises his upper lip in order to give yet another exhibition of the mirthless Stuart smile and marches slowly to the door. Genuflections and curtain.

It cannot be necessary to follow the obvious mazes of this creaking thing with any further detail. Of course, Mr. Jarvis is discovered to be a pretender, but not the Pretender. Of course, the Lady Margaret, who has just sworn that she will follow him barefoot to the world's end, turns violently upon him and rends him with coarse words. Of course, the mysterious fiddler then leaves her presence—slowly, oh, so slowly—while the convenient orchestra from Fielding's renders the song, which her ladyship did not sing, with exquisite vibrato and rallentando. Of course, the Lady Margaret, who has, as we knew she would, plucked the white rose of a blameless life from her bosom and flung it at her feet, cries out, "He has gone! my King!" bursts into floods of tears, stoops, gathers up the still intact rose and presses it to her lips. Vibrato, passionato, crescendo,—Curtain.

Captain Drummond's rooms in Bishopsgate early the following morning, so early that the day has not yet broken. For all that the Lady Margaret is abroad and so is the seventeenth-century John Burns and the mob of that period, early risers all. Many things now happen, and all of them ridiculous. The so-called Mr. Jarvis is once more the mysterious fiddler, and, having washed his hands in real water with real soap, and dried them on a real towel, and, having spoken somewhat to Captain Drummond's man, he is told that Lady Margaret is below. She has come to save him from the mob led by the seventeenth-century John Burns. So, for no other purpose than to keep the curtain up, the fiddler gets back into Mr. Jarvis' wig, places himself in front of the window, through which two stones are flung, and addresses the mob in a high, hollow voice.

Drummond, now no longer alias McNeil, has joined his tool, who is then the recipient of a bullet in a vital part. Other early risers include Mistress Cochrane and Viscount

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Bolingbroke, who are taking the early morning air in Bishopsgate, which is some distance from their haunts. Anger from within and without. More noise than ever, but above it all the creaking of the machinery. Inconceivable happenings, and, finally, the fiddler in a heap upon the floor with the passionate young lips of the Lady Margaret upon his equally heated brow. He is dead. The wound is vital . . . Nonsense! This is a machine-made play. The kisses restore him to himself. After some feeble remonstrance, he hands the incriminating letters, greatly desired by Bolingbroke, to Captain Drummond, who tears them up at once, although he has occupied all his time and much of his money to obtain them, and throws them upon the fire—the fire which has been burning all night. And then, in order that the mysterious fiddler who has made him look so great a fool shall bear him no ill-will in the future, Henry St. John, Viscount Bolingbroke, offers him a snug and lucrative post in a sunny clime, and turns obligingly away so that the Lady Margaret may fling herself into the tattered and despicable arms of a rogue and blackguard, whose French accent is delicious but whose manners leave much to be desired, and are indeed no better, and particularly like those of Arsène Lupin. The ubiquitous orchestra from Fielding's, not to be beaten, has followed our strange collection of dolls and marionettes from the Lady Margaret's house, and is hidden somewhere in Captain Drummond's room. And so once again it is handy with its vibrato, impassionato, crescendo just before the curtain falls.

It is quite unnecessary to say that the actors concerned in this infantile production can do nothing with their rôles. For the most part they look extremely foolish, and the only point in the whole of the production which affords any surprise is why Mr. Gerald Du Maurier ever had anything to do with it. Is there not one candid friend attached to this new management?

A STRONG MAN FUTILE

Poor Othello! He looks pitifully at us over a sea of misunderstanding and failure. Tripped and obstructed in his own day by the very excellences that lay in him, he has been wrestled with since but not unriddled, much discussed yet little understood. "My parts, my title," says he when first we see him, "and my perfect soul shall manifest me rightly." So he spoke, back over the years! Would he speak thus now?

He asked not for sympathy; he was not of the stuff that sought it. He would have spurned the subtleties of peripatetic defence. He himself was sternest in censure of himself; even as he was unerring in mentioning, with kingly dignity, those attributes that had won him place and power before, but that had unwrought him in the end. Free of introspection though he was, he yet knew himself; and assuredly the subtle Iago was not unaware of him. Even so frail a dupe as Roderigo did not fail in striking his central note. It was he who made Brabantio aware that his daughter had been plucked away by "an extravagant and whirling stranger of here and everywhere." Othello, too, in no way suspecting the traitorous ear that heard it, says the same thing: "For know, Iago," says he:—

> But that I love the gentle Desdemona,
> I would not my unhouséd free condition
> Put into circumscription and confine
> For the sea's worth.

He has won to mature age, to weight of opinion and office, never knowing the bonds of condition. His location was "here and everywhere." His condition was "free and unhoused." His disposition was "whirling and extravagant;" he would course the earth as his choice dictated. And he prized it. An ancient Pliny might declare the "riches of the sea" to be past all reckoning. Be it so! He would yet not exchange it for his liberty.

Moreover, such a life had left its mark on him. It had, indeed, moulded him to its fashion. Since his arms had but "seven years' pith" in them they had used "their dearest action in the tented field." He had been "sold to slavery," and had won his redemption thence. His "disastrous chances," his "moving accidents by flood and field," his "hairbreadth 'scapes i' the imminent deadly breach"—all had given him not only to love his freedom well, but to meet his perplexity with short, straight deed, thus to proceed to the next matter in hand. Widely travelled was he, and could speak of strange marvels at the remotest ends of the earth; nevertheless "little of his great world" could he speak, "more than pertains to feats of broil and battle." And a mood so bred is not one to weigh and excogitate the perplexities of a ravelled occasion.

Such was the man who came to Venice: liberty-loving and imperious, prizing his freedom and proud of his "perfect soul"! He came to Venice to seek service, and it was "nine moons" ere any could be found him. Those "nine moons" chafed him; he regarded them as "wasted." He did not desire languor; he wished activity, he hungered for the things of count—

> The neighing steed, and the shrill trump,
> The spirit-stirring drum, th' ear-piercing fife,
> The royal banner, and all quality,
> Pride, pomp, and circumstance of glorious war.

Baulked of these, the only realities to him, he sought to recreate them by dwelling on the deeds and adventures of his past. With something between modesty and pride (with that modesty which is all pride) he permits himself to be questioned on his vigorous history by the courtly Brabantio, and in replying he does not forget that the "gentle Desdemona," the duteous daughter in this hospitable house, hangs on his words. He is warmed by that fact. Something that had not hitherto accosted him in his life greets him now. Moreover, his "nine moons wasted" soften him to submit to the gentle influence.

Was ever so strange an opposition? He, a stranger to the gentler ways of women, and she in mute wonder at these monstrous experiences of his! He was even such a man as her dreams had pictured for splendour and power. It was not strange but inevitable that "she wished that Heaven had made her such a man." And he? In truth he was no marrying man; his mood and habits rebelled against all thought of shackles to his freedom. But she won him with as remote and wild a charm as he won her. She came to him as an angel might—wild because unknown, wondrous because strange. Moreover, she pitied him! Whoever before had thought to pity so stout a warrior as he? Said he:—

> She loved me for the dangers I had passed;
> And I loved her that she did pity them.

"This only is the witchcraft I have used," he adds. It was witchcraft enough. It was the philtre of the wondrous.

What could be the outcome of such a union? From its inception it trembled on disaster. Would he not bruise her with his resolute handling of life? Would she not irk him with the very gentleness that had first won him? Moreover, there was another trait in him that whispered danger. For a man who wins to the height of years without ever having to bend to a gentler companion; a man aloof so long, not only from conjugal embrace, but from the softening of feminine ways, such a man will, if he marry at last, be touched with a grossness that may easily flame to jealousy, even to the picturing of gross visions at a hint of infidelity. He will be uxorious to the limit of irritability. Furthermore, a man who through all these years has never known place or property, will seek these even to selfishness in his wife, if he marry at last. And so secluded a girl as Desdemona, so confiding and trustful, moreover, would be but little likely to understand so imperious a husband. Yet Othello was one who was open as the day; of perfect honour; compact of generosity—which might well win them both beyond the first troublous tacks to the open sea. There needed but the boon of peace, of mutual faith and tranquillity.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

That was a boon not to be granted. Iago hung near; and he was one who knew Othello well, and hated him not less. He was a man whose young mind swung to filth and iniquity as a magnet to the Pole. Breathing evil with his every breath, emitting filth with his every word, he hated virtue on instinct. He cast about for reasons of hatred, but his instinct sprang before all reasons from a virginal evil. Thus he hated the "free and open Othello;" whereas the union of a noble Othello and a pure and lovely Desdemona roused him to a height of furious, unconsidering hatred. He hated the gentle Cassio too; and he determined to whelm all three in an imbroglio that shall give play to his cunning intellect, and rouse delighted laughter in the fiends that infest his mind. That he shall thereby win money from his dupe Roderigo is but another whip to his instinct.

That Othello has faith in him he knows well. Was not his bluff, crude manner put on to fend distrust? On this he relies for success with his desperate plan. First by hints, suggestions, innuendos, half-revealings, he prepares Othello's mind to receive the full blast of his vile suggestion. Its very monstrous character is its own surety, and Iago's bluff manner, surely, is earnest of his honesty! But its deadliest guarantee to success is the gross mood in Othello's mind that awaits its reception. It touches his raw uxoriousness, his sense of place and property. Forthwith the words fly from him:—

> O curse of marriage,
> That we can call these delicate creatures ours,
> And not their appetites! I had rather be a toad,
> And live upon the corner of a dungeon,
> Than keep a corner in the thing I love
> For others' uses.

The very sight of her purity, as she comes to him, mocks him. It, by terrible irony, fans this very gross mood in him that strikes conviction on Iago's tale.

"Farewell the tranquil mind! farewell content! farewell the plumed troop, and the big wars, that made ambition virtue," he cries; and flies into a fury of denunciation against Iago. This is even what that subtle intellect desired. In the hot defence of himself he pours out filthy images that fan Othello's gross mood aflame again. It is swift work now; and that Iago knows well, rejoicing in the excitement. Let Othello's mind once cool from this, and all is undone for Iago. So he brings out circumstance, in part imagined, and in part such as fortune had dowered him withal, to fan the flame to higher terror. And every circumstance avouched is carnally gross, or lends so vile an interpretation. "Goats and monkeys!" wails Othello at the zenith of his mood.

The terror is full; Othello determines to free himself from these entanglements with as sure a hand and as unerring a decision as he had known in the days before he let himself be tricked by a woman. He, a free man once, was trapped by her; now he is tricked by her; he must quit himself of it all. She must die. "It is the cause, it is the cause, my soul," he says as he proceeds to the deed, whipping his determination still with gross reminder of her imagined act, thereby showing that he is wounded in his sorest part. Through all he holds her fancied deed before his eye, to spur and hold him to the destined end.

Who shall paint that tragedy? The marriage has fallen awry: she dead, and he with ruined peace of mind. Who, too, dare paint the horror of his after-discovery? That is tragedy of tragedies. She shines now to him as an angel of purest ray. He looks back over the past and sees the over-energy of purpose that led him to so disastrous a conclusion; he looks back further, and sees where once it plucked his honour, where, "when a malignant and a turbanded Turk beat a Venetian and traduced the State," he "took by the throat the circumcised dog, and smote him—thus!" With that word the action closes his account, even as it had closed the Turk's in the times gone by. Therewith Tragedy is full—so full as to swell to a very relief of conclusion. The hand that slew his innocent wife destroys her wronged husband, and death seizes them both in kindly arms. The tragedy is its own relief, yet it is exceedingly pitiful. For he had never an opportunity of displaying to her those more kingly qualities that had won him honour. He fell, pierced in the one weak joint in his harness; fell in tragedy; fell in pity; fell with hands red with the life of his dearest—she who might perchance have been to him the coming of heaven on earth. It is terrible, terrible with all tears.

TIME-WORN RIDDLES

Men have perennially pondered over the problem of the origin of life upon the earth. With the dawn of reason to lift them above the brutes came this legacy of thought that did not perish from one generation to another to puzzle and perplex. Mankind has striven to lift the veil for unknown æons. Evidence of the geological antiquity of our race is so obscure that a portentous fabric of theory has often been built up on a chipped flint, or on a scrap of material from which the cranial index of some primitive being could be argued. While research has carried us step by step toward the goal of evolution, the ultimate issues "What is life?" and "How did it originate on our globe?" are still unanswerable. Nowadays we shroud our guesses in a maze of words, words which bristle with broken links of definition. Primitive man, when he tried to unravel the mysteries, built up quaint allegories. His environment was one huge parable to him. Just so a child weaves fascinating legends and spins "stories" out of the talk of birds or the flitting of clouds across the sun. Primitive man was childhood writ large. Modern man is busy laying up his talent of imagination in the napkin of commonplace. Nevertheless, imagination is the only talent which will ever enable the investigator to see beyond the end of his nose.

The varying degrees and condition of life-tissue are, again, problems as perplexing as its ultimate essence. In what does plant-life differ from animal-life? Is it conceivable that one phase of being can have passed into the other, or is there some impassable gulf fixed between the two? The answer of Science is halting and uncertain. Now and then she takes an ambiguous genus which she used to label "plant" and labels it "animal." She gives reasons for so doing that satisfy herself and conform to her formulæ of half-defined words.

To the poet the plant or tree is a sentient being. In him primitive man lives again. He builds by parable. When Wordsworth says:—

> 'Tis my faith that every flower
> Enjoys the air it breathes, the assurance, as of the statement of some ultimate law, comes home to us, as if by instinct. It must be so, we say to ourselves. Only those who have wandered in a virgin tropical forest can conceive the meaning of the words "the struggle for existence." The whole vegetable world cries insistently "Give us light and air or we perish. Shut us in the dark dungeon of impenetrable gloom beneath the great trees, leave us to the tender mercies of those self-seeking bullies and, if we do not die and disappear, we must persist in some pallid, anæmic type. Rather than give up the struggle and go under we will change our habit. Give us air and light and we can level up; shut us out of these and we must level down."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The modification of plant-life by environment is surely evidence of the essential ultimate unity of living things. All living forms hold the breath of life in common. The plant and the animal both breathe, although in inverted fashion. Here, again, for the moulding of the mood of man by the message of the woods, we must look to the poet to interpret for us. All the world knows the magic of the musings which Tennyson wove into his monologue "Maud." The self-tormenting lover, with the dreadful taint of insanity in his blood and the burden of idleness and vacuity to set his brain teeming with fancies, has reached an unsteady quicksand of felicity. He has poured out his tale into responsive ears, and in the twilight he catches glimpses of the light of heaven. As he muses the muffled roar of the distant rollers comes up from the shore, the breezes whisper, as they stir the cedars round about his home and Maud's. Thus he falls to dreaming of the dark trees as of a thing sentient and within the pale of human analogy :—

> O, art thou sighing for Lebanon,
> In the long breeze that streams to thy delicious East,
> Sighing for Lebanon,
> Dark cedar?

The passage surely contains a note of true inspiration. Thus, beneath familiar palm-groves the Jews dreamed by Babylonian waters of their captivity. Thus young Disraeli's thoughts flew, like homing pigeons, to the cradle of his mysterious race. It requires the poetic instinct so to realise a supreme law of association linking up the whole round earth.

To get nearer to the heart of our problems we must take our stand on the platform of Science. At a recent meeting of the British Association the President told the scientific world that the old belief that each vegetable cell-unit was boxed up in a case of cellulose had disappeared under modern investigation. The protoplasm is now believed to be in a state of continuity by reason of the discovery of connecting canals and threads passing through the cell-tissue. Something like sense-organs, he said, have been discovered in the roots, stems, and leaves of plants, and the phenomena of geotropism appears to indicate a perception of the incidence of gravity and its reaction on irritable tissues. Thus the plant, in the light of modern investigation, would appear to furnish us with an object-lesson of a nervous system in the melting-pot of evolution.

Our green planet teems with a myriad life. Vegetation fills nearly every chink and cranny of the earth's surface, from the region of perpetual ice to the baked walls of rock which tower above the Red Sea. Put the tropical plant under chill skies and it withers. We say it "dies." Let it be placed in uncongenial environment or mutilated, and, by automatic forces of which we know nothing, blight and parasite take possession of it. It becomes a cumberer of the ground. An unconscious force or instinct teaches it expedients by which its fertilisation and consequent propagation may be achieved. Its being is bent on the task of carrying on the type. Surely if the last word of Science be read through the glasses of imagination, the whole economy is no mere parody. The lives of animal and vegetable are not moving on parallel paths which can never meet. There must be some common territory into which, in the flux of live form, the vegetable has entered to emerge with the added symbols of animal life. "When wheat is green, when hawthorn buds appear," to ears that hear and eyes that see :—

> Imagination bodies forth
> The forms of things unknown.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF ARTS

On Tuesday evening, February 14th, Mr. George A. Stephen read a comprehensive paper dealing with the subject of "Modern Machine Bookbinding," Mr. John Murray, J.P., D.L., F.S.A., being in the chair. Machine bookbinding, the lecturer observed, was solely a product of the nineteenth century. At the time of the Great Exhibition of the Works of Industry of all Nations in 1851 it was in its infancy, yet the jurors of the bookbinding section were jubilant at the great strides which they considered had then been made.

Since then the incessant demand of the public for cheap books, and the acute competition of publishers and authors, have combined to stimulate mechanicians to produce machines for the efficient execution of almost every process in printing and bookbinding, and the natural result to-day is a plethora of books, good, bad, and indifferent.

The various technical processes for binding books and magazines were described in detail with the aid of many good lantern-slides, and the methods of colour-printing with regard to the production of artistic covers were plentifully illustrated. Unfortunately, said Mr. Stephen, owing to the acute stress of competition between publishers and the demand for cheap books by the public—who cannot or who will not make any distinction between immediate and ultimate advantage—the publishers are practically compelled to avail themselves of every means which tends to lessen the cost of production. The inferior physical qualities of books at the present day must not be attributed primarily to the wholesale bookbinder, as he simply estimates for that for which he is asked, and, if the prices are cut very fine, cannot turn out good work. The responsibility lies with the publisher, who is generally more concerned with low prices than with quality and serviceability; even when he is prepared to pay a fair price for a binding he often handicaps the binder severely by giving him books that are printed on the detestable featherweight paper, or the equally execrable heavily-loaded art paper, both of which preclude satisfactory work.

Reference was made to the common defects in cheap bindings, and to the fact that the Royal Society of Arts did a great service when it appointed a committee to investigate the causes of the decay of modern leather bindings, and to indicate the best methods of preparing leather for bookbinding. The committee's published report had a salutary effect on the manufacture of leather, for which all librarians and bookbinders are grateful.

"The standardisation of book-cloths in Great Britain," concluded Mr. Stephen, "is quite practicable, and worthy of the attention of the Royal Society of Arts. The Society could prosecute inquiries and obtain suitable materials for testing, and so forth, and it could employ the National Physical Laboratory to make the actual tests, as it possesses much of the necessary apparatus. Special attention should be given to the relative advantages of cotton cloths as compared with linen cloths, and to the attacks of British and foreign insects; tests should be made regarding the effects of water on the colour of the cloth, the effects of the products of combustion, and the behaviour of the cloth in regard to germ cultures.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

"If the Royal Society of Arts would undertake this, publishers would have reliable standards for their guidance in the production of satisfactory books, for which librarians and others would be prepared to pay a fair compensation; the publishers would receive the cordial co-operation of the paper-maker, the printer, the manufacturers of materials, and the binder, and with this consummation British books would become renowned for their intrinsic value in addition to their artistic quailties."

Mr. John Murray, in the most interesting speech with which he opened the meeting to discussion, remarked that although he had not actually bound books, he was responsible for a very great deal of bookbinding. The more one considers the question, the more one realised that there were two distinct points of view—that of the book-lover and that of the book-user; and they were widely different. Mr. Murray discussed briefly two or three matters which had not been mentioned in the lecture—the manner, for instance, in which the text of a volume is placed, and the moot point as to whether the edges of a book should be cut or not. Years ago his father issued one of Darwin's works at a time when this latter question first began to occupy attention; thousands subscribed for it, but very few desired the cut edges; people then preferred to cut the book themselves.

Mr. Murray humorously observed that the publishers had been rather severely censured by the lecturer; personally, he was so used to this that he rather liked it. They often deserved it; but they were practically helpless, in view of the present-day curse of cheapness. The public gave no thanks for a beautiful book. Pictorial lithographed covers, in his opinion, were utterly out of place; handling such a volume, he always felt as if he would like it re-bound. Binding, like printing, began at its very zenith—we cannot compete with Caxton or the old binders. Books were now looked upon not so much as treasures as things to be read and thrown aside.

Sir George Birdwood, in the discussion which followed, expressed the opinion that bindings should be as plain as possible, and condemned the illustrated covers strongly; he also explained lucidly a technical point with regard to the use of cotton and linen thread in bookbinding, and referred, in the course of a valuable little speech, to the French methods of issuing books. Other interesting contributions were made to the elucidation of various questions that arose, and at the close of a very successful meeting a large collection of specimens and designs which the lecturer had thoughtfully provided were inspected with much interest.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

THE FAR EASTERN SITUATION

By Lancelot Lawton

The action of Russia in presenting an ultimatum to China has abruptly transferred the centre of interest in foreign affairs from the Middle East to the Far East. Regarded separately, it must be confessed that the demands contained in the Russian Note are not of sufficient importance in themselves to warrant a resort to extreme measures. Taken as a whole, however, they constitute a very serious indictment against the good faith of China as expressed in her treaty obligations, and in so far as they reflect the incapacity of the Central Government to reconcile the growing spirit of aggressive nationalism among the masses with the solemn duty imposed upon the State of maintaining friendly relations with neighbouring Powers they exhibit disquieting symptoms of world-wide concern. Let it be said at the outset that nobody who can lay claim to an intimate knowledge of the situation in the Far East believes for a single moment that hostilities will result. China has merely tested the extent of Russia's patience in diplomacy, and now that the movement of troops in the direction of her frontier has convinced her that this is exhausted she will not hesitate to seek an early and an amicable settlement.

It is generally recognised in diplomatic circles that the ultimatum can hardly fail to have a more far-reaching effect than would appear on the surface. For some time past the relations between the two countries have been drifting towards a crisis, and on more than one occasion the Russian Minister at Peking has considered it necessary to protest in no unmeasured terms against the obstructive tactics resorted to by the Wai-wu-pu. Recently there have been grounds for believing that China intended to revive the question of a railway in Manchuria running north from Chinchau. This project is of peculiar interest to Great Britain; for, whereas the original scheme, supported by the United States Government, for a line from Chinchau vid Tsitsihar to Aigun provided that the necessary financial assistance should be obtained from a group of American bankers, it was agreed that the actual work of construction should be placed in the hands of a well-known firm of English railway contractors. It is, of course, understood that in the event of China deciding upon a modification of the proposed system similar provisions in regard to finance and construction would remain in force.

I am speaking with some knowledge of facts and, moreover, with a deep sense of responsibility when I assert that the prospects of obtaining Russia's consent to a line northwards from Chinchau are exceedingly remote. There is, however, reason to believe that a line southwards from Aigun, constructed according to the Russian gauge and terminating at some point on the Chinese Eastern Railway, would meet with her approval. It has already been suggested that a railway from Chinchau proceeding no farther north than Taonanfu—a town some three hundred miles from the coast—would satisfy, at least for the moment, the requirements of all Powers and partners concerned; but were Russia to be consulted in the matter it would be found that she holds to the opinion that no safe guarantees can possibly be given that such a railway would not one day be extended in the direction of her frontier. She would, in short, be disposed to look upon this latest idea as merely an attempt on the part of China to drive in the thin end of the wedge, and thus to realise the first stage of the grand ideal, a line from the Gulf of Pechilhi to the Amur, which would rival in every respect the already established communications.

It cannot be too clearly emphasised at the present juncture that Russia is frankly opposed to any project for a railway that is to penetrate Manchuria in a northerly direction while possessing a southern terminus on the sea coast. Her attitude is mainly dictated by strategical considerations of the highest importance; but at the same time it also finds warrant in a very natural desire to protect the purely commercial interests of the Chinese Eastern Railway. Again and again she has warned China in terms that leave no room for misconception as to possible consequences, that she must be consulted in all matters relating to railway developments of a nature likely to affect "the military and political interests of Russia or the Northern Manchurian Railways." Her right to place a veto upon Chinese schemes in the area under discussion has been explicitly endorsed by the British and French Governments; while, apart altogether from anything that may have transpired at the already memorable Potsdam interview, the exclusive privileges held by Germany in Shantung preclude her from protesting against the existence of similar conditions elsewhere in China. The United States, whose diplomacy has been consistently exerted in favour of the policy of the Open Door, remains therefore the only source from whence objections may reasonably be expected. It cannot be denied that since the conclusion of the recent agreement between Japan and Russia, recognising the mutual character of each other's interests and guaranteeing the maintenance of the status quo in Manchuria, the Washington Government appears to have lost all heart in the pursuit of railway schemes, and has adopted a policy more conciliatory than that which formerly characterised its relations with Russia. It may therefore be safely assumed that the Chinchau-Aigun railway project has been finally buried, either with the consent or the knowledge of all the Powers; and the firm action recently taken by Russia in Peking will serve to remind the Chinese that she is ready to resort to force in the event of her interests being seriously menaced in directions other than those specifically mentioned in the terms of the ultimatum, and that, in short, an attempt to revive the Chinchau-Aigun project in any shape or form whatever will be viewed with marked disfavour.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

From the Japanese side I have received an authoritative statement concerning the negotiations in connection with the Manchurian railways, and as it makes mention of several very important aspects that are new to the whole controversy it is not inopportune in the present article to summarise their purport. In the first place, it is claimed that an agreement concluded between English and Japanese financial groups, on the occasion of discussions over the Hankow-Canton Railway, provided for frank and loyal co-operation throughout the whole of China, including Manchuria. Then it is asserted that the British interests involved in the Chinchau-Aigun project gave repeated and explicit assurances that in no conceivable circumstances would there be any question of seeking an alliance with American interests, but that, on the contrary, they were only too willing that the Japanese should be admitted to substantial participation. On the plea that the feeling in Peking at the moment was anti-Japanese in tendency, they urged that it would prejudice the success of the scheme if representations were made by them to the Chinese Government with a view to securing an immediate and properly defined recognition of Japanese rights in the matter; but they promised that as soon as an agreement was concluded they would not hesitate to exert their influence in Chinese official circles with the object of obtaining for the Japanese a share in the enterprise, and thus giving practical effect to the understanding already arrived at between the two groups.

The Japanese complain of unfair treatment, inasmuch as they allege that all the time that these pourparlers were in progress an agreement had been secretly concluded with Tang Shao-yi on behalf of the Chinese Government, providing that the line should be constructed solely as a result of British enterprise, and making not the least allowance for Japanese participation. According to their version, the same statesman, on the occasion of his visit to the United States, made yet another secret agreement on the subject, in consequence of which British and American interests were literally forced into co-operation; and, furthermore, they assert that it was the publication of a third and subsequent agreement, defining the interests of the various parties concerned, that first made them acquainted with the true circumstances. Thus, if they are to be believed, they were deceived throughout the whole course of the negotiations, and the pledges given to them were in every instance cynically disregarded. The charges are of undoubted seriousness, and it is due to the British reputation for good faith that they should not remain unanswered. The Japanese are careful to explain that throughout the British Government have admitted their claim to participation, while they add that the "highest authority" in the United States has also expressed the unqualified opinion that their attitude is a reasonable one.

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

THIS week has seen a rush of new issues—some of them reasonable, others not quite so enticing. But the promoter has been too sanguine, for the public is not on the feed. Timber seems fashionable, but there are few things more speculative, and I do not think that any one who had ever ridden through a big forest abroad would care to speculate in timber. A Channel Islands Company, the Dominica, has secured the Millars Karri and Jarrah crowd; but I should never advise any one to put their money into any company registered in the Channel Islands. The Roneo venture appears a reasonable business, for the company does a large trade and makes a good article. The West Australian Loan at 96½ does not appear cheap, and the underwriters will probably be called upon to take most of it. The Alpha Petroleum is a reasonable oil venture.

MONEY is temporarily somewhat hard, but it must eventually become weak, for there is no speculation here, very little in New York, and hardly any on the Continent. In a few weeks Egypt will release her gold, and as soon as she does this we shall see the Bank Rate fall to 3 per cent.

CONSOLS are barely steady, but they must rise eventually, and are a good purchase. It will probably occur to most people that India 3½ stock is a sounder security than the West Australian New Loan. It is certainly a better market, and its security is equal to Consols.

FOREIGNERS are not a market that is much in favour to-day, although no one anticipates any Russo-Chinese trouble. China is too weak and too much perturbed at the moment to stand up against Russia, especially as she has no case. The Railway Loan is being got ready, and this will keep Russian stocks steady.

HOME RAILS are in such short supply that the dealers bid lustily for stock the day before the settlement. The more closely one looks into the figures of the accounts the more convinced must one become that there is a good time ahead for English Railway stocks. Lloyd George is preparing his great scheme of nationalisation, and will probably bring it forward next year. By that time we shall have seen all English Railways rise ten or fifteen points. The State will then absorb the railway system and pay 25 per cent. more for it than it would have done a year ago. That it is wild-cat finance makes little difference to the politician. By the end of next year the Irish party will have left Westminster and the Labour party will have been promised paying jobs in the Railway world. Thus Asquith and Lloyd George will be left in possession. I cannot deal with this Nationalisation scheme here. It is not yet complete. But it is being pushed on, and the Railway managers are being consulted by the Chancellor. The point for the investor to observe is that any State purchase of the Railways must tend to enhance the value of the speculative stocks. For example, Dover A, Little Chats, and Great Central deferred when converted into Consols become at once solid negotiable securities. On yield alone the investor can to-day safely buy North Eastern, Great Western, and London and North Western. As a speculation we may purchase both the preferred and deferred of the Great Central, also Great Eastern ordinary.

YANKEES.—This week Wall Street enjoys another holiday, and it is hardly likely that the market will be improved by the break. Nevertheless, all Yankees are steady. A reaction seems almost necessary after the considerable rise. There is a rumour that the rates will be raised on all the lines. This is hardly likely, but we may rely upon a moderate advance upon most of the leading railways. Whether this will give us a boom market depends upon the Banks. They may decline to finance any great speculative movement. They have been bullish ever since the middle of December, and they might turn round. There is this bare chance against us, and were I a large bull of Yankees with a profit to take I should not lose the opportunity. No one was ever ruined by taking a profit. The best shares to purchase to-day are Unions, Chesapeakes, Atchisons, New York Centrals, and Pennsylvanias. These are all solid investment stocks, paying good dividends, and are almost outside the gambling risk.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

RUBBER.—The raw rubber market continues absurdly strong. The Para stocks are being held up on the Amazon and are financed by the Brazilians. It is a dangerous game, but the plantation output cannot affect the price of fine hard cured Para for at least two years. Therefore as long as the financiers are satisfied I suppose we shall see a strong market in the raw material. This does not, however, attract the public, which remains indifferent to the price. The Lane buys heavily, and the Stock Exchange jobs in and out, not exactly bearish, but inclined that way. The argument that you cannot continue to mark up quotations unless you get the support of the public is sound. The effort ends in a rigged market, which again ends in collapse. I have made careful inquiries this week amongst the dealers, and I can find no signs of public buying. But the Mincing Lane proprietors who have dozens of stale options on estates, and the Mincing Lane speculators who hold many thousands of unmarketable rubber shares are much more sanguine than the House, which is short of stock. I see no signs of a break at the moment. But I cannot advise any one to buy rubber shares to-day. I have absolute faith in the plantation industry—but as an industry alone, not as a speculation.

OIL.—There has been very little doing in the oil market this week. Lobitos looked so cheap after the fall that they were wisely bought. Shells have been steady, but they are not worth their present price. Spies have fallen, but as they were not affected by the oil war there was no reason for the weakness except the state of the market. Kerns have been picked up. The spouter in the Mexican Eagle ground did not catch fire, and the bears bought back. Until we hear exactly how this Company stands with regard to its fight with the Waters Pierce Company the shares are very much of a speculation. The Potrero well has helped them; that is the best we can say at the moment.

KAFFIRS.—The Goldfields capital will be raised to £4,500. That is now agreed. But, though the Board carried the day, it can hardly be said that the City likes the scheme, or that the Goldfields has improved its position by its increase in capital. The public is not in the Kaffir market, and shows no sign of ever returning.

RHODESIANS.—In spite of all the marvellous news, no one can be got to buy anything. The Chartered Report did no good, and now we await the meeting. But I doubt if that will help us at all. Plainly, no one wants to speculate in mining stocks, however good they may be.

The MISCELLANEOUS MARKET seems to please the speculator best. Here he has the chance of picking up bargains, and above all he can buy shares that have paid dividends for many years and will continue to pay. London General Omnibus are, however, far too high, for the Board can hardly pay a dividend until they have tackled the question of depreciation. The Imperial Tobacco Company meeting was a success, and the securities of this concern are worth buying. Bradford Dyers Ordinary shares are also a reasonable speculation. Maples have had a good year and should be bought. Whiteleys have had the best year since they became a public company, and the preference and ordinary are much under-valued. Harrods have also done splendidly, and the new capital will be eagerly sought for. All these companies are in the first rank, and no better investments can be found on the Stock Exchange. They are all splendidly managed, honestly capitalised, and not too high in price. The buying of Telephone shares still continues, and the purchasers are both rich and influential. A move is on.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

"WHAT OF REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT?"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I notice that you state in your current issue that you will be glad to receive the views of readers on the above subject in reply to a letter re same from Mr. Wenyon-Samuel. May I, as an ordinary sort of man, with no political ties, give my view of the case dealt with by Mr. Wenyon-Samuel?

Firstly, let me say I am not a political party man in the sense that I do not believe in "party" government as the best, and am convinced it is almost the direct opposite of true representative government—i.e., government by the people, literally, which we are so fond of boasting about and with so little justification. Our present House of Commons is in no better position towards the Ministers of the party in power than the Russian Duma is towards the Czar! At all costs and hazards the "Party" must not be defeated in a division that has its leaders possessing the plums and emoluments of office.

However, as regards Mr. Samuel's letter, I am in full and complete agreement that, until we get Home Rule, we must treat all Ireland as a portion of the electorate, in the same way as Wales, Scotland, and England. Since 1905, the three political groups—Liberals (or Radicals), Labour (including what "Socialists" there are), and Irish Nationalists, have supported the Liberal party's programme in and out of Parliament, and are part and parcel of the Liberal Government. Very well, then, this Triple Alliance at the last General Election received a clear majority of 126 over the opposing party, the Conservative party, from the electorate. They therefore received an unmistakable mandate for the reform and bettering of the legislative powers and functions of the House of Lords, but for nothing else. By Liberal candidates everywhere Home Rule was shelved, especially by Liberal Ministers; Disestablishment was nowhere; even Tariff Reform played second fiddle. The question they asked a mandate for was restriction of the House of Lords' Veto solely, and they have got it—not to abolish, but to reform.

And now, Sir, I really must question the accuracy of Mr. Wenyon-Samuel's figures. He says—"If Ireland is left out of account . . . this would leave the Liberal party in England, Wales, and Scotland with a majority over the Unionists of more than 70." Again, and further—"If the Labour Members are deducted, still the Government's majority would be over 30." Let us look at the actual result of the last General Election:—Liberals 272, Labour 42, Irish Nationalists 84; total 398 for the Liberal Government; Conservatives 272. Deduct the Irish, and the total of Liberal and Labour is 314, a majority over the Conservatives of 42. Further deduct the Labour Members and the Liberal majority is nil. It is a tie, 272 each! I do not agree that the Irish Unionists should be deducted from the Conservatives, as they regularly support every Conservative measure, whether dealing with Ireland or not; whilst the Irish Nationalists don't care a pig's tail for any measure but Home Rule, and will vote for or against any legislative proposal—Liberal or Conservative—as it affects the one object they are, on their own admission, at Westminster for—viz., Home Rule. The Liberal party alone have not got a majority in the House, taking the whole electorate into account. The Irish Nationalist group, supporters at present of the Liberal party, and therefore part of the Liberal Government, hold the balance of voting-power in the House.

When Mr. Wenyon-Samuel states that to have a Liberal majority in the Second Chamber ("in both Houses") would be the "representative system of Government perfected" and "as it should be" I can see the all-absorbing strain of "party" bias runs very fiercely in this gentleman. If he laments so bitterly over a Conservative majority continuous in the House of Lords, or Second Chamber, how can he, as a fair-minded and consistent man, advocate simply substituting this party's majority with a similar Liberal party majority? When the Liberal Government went out of office and government and was succeeded by a Conservative Government in the Commons, as I suppose is quite possible, how does Mr. Wenyon-Samuel propose the Second Chamber Liberal Party Majority is to be prevented from doing exactly what he resents the present Conservative majority doing—e.g., spoiling, blocking, or rejecting the measures of their political opponents in Government? No political party or group should be predominant in the Second Chamber.

My idea of a perfected representative system of Government "as it should be" is to abolish, lock, stock and barrel, our present

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

"party system" of politics, which is killing individualism, smothering conscience, and simply turning a thinking, intelligent man into what is nothing more or less than a part of a machine. As Mr. Gilbert satirically put it, "If they've a brain and cerebellum, too, they've got to leave the brain outside and vote just as their leaders tell 'em to." Perfectly true. Woe betide the man with conscience, spirit, independence, and loyalty to his constituents who defies the Whip to keep his conscience clear! Witness Lord Robert Cecil, Harold Cox, Gibson Bowles, Hilaire Belloc, Sir Robert Perks, and Horatio Bottomley, to mention only a few. All fell from their political places because of declining to become the docile slave of the party Whip—all, that is, except Mr. Bottomley, who conquered, thanks to what must be an unusually intelligent constituency, that forced the party to swallow a direct snub in routing their official party candidate to return an independent, intelligent, honest politician who will take his "brain and cerebellum into the House and vote just as his conscience and constituents tell him to." Let us have independence in politics; no title after a candidate's name, such as Liberal, Conservative, Labour, &c.; but let a candidate simply give his opinions to his proposed constituents, and let his opponent or opponents (if any) give their opinions and let the electors then vote for the man whose opinions they uphold, not because "he is a Conservative and so am I." Let the leaders of the majority returned on certain questions as at present choose their Ministers of State from the best of the whole House of elected representatives of the people, not as at present from less than one-half of the House. Let the different Departments be governed by Boards of experts on the various subjects dealt with respectively by the Departments, with the Secretary of State as the Head. Let soldiers rule the Army, sailors rule the Navy, genuine business men the Board of Trade and Local Government Board, learned men and women, as also business men the Education Board, and so on. And, finally, introduce that most democratic of democratic arbiters, the Referendum, to decide on unusually important measures where there is a deadlock between the "Ayes" and the "Noes" in Parliament. Then, Sir, I maintain we shall have true, perfect representative government, literally "government by the people for the people," and not, as now, government by party represented by the Whips.

That is one thing I must say, I should like to see good Christian women enter Parliament, for they would have none of the present nerveless, axe-grinding state of affairs I am sure.—I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

A CONSTITUTIONALIST.

Wigan.

A CASTING VOTE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The Unionist party can save the country, and no one else can. With this paraphrase—or parody—of William Pitt's memorable words, I preface what I desire to submit to yonr readers. Every Unionist must needs agree that the present constitutional crisis is the most momentous since 1832. Some, indeed, have gone farther back and spoken of 1688; nor can it be shown that they were exaggerating. But there is a difference in the situation, whichever date be chosen for comparison. Civil War, which all but broke out in 1688—did actually in Ireland—is now no longer a contingency to be reckoned with. In 1832 the mass of the nation was on the side of Reform, and the House of Lords had put itself in the wrong. How do matters stand now? It is the Lords who in 1911 are in the right, and the Commons in the wrong. The Commons in 1911 have no more right to interfere with the structure of the House of Lords than the Lords had any right to interfere with the structure of the House of Commons in 1832. The "Veto" Bill is even more unconstitutional than was the rejection of the Reform Bill. But this is not all. In 1831-2 the mass of the people were Reformers. What of the electorate at the present day? It is worth while asking this, and striving to answer it. Briefly, out of the seven millions of electors in the United Kingdom, the Ministry had a majority of a little over a quarter of a million. What is a quarter of a million among seven millions? And even this is not all. This quarter of a million is made up of Labour Socialists and Irish Nationalists. If we take the historical parties, Conservative and Liberal, and leave out of account the new fangled revolutionary factions, we shall find an actual majority, in England, for the Unionist party over the so-called Liberals. On the other hand, the motley "Ministerialist" majority is wholly composed of persons to whom the time-honoured British Constitution is of no moment. The Irish Nationalists, whatever they may say, aim at breaking up the United Kingdom and "casting off the yoke of England." The Labour Socialists simply want to take the money of the "rich" in order to improve the condition of the "poor." Socialism and Nationalism are both impracticable, as could easily be proved—but the proof is irrelevant to the present discussion. Were they ever so practicable, the advocates of these policies are put out of court by the fact that nearly half the electorate opposes them. The extremist devotee of popular Sovereignty could not contend that three millions and a quarter are entitled to impose their arbitrary will upon three millions, and to fling the Constitution into the wastepaper-basket in order that they may do so.

But, it will be argued, the three millions and a quarter have returned to the House of Commons a majority of 126 supporters of the Ministry—and the majority of the House of Commons is the supreme power in the Empire. Every clause of this plea is a fallacy; a fallacy so transparent that it is not easy to know where to begin refuting it. Are the Labour Socialists really supporters of the Ministry? Would they not withdraw their support if they were told that some of their schemes were impracticable or inexpedieut? As for the Irish Nationalists, to ask the question is to answer it. They are only in the House of Commons at all in order to destroy its legislative and administrative authority over Ireland; and this deprives the Nationalists of all claim to vote upon an English Constitutional measure. Besides, the Irish Nationalist members have more than once threatened to vote against the Ministry if some demand or other of theirs were not complied with.

All this goes to show that the nominal majority in the House of Commons is wholly fictitious. By a curious coincidence, the genuine Ministerial majority is exactly one in excess of the Unionists. When Mr. Butcher was alive the genuine Ministerialists and Unionists were exactly balanced; and as Cambridge will certainly not return a Home Ruler or a Socialist, the balance will be restored in due course. Sir Charles Dilke's death actually has restored it.

So, then, public opinion is for practical purposes exactly balanced in the electorate, and representation is virtually balanced in the House. It is in this state of things that the Lower House is being asked to dictate to the Upper as to the structure, functions and duties of the latter—a wholly unconstitutional assumption, as I have shown. Moreover, anticipating the refusal of the House of Lords to be dictated to, the Premier has talked of demanding "guarantees" that the Upper House shall be overruled. This means that the House of Lords shall be swamped; that the King shall be asked to create peers in numbers sufficient to place the present Ministry in a majority in the Lords as well as in the Commons.

To protest against such a procedure as this is not "to drag the Crown into the vortex of party strife" though Radicals, Socialists, and Irish Separatists will shriek that it is. But it is not so. On the contrary, it is the Premier who has dragged the Crown into the vortex of party strife. It is for the Unionist Party to save the country and the Constitution; and the way to do it is to rally round the Throne. Let every Unionist—elector or non-elector, for the unenfranchised are part of the people as much as the enfranchised—sign a petition praying the King to forbear from creating any peers for the purpose of swamping the House of Lords.

It cannot be denied that if his Majesty, whether of his own motion or in response to such a petition, refused the request of the Ministry, a serious crisis would arise. Finance would be thrown into confusion, worse confounded even than Mr. Asquith and Mr. Lloyd George have left it. Nay, the turmoil of yet another General Election might have to be faced; but anything is better than the overthrow of the Constitution. There may be other modes of rescue—if so, let us have them as promptly as may be. But if no one devises a better method, and if the Unionist Party will not adopt this one—the cause is lost.

EDWARD STANLEY ROBERTSON.

THE INFLUENCE OF WOMEN

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In THE ACADEMY for February 11th there is a criticism of a book by W. Lyon Blaese, entitled "The Emancipation of Englishwomen." In these words Mr. Arthur Machen expresses his strong disapproval of the purpose of this book:—

> Our state is bad; there is no reason why we should make it worse by adding to a voting-list chiefly composed of emotional and ignorant and puzzle-headed people a few hundred thousand more puzzle-headed, ignorant, and emotional people who happen to wear petticoats. And then, again, there is another point, and an important one. In America, as we have seen, "politician" means rascal. It does not mean that in England, so far; but it does mean in the great majority of instances dreary and windy bore, sham logician, insincere and gabbling humbug. . . . It seems a pity to poison, and corrupt, and destroy the source of all beauty and every Art with the driest, dreariest of all the delusions with which the wretched race of men has been afflicted since it was driven from the flaming portals of the Lost Garden. It has often been urged that women have accomplished singularly little in the region of the Arts. This, in a sense, is true; there have been very few supreme women-musicians, poets, architects, painters, or sculptors. But those who know see beneath every masterpiece the words femina fecit; and it is this fountain of beauty that the foolish suffrage-maniacs are endeavouring to pollute and destroy.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

I will then turn to a second description of the nature of women in the same issue, occurring in Mr. Frank Harris's amusing "Open Letter" to Mr. Bernard Shaw. There we get an interesting glimpse of the high estimation Mr. Harris entertains of women. He writes:—

> I see Shaw as a woman, with all a woman's quick insight into shams and a woman's quick eye for little faults and conceits, and a woman's genius for romance, and a woman's sympathy with suffering, and a woman's intuition of all high things.

This quotation, read in connection with Mr. Machen's article, forms a very pointed comment on it. Surely, if the inevitable trend of politics seems to be towards rascality, windy boredom, sham logic, insincere and gabbling humbug, or the driest and dreariest delusion, it is time that this deplorable débâcle was arrested? And who are better fitted for the task of inspiring, uplifting, and purifying this field of human activity than those who have inscribed "beneath every masterpiece of the world the words femina fecit"? Whether this remark of Mr. Machen's is true to history or not is beside the question; what I wish to point out is that you cannot have it both ways. Either the collective force of women's influence makes for good in this world, or else they "poison, corrupt, and destroy." Mr. Machen seems at one moment to fear this and at the next to affirm the exact contrary. He would do better to consider that many of his so-called "foolish suffrage-maniacs" are women of the kind so truly described by Mr. Harris, and approved of by Mr. Machen himself, as a fountain of beauty and Art in human life!

E. Money Coutts

HARRISON AINSWORTH

To the Editor of The Academy

Sir,—Will you kindly permit me to make two observations arising out of your very interesting review of "Harrison Ainsworth and his Friends," that delightful biography written by Mr. S. M. Ellis?

(1) The inference which you have drawn that because Ainsworth's romances are only read to-day by young people, and are therefore not in vogue and unpopular, to my mind is not quite correct. There is always a vitality in books that fascinate the youthful intellect. What appeals to the young is generally universal. The young mind longs to see its own vigour and freshness unmoved in romance. The fact then remains that Ainsworth's novels—and particularly the early ones—are still popular. The Kensington Public Librarian assured me of this, and the Manchester Public Library contains no less than 457 copies of his works, which to-day find numerous readers.

(2) There is positively no foundation in your remark that Ainsworth in his latter years was ostracised. Like many of us, he may have outlived his ideals. The works of the literary giants of his day may have overshadowed his own, and the voice of fame which in his youth and maturity heralded a new power in creative work may have grown weaker; but in the isolation of his age he was never subject to any detraction. He was always held in high honour by the few who outlived his generation, and it is also remarkable that almost to the end of his life he continued to write; and his last novels fetched prices which many a budding novelist of to-day would be proud to receive.

I speak with a certain authority on the subject, as I had the great privilege of contributing to the two magazines which he owned and edited.

Isidore G. Ascher.

CARLYLE AND MR. FRANK HARRIS

To the Editor of The Academy

Sir,—My attention has been drawn to my article on the Magazines in The Academy of the 11th inst., where I said of Mr. Harris's "interesting article on 'Talks with Carlyle'" that some of it "is a little difficult to reconcile with internal probability." As the friend who drew my attention to the matter thought that it could be made to bear a doubt of Mr. Harris's personal word, I hasten to repudiate such an interpretation. I do not myself see how it could possibly be twisted into such a meaning; but what one thinks another may think, and hence my letter.

I am the more anxious to write as this opens a very interesting question. Mr. Harris in his article disavows the claim of literal accuracy by saying that his notes at the time were not expansive; in one case he says, "I can't remember how the talk began and my notes do not help me much." But, despite this, there is one passage that is so wholly at variance with all that one conceives as being characteristically Carlyle, judging from the internal evidence afforded by his emphatic writings and declared opinions, that I would be very glad to hear Mr. Harris's exposition of it.

Let me quote the passage. Mr. Harris is speaking of Disraeli, and says to Carlyle, "He at least offered you a baronetcy. Why didn't you take it?" Carlyle's reply goes thus: "Baronetcy!" the old man roared. "The unspeakable Jew would have given me the reward of work, but not the work; he might have kept the reward if he had given me the work." Now this can only mean one thing, and that is, that Carlyle desired administrative employment under Disraeli! Carlyle, the irritable, irascible autocrat, the man whose emphasis of political opinion his pamphlets had made notorious, the man who in "Sartor Resartus," and again in "The French Revolution," had made pitiful laughter of flunkeydom, grumbled at not receiving employment under the man he detested! Surely not! Yet Mr. Harris records it. It is perplexing. I, for one, would be glad to read his explanation of it all.—Yours, &c.,

The Writer of the Article.

SUMMER IN MID-WINTER

To the Editor of The Academy

Sir,—During a stay in the Canary Islands which I have just completed, I was pleased to find the leading English newspapers, including your valuable journal, readily available there. This is one evidence of the way in which these Islands are becoming anglicised.

It may interest your readers to know that while at Orotava, in Teneriffe, which is the beauty spot of this interesting group, during the wintry weather at the beginning of the year I was bathing daily in the open Atlantic, which washes the shores of the bay. The water was so agreeable in temperature that I could stay in for a lengthened time, and afterward enjoy a prolonged sun-bath on the sands. Nothing could have been more healthful or invigorating.

Those of your readers who winter abroad may be glad to know that such facilities can be enjoyed even in January within four days' run by liner of our own shores.

G. Macara.

Spencer Park, St. Albans, February 17th, 1911.

HUXLEY

To the Editor of The Academy

Sir,—Mr. Frank Harris writes again as grandly on Huxley as he did on Dilke. Such criticism as his is worth rubies set in gold, for it reads like very truth itself. I only saw Huxley once at the Royal Society, and then he was a trifle bombastic in talk, which was silly; but, for all that, I rejoice in the very grand and just portrait Mr. Harris gives us.

C. A. Ward.

February 21.

"WHO" OR "WHOM"?

To the Editor of The Academy

Sir,—The correspondent who impugns the grammar of the following sentence (attributed to Mr. Belloc) may, I think, fairly claim that he has the grammarians on his side: "Antwerp would be of the utmost value to whomever might be its Sovereign."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

In Maunder's handbook I read (p. 15): "Sometimes part of a sentence supplies the place of an objective case, as 'Much will depend on who the commissioners are.'"

Mason, too, a well-known authority, describes as "faulty": "I will give this to whomsoever wants it," and adds that "wants must have whosoever for its subject."

Other authorities might be cited to show that "whomever" in Mr. Belloc's sentence should give place to "whoever."

W. C. M.

Glasgow.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The sentence "Antwerp would be of the utmost value to whomever (sic) might be its Sovereign" is grammatically correct. The preposition "to" governs the relative that follows it. The phrasing may be ungainly without being wrong. To whomsoever "it (i.e., Antwerp) belonged, or might belong, it would be of value." The ellipsis is over large—that is all. Anybody who will study Lambert Bos's ellipses may explain half the things that read like bad grammer, and are not.

C. A. WARD.

Charlecot, Walthamstow, February 21.

MSS. OF ST. BERNARD

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I am editing for the Cambridge Patristic Texts' Series, published by the University Press, the De Gradibus Humilitatis et superbiae, the De Diligendo Deo, and the De Conversione of St. Bernard. For the purpose of collating Mabillon's text I am wishing to obtain information as to the MSS. of St. Bernard which exist in this country. By the courtesy of the respective custodians I have learnt something of the MSS. of this author in the British Museum, the Bodleian and the Cambridge University Library. I am led to suspect that others are contained in various public and private collections. I venture to beg your kind help in order to make known my need. I should be very grateful to any person who would meet it.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

WATKIN W. WILLIAMS.

Monkton Vicarage, Isle of Thanet, Kent.

"FROM GREENLAND'S ICY MOUNTAINS"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—When you suggest, in your "Review of the Week," that the author of "From Greenland's Icy Mountains" had probably never been in Ceylon, it is really sad to reflect how dim must have become the memory of that man of "apostolic zeal" before such a sentence could have appeared in a paper devoted to literature. Reginald Heber was appointed Bishop of Calcutta in 1823; his diocese included Ceylon; and he died at Trichinopoly, in South India, in 1826.

A. C.

BOOKS RECEIVED

FICTION

His Will and Her Way. By H. Louisa Bedford. Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.

Once Upon a Time. By Richard Harding Davis. Illustrated. Duckworth and Co. 6s.

The Witch Ladder: A Story of Somerset in the Later Days of Victoria. By Edward S. Tyler. Duckworth and Co. 6s.

A Debt of Destiny. By Aimée (Lionel Dalsace). Authorised Translation by Fred Rothwell. Swan Sonnenschein and Co. 3s. 6d.

Adventure. By Jack London. Coloured Frontispiece. Thomas Nelson and Sons. 2s. net.

The City of Shadows: A Romance of Morocco. By Charles Beadle. Everett and Co. 6s.

The Bermondsey Twin. By F. J. Randall. John Lane. 6s.

The Stranger from Tonia. By William P. Kelly. Illustrated. George Routledge and Sons. 6s.

The Old Dance Master. By William Romaine Paterson (Benjamin Swift). Chapman and Hall. 6s.

Just to Get Married. By Cicely Hamilton. Chapman and Hall 6s.

The Polar Star: A Sequel to "The Bounty of the Gods." By the Lady Helen Forbes. Duckworth and Co. 6s.

A Weak Woman. By W. H. Davies. Duckworth and Co. 6s.

Knight Checks Queen. By Mrs. L. Lockhart Lang. Alston Rivers. 6s.

VERSE

Lays of Love and Trust. By Isabel Fannin Barker. Elliot Stock. 3s. 6d. net.

Oedipus, King of Thebes. By Sophocles. Translated into English Rhyming Verse, with Explanatory Notes, by Gilbert Murray, LL.D., D.Litt., F.B.A. George Allen and Sons. 1s. net.

The Adventure: A Romantic Variation on a Homeric Theme. By Henry Bryan Binns. A. C. Fifield. 2s. 6d. net.

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND MEMOIRS

Essays on Russian Novelists. By Wm. Lyon Phelps, M.A. Frontispiece. Macmillan and Co. 6s. 6d. net.

Anglo-American Memories. By George W. Smalley, M.A. Portrait. Duckworth and Co. 12s. 6d. net.

Histoire de la Langue Française des Origines à 1900. Tome III., La Formation de la Langue Classique (1600-1660). Deuxième Partie. By Ferdinand Brunot. Armand Colin, Paris. 7f. 50c.

The Department of Education in the University of Manchester, 1890-1911. Sherratt and Hughes. 2s. 6d. net.

PERIODICALS

United Empire; Oxford and Cambridge Review; Century Magazine; Literary Digest; Cambridge University Reporter; Bulletin of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, N.Y.; University Correspondent; Constitution Papers; School World; The Author; Atlantic Monthly; Mercure de France; Bookseller; N.R.A.; Modern Language Teaching; Revue Bleue; Publishers' Circular; Popular Magazine; Top-Notch; Editorial Review, N.Y.; The Book Buyer, N.Y.

SAARBURG MOSELLE
GUTTA CONTRA GOUTTE

THE SAARBURG MOSELLE Co.
LIMITED

London Office:
28, KING STREET, ST. JAMES', S.W.

Cellars:
TRIER A/D MOSEL AND GEISENHEIM

Speciality
STILL AND SPARKLING SAARBURG MOSELLES

The Moselle Wines are grown on a dry, sandy soil: contrary to Clarets and Hocks, which are grown on chalk or slate. Therefore this Wine is recommended by the Medical Profession specially to those subject to Gout, and consequently forbidden to drink other Wines.

We can specially recommend the three following Wines: "White Label," "Mauve Label," and "Green Label," which are now in very fine condition.

Samples and Price List on application.

Supplied to all First-class Hotels and Restaurants.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, LTD.,

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET, W.C.

Only Branches } 48, Queen Victoria Street, E.C. 132, Kensington High Street, W.

NEW BOOKS LESS THAN HALF-PRICE.

	Offered at		Published at
CRESPI, FRANCESCO, Italian Insurgent	s. 1	d. 9	s. 7	d. 6
GRAFTON, THIRD DUKE, AUTO. AND LETTERS	3	6	18	0
HARVARD, JOHN, AND HIS TIMES	3	3	7	6 net.
STEPHEN, SIR JAMES FITZJAMES, LIFE by his brother Leslie Stephen	5	0	16	0
THIEBAULT, BARON, MEMOIRS OF, 2 Vols. trans.	7	6	28	0
YOUNG, ARTHUR, AUTO. OF, Ed. M. Betham Edwards	4	9	12	6

Full List Free on Application.

BOOKS, Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold, and Exchanged. Monthly Catalogues Free. Libraries purchased, catalogued, arranged, or valued.—Thomas Thorp, 93, St. Martin's Lane, W.C. (and at Reading).

HOW TO WRITE FOR THE PRESS OR TO BECOME AN AUTHOR.

Interesting and useful Booklet free.

"H," LITERARY CORRESPONDENCE COLLEGE, 9, Arundel Street, W.C.

TYPEWRITING.—The WEST KENSINGTON OFFICES.—Authors' MSS., Legal and General Copying. Private Dictation Room. Facsimile Circular Letters. Circulars, &c., duplicated. References. Established 17 years.—Sikes and Sikes, 223A, Hammersmith-road, London, W.

CONSULT

The Gresham

On all Matters of

LIFE, FIRE & ACCIDENT INSURANCE.

Many Special Features.

Write for Prospectus; it will pay you.

Liberal Terms to recognised Brokers and Agents.

HEAD OFFICES:

ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE, POULTRY, LONDON, E.C.

JAMES H. SCOTT, General Manager.

Free Insurance Coupon to readers of "The Academy." (Not to be detached.)

The Gresham Fire and Accident Insurance Society, Limited,

of

ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE, POULTRY, LONDON, E.C.,

will pay

£100 (One hundred pounds) to the legal personal representative of the bonâ fide holder of this Coupon, if he or she be killed solely and directly by an accident within the United Kingdom to any Railway Company's Train, a Tramcar, Omnibus, Cab, or other Licensed Vehicle plying for public hire, in which the holder is travelling as an ordinary ticket-bearing or fare-paying passenger, subject always to the following special conditions which are to be taken as incorporated in the contract:—

(a) That death result within thirty days after the accident (b) that notice thereof be given within seven days to the Society at its Head Office in London (c) that such reasonable evidence of the cause of death be given as the Society may require (d) that the holder shall have written in ink prior to the accident his or her usual signature in the space provided therefor (e) that the Society shall not be liable to any one person in respect of more than one Coupon in this or any other publication (f) that this insurance shall not be available to persons under twelve or over seventy years of age, and shall hold good for seven days from 12 o'clock noon of the day of issue.

Signature of Holder .....

Address .....

GERMAN wishes to correspond with ENGLISHMAN, to exchange German for English. Correction reciprocal. Write to Mr. G. Wolfram, Weingarten 3, Quedlinburg (Germany).

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references.—Address Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

BRITISH MUSEUM.

The READING ROOMS will be CLOSED from WEDNESDAY, MARCH 1ST, to SATURDAY, MARCH 4TH, inclusive.

F. G. KENYON,
Director and Principal Librarian.

British Museum,
February, 1911.

"The Book Monthly is now enlarged and makes an exceedingly pleasant and readable publication."—CLAUDIUS CLEAR, in the British Weekly.

. . THE . .

BOOK MONTHLY.

You know the "Book Monthly" by name—you very often see it quoted in the papers. It is a brightly written, brightly illustrated magazine about the books and the literary affairs of the day. But as yet you have not taken it in! Well, you are missing something, and you should at once arrange to get it regularly. It is an instructing, entertaining "guide, philosopher and friend" for the reader near the centre of things or far away. Being now seven years old, and so grown up, it has just been enlarged, and made more popular and practical in contents and style. Read it and you will know what to read; what's what, and who's who in the book world.

THE BOOK MONTHLY is published on the 1st of each month, by Simpkin, Marshall & Co., Ltd., Stationers' Hall Court, London. It costs Sixpence, and it can be ordered from any Bookseller, Bookstall, or Newsagent. The Publishers will send it, post free, for a year, inland or abroad, on receipt of eight shillings. You can have a copy of the current number posted to you by forwarding 6d., or a specimen back number for nothing.

Edward Whistler,

II, Strand, Charing Cross, London.

DIAMOND MERCHANT :: :: JEWELLER & SILVERSMITH.

A large stock of New and Second-hand Diamond and Gem Jewellery, Antique and Modern Silver Plate, always on hand, at bargain prices, for cash.

Fine Pearls, Emeralds, Diamonds, and early specimens of Antique Silver Plate wanted. High Prices given in Cash. Full Value allowed in Exchange.

Valuations made for Probate and other purposes.

GUN DEPARTMENT.

HAMMERLESS SECOND-HAND GUNS,

British Made, from £6 10s.

Nitro Proof. The Cheapest Gun in the Market combined with Quality.

ALSO

HAMMERLESS EJECTORS,

By Best London Makers, at Greatly Reduced Prices.

CORDITE RIFLES, ·400, ·500, ·600 Bores.

Catalogue and Price List on Application Gratis.

Telephone No.: 2033 GERRARD.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE & BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC

OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO AND . . THROUGH CANADA. . .

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service vid Vancouver.

For further particulars, apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,

62-65, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON, E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street, Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE

TO

SOUTH and EAST AFRICA.

WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.

Via the SUEZ CANAL.

Calling at MARSEILLES and NAPLES.

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.

(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—

DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.

Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE PLEASURE CRUISES

LIVERPOOL

to the

MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC

by the

"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"

Carpathia Leaves Liverpool 2 Mch., 1911.

Ports of Call . . .

CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS, MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA, ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME, PALERMO, NAPLES.

For full particulars apply—

THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

George Odell,

31, KING STREET, ST. JAMES', LONDON, S.W.

Ophthalmic and Mathematical Optician

Inventor of the Porter-Odell Patent Lens.

SPECTACLES AND EYEGLASSES

made to the individual facial measurements, thereby assuring accuracy and comfort. To enable the fitting of the innumerable variety of faces my different patterns have already run into the hundreds.

LORGNETTES in Gold, Metal and Tortoiseshell.

BAROMETERS. THERMOMETERS.

FIELD AND OPERA GLASSES.

The ODELL LUMEX PRISM BINOCULAR

pronounced by Naval and Military Officers to be the best (see testimonials).

P & O Passenger Services.

EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA, JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports

(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)

Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises

Throughout the Year, according to Season.

AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE, NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.

Programme on Application.

For Passage, Freight and all information apply—

PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, 122 Leadenhall Street, E.C., or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours

R.M.S.P.

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY.

(Royal Charter dated 1839.)

Fortnightly Sailings from Southampton to—

ARGENTINA & BRAZIL

via SPAIN & PORTUGAL.

WEST INDIES, BRITISH GUIANA, SPANISH MAIN, CENTRAL AMERICA, NEW YORK.

From LONDON to—

MOROCCO & CANARY ISLANDS,

EGYPT, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA & JAPAN.
(By Shire Line.)

For further particulars apply to

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY

18, Moorgate Street, E.C., & 32, Cockspur Street, S.W.

Printed and Published for the Proprietor by ODHAMS LTD., 35, Floral Street, Covent Garden, and 67, Long Acre, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE

No. 2026 [Registered as a Newspaper.] MARCH 4, 1911 PRICE THREEPENCE

THE CARNEGIE LIBRARY, PA. STATE COLLEGE, STATE COLLEGE

THE ECONOMICAL

Sheffield Simplex

AN EXAMPLE.

Running Costs for One Year, covering 9,279 miles, at Half the Cost of a Taxi-cab.

Read the following from the owner of a luxurious 45h.p. 6-cylinder "SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX" Cabriolet Car :—

Northampton, January 29th, 1911.

"By the 1st February I shall have had my car 12 months. The distance I have run is 9,279 miles, and the cost 4·4d. per mile."

"SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX" are strikingly simple in design, exceptionally sound in mechanical principles, with which is combined the finest possible workmanship AND SPECIALLY CREATED SHEFFIELD STEELS.

MADE IN TWO SIZES—25h.p. and 45h.p.—BOTH 6 CYLINDERS.

Catalogues post-free on application to Dept. "A."

The SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX MOTOR WORKS, Ltd.

TINSLEY, SHEFFIELD.

London Depot: c/o MULLINERS, 132-135, LONG ACRE, W.C.

SCOTLAND:—MIDDLETON & TOWNSEND, 56, Belford Road, Edinburgh.
LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE:—THE HOLLINGDRAKE AUTOMOBILE CO., Stockport.
SOUTH WALES:—GEORGE ACE, LTD., Warren Street, Tenby.
AUSTRALIA:—MURRAY AUNGER, LTD., Adelaide, S.A. MOULDER BROTHERS, Sydney, N.S.W.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Mr. Andrew Melrose's

PRIZE NOVEL COMPETITION

(Third Year).

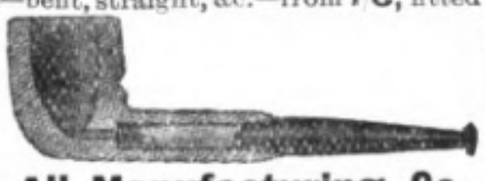
The Literary Agency of London has again been instructed to conduct the above Competition.

Prize: 250 Guineas.

ADJUDICATORS:

MR A. C. BENSON, MR. A. E. W. MASON, MR. W. J. LOCKE.

Papers relating to the Competition may be had on application to the Literary Agency of London. All applications must enclose a stamped addressed envelope for reply.



5, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

THE SORB-ALL FRENCH BRIAR PIPE

Recommended by the medical faculty, is offered direct to the public for the first time. The SORB-ALL plug is the most absorbent on the market.

COOLEST, SWEETEST, AND DRIEST.

The SORB ALL can be smoked without a particle of nicotine or juice entering the mouth. Sold in various shapes—bent, straight, &c.—from 1/6, fitted with the "SORBALL" hygienic plug.

Note the Plug.

The Sorb-All Manufacturing Co.,

88, Chancery Lane, London, E.C.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, LTD.,

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET, W.C.

Only Branches } 48, Queen Victoria Street, E.C. 132, Kensington High Street, W.

NEW BOOKS LESS THAN HALF-PRICE.

			Offered at		Published at
CRISPI,	FRANCESCO,	Italian Insurgent	s. 1	d. 9	s. 7	d. 6

Continued in next column.

CONSULT

The Gresham

On all Matters of

LIFE, FIRE & ACCIDENT INSURANCE.

Many Special Features.

Write for Prospectus; it will pay you.

Liberal Terms to recognised Brokers and Agents.

HEAD OFFICES:

ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE, POULTRY, LONDON, E.C.

JAMES H SCOTT, General Manager.

BOOKS, Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold, and Exchanged. Monthly Catalogues Free. Libraries purchased, catalogued, arranged, or valued.—Thomas Thorp, 93, St. Martin's Lane, W.C. (and at Reading).

Mudie's Select Library—continued.

GRAFTON, THIRD DUKE, AUTO. AND LETTERS	3	6	18	0
HARVARD, JOHN, AND HIS TIMES	3	3	7	6	net.
STEPHEN, SIR JAMES FITZJAMES, LIFE by his brother Leslie Stephen	5	0	16	0
THIEBAULT, BARON, MEMOIRS OF, 2 Vols. trans.	7	6	28	0
YOUNG, ARTHUR, AUTO. OF, Ed. M. Betham Edwards	4	9	12	6

Full List Free on Application.

Free Insurance Coupon to readers of "The Academy." (Not to be detached.)

The Gresham Fire and Accident Insurance Society, Limited,

of

ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE, POULTRY, LONDON, E.C.,

will pay

£100 (One hundred pounds) to the legal personal representative of the bonâ fide holder of this Coupon, if he or she be killed solely and directly by an accident within the United Kingdom to any Railway Company's Train, a Tramcar, Omnibus, Cab, or other Licensed Vehicle plying for public hire, in which the holder is travelling as an ordinary ticket-bearing or fare-paying passenger, subject always to the following special conditions which are to be taken as incorporated in the contract:—

(a) That death result within thirty days after the accident (b) that notice thereof be given within seven days to the Society at its Head Office in London (c) that such reasonable evidence of the cause of death be given as the Society may require (d) that the holder shall have written in ink prior to the accident his or her usual signature in the space provided therefor (e) that the Society shall not be liable to any one person in respect of more than one Coupon in this or any other publication (f) that this insurance shall not be available to persons under twelve or over seventy years of age, and shall hold good for seven days from 12 o'clock noon of the day of issue.

Signature of Holder .....

.....

LITTLE SALON—SOCIAL LITERARY CIRCLES. At S. Kensington. Debates, Discussions, Music. Letters only. Secretary, 15, Rectory Chambers, Church Street, Chelsea.

HOW TO WRITE FOR THE PRESS OR TO BECOME AN AUTHOR. Interesting and useful Booklet free. "H," LITERARY CORRESPONDENCE COLLEGE, 9, Arundel Street, W.C.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references.—Address Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

"The Book Monthly is now enlarged and makes an exceedingly pleasant and readable publication."—CLAUDIUS CLEAR, in the British Weekly.

. . THE . .

BOOK MONTHLY.

You know the "Book Monthly" by name—you very often see it quoted in the papers. It is a brightly written, brightly illustrated magazine about the books and the literary affairs of the day. But as yet you have not taken it in! Well, you are missing something, and you should at once arrange to get it regularly. It is an instructing, entertaining "guide, philosopher and friend" for the reader near the centre of things or far away. Being now seven years old, and so grown up, it has just been enlarged, and made more popular and practical in contents and style. Read it and you will know what to read; what's what, and who's who in the book world.

THE BOOK MONTHLY is published on the 1st of each month, by Simpkin, Marshall & Co., Ltd., Stationers' Hall Court, London. It costs Sixpence, and it can be ordered from any Bookseller, Bookstall, or Newsagent. The Publishers will send it, post free, for a year, inland or abroad, on receipt of eight shillings. You can have a copy of the current number posted to you by forwarding 6d., or a specimen back number for nothing.

Edward Whistler,

II, Strand, Charing Cross, London.

DIAMOND MERCHANT :: :: JEWELLER & SILVERSMITH.

A large stock of New and Second-hand Diamond and Gem Jewellery, Antique and Modern Silver Plate, always on hand, at bargain prices, for cash.

Fine Pearls, Emeralds, Diamonds, and early specimens of Antique Silver Plate wanted. High Prices given in Cash. Full Value allowed in Exchange.

Valuations made for Probate and other purposes.

GUN DEPARTMENT.

HAMMERLESS SECOND-HAND GUNS,

British Made, from £6 10s.

Nitro Proof. The Cheapest Gun in the Market combined with Quality.

ALSO

HAMMERLESS EJECTORS,

By Best London Makers, at Greatly Reduced Prices.

CORDITE RIFLES, ·400, ·500, ·600 Bores.

Catalogue and Price List on Application Gratis.

Telephone No.: 2033 GERRARD.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

CONTENTS

	Page
Review of the Week	251
To the Months	252
Ebb-tide	252
The Name of the Ship	252
Baxter and his Prints	253
The Lords and the Crown —Part II.	254
Reviews :—
The Great Kevir	255
The Great Word	256
America's External and Internal Legislation	258
A New Sentimental Journey	259
The Land of Omar	260
Patriotism and Socialism	260
The Antiquities of Durham	261
Shorter Reviews	262
Fiction	263
The late Duke of Devonshire	264
The Theatre	266
Music	268
Water-colour Drawings at Mrssrs. Agnew's Galleries	269
Aspects of Tragedy—I.	269
The Poet's Holiday—I.	271
India: A Series—VII.	272
Reflections on Modernity	273
Foreign Affairs: the Balance of Power in Europe	274
In the Temple of Mammon	275
Correspondence	277
Books Received	278

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

THE ACADEMY is published by MESSRS. ODHAMS, LIMITED, 67, Long Acre, London, W.C., to whom all letters with reference to publication must be addressed.

Applications referring to Advertisements may be addressed to MESSRS. ODHAMS, as above.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

THE ACADEMY is now obtainable at Messrs. W. H. Smith & Sons, Messrs. Wyman's, and Messrs. Willing's bookstalls and shops.

Owing to postal restrictions, THE POETICAL GAZETTE will in future be issued as a separate publication, obtainable through the Poetry Society, Clun House, Surrey Street, W.C. By courtesy of the Editor of "The Academy," the special subscription rate offered Members of the Poetry Society remains available, and as a special privilege they may obtain "The Academy" weekly for one year for 10s. (instead of the ordinary annual postal subscription of 15s.), or for one quarter 2s. 6d.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

THE Shakespearean writings, whoever was the author of them, are certainly the medium for producing Homeric contests. One day Mr. Frank Harris and Mr. Bernard Shaw are exchanging compliments. Mr. Bernard Shaw, as a defence of cribbing from Mr. Harris, remarks that Shakespeare was addicted to the practice of "picking up a good thing where you find it." Indeed, yes! According to Dr. Owen, he picked up and calmly appropriated the entire dramatic stock-in-trade of Bacon; and, says Dr. Owen, "I can prove it, and I alone!" "Not at all," says, in effect, Mr. Albert Calvert, "you are only prigging from me. I knew all about the cypher and buryings years ago, and said so in a book I published." According to one authority, Shakespeare was a drunken, dissolute scoundrel; according to another, Bacon was one of the greatest and most impudent literary frauds of all time. We stand aside from a conflict in which only Achilles and Hector would be worthy protagonists. Fortunately we possess, ranged on our shelves, plays and sonnets which are catalogued under the name of William Shakespeare. They may have owed their authorship, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, to a gentleman who would be summarily convicted in these days, or to a profound lawyer who was apparently endowed with a most unlawyerlike equipment. We have our own view on this matter, but if ever it is committed to cypher, we shall take care that it is buried in mid-ocean with a ponderous weight attached to it.

If Charles Dickens is receiving this year his meed of worship, William Makepeace Thackeray is not to go unhonoured and unsung. Twenty octavo volumes, comprising a complete édition de luxe of his works, are to be published as a centenary issue by Messrs. Macmillan and Co., beginning with "Vanity Fair" this month, and concluding in November with the "Critical Papers" in art and literature. Reproductions of more than fifteen hundred illustrations by Thackeray himself and other artists, which appeared in the original editions of the various books, are to be included, while Mr. Harry Furniss has designed five hundred special plates. Several of those we have been permitted to see, and they are certainly in the artist's best style, full of humour and significant line; his idea of Becky Sharp is especially good. Evidently there is no reason to fear any eclipse of the fame of the great Victorian novelists for many years to come. A few years ago the indifferent remark was frequently heard, "Nobody reads Dickens—or Thackeray—now, except the old fogeys," a remark which was, of course, absolutely untrue, but one of those contagious observations which gave "tone" and superiority (in certain youthful circles) to the immature critic. That statement would be greeted with scornful laughter to-day. Cheap editions and expensive editions all seem to be good investments from the publishing point of view. In the end the public has the word, and long after critics and writers have passed away its voice proclaims who shall wear the laurel crown.

Among the foreign papers which have recently reached us are copies of the Wednesday Review of India, a capably edited weekly modelled on the lines of the London reviews. Politics, literature, science, and "society" come within its sphere, and its articles make interesting reading even for men of the Occident, since English affairs occupy plenty of space in its columns. One paper, entitled "Two Years in Birmingham: some Reminiscences," by an Indian Bachelor of Arts and Science, is a capital little picture of ourselves as others see us—though it is unfortunately written in the present tense. "It is still summer. There is nothing lovelier than a real good English summer day," writes Mr. Raghavendra Rao. "There is brilliant sunshine—a phenomenon so uncommon in England that any morning when the sun comes out all the people rush out of their houses to salute the rising sun, and gleefully call out to their friends across the road, 'What a glorious day!'" We have not noticed this peculiar enthusiasm at 3.30 a.m. (for the month of which the author speaks is July), but there is a certain amount of truth beneath the pleasant exaggeration; we are pleased, also, to note that the reproach of stolidity finds no corroboration from Mr. Rao. He walks through the Park, and sees plenty of life and enjoyment. "Here is a nation that can and does let itself go. Here none of the reserve that is characteristic of the English." Other articles on "Rulers of India" and "Cotton Cultivation in India"—the latter by Professor Kale, M.A.—are well worth consideration by English readers.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

TO THE MONTHS

Dance, dance and whirl the weary year away
Unto the bourne of every bygone year.
Dance on; your measures, be they sad or gay,
No imprint leave upon the face austere
Of this our kingdom. Ring your fleeting rounds—
Their trace evanishes; and not a birth
Of darkling vapour 'neath the azure bounds
Of empyrean, clouding its blue mirth,
Nor flashing wafture of the wild bird's wing
Write upon air a more enduring thing.

The Seasons are your garments; them you cast
Over the world you dance upon; their stain
Tinctures the vision of the precious past,
Garlands the garners of delight and pain.
Though Earth forget them and a bosom bare
Lifts to the lashes of the winter wind,
Your robes of many colours—radiant, rare,
Kindling old haunts of memory—remind
How Spring and Summer and red golden ways
Were prelude to the sere of these dark days.

Dance in my heart, ye Twelve, that delicate thing
Throbs at your lightest footfall, to the last,
And not a day of all the days ye bring
Shall unrecorded steal upon the past.
Too instant are they—each a living stroke
Of this slight shadow-picture that enspheres
My life—a vision of a rainbow broke
On stormy time. Oh, children of the years,
Your dance of joy shall light my dim to-morrow
Through the long darkness of your dance of sorrow.

EDEN PHILLPOTTS.

EBB-TIDE

As in some rocky cleft
Half hid among the cliffs' vast jagged steeps,
The sound of ocean softly weeps
Like dreams long past and left,

The anguished soul of me
Mourns, shivering, steeped in woe that rends
Its ship of Love—vowed to enchanted ends—
Which life's wild wrecking sea,

Storm-driven as if accurst,
With wild shrieks claimed. Love swooned and sank
As Fate, relentless, seized the cup and drank
—But left my soul athirst.

Now ebb-tide's cadence low
For ever sobs with Love that once was mine:
Lost more and more the less I all resign
To One whose claim I know.

A. M. J.

THE NAME OF THE SHIP

By HILAIRE BELLOC

LADY CAPON: Of course they were glad in one way, because it gave him something to do, and they weren't rich, but it was a terrible wrench to have to lose him. His mother went down to Plymouth to see him off, and she tells me that he bore up very well. They're glad of the ship, anyhow.

MR. BAILEY: Ships differ, don't they?

LADY CAPON: Yes; it seems that people find an awful lot of difference. Some ships, you know, they simply try not to get onto at all; but I suppose they're commissioned, or something. (She looks vaguely before her; then her eyes become passably intelligent and alive, as though she had a story to tell.) There was Dick Betherton. . . .

MR. BAILEY (pondering): Dick Betherton!—(waking up suddenly)—Oh! Lord Betherton!

LADY CAPON (a little snappishly): Yes, of course, Lord Betherton.

MARY SMITH: Bill, how can you!

MR. BAILEY (innocently): How can I what? When she said Dick, I couldn't help thinking of all the other Dicks I knew.

MARY SMITH: Well, you know that he used to be called Dick.

MR. BAILEY (sadly): Not by me.

LADY CAPON (hurriedly, to smooth things): Well, anyhow, he was frightfully keen on getting onto the In— (She looks puzzled and worried, and then turns to Mary Smith). The In— What was it?

MARY SMITH: Inp—p—

MR. BAILEY: Important?

MARY SMITH: Oh! how can you—

LADY CAPON (excitedly): No, not the Important. It's on the tip of my tongue. . . . The In—In—

MR. BAILEY: Indescribable.

LADY CAPON (waving her hand nervously): No, no! wait a minute. In—

MR. BAILEY (sympathetically): Indestructible?

MARY SMITH (whispering angrily): I do wish, Bill—

LADY CAPON (interested): The In— What did you say, Mr. Bailey?

MR. BAILEY (solemnly): Indestructible I suggested, Lady Capon. I'm sure there's a ship called the Indestructible, but I can't remember where she is.

LADY CAPON (thoroughly interested): It's very like that, Mr. Bailey. (She looks at him sadly and thoughtfully for a few seconds. Mr. Bailey stares into space through his glasses. Lady Capon shakes her head.) N—o, it's not the Indestructible, not exactly, but it's like that. In—

MR. BAILEY (cheerfully): Indefatigable.

LADY CAPON: No, but it's like that.

MR. BAILEY (in a satisfied tone): Well, then, it is not the Indecent; she's in the Caracas.

LADY CAPON: The In— what, Mr. Bailey?

MR. BAILEY: The Incredible, I said.

LADY CAPON (still seeking for the word—worried): You didn't say that; but anyhow it's not that—it's not that sort of sound. You had it nearly once, the In—In—

MR. BAILEY: Indescribable.

LADY CAPON (thoughtfully): No, not that.

MARY SMITH (trying to cut all this short and talking rapidly): I do hope they haven't gone on the China Station. You see. . . .

MR. BAILEY (interrupting): My dear Mary, there mayn't be any China Station any longer. And you couldn't drink there when there was.

LADY CAPON: Isn't there? Couldn't you? (She goes on pitifully in a half tone.) The In—In—?

MR. BAILEY (brilliantly): The Inexcusable?

LADY CAPON (shakes her head irritably, only half hearing): No, no; oh dear! it's on the tip of my tongue again.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

MR. BAILEY (suddenly, as though he had found it): I know—the Inconsequential. She's a German ship, with blue and white funnels and stripes, and a frieze of white fishes in stencil all round the gunwale strake.

LADY CAPON (triumphantly): The Inhospitable; that's it, the Inhospitable!

MARY SMITH (gently): Surely, Dorothy dear—

MR. BAILEY (eagerly): Yes, that's it, the Inhospitable. I remember her well. She was one of the Inseparable class, sister ship to the Inexcusable. (Mary Smith looks daggers at him. Mr. Bailey goes on talking rapidly.) It's a very funny thing. You can get two ships built one exactly like the other, and yet they behave quite differently. There were those two ships, for instance. I went on one of 'em with my brother Jim to Malta in the year 1903. She rolled like a pig; and the other one was as steady as a timber ship.

LADY CAPON (interested): Which one was that?

MR. BAILEY: The Ineffable.

LADY CAPON (disturbed): But you said another name just now.

MR. BAILEY (airily): Oh yes, the Infallible; but she's out of commission. They're going to scrap her.

LADY CAPON (recovering it again with triumph): Inhospitable! That's it; she's got four funnels.

MR. BAILEY (gloomily): Yes, she would have. (He gets up and moves solemnly across the room. He stoops and peers for a long time closely at a little etching.)

LADY CAPON (to Mary Smith): What are you looking so vicious about, Mary?

MARY SMITH (viciously): Oh, nothing.

LADY CAPON: He's your cousin, isn't he?

MARY SMITH (sighing): Yes.

LADY CAPON (following Mr. Bailey with admiration in her eyes): What a wonderful man! Really, he seems to know every ship in the Navy. Does he belong to the Navy League?

MARY SMITH (wearily): Oh no; oh dear me, no! He's quite the other way.

LADY CAPON (a little offended): Oh dear! Do you mean he's a Little Englander?

MARY SMITH (sighing profoundly): Oh, worse than that!

LADY CAPON (shocked): My dear Mary!

MR. BAILEY (coming slowly back to them again): I was wrong about the name of that ship.

LADY CAPON (very graciously): Oh, Mr. Bailey, I've been hearing dreadful things about you.

MR. BAILEY (in alarm): I hope I didn't get one of the ships wrong, did I? I rather pride myself on knowing that sort of thing.

LADY CAPON (graciously): No; certainly not, Mr. Bailey. (Archly) But we've been hearing dreadful things about your politics.

MR. BAILEY (airily): Oh, my politics! . . . Well, well, I'm not sure that I've got any. But I do hope I know my way about the Navy List. By the way, I was telling you I got the name of that boat wrong.

LADY CAPON (interrogatively, never having met such detailed knowledge before): Yes?

MR. BAILEY: It's the Intolerable.

LADY CAPON (muses, looking at the carpet, then suddenly waking up, a little flustered): What an odd name, Mr. Bailey!

MR. BAILEY (vaguely): Yes, it is odd; but they've got odd names sometimes. You see ships inherit names, and very often they're French names from prizes taken in the Great War. For instance, there was the Insaissable and the Incongrue, and the Incomprise. And—oh, lord! lot's of 'em. (He merges into silence, and many thoughts fill to overflowing the mind of Lady Capon. Mary Smith has given them both up in despair.) I must be going home, Mary. (He gets up to go. Mary Smith shows no enthusiasm to detain him.) It's odd—after our conversation, but the man I'm going to meet now has come off a ship with a name that I can't remember for the moment. But it's the In— In—

MARY SMITH (suggesting savagely): Inexhaustible!

MR. BAILEY (rapidly): Yes, that's it—the Inexhaustible. Thanks, Mary.

LADY CAPON: Oh, Mary! how clever you are!

MR. BAILEY (looking at his cousin paternally and very tenderly): Yes, she is clever, isn't she, Lady Capon? Well, as I was saying, the Inevitable—beastly old sieve. (He goes off, and there is a great silence.)

BAXTER AND HIS PRINTS*

THE hobbies of collectors are many, and they are in no small degree, at all events in the present day, the result of ingenious trade impulses started with a view to creating a demand, with a corresponding rise in prices for work which would otherwise arouse little attention. It is so with pictures, it is so with engravings, and now that the nineteenth century is beginning to recede into the past, people are turning to the despised Early Victorians, and wondering vaguely whether there is nothing "collectable" there. There seems every prospect of these curious folk raising the works of George Baxter to this dignity, and the phrase "Baxter Prints" is already coming to have a familiar ring in circles where you must collect something or confess your self unintellectual. It is to help folks who have been bitten with this craze that Mr. Lewis's volume has been produced; and, whatever we may think of the collector-connoisseurs who accumulate Baxter's works and detect in them beauties invisible to his contemporaries, it is certain that Mr. Lewis has turned out a careful study of Baxter's art and craft, and of its place in the chain of artistic development.

George Baxter's works undoubtedly mark a fresh departure; he was indeed the father and practical originator of modern colour-print, and although much of his ingenuity was expended upon the reproduction of subjects intrinsically poor and unworthy, yet his fine craftmanship appears in the delicacy and richness of his tints, and often in the remarkable sense of atmosphere with which he contrived to invest his distances. Some of his best work is seldom excelled even now; and when one considers the primitive nature of his apparatus, the entire originality of his methods, and his independence of the discoveries and inventions of others, the results he produced are seen to be little short of marvellous. But, of course, they were altogether lacking in the breadth and power and softness of the work of the great mezzo-tinters, whose sun was setting as his was beginning to rise; and they failed, too, when compared with the fine texture and harmonious tones of the great eighteenth-century work, as handled by Rowlandson and some of his contemporaries. The Early Victorian era was a prosaic time; it wholly lacked any understanding of, or desire for, that element of mystery which, as the greatest of the Victorians pointed out, was the essential element in art. So Baxter supplied their need with bright colours and garish lights, which formed appropriate frontispieces for their printed works, and decorated the covers of the jingly music which was the delight of that time.

* The Picture Printer of the Nineteenth Century: George Baxter. By C. T. Lewis. (Sampson Low, Marston and Co. 21s. net.)

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The life of George Baxter extended from 1804 to 1867. He was born at Lewes, and his early labours were performed there and at Brighton. From the first he displayed the characteristics of careful accuracy and practical ingenuity which marked his work to the last. His temperament was of the irritable artistic sort, which kept him continually at loggerheads with those who ought to have been his friends throughout his life. He was swift to take offence and slow to forgive, and the result was that on the personal side his life was stormy and unsatisfactory. But he was a true artist also in looking for his reward rather in the excellence of his work than to the pecuniary profits which it realised. Although he had one or two spells of success which brought fortune, they never lasted long enough to set his affairs upon a permanent satisfactory footing, and he died at length in what can only be described as poverty. He was open-handed and charitable, and much of his money was dissipated in helping others. Throughout his career he was always busied in improving and perfecting his processes of printing, and he certainly had pre-eminently "the eye that winces at false work and loves the true." He was continually refining and improving his methods, though with small reference to their commercial value, and for some of his colour-prints he used as many as twenty-four blocks, worked, it must be remembered, by hand processes, and in quite a large proportion of his works the number of blocks used was ten and upwards. Thus the labour that he expended to produce his results was very large, and one can only regret that it was not always given to subjects that were worth preserving. Mr. Lewis provides us with a very careful and complete catalogue raisonné of his known works, with full details of size, date of publication, and description. This is, so far as we know, the first authoritative catalogue of the kind produced, and collectors will find it invaluable—not the less so for the chapter principally devoted to advising collectors on the subject. Numerous illustrations are provided, and they are exceedingly well produced, the delicacy of Baxter's work being perfectly re-echoed in them both in colours and in black and white. The subject has in short been thoroughly thrashed out in a handsome volume, which will interest a very much larger circle than the collectors to whom it is primarily addressed.

THE LORDS AND THE CROWN

By Montagu Wood

PART II.

I was maintaining last week that the Crown had no power legally or constitutionally to terminate political deadlocks. Let us examine this: What is the case quoted as the foundation of this contention? It is, of course, the one universally cited case, the case of William IV. It is rather curious to reflect that but for the fact that Lord Grey, a Radical of those days, suggested to William IV., an almost Radical King, that he should create Peers to pass the Reform Bill, we should never have heard a syllable of the preposterous contention of the Radical Party to-day that the House of Lords can willy-nilly be overwhelmed and wiped out of existence, nor is it possible to conceive that any one in their wildest moments of insanity would have dreamt of suggesting such a demented means of solving the embarrassment of a discredited faction. But it is also remarkable that as a matter of fact William IV. did not carry out what he may possibly have intended, so that a precedent, maniacal as such a precedent must have been, was not even in reality actually created.

Now let us consider the circumstances of the proposed creation of Peers so often quoted as compared with the present crisis. There was a case of a Bill brought before Parliament, which came, if any Bill ever did, under the formulæ prescribed above—that is to say, a Bill upon which the people, not as a party but as a nation, had grimly, firmly, and in the overwhelming mass of their multitude set their minds, and unsurprisingly so, considering that it was a Bill that conceded them the first and barest elements of political rights. The prolonged rejection of the Bill might without exaggeration (because exaggeration is so customary where revolution is talked of) have led to very serious uprisings of the people. Considering these circumstances, it is quite conceivable that a wise King might justifiably consent to the creation of a few Peers to avert a tremendous national convulsion. It is arguable that it was justifiable, it is arguable that it was advisable. But before one points the absence of all sort of analogy between the present time and that occasion, let us make one comment on the position of the Throne in those days to what it answers to now.

In spite of the checks that since the Stuart times had been placed upon the personal powers of the Sovereign down to the time of William IV. inclusive, the Throne was frankly partisan. The first two Georges were naturally Whigs. George III. was notoriously and in many ways disastrously a strong and bigoted Tory. George IV. was as Prince of Wales a violent Whig; but on becoming Prince Regent transferred himself abruptly to the side of the Tories. William IV., on the other hand, was hailed as a democratic Monarch, so that his acquiescence to create Peers for his own side had in those days no baleful significance or promise of acute resentment.

Since those days, happily for every one, the Crown has had no politics. All Sovereigns are human, so that in all probability the Crown has had its partialities, but in overt acts it has held the scales most honourably and impartially.

Now let us see what it is now asked to do. It is asked, I suppose the Radicals would argue, to terminate a deadlock between the two Houses. There is no deadlock between the two Houses in any ordinary sense of the term. There was a temporary deadlock over the Budget, but that has been removed, and there is no bill that has come up from the Commons—save one, to be deferred for a moment in my argument—which has been rejected by the Lords. In fact, to go back to my formula, there is no legislation directly affecting the welfare of the people, upon which the said people have grimly, firmly, and by an overwhelming majority set their hearts that has been rejected by the Lords. Even if that had been so, it would surely have been an order of the very strongest and the most unpalatable kind, to suggest that the Throne should be called in to solve the difficulty. As a fact, as I have already stated, the idea that the Lords would not give way under such circumstances is unthinkable.

Now what are the facts of the present case? The Bill sent up to the Lords which they reject is a Bill to abolish themselves. There is not a fragment of evidence that the people are, in spite of two Elections, virulently hostile to the Peers; on the contrary, the Peers who were said before to represent only themselves, now clearly represent three million electors—quite sufficient to support any Second Chamber. They are also warmly and stoutly supported by the rural constituencies in which they live. Under these circumstances the Crown, hitherto admirably, loyally instinct with all the finest devotion it is possible to pay to its neutral duty, is called upon by an arbitrary personal act to create an artificial party majority in the Second Chamber of the United Kingdom for the purpose of wiping out the said Chamber from the Constitution of the realm, in defiance not only of every sentiment in connection with the Royal position in the kingdom, but in defiance of the Coronation Oath, whereby it has religiously sworn to maintain the Constitution in its integrity.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

In regard to any such personal act, let us reiterate the fact that the Crown has no Constitutional power to create Peers in the way suggested. The Crown has power to create Peers, to reward national and political services within rational limits, but it has no Constitutional power to create Peers for the avowed and intended object of manufacturing an artificial majority in one of the Estates of the realm, and so forcing through a purely partisan measure; much less has it the Constitutional power (save the mark!) to create Peers in order to eliminate one element of the Constitution which it has solemnly sworn to uphold. So far with regard to the Constitutional standpoint; but an additionally imperative standpoint is the legal one. Not only must the sense of the community be outraged by the suggestion of such arbitrary action in regard to decency and custom, but its legality is entirely without foundation. The legal aspect of the question is this: The Crown can technically and legally ennoble as many subjects as it chooses, but it cannot, without the consent of the House of Peers, make them Lords of Parliament. The House of Lords can therefore refuse to allow them to vote.

Constitutionally, and legally therefore, the Crown has no status to act; but even if it had, can any one conceive that a Prime Minister outside Bedlam would recommend the Throne to interfere in the matter or to drag it into the mire and degradation of party politics? Obviously the Throne must either acquiesce, and become a tool of the Radical party, or refuse and be the target of its vulgar abuse. Unhappily there is no alternative, because to abstain is, to the hectoring Radical mind, to refuse; so that if the personal advisers of the Crown, as opposed to the political ones, say, as they only can say, "We have no power of any sort, and no wish to interfere with party politics," that will be treated as a refusal by the riff-raff of the Government battalions, and acted on as such. It is useless with such battalions to argue that, if Peers are to be made for Radicals to abolish the House of Lords, more Peers must be made subsequently to re-establish them, and so the Throne is to be a pawn in the party game henceforth, and evermore shorn of dignity and prestige.

On one thing, however, let the Unionist Party and the House of Lords be absolutely determined. If the Throne cannot see its way to resist the advice tendered by its Ministers to create 500 Peers, those 500 Peers must be in full measure created. The whole thing is an undisguised bluff on the part of the Radical Ministry. A few months ago they openly declared that not a single Peer was to be created because the House of Lords was expected to give way. Now they declare "Yes; the Peers will be created in batches of fifty. After the first fifty the Lords will give way." What a delightful trap, if any one is fool enough to fall into it. Nothing can exceed the grotesque farcical pantomime position of the Radical Cabinet if they have to create those 500 Peers, out of their democratic, disinterested gutter following. Also, if one may respectfully suggest anything to the personal advisers of the Monarchy, let 500 be created or none. They and their Radical sponsors will be the laughing-stock of the universe. These sponsors will moreover have grossly and egregiously violated the privilege of Parliament, the privilege of party, and the primary liberties of the Kingdom.

REVIEWS

THE GREAT KEVIR

Overland to India. By SVEN HEDIN. Two Vols. Illustrated. (Macmillan and Co. 30s. net.)

SECOND only in order of merit to the pleasure of traversing great distances in a far-off land is that of sitting in a comfortable chair by a cheerful fire and reading the story of such travels. Those who would obtain a somewhat nearer insight into the life of modern Persia than is possible from a perusal of the daily paper will find a deep well of information in Dr. Sven Hedin's recent work, "Overland to India," more especially since the learned author, as he points out in his Preface, diligently avoided routes trodden by the feet of other travellers. Now "travelling in Persia is as calm and peaceful as on country roads in Sweden, and exciting adventures are exceedingly rare," and, consequently, one would naturally expect a certain "flatness in the description" of day after day spent amidst the deserts of Iran. We are, therefore, exceedingly grateful to the author for the gracious way in which he extends his forgiveness to us if we perhaps grow a little "weary of the perpetual ring of caravan bells, and look eagerly for an oasis where for awhile he may wake from his slumbers."

The first point to appreciate before setting out upon the arduous task of following the author's restless footsteps through the sandy wastes is that a farsakh is equivalent, roughly speaking, to three and three-quarter miles. The earlier portions of the journey—namely, from Trebizond through Erzerum and Tabriz to Teheran—do not call for any particular comment. In view of recent events, it is, of course, of some interest to read of the manner in which Russia protects and extends her interests in the land of the lion and the sun, and for this and other obvious political reasons one may well pay a considerable amount of attention to the descriptions of such strategical points of vantage as Erzerum. The favourite policy of Russia in playing off native races against each other, and thereby keeping them in a lasting state of impotence, is well exemplified in these introductory chapters.

The far-reaching effects of the opening of a new commercial route may be appreciated when one reads, as here, of the comparative ruin of Tabriz, which shortly before the opening of the Suez Canal had a population of 350,000 inhabitants, but has now sunk to the level of a mere provincial market-town. The decline of Tabriz is merely a single illustration of a general national decadence:—

> A degenerate race, without orderly control, without discipline and obedience; a morality which reminds one of whitened sepulchres; a language which produced one of the world's richest literatures, but is now spoken by a people which has lost mastery over itself, and is spoken in a land which seems doomed to disappear as an independent state. Everywhere is seen neglect and decay, an indifference which knows no other rule of life than laisser-aller.

Such is the author's indictment of modern Persia.

At Teheran began the serious business of the expedition—namely, that of equipping a caravan, no novelty to such an old hand as the author. Those who have followed his previous wanderings in Central Asia and Tibet will scarcely be surprised to hear that the explorer felt a great longing for places far from the haunts of men:—

> And yet I was eager to return to the desert; its silent, inexplicable witchery drew me on with irresistible force; I seemed to hear its mysterious voices calling to me from its depths, "Come home." Beyond the great desert I had a vision of the blue, snow-clad mountains of Tibet, but now the desert must first be conquered.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The latter half of the first volume is mainly devoted to the Great Kevir, that weird inland lake of salt and mud which is scarcely less mysterious than that other great lake in the heart of Africa, Lake Tchad, recalling vividly the memory of the late ill-fated Lieutenant Boyd Alexander. Its area, in round figures, is 21,000 square miles, about the same as that of Lake Michigan. Dr. Sven Hedin mapped with considerable care the Southern limits of this immense salt waste, which possesses a maximum length of 300 miles and a maximum breadth of 150, and twice traversed it, from South to North and from North to South, by these means enabling himself to form a fairly complete theory of its origin and extent:—

> The Kevir is, then, a kind of masked subterranean lake, concealed and filled up by the loose material carried into it by the watercourses; it is a lake which contains more mud than water; a lake with a bottom which, paradoxical as it may sound, lies higher than the water-surface, for we should have to dig down some eight inches into the solid matter before coming to the water . . . it is really a hydrographic system of beds without water.

The Kevir appears to be a climatic boundary, and > Though an exceedingly shallow and flat depression, is an enormous recipient for all the rain-water that falls in the surrounding hills; it collects from all four points of the compass as into a lake.

Although caravans frequently cross the Kevir, the passage is fraught with very grave danger. After heavy rains the whole expanse becomes one vast quagmire, and men and camels may never, or only with the greatest difficulty, escape to dry ground. Upon the completion of his second crossing the author convinced himself that "the descriptions by the natives of the risks to be encountered were not exaggerated." There is a native tradition that the salt desert was formerly a large lake into which a broad river discharged its waters. Under existing conditions, according to the author's theory, denudation is proceeding with great and destructive energy, and "it is the part of the rain to wash down, during the winter months, to the Kevir all the material pulverised during the summer; and during the lapse of thousands of years the depression has been filled up with solid matter."

"Persia is poor in everything except square miles," and when one contemplates the universal apathy prevalent in that decadent land and the rapacity with which landlords and bureaucrats seize the meagre profits of the peasants one is scarcely surprised to hear it so described.

A study of the Kevir undoubtedly affords ground for extremely fascinating conjecture, not only as to its past history, but as to its future destiny. The author's conclusion is that—

> Undoubtedly the physical geographical changes now in progress will end in entirely converting the Kevir into a sandy desert of the same kind as in Eastern Turkestan. And we can, on the other hand, draw the inference that Eastern Turkestan, after having been at one time a part of the Central Asiatic mediterranean Sea, was gradually filled up with finely disintegrated products of weathering of the same kind as in the present Kevir, and that its solidified lake of wet mud and clay was finally dried and hardened to such a degree that it could bear the weight of the encroaching sand.

In Tebbes, that marvellous oasis of palms and running water set like a tiny island in the midst of the wastes of sand, the author had the good fortune to witness the great Passion Play performed each year in the first month of the Mohammedan lunar year, Moharrem, in commemoration of the death of Hussein at Kerbela in the year A.D. 680. Readers of the author's "Trans-Himalaya" will remember how he also witnessed the New Year festival of the Tibetans in Tashi-lunpo.

The present work is not devoted entirely to a record of Dr. Sven Hedin's own wanderings, but discusses in very full detail the journeys in Persia of a number of more or less celebrated travellers, from the days of Alexander the Great and Marco Polo to those of Lieutenant Vaughan. "The great value of Marco Polo's description of the Persian desert consists in confirming and proving its physical invariableness during more than six hundred years. It had as great a scarcity of oases then as now, and the water in the wells was not less salt than in our own days."

At Seistan the author found himself in the midst of a plague-stricken area. The ravages of the dreaded disease are graphically described. The general impression of Persia and the Persians conveyed by this work is a sad one. But that the future is not necessarily black is clearly demonstrated. The great need of the country is improved irrigation. "Fertility in Persia is almost solely dependent upon water supply; and here alone [Seistan] is enough water not merely to fill great canals as large as rivers, and a network of smaller ditches and dykes, but also very frequently to run to waste in superfluous swamps and lagoons." And again, "The soil is not less fruitful than before, and, whether the volume of water in the Hillmend increases or diminishes, it is always so enormous that it could provide for the maintenance of millions of human beings."

A few words may be said regarding the maps and illustrations. Dr. Hedin's services to cartography are well known and appreciated. He has in these volumes added greatly to our knowledge of the more remote regions of Iran, and in especial of the great Kevir, of which all existing maps give an inaccurate representation. The illustrations are very numerous, almost unduly so, and the coloured plates might well have been omitted. The gem of the collection is a photograph of the great Tamarisk outside Tebbes, with men and camels beneath its shade, and the city floating like a mirage in the background. The sketches from the author's pencil do not pretend to artistic merit, and therefore escape comment. And so we leave him wending towards the land of wild asses and yaks, beyond the eternal snow.

THE GREAT WORD

The Historical and Religious Value of the Fourth Gospel. By Ernest F. Scott, D.D.

The Founding of the Church. By Benjamin Wisner Bacon, D.D., LL.D. Constable. 1s. net each.

Three or four volumes of this series—"Modern Religious Problems"—have already been noticed in The Academy. It was shown that a number of persons, not widely known to fame, innocent of the simplest logical sense, were prepared with a stern flourish of critical trumpets to brush all that is vital in the Christian religion on one side. These prophets of "Modern Religious Problems" set about their work with a kind of sad stoicism; they grieved even as they struck; with a sort of fiat justitia, ruat cælum air they evacuated the Gospels of all but a little weak morality, and left us to contemplate documents about as inspiring as "Poor Robin's Almanack."

Dealing with two fresh volumes in the same series it is not necessary to retraverse the old ground. It was shown that the reasoning powers of these "higher critics" would have entailed a whipping in the thirteenth-century booby-class; it is hardly worth while repeating the process. Dr.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Ernest F. Scott, who is Professor of Church History in Queen's University, Kingston, Canada, however, is perhaps worth a passing notice. He is quite certain that the Fourth Gospel "cannot" be attributed to the Apostle St. John; and here are some of his reasons:—

> Its portrait of Jesus is dominated by certain conceptions of His work and nature which were not possible to a thinker of the primitive age. . . .
>
> We cannot believe that one who had known Jesus in the flesh, and who had been nearer to Him than any other, would thus have presented the Master's life. His reflections on the meanings of the life could never have displaced his interest in the life itself. . . . The Gospel . . . lacks the warm colours and the definite outlines of personal reminiscence. The Evangelist, like Paul, is "one born out of due time," who has not witnessed the earthly life of Jesus except through the eyes of others.

And so forth, and so forth; and one turns to the Gospel and reads:—

> When Jesus therefore saw her weeping, and the Jews also weeping which came with her, He groaned in the spirit, and was troubled.
>
> And said, Where have ye laid him? They said unto Him, Lord, come and see.
>
> Jesus wept.

It is curious that any one, professing any form whatsoever of Christianity, should have the hardiness to sweep away all the evidence both of universal tradition and of hard fact itself on no better ground than his own purely personal fancies and speculations. So and so was not "possible" to a primitive thinker, we "cannot believe" this, we cannot admit that. One would really be glad to know the qualifications of this writer for making his whims and conjectures the criterion of the truth.

However, too much space has been given to the vagaries of these obscure and illogical persons who know, as they say, the mind of Christ better than the Apostles and the Evangelists. The real interest of these little books, and of many other books written in the same spirit, is the evidence they afford of the infinite possibilities of human errancy; and this capacity for going astray, for being utterly and completely wrong on any given question, is no doubt the defect of the human quality. The lower we go in the scale of being the less the possibility of defect; to put it roughly and crudely, a chunk of old red sandstone, which cannot possibly be "wise," cannot possibly be "foolish;" an oyster which cannot be "kind" cannot be "cruel;" a tiger which cannot be "moral" cannot be "immoral." It is when we get to man that we rise into the region of the great paradoxes. The being who can literally mount to heights of meditation and imagination that are unearthly is also transcendent on the downward path, so that there have been people who have declared men to be inferior to the trees and the flowers and the dead rock itself. The rocks, they would say, know not corruption, whereas humanity for ever dwells on the very edge of death and putrefaction; a man, with his eyes turned heavenward, is removed by but the drawing of a breath from that mass of horrible and deadly poisons which we call a corpse; and thus is man inferior to a diamond, to a lump of granite even.

So with the intellect; a pig is incapable of reason and equally incapable of unreason. The same measure applies to the Arts; an anthill is not architecture, but ants can never commit the horrible follies and monstrosities in brick and stone which are making the inhabited parts of the earth hideous to look upon. The chains which hold the lower parts of creation, so that they may not ascend on high, restrain them also from descending lower than the place which has been appointed them.

Now in the eighteenth century it may be said generally—with certain notable exceptions—that mankind in Europe had succeeded in entirely forgetting the meaning of the Arts. It was not so much that people wrote ill or painted badly as that they had ceased to know what Art is in its essence. We know that they regarded Pope's work as representing the highest achievement of poetry; we may justly conclude, then, that they had not the remotest notion as to the meaning of the word "poetry." Strange as it may seem, the whole mass of well-educated, otherwise intelligent Englishmen had succeeded in blotting out of their consciousness and intelligence and emotions a piece of knowledge, an instinct, which is part of the very definition of man. It was as if a whole nation, subject like all other men to the passion of thirst, endeavoured to appease this physical desire by swallowing dust and ashes. It would be incredible if it had not happened. So also would certain modern states of mind with respect to religion be incredible if we had not evidence of its existence in the form of "Modernism," "Higher Criticism," and such-like bewilderments. Using general terms, religion manifests itself to that form of mental muddle which calls itself "the modern spirit" as a system of ethics touched with hysteria. The real substance of the dish, as it were, is a moral substance; but that this may be swallowed and rendered more or less palatable we are allowed a sauce of vague sentiment. It is as if the priest, reading out the Decalogue, were to treat himself and the congregation to a gulp and a choke after each Commandment, thereby testifying to his belief in the Cosmos, the Immanence, and the Benevolence of Everything and the Equality of Everybody, and the (almost) certainty that there is a Sort of Something Somewhere that, for the present at all events, we may justifiably continue to call God. Still, the gulp and its significance are but the agreeable accessories of the real thing: true religion consists in not coveting one's neighbour's wife, nor his ox, nor his ass, nor anything that is his.

And here is a blunder, here is a blindness almost as enormous as if one thought that literature consisted of the rules in the grammar, or painting of the laws of perspective, or good manners of obedience to the negative injunctions laid down in little books of etiquette.

Religion, to put the matter simply and intelligently, is nothing more than the supreme art of happiness. Like other arts, it has its negative rules. Suppose we regard man for a moment purely as a thirsty animal, who is to be instructed in the true method of appeasing thirst. We should give him some preliminary and negative cautions, such as (if you would quench your thirst), you must not eat salt, you must not drink sea-water, you must not consume dust and ashes. These cautions—or commandments—clear the way, as it were; but it would be a strange error indeed that would put them in the place of the great draught of the cold well-water, which alone can quench the burning, and finally satisfy the desire. So with religion. Its end is happiness; it declares that this happiness—this fullness of joy and delight, this fulfilment of all that man's being vaguely prophesies—is only to be found in a certain way or conduct of the soul, and it lays down its laws and its rules and its cautions so that this end may be attained. Part, and part only, of this code is ethical, and the Christian religion, it may be claimed, stands unique on this ground—that it has perceived the real relation and interdependence of the means and the end. There was plenty of morality in pre-Christian times, and plenty of "religion," but it had not been perceived that the one was the means and the other the end. You had your philosophic code of morals and you had your mysteries of Eleusis; but the pagan world did not see that on the one hand ethics qua ethics did not lead to initiation—that is happiness—nor did it understand that the immoral person was incapable of being initiated.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The Catholic Faith joined the two broken syllables, and made one great Word; we must take care that modern heresy and confusion do not shatter that quickening utterance into senseless particles.

AMERICA'S EXTERNAL AND INTERNAL LEGISLATION

American Commercial Legislation before 1789. By ALBERT ANTHONY GIESECKE, Ph.D., President of the University of Cuzco, Peru. (University of Pennsylvania. $1 50c.)

The Tariff History of the United States. By F. W. TAUSSIG, Ph.D., Henry Lee Professor of Economics in Harvard University. (G. P. Putnam's Sons. 5s.)

THESE two books deal, the one with the history of American legislation of all kinds before 1789, and the other with the history of the tariffs, beginning almost immediately after that date. The first, of course, was the legislation imposed compulsorily upon America when she was regarded as a subject-Colony to England, and the second is the story of her own voluntarily decreed legislation for the purpose of expanding her trade and commerce. The first book is new, and the second is a fresh edition of a highly successful and authoritative work first produced in 1888, and now revised and brought right up to date. In view of the recently proposed reciprocity agreement between America and Canada, they are both of special value and give rise to much thought.

Professor Giesecke's book appeals perhaps mainly to the pure scholar as apart from the practical political historian. It is essentially a student's book, though it treats of its subject in the most lucid way. Students of Adam Smith—and they are still too few—will be already familiar with a great deal of the ground covered. The old economic fallacy so utterly destroyed in the "Wealth of Nations," that wealth consisted in money, gold and silver, and that those could be brought to a country and kept there only by means of a favourable balance of trade—i.e., by an excess of exports over imports—is seen to be the basis of England's commercial policy during this long period.

In this belief difficulties were placed in the way of the importation of foreign goods, and the export of raw materials was restricted with the idea that it helped the home markets, and what with bounties on the one hand and restrictions on the other trade was forced through artificial channels and progress was very slow. All this was done because the Colonies were looked upon primarily as sources of profit, and their trade was to be preserved, with exceptions, to the merchants of the Mother Country. The result of this policy we know. It led to the refusal of the colonists, as they then were, to submit to English dictation as to the way in which they were to conduct their own business, and a repudiation of the authority of a Parliament in which they had no representation, and which assembled some three thousand miles away. The end of the conflict was the discarding of all external governing authority and the drawing up of the Articles of Confederation, the principles of which have led to the foundation of the United States, where can be witnessed forty-five equal and co-ordinate States, living peaceably together as one nation. Yet the year 1789 marks no such epoch in economic as it does in political history, and we have to pass on to the year 1808 to see the birth of the new idea and the growth of the Protectionist principle in America.

> The Berlin and Milan Decrees of Napoleon and the English Orders in Council led in December, 1807, to the Embargo. The Non-Intercourse Act followed in 1809; war with England was declared in 1812. During the war intercourse with England was prohibited, and all import duties were doubled. The last-mentioned measure was adopted in the hope of increasing the revenue, but had little effect, for foreign trade practically ceased to exist. This series of restrictive measures blocked the accustomed channels of exchange and production, and gave an enormous stimulus to those branches of industry whose products had before been imported. Establishments for the manufacture of cotton goods, woollen cloths, iron, glass, pottery and other articles sprang up with a mushroom growth. . . . The consequent rise of a considerable class of manufacturers, whose success depended largely on the continuance of Protection, formed the basis of a strong movement for more decided limitation of foreign competition."

There you have shortly the rise of the tariff movement in America and the creation of a powerful class in the community, in due time to become the most powerful of all classes, whose strength is always at its disposal.

The subsequent history of the tariff movement in America is a story varying in important and uncertain ways, but it is always increasing in strength, and increasing in its demands proportionate to its strength.

Gradually the trusts grew under a system developing its tariff not mainly for revenue, but for protective purposes. Their legislative control, however, is of comparatively recent years. One of the best examples is to be found in the victory of the Sugar Trust during the passing of the Tariff Act of 1894. At first the proposal for the sugar-duty was incorporated in a series of measures, one of which was the proposal for the establishment of an income-tax, beginning on incomes over $4,000. This tax on the comparatively rich was meant to offset the burden the sugar-duty would impose on the poor. But the income-tax proposal was lost whilst the sugar-tax was won.

The Tariff Act of 1897 went still further along this course. "The tariff of 1897, like that of 1890, was the outcome of an aggressive spirit of Protection." "It was the longest-lived of the general Tariff Acts of the United States. Its material was the Act of 1846, which remained undisturbed for eleven years. That of 1897 remained in force for twelve years:"—

> The huge fortunes acquired in some protected industries, the Carnegie fortune most conspicuously of all, brought the feeling against monopolies and trusts to bear against the high duties. . . . The two things—trusts and tariffs—are much associated in the public mind, and hostility to the combinations has bred hostility to extreme Protection. Hence the Republican party on its campaign platform of 1908 gave a promise of revising the tariff; and its candidate, soon to become President Taft, pledged his efforts to secure a revision—"revision" being understood on all hands to mean primary reduction.

The Bill was at last produced, and in the main was of a lowering tendency as regards tariff-rates. Yet when it reached the Senate—that faithful guard of the interests of the Corporations—the Protectionists, under the leadership of Senator Aldwich, carried 847 amendments!—

> So the Bill went to a Conference Committee, and there, as usual, its details were finally settled. . . . What passed in the Conference Committee can only be guessed, but guessed with some certainty; many sessions, hurried procedure, give and take, insistence by this or that member among the ten on some duty in which he is particularly interested.

But in the end President Taft intervened, and, securing the complete abolition of the duty upon hides, also secured a general lowering of the tariff in fulfilment of his election pledges. Professor Taussig says, however, later on :—

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

> In a sense the Act of 1909 brought no essential change in our tariff system. It still left an extremely high scheme of rates, and still showed an extremely intolerant attitude on foreign trade.

The political battle of the future is clearly to be the battle of the tariffs, the fight between the interests of those who produce the necessaries of life and the millions who use them. To those interested in the great commercial problems arising out of the tariffs there is much to learn from and ponder over in this nobly-written history of tariffs in the United States of America.

A NEW SENTIMENTAL JOURNEY

Le Voyage Romantique: Chez Louis II., Roi de Bavière. By Ferdinand Bac. (Eugène Fasquelle, Paris. 3f. 50c.)

M. Ferdinand Bac is a distinctly fascinating writer. His work exhibits that undefinable quality which we may roughly describe as writing for writing's sake, a quality which not seldom extorts from the reader its corollary—reading for reading's sake. The author has, of course, a thesis; he might say, with La Fontaine, "Et conter pour conter me semble peu d'affaire," but his sincerity would be as questionable as that of the fabulist. Not that we mean to disparage the subject of the "Voyage Romantique"—an interesting theme admirably treated; but the manner outweighs on the whole the matter. The thesis, at times passionately supported, of the necessity for artistic consistency, for "l'Unité Romantique," seems to fail in wringing a verdict even from the author—its judge, jury, and counsel for the defence rolled into one. M. Bac has, in fact, the extraordinary talent of being able to give, in their most telling form, all the arguments against his own side. We are reminded of Mr. Lowes Dickinson's "Modern Symposium," where a dozen political thinkers of the most various complexions are made to say, one after the other, the absolutely last word in an endlessly-revolving wheel of debate. We are reminded over and over again of Robert Louis Stevenson—the Stevenson of "Virginibus Puerisque," of "An Inland Voyage," of "A Lodging for the Night." We find here the same obscurantism, the same self-mockery, the same helpless irony in face of "the big battalions." M. Bac notes sympathetically this last quality in the hero of his book—Ludwig II. of Bavaria—adding that he displayed it at its best at the moment of his supreme isolation and defeat, "for to practise irony when everybody can see the meaning of it is to take away all its effect and to bring it down to the level of a mere exercise of wit." Another ingredient of the present work is the absorbing interest of the author in works and questions of art; this also he shares with Stevenson, but in a far higher degree. It could hardly be otherwise, seeing that the matters that M. Bac here discusses—Stevenson-like—in the spirit of an amateur were formerly the things of his profession. He was a painter, in fact, before he became a writer. In this connection, if we may be allowed one more comparison, it would be interesting to put his work alongside of that of Mr. G. K. Chesterton, another penman who began with the pencil and the brush. We find the same freedom from literary conventions, the same amiable discursiveness, the same susceptibility to all sorts of suggestion.

"Le Voyage Romantique" has something of the power and character of a dream. It is a medley of fact and fiction. Pascal Latour, a rather shadowy personage, more of a brain or a bundle of perceptions than a living man, resolves to go on his travels in search of the beautiful—of loveliness set in loveliness, free from all vulgar discordance. As companion for his journey he takes a little sempstress, called Simplicité, another unreal personage, whose untaught aspirations after the beautiful may serve as a foil to his own exaggerated æsthetic culture. Once embarked on the quest, Latour becomes, for any real young girl corresponding to the Simplicité of the story, though not for a sympathetic reader of latent artistic proclivities, excessively long-winded; he confesses indeed as much, when his companion, not unnaturally, seizes an occasion to get away from him. "It is a pity," he humorously laments, "I should have had the opportunity of easing myself for good and all of a whole crowd of dicta that no one has ever yet been willing to listen to." The stuff of M. Latour's reflections is theories of art and Romanticism. He has all the Romanticisms—the return to a Golden Age, the return to one's twentieth year, a touch of sympathy for Wertherism, a regret for the old provincial basis of society. Christian Romanticism is set off by that of the modern Simple Life. He gives us reminiscences of Borrow, of de Quincey's "Mail-coach," of Victor Hugo; he utters sentences that might come straight out of "Dorian Grey." Speaking of some curious cloud-effects, "Those are," said Pascal carelessly, "clouds of the English School of 1820—the property of Mr. Bonington, whose delightful studies you can see at the Louvre." Simplicité contributes an occasional item, sometimes fairly appropriate, to the romantic feast; once, for instance, to confirm a long disquisition of Latour's on Nature's abhorrence of symmetry, she narrates the appearance of a square cloud over her native village, whereat the villagers set to feasting and drinking and consuming all their provisions and stores, thinking the end of the world had come. For the attack on Romanticism, M. Bac has recourse to such protagonists as Max Nordau, with whose opinions he furnishes the mind of the "Conseiller d'État," who gives the case against Ludwig II.

Ludwig II., the half-hero of the book, is the nucleus of that part of it that deals with historical facts. It is natural that the Mecca of the romantic travellers should be the scenes where the patron of Wagner tried to live his dream and met his tragic end. Many new facts and views are brought to light, and there is no reason to distrust the substantial accuracy of the accounts, favourable to the King, of the Hungarian painter, and of the coachman who had been the partner of so many of those famous nocturnal escapades, in the gilded coach, lighted by electricity—an unexpected trait in our romantic—or of the brutal requisitory of the "Conseiller d'État." The King's habit of ordering executions, which were carried out in as academic a spirit as those of the Queen of Hearts in "Alice in Wonderland," and his imposition of a mask on a servant who displeased him, and who had an ugly face, are amusingly told. Two interesting documents are the remarkably sane proclamation of the alleged madman at the very moment of the coup d'état, and a letter to a certain Countess, the only woman he seems to have come near loving. In this latter he speaks eloquently and touchingly of his own character; "hatred of everything that is base" is the note he signalises himself. The castles are described, and the daily life of the King, though we miss the famous drive across the snow with torches. We feel, too, that the account of the final tragedy, when the body of the King was found locked in a mortal embrace with that of the mad doctor, below the waters of the Starnbergersee, is incomplete through lack of the mythical element. We have ourselves found traces of the peasant belief still surviving a bare ten years since that Ludwig did not perish in the Starnbergersee, but continued to live among his faithful peasantry for many years afterwards.

The life of Ludwig II. of Bavaria is an excellent text for a writer on Romanticism, for he exhibited not only the peculiarities that are morbid to the Philistine, but also the foibles that the disciple would condemn out of his own creed. He sins often against artistic harmony. On this point M. Bac is particularly interesting. Severe as he is for the bourgeois, who tries to buy an artistic equipment on no principle at all, whereby "most people's houses are the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, where any creed can enter and hold its fancy bazaar under the eye of the Turkish gendarme," he is hardly less so for the æsthetic purist. "It is science rather than truth." The bigot for eighteenth-century decoration should reflect that they mixed their styles at the best moments of the eighteenth century. We might extend this condemnation of æsthetic purism, with reservations, to linguistic purism. A language would suffer indeed if all its words were made to satisfy the conditions of uniformity of origin and antiquity.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

An interesting incident in the book is the story of Moritz Schwind, the brilliant Viennese painter who was befriended and honoured by Ludwig II., and whose merits have scarcely met—outside Germany—with the reward they deserve. We will conclude with the story of a Tyrolese innkeeper's wife, who had enjoyed the royal patronage; on her death-bed she is reported to have said, "Je bénis mes Hautes Seigneuries et je les supplie de . . . nous garder toujours Leur auguste clientèle." Though this is not the original language, it would be a pity to translate it.

THE LAND OF OMAR

Through Persia in Disguise, with Reminiscences of the Indian Mutiny. By Colonel C. E. Stewart, C.B., C.M.G., C.I.E. Edited by Basil Stewart. (George Routledge and Sons. 15s.)

Colonel Stewart served for twenty-five years in India, and afterwards for thirteen in Persia, completing his service with seven years as Consul-General at Odessa. In India he went through the Mutiny of 1857, both with English and Indian troops, and was constantly in action; though very junior, he commanded a native regiment in the Umbeyla Campaign of 1863-4, and was highly commended in despatches for his gallantry in the expedition against the Jowaki-Afridis in 1877-78. He thus gained a knowledge of various languages and of the native character which was most useful in his travels in Persia. On one occasion he crossed Syria, and went down the Tigris to the Persian Gulf, taking with him his newly-married wife. Later, he landed at Trebizond, on the southern shore of the Black Sea, and journeyed through Armenia to Teheran and Ispahan. He had a feeling for the Armenians, who, being Christians, fare badly; the Kurds ravage the country, while the Turks do not pay for provisions supplied. Colonel Stewart noticed many interesting things: "The difference between a Persian and a Turk is that a Turk always drinks coffee, and a Persian tea." "Certain Mahomedan tribes in Persia believe that Hussein, the grandson of Mahomet, went voluntarily to death when he was killed near Bagdad, so that mankind should thereby be saved. This idea of an atonement being requisite is evidently acquired from Christianity." He found that "although Russians drive so well, they never ride, with the exception of Cossacks." In Armenia he observed a dislike to the Turkish Government among the Christian population, but a still greater dislike to the Russian Government. In Persia, he described briefly, but clearly, the division of Mahomedans into Sunnis and Shiahs, the latter declaring Ali, the prophet's nephew and son-in-law, to be the first Khalif. "It is curious how the love of Ali and his family has taken the place of patriotism and every other feeling in Persia." He praises the Persians highly for their excellent Parisian manners, but evidently did not trust them. To the Europe-taught ones he applies the Arab proverb, "They leave their home a donkey and return a thorough jackass."

Colonel Stewart made a long journey in 1880-81 from Ispahan to the North-East frontier of Persia, disguised, under the name of Kwajah Ibrahim, as a Culcutta Armenian dealer in horses, engaged on their purchase. He assumed the disguise "because I could travel about more conveniently as an Armenian than as an Englishman," and kept it up for four and half months, only once being doubted by an Afghan merchant from the Panjab, whose suspicions he managed to allay. His long employment on the Afghan frontier enabled him to observe much, and while attached to the Afghan Boundary Commission of 1884-86 he visited Herat. His health suffered at times; the heat was constantly excessive, and the water was often brackish and hardly drinkable. Like all Persian travellers, he dilates upon the Kavir, or Great Desert, of which only parts are salt and look as if they had formed part of an inland sea: "Sometimes the whole soil seems rotten and the feet sink deeply into it, salt showing on the surface." Food was at times a difficulty, though he was assured by Persians that manna did sometimes fall from heaven. His travels and surveying have added greatly to the knowledge of Persia, and it is to be regretted, as he says, that when the Shah applied for twelve English officers to drill his troops, but did not offer to pay them, expecting the Indian Government to do so, the application was refused. "The influence that England would have gained in Persia would have been considerable." Besides his travels, Colonel Stewart held Consular appointments at various large towns in Persia, and gained such special information of the country that he was invited to lecture before the Geographical Society and other London institutions. These papers are reproduced and repay perusal, though they are no longer quite up to date.

Mrs. Stewart has prefixed a very suitable Introduction to her late husband's journals, which have been edited by Mr. Basil Stewart, already known as an author. The story is well told, with good maps, and is an interesting record of an unusual career. More illustrations would have been welcome, especially if they had been as humorous as that of the picture in the Cathedral at Julfa, Ispahan, illustrating the parable of the man with the beam in his eye picking the mote out of his friend's eye.

PATRIOTISM AND SOCIALISM

Contre l'Aigle: Contre Nous. By Paul Adam. (Falque. 3f. 50c.)

Books, articles, and pamphlets directed "Contre l'Aigle" (the Prussian one) have for a long time been numerous in France, but during the last twelvemonth they have certainly exceeded the average; the fortieth anniversary of the Franco-Prussian War seems to have usurped by anticipation the customary honours of a fiftieth commemoration. After all, this is perfectly natural; another decade will have thinned too irretrievably the ranks of the foremost combatants, and will perhaps have answered the question of Alsace-Lorraine. Though the majority of these writings are of an ephemeral character, many of them serve a useful purpose in exhuming facts from the graves where they have been buried by unscrupulous idealists. M. Paul Adam is a distinguished writer, but in his latest work he has not achieved a monument of imperishable bronze; he has compiled a somewhat incoherent volume, relieved by a series of extremely lucid intervals.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The book is divided into two parts; the shorter, earlier part is by far the more interesting. "Contre nous" is a series of excessively-detached remarks on the vices that M. Adam finds in modern society, especially in modern French society. His standpoint is a little elusive. We were prepared for attacks from the author of "Basile et Sophia," on bureaucracy, the bourgeoisie, and Philistinism; these attacks we get in the best Flaubert and Whistler style. We were less prepared for his ferocious and, it must be added, very practical advocacy of Socialism. "Give us arms" is his cry; he demands them, not only to repulse the invader, but also to inaugurate the millennium. This had led him into a controversy with a Hervéist journal; a sketch of the arguments is given. He criticises the actual organisation of strikes and elections, and has some appallingly practical suggestions for the leaders of revolutions.

But, as we have already said, it is the "Contre l'Aigle" theme that is the best worked out. M. Adam here goes to the very root of the matter, and joins issue with those very politicians whose ideas he seems elsewhere to share, the Parliamentary Socialists. He is quite as severe for the partisans of Jaurès as he is for those of Hervé;" if the latter are preparing to hand over their countrymen gagged and bound to foreign Cæsarism, the former are doing to the full as much mischief by their vague sentimentalities and untimely fraternisings with a potential enemy. "Le pacifisme, voilà l'ennemi" would be a very fair rendering of M. Adam's thesis: he believes in nationality; he brings his opponents down to facts; he shows them in the concrete instance of Alsace that it is not a matter of indifference "whether one wakes up a Frenchman or German." And he rubs in the incontestable fact that, supposing that in the event of a war the French Socialist refused to draw the sword, the German Socialist would certainly not follow his example. He believes in the most certain fact in European politics—the shade of Bismarck; in a most characteristic phrase he tells us that "le rire sardonique du Teuton a pour dents quatre millions de baïonnettes inexorables." He has a great admiration for Mr. Blatchford, and accepts most of the conclusions of that controversialist's famous pamphlet. He supplements them with some observations of his own relative to the position in the Netherlands. He even allows himself to consider the lamentable hypothesis of the absorption of France by Germany.

The grave defect of this work may be described as its "shrillness." It abounds in "little facts;" a fatal mistake—every cause can produce a sufficiency of such facts. It borders sometimes on the hysterical. M. Adam starts his whole argument from the case of a child, accidentally killed in a collision between the Prussian mob and the Prussian authorities. The same defect is to be found in that historical pamphlet, "Histoire d'un Crime." This is a state of mind that generally gives the advantage of position to the enemy. The German press has lately been congratulating itself, with some show of plausibility, on its even temper and forbearance, thrown into strong relief by the passionate outbursts of its rivals. We will conclude by indicating one of the most whimsical ideas of the book. The Triple Entente, according to M. Adam, is the alliance of the countries once conquered by the Normans of Rollo, Rurik, and William. Our late King, it seems, was a Norman, and his successor is an Anglo-Saxon; whereby the Triple Entente may be put in jeopardy. This makes a rather excessive demand upon the imagination. It is a curious variant of the wolf and the lamb, with abstraction of the former's disinterested motives.

THE ANTIQUITIES OF DURHAM

Memorials of Old Durham. Edited by HENRY R. LEIGHTON, F.R.Hist.S. Illustrated. (George Allen and Sons. 15s. net.)

MR. HENRY LEIGHTON deserves many congratulations for the very interesting volume which he has compiled out of a number of instructive and withal attractive monographs bound together by their common connection with the County of Durham. Archæologists in general, and moreover all who take interest in the great bishopric will delve with rejoicing in the rich mine which Mr. Leighton has placed before them, and few will turn from its pages without feeling the desire for still more of the same material.

Conscious of the work of those who had preceded him on the same road, Mr. Leighton made no attempt to write a history, either popular or exhaustive, of the Palatinate. He recognised that the occasion did not call for any such attempt, but, on the other hand, he felt that further information on some of the side-issues of Durham lore, as it were, would not be unwelcome. This of his instinct has been sure. In his preface he states his object as twofold—"to awaken a greater interest in the past of this most historic district, and, secondly, to serve as an introduction to the greater histories of the county." Durham, the county of a Prince-Bishop, differed materially in government, and consequently in history, from the other districts of the British Isles. Thus its history in all its ramifications has a distinctive character, and serves as a tonic to the most jaded historical appetite. The present volume contains the following monographs, together with an historical introduction:—"Topography of Durham," "Folklore of the County of Durham," "The Legends of Durham," "Place-Names in the Durham Dales," "Durham Cathedral," "Finchale Priory," "Monkwearmouth and Jarrow," "The Parish Churches of Durham," "Monumental Inscriptions," "The Castles and Halls of Durham," "Durham Associations of John Wesley," and "The Old Families of Durham." From this list it will be seen how varied is the fare which Mr. Leighton places before his readers.

It will be news to many that the county of Durham in earlier times included detached portions scattered in the surrounding counties. These outlying portions were gradually absorbed, and it is now long since they passed out of the jurisdiction of those with whom the government of the county lay. The power of the Bishop in the Middle Ages was very considerable. He was more than a feudal lord; in fact, one might term him a feudatory prince, and such he really was. He had his own courts of law, his own officers of state, his own assemblies, his own system of finance, his own coinage, and even his own army and fleet. The Bishop had also the power of life and death over his subjects. The writers in this volume confine themselves strictly to their respective subjects. Nevertheless occasionally we get a sidelight of some movement of more general concern. Thus the Rev. Henry Gee, in his historical introduction, in a few short sentences makes his readers feel half the terrors of the Black Death:—

> It spread with frightful rapidity, carrying off all orders and conditions of men, for none escaped. Sometimes a whole household perished, and here and there an entire village was obliterated. "No tenants came from West Thickley, because they are all dead," is the steward's entry at one manorial court, or halmote, as the local word is. In the winter that followed there was no sowing, and when the spring came men had not the heart to go to work on the fields, for the plague was renewed with increasing violence, and everything was thrown out of gear. Villeins had run away from sheer terror; even madness was not unheard of; and whilst there was little to eat, famine and misery stalked unchecked.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

SHORTER REVIEWS

The Pictorial Key to the Tarot. By A. E. Waite. With Seventy-eight Plates. (William Rider and Son. 5s. net.)

About the occult there is no disputing. There is an arbitrariness in the dogma of the mystic before which the layman is powerless to do aught but confess himself of the "outer circle," apart from the elect minority. Happily, however, the profanum vulgus, the Smith of Mr. Waite's scorn, may enjoy the "Paradiso" of Dante without seeking authority for his disposition of the planets or the arrangement of his celestial spheres, while it is possible to embrace the more vital portion of the theosophic philosophy apart from certain of its dogmatic tenets. In the same way we are content to class ourselves among those who have received no part of the secret tradition pertaining to the mystic Tarot cards of the early fourteenth century, and to enjoy merely the picturesque and decorative quality of the symbolic interpretation of universal ideas by means of universal types to be found in Mr. Waite's "Pictorial Key to the Tarot." Though the author is careful to insist on his indifference to the history of playing-cards in general and to declare himself concerned with the Tarot merely as an instrument of divination and a keystone to the occult sciences, his book will prove of considerable service to the student of the Middle Ages by reason of its kinship with the literatures of Alchemy and Kabalism and the mysteries of Rosicrucianism and Craft Masonry.

Mr. Waite appears to have spared no pains in compiling a comprehensive synoptic account of the Tarot, and defining its archæological position. With his symbolic interpretation of the cards themselves, and the divination proper to their various combinations and juxtapositions we are not concerned here, nor is our philosophic calm impaired by the controversy which has raged over the Tarot cards as to their claims in relation to the Mystic Quest in connection with Witchcraft and the Black Magic as a means of obtaining oracles, and lastly, as a medium for the humble fortune-teller. Nevertheless, we welcome Mr. Waite's book as a valuable addition to the literature of cartomancy, and a proof of the existence in our midst of something of the true mediæval spirit. The set of seventy-eight Tarot cards prepared by Miss Pamela Colman Smith, and illustrating the Greater and Lesser Arcana, are for the most part happy in their design and appropriately simple in composition, although the effect is occasionally marred by a certain weakness of drawing. If they do not invariably succeed in conveying the whole of the mystic meaning attributed to them, her task has certainly not been an easy one.

Legends of our Lord and the Holy Family. By Mrs. Arthur Bell. Illustrated. (Kegan Paul and Co. 6s. net.)

Mrs. Arthur Bell has made a typical selection from the wonderful and romantic cycle of legends which in the course of many centuries has grown round the simple Gospel story of the Life of Christ. Some are drawn from the Apocryphal Gospels, a good many from French, others from German sources. Interspersed are accounts of various national and local rites and customs, which celebrate the events of certain legends. Although the book is illustrated with some photographs from the great Masters, it does not follow the lines of Mrs. Jameson's work of showing the legends as represented in Art. The stories are given in their own picturesque setting, very well told, with many charming references to sacred traditions, floral folk-lore, and special cults, with some occasional notes on pictures inspired by the legends. The growth of legend far from the Holy Land is curiously illustrated by the remarkable claim of the Bretons that St. Anna was their fellow-countrywoman. In Brittany "'Il n'y a que Ste. Anne' is a favourite saying of the simple peasants, and it is to her shrines that they flock for help and comfort in all their difficulties and sorrows." We can hardly follow Mrs. Bell when she says that the Romance of the Holy Grail "belongs rather to secular than to sacred legend, for it is to a great extent a transformation of ancient Keltic folklore into a Christian allegory. . . ." The same might be alleged of a considerable body of legendary stories. For those who appreciate the old saying, "φωναντα συνετοισιν," the chief value of these often very beautiful legends is their deeply humanistic element. Such readers will delight in Mrs. Bell's admirable collection.

The Fauna of British India, including Ceylon and Burma. Rhyncota. Vol. V.—Heteroptera: Appendix. By W. L. Distant. (Taylor and Francis. 10s.)

We lately noticed the volume in this series—now being published under the authority of the Secretary of State—on the Coleoptera Lamellicornia. This volume, also edited by Dr. Shipley and Mr. Guy Marshall, contains—to use popular language—more beetles, of all sorts and shapes, with their antennæ, and legs, bodies, and other members and portions, in all sizes, dimensions, and attitudes. It is perfectly wonderful that there should be so many grotesque varieties, and it would be most interesting and valuable to know what is the real bed-rock meaning of so many deviations in Nature from, say, a normal type. From the numerous references to Vol. II., this would appear to be a supplementary work, as the author is said to have described a large number of forms which have been collected in various localities in British India since the previous volumes were published. Absolute finality is probably unattainable, but the enumeration of the Indian Rhyncota will, with certain exceptions, be completed in another volume. As to the family Lygeidœ, there has been some question of nomenclature, as it was suggested by an expert that a family name should be founded on the oldest genus it embraced, and should be changed accordingly. Some confusion has naturally resulted. The question of nomenclature is a thorny one. We were lately informed by a scientist that scientific names are mere names, and that their meaning is not worth investigating. Certainly many of those in this volume are repellent, and obscure to the uninitiated. They do not all appear in the ordinary reference-books. McNicoll and Stormont are out of date. Some new comprehensive work, to explain all scientific terms, is much wanted. The Indian names in this book are, on the whole, quite well reproduced; but certain of them should be Parasnath, Pondicherry, and Rajshahi, as printed in the recent "Imperial Gazetteer," and not as printed in this volume. Dr. Nelson Annandale is evidently making his mark in scientific observation and collection.

The Church and the Empire. Being an Outline of the History of the Church from A.D. 1003 to A.D. 1304. By D. J. Medley, M.A., Professor of History in the University of Glasgow. (Rivingtons. 4s. 6d. net.)

Chronologically this is the fourth volume in a series of eight brief histories of the Church Universal admirably edited by that well-known ecclesiastical historian Mr. W. H. Hutton, who has himself contributed two volumes of the seven now published.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Mr. Medley gives a clever survey of the chief problems and struggles which agitated the Church and the States of Europe in the period allotted to him. The eleventh century witnessed the beginnings of the Church's "efforts to prevent her absorption by the State, and to attempt the reduction of the State to a mere department of the Church." Hence arose the great quarrel between the Pope, Gregory VII., and the Emperor, Henry IV., over the question of lay investiture. It is interesting to note here that Mr. Medley does not adopt the usual interpretation of the famous penance of Henry at Canossa. So far from this act being, as Dr. Bryce said in his "Holy Roman Empire," "an irretrievable disgrace on the Crown so abased," it was a clever move by which Henry forced the hand of the Pope.

In tracing the development of "the great movement in favour of Church reform which emanated from Cluny" with the object of freedom for the Church from feudal State control, Mr. Medley deals with one important question which touches present-day relations—the appointment of Bishops. The resultant compromise in several countries made the clerical elections merely nominal, leaving the real power with the State. "It was not the rights of the electors, but the all-pervading authority of the Pope which was to prove the chief rival of royal influence in the local Church;" so a later section speaks of the Papal power in the Church Other chapters have to do with Guelf and Ghibelline, The Schoolmen and Theology, and the Mendicant Orders. There is an interesting account of the later development of certain doctrines with their antipathetic heresies. Mr. Medley (in his Preface) ironically trusts that, guided by the expert hand of Mr. Hutton, he himself has "not fallen into any recognisable heresy"! But on his own showing the immanence of the spiritual in the material is ever a difficult point for some minds. We recommend this useful book to those who desire a short and instructive study of some of the most important relations between Church and State during a difficult period of mediæval history. The whole series would form fitting companion-volumes, indispensable for reference, to the comprehensive History of the English Church edited by Dean Stephens and Dr. Hunt.

FICTION

Account Rendered. By E. F. Benson. (Wm. Heinemann. 6s.)

Mrs. Winthrop, a lady of superabundant energy, which she endeavours to exhaust in dealing with domestic matters in a summary fashion, is the wife of a retired gentleman of about fifty, whose only occupation seems to be playing patience alone in his study. Mrs. Winthrop is also mother of Frank, a subaltern in the Army—a six-foot lovable personage—and of two imps, a boy and girl, for whom a governess is required, as they apparently are beyond parental control. The governess is young, beautiful, and poor. The neighbours are Lady Tenby, who seems overflowing with kindly feelings, and her son Ted, or Lord Tenby, also six foot and a golfer. The last-mentioned is a very amiable personage, and does not use, at least so far as the book records, golfers' bad language.

In the earlier chapters, which are very entertaining, the story deals with swimming-parties and the usual daily amusements of a country house, with bridge to follow; but in the midst of this tranquil existence everything suddenly changes by the governess finding herself heiress to over a million of money, left her by an American bachelor uncle. Thenceforward the story consists mainly of the doings of Lady Tenby and the governess, and the results of Lady Tenby's lying in order to secure the governess as wife for Ted, and the recoil, or "account rendered," we must leave our readers to learn for themselves. We may mention, however, that there is not the usual traditional ending, but an inferential one. There is some clever dialogue in the book, as one might expect from Mr. Benson, and some of the fairy and other tales evolved by the governess for the benefit of the imps are distinctly clever.

On the whole the character of Lady Tenby is consistent throughout, it being apparent to everybody that her seeming open-heartedness is no more than a blind, and we are not surprised at the development; but Miss Allenby, the governess, does not, after her governess days, when she was really charming, appeal so strongly to us. There is an air of unreality about her which vexes one. It may be the rapid transposition of her fortunes, or it may be the knowledge given to the reader, but not to herself, of the way in which she is being deceived that creates such an impression.

A Russian Judas. By Fred Whishaw (C. H. White. 6s.)

The palm for the great novel, previously held by one or other of the nations of Western Europe, has in the last generation most often gone to Russia. Her great names have shown the world a new truth of portraiture, a fresh vividness of narrative, and a greater breadth and dignity of art-form than had been before attained. Moreover, without exception, the material they worked upon has been Russian life and the previously unexplored region of the Russian soul.

The scene of the present novel is laid in Russia. The heroes are Englishmen—two brothers who have been summoned to Russia by an uncle with the prospect of replacing two Russian nephews of his as the joint-heirs to his enormous estate. They come, they conquer the old man's affections, and in due time inherit the property. But the Russian nephews are not content to be ousted, and immediately commence a series of plots against the lives of the two Englishmen. Under assumed names they hire themselves as "lukatchi," or gamekeepers, and in the course of bear-hunts and wolf battues make various attempts to do away with their employers. This gives the author an opportunity to describe the pursuit of game in Russia. The knavish tricks of the disappointed nephews meet with an ill success, the consistency of which is amazing. Clumsier villains—oh, how maddeningly their shots miscarry!—and more lamblike victims it would be difficult to find. Time after time the Englishmen's cartridges are filled with sand; they are peppered, they have bullets whizzing by their ears; they are driven out to pot wolves, and then told that their return is a risk of life and death, that they must probably sacrifice the horses to their ravening pursuers, and still they suspect nothing!

In one or two ingenuous asides the author reveals a point of view towards the peasantry as sweepingly censorious as that of the average district-visitor in England. We wish we could have said that the descriptions of hunting adventures give any sort of fillip to the story, but they do not grip, and the English used is often slipshod.

Friends of Fate. By Lucas Cleeve. (Greening and Co. 6s.)

It is a suggestive, although perhaps not a remarkable, fact that, while great writers of fiction are as a rule content to busy themselves with describing quite ordinary people, the journeyman novelist seems to be obsessed by the necessity of portraying genius. In "Friends of Fate" Lucas Cleeve has tried to create the character of an unscrupulous but, of course, great Jewish lawyer, who, by means of backstairs intrigue and modified blackmail, becomes the leading legal light of his age. We do not see in what way he is great in himself, and, although we have watched him at work, we have not discerned any touch of genius in his methods. There are many people in Dartmoor and Portland who are considerably more clever, and also considerably less unsavoury. We need not here enter into the dirty tricks of Raphael Nathan, alias Ralph Norton; suffice it to say that he does most things which even the ordinary sensual man has agreed to call abominable, and in the end he is left materially successful, having realised his high-souled ambition to become the friend and confidant of various members of a penny-novelette aristocracy. Lucas Cleeve does not possess a very good style, and she has ruined whatever power of writing she may once have possessed by continuous efforts to be clever. Nor has she any gifts for description or dialogue. She has, however, by means of broad margins and large type, managed to make a book of it, and that, after all, is the main thing.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The Shadow on the Purple. By A Peeress. (Lynwood and Co. 6s.)

In a somewhat naïve and unintentionally amusing preface "A Peeress" tells us that these tales are experiences of a relative of hers as Attaché to a British Embassy on the Continent, and that "the facts recorded are in every case true." This statement surprises one a little, not because the facts are extraordinary—from a novelistic point of view—but because they seem to belong so completely, and one might even say so exclusively, to that style of aristocratic sensationalism which the ingenious Messrs. Guy Boothby and William le Queux have made popular. However, in view of the preface, we do not feel entitled to deny that various Princes of the reigning House of Alvania really did embroil themselves in a monotonously vicious manner with fair ladies of inferior birth, then meet violent ends at the pistol point, and lie in State "with their faces artificially whitened to hide the stain of the powder." Of course all the numerous throng did not die thus; one was condemned to death by Nihilists, and two or three may even have reached comparative old age. On the whole, we do not think "A Peeress" need have warned her readers not to inundate her with "correspondence regarding the characters and incidents recorded in these pages." Her book will hardly set the Thames on fire.

Lady Fanny. By Mrs. George Norman. (Methuen and Co. 6s.)

According to the publishers—and, indeed, they ought to know—this book is concerned with "the psychology of a married woman of our own time." For our part we should have preferred to describe it as the psychology of a Dresden shepherdess or some pretty artificial trifle of the sort, for though we found Lady Fanny Benning interesting, we also found her wholly unconvincing. After seven years of happy married life this charming creature discovers that her husband is not worthy of her romantic raptures, and decides to try the effects of absence from home and innocent flirtation to bring her husband back to her rather exigent emotional level. She goes abroad and flirts successfully enough, but her husband very sensibly refuses to pay any attention to her epistolary hints. Then the inevitable happens, and she meets the young man whom she ought to have married; but her defiance of convention does not extend beyond innocent flirtation, and she makes the great renunciation and goes home with a mysteriously penitent husband. The young man, who is not much more than a Dresden shepherd, says "It is best!" so we may regard this as a happy ending. The author's grammar is not always above reproach, and Stevenson's name should not be spelt like that of the inventor of the steam engine. Lady Fanny would have known this, for we are told that he was a great crony of hers.

Wilson's. By Desmond Coke. (Chapman and Hall. 6s. net.)

The mantle of the late Talbot Baines Reed, master in the art of school story writing, seems to have fallen on Mr. Desmond Coke, for "Wilson's" is as good a yarn of schoolboy hopes, comedies, tragedies, and fears as we have read for a long time. Wilson's is the slack house of the school—do we not remember "The Master of the Shell"?—and Dick Hunter is forced by circumstances to the unsavoury task of reforming it. He makes enemies among the "slackers," for all the manly sports were to them "rot;" but in due time he has his reward. The descriptions of the "Bumps"—the boat-race—of a critical match between the newly-formed and somewhat flabby cricket eleven and a junior house, and the general portrayal of school life at Sherborough, are vivid and exciting, and appeal to the grown-up reader most strongly. In fact, a great part of the pleasure we have obtained through this clever story comes from the author's realisation that most sensible people are young at heart. He has written, as he states in his neat note "By Way of Explanation," for the lucky ones "who, by steadfastly refusing to grow old," have managed to remain children; he succeeds, therefore, in interesting all.

THE LATE DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE

By Frank Harris

The title of these papers usually implied a considerable intimacy with the person written about. I therefore hasten to say that in this instance I can make no claim to any such privilege. I had two or three conversations—I might almost call them "interviews"—with the late Duke when he was Lord Hartington. These talks seem to me memorable for various reasons, and I desire to report them with all fidelity, while expressly excluding any pretension to friendship, or even to more prolonged personal acquaintance. Moreover, I have no notes of these talks, which matters the less as a vivid memory of them has been sharpened by the fact that I have used the knowledge acquired from them again and again in the intervening years.

A statue to the late Duke, who died in 1908 in his seventy-fifth year, has just been erected in Horse Guards Avenue. It was unveiled on February 14th by Lord Lansdowne, who, according to custom, made a speech about the man, whom he must have known intimately for many years.

Such customary tributes are almost always taken as conventions in convention-ridden England; every word of praise is discounted, every hinted shortcoming exaggerated, and yet the effect is a high-coloured oleograph of an angel rather than a photograph of a man.

Nor will I pretend to give a true portrait of the late Duke; I should not be allowed to, had I the intimate knowledge necessary to establish a fine spiritual balance between virtues and vices, and so reconstitute the individual soul with its tangled web of good and evil; but something I can do to make a legendary figure clearer to men, and this ought to be done, it seems to me, in the public interest.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The first talk I had with Lord Hartington, as he then was, was in Monte Carlo one night after the Casino had closed and the crowd dispersed. It was a year, I think, after Lord Randolph Churchill's untimely resignation. Men were still at variance as to his leadership of the House of Commons—some praising it, and others dispraising, while the great majority were completely indifferent. I was eager to find someone who would agree with me that Lord Randolph's leadership was a miracle of tact and courtliness inspired by an almost uncanny knowledge of men of the House of Commons variety. As the chance offered itself to me, I put the question to Lord Hartington.

I had already a high opinion of his judgment and his curious impartiality. I had been in the House of Commons three or four nights a week from 1883 to 1885. Lord Hartington usually sat with his hat tilted forward over his face in an attitude that implied sleepy indifference to what was going on. But I had reason again and again to remark that his indifference was of manner alone, that he was an extraordinarily interested, careful, and acute observer. One instance occurs to me. Mr. Sexton at that time was commonly spoken of as the best orator in the Irish Party, and if oratory were limited to an exquisitely modulated delivery of platitudes and commonplaces, Mr. Sexton deserved his reputation. Lord Hartington, I noticed, often sauntered out of the House when it was crowded and members were excited by Mr. Sexton's elocution. But whenever Parnell spoke, hammering out realities in broken phrases, Lord Hartington was there listening; he listened, too, to Tim Healy and Mr. Redmond. One could judge the value of men very closely by Lord Hartington's attitude towards them. More than once I noticed that he could endure bores gladly so long as they were earnest, fanatical bores; but fluent windbags found no favour in his sight. I came to see that his judgment was peculiarly English; that he was in some sort the embodied conscience of the House of Commons.

Holding this high opinion of Lord Hartington, I was, of course, excessively eager to get his judgment of Lord Randolph Churchill, for by it I might be able to correct, or at least confirm my estimate both of Lord Randolph and of Lord Hartington.

At first Lord Hartington put me off with courtesy that evidently cost him an effort; I could see he wished me and my probing questions to the devil. I ventured to remind him that it was a duty which intelligence owed to itself to provide the ingenuous with correct estimates.

He answered to the obligation at once:—

"I'm willing to give my opinion," he said, "but it's difficult to answer a general question. Can you define more nearly what you want to know?"

His disinclination to reply to me, which at first I took for personal dislike, was rather a sort of mental inertia or lazy reluctance to make the effort necessary to find exact and adequate expression for his thoughts.

"I should like to know," I said, "what you think of Lord Randolph's leadership of the House of Commons in comparison, with the leading, say, of Disraeli or Gladstone?"

With wrinkled brow and a sort of ill-tempered obstinacy he set himself to the task of turning his feelings into words; again and again he corrected himself meticulously, evidently determined to say neither more nor less than just what he felt.

"Disraeli," he began, "came to the House of Commons from the outside" (his look questioned me: "D'ye know what I mean?" I thought I knew, but I wanted him to explain, so I replied with arched eyebrows and a puzzled look). "I mean he was not English exactly, and had not been at the 'Varsity, and all that" (I nodded); "and he never learned much about the House. To the very end he kept running his head against walls—walls often of prejudice; but sometimes walls which I hope won't be overthrown for many a year to come. But as soon as he found he was against a wall he altered his course, and the House used to forgive him because of the quickness with which he tacked round and the dexterity with which he found good reasons both to explain and to justify his change of front.

"Some men," he went on, after a pause, "thought him insincere because of the ease with which he chopped and changed; but he was sincere enough, I thought; if you granted his unvarying premise that he was the best man in England to be Prime Minister;" and the heavy face seemed to lighten from within.

"Gladstone, on the other hand, was English all through, a Public School boy who had won honours at Oxford: he knew a good deal about the House of Commons—a hundred times more that Disraeli ever knew; but he was never what I should call a House of Commons man. He was too emotional, too—" (high-falutin' was the word he wanted; but I would not supply it) "too—you know what I mean. . . .

"Gladstone was imposed on the House of Commons by the country. English Liberals throughout the country wanted him at the head of affairs and no one else, and they got their way.

"When Gladstone ran his head against some House of Commons wall, he did not do it out of ignorance but of malice prepense, and he usually persisted in butting the wall till he knocked some sort of hole in it which served him as a way out or in, as the case might be. . . .

"You can call his self-will principle if you like, though sometimes the principle was difficult to see unless you began by admitting his major premise, which wasn't very different from Disraeli's except that he thought Gladstone was the only man in the world who had any business to be Prime Minister of England."

"Randolph Churchill, on the other hand, knew the House of Commons better than the House of Commons knew itself. He led it with genius as it has never been led in my time. Such a Leader does not come once in a century. Every hour he was in the House strengthened his hold upon it, his control of it. If he had only waited a little while, his unique power would have been acknowledged by every one, and he would have been master of England; but——" and he shrugged his shoulders.

"It's a pity, isn't it," I said, "that the House takes such a long time to recognise genius?"

But he would not have the House blamed.

"Genius," he said, "being singular, should expect to have to wait for general recognition. It's a pity, if you like, that Randolph's powers are not being used, but it's mainly his own fault, and this he'd admit himself, I think, if questioned."

"In fact," I replied, "he was 'a young man in a hurry,' to use his own words against him."

The remark was too obvious. Lord Hartington nodded with indifference and turned away.

This impartial judging of three such men as Disraeli, Gladstone, and Randolph Churchill implies, in my opinion, extraordinary insight, backed by an even more extraordinary fairness of mind.

Lord Hartington is often spoken of as a typical Englishman. He was that in fairness and firmness, in practicality and reticence, and half a dozen other qualities; but he was very much more. On a memorable occasion he took the side of genius against power, against his own self-interest, too, and that is not an English trait—not a characteristic, indeed, of any nation. It is a generosity which goes with greatness and with greatness alone. The incident is rare enough to be worth mention. Some will remember that Lord Randolph's resignation put Lord Salisbury in a quandary. He had accepted, perhaps, indeed, forced on, the conflict with his imperious lieutenant; yet the sudden resignation found him unprepared. Who could be put in Randolph's place as Leader of the Commons and Chancellor of the Exchequer? He naturally turned to Lord Hartington, as the leader of the Liberal-Unionists. He did not know that Randolph had already asked Lord Hartington whether in such a case he would take office under Lord Salisbury, and Lord Hartington had answered that so far as he could see at the moment it would be better that he should refuse. Lord Salisbury put the question to Lord Hartington, who was abroad at the time, and Lord Hartington declined the offer. In his extremity Lord Salisbury then got the father of Lord Hartington to recall him to England, and put a leader in the Times declaring his willingness to serve under Lord Hartington. This changed the position.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

As soon as Lord Hartington reached London, Randolph Churchill met him, I think, at the station, and asked him whether Lord Salisbury's new offer had altered or would alter his resolution.

Lord Hartington began by admitting that he had not considered such a probability when he said he thought it best for the Liberal-Unionists not to take office with the Conservatives; but added that his own position did not seem to him to alter the question at all. "I think," he concluded, "you are the best Leader of the House of Commons, and I should not like to put any obstacle in the way of your return to power."

Randolph came away satisfied that neither argument nor entreaty would move Lord Hartington from his position of self-effacement, and the event showed that he was right. Every sort of pressure was brought to bear on Lord Hartington, but nothing would move him—Randolph was the best man for the post, he thought, and he would not be a party to keeping him out of it.

One more reminiscence. I was in the House one night, after the Liberal-Unionist split, when Lord Hartington attributed a certain statement to Mr. Gladstone. Mr. Gladstone shook his head energetically, and was understood to deny having used any such words. Lord Hartington attempted to define the words more precisely, but Mr. Gladstone persisted in his denial. Then Lord Hartington declared that he would be very loth to insist on an assertion which his right hon. friend denied, and he continued his speech. After he had finished speaking he came through the lobby and I met him and gave him the exact reference. He thanked me and went to the library to verify the very words. But, a little to my astonishment, he never referred to the matter again in public. Some months afterwards I met him and asked him how it happened that he had not gone on with the matter.

"I gave Mr. Gladstone," he said, "the words; but he had some explanation of them. I did not think it sufficient, but it was painful for me to dispute on such a matter with one who had been my leader, and I preferred to let the matter drop"—preferred, that is, to seem to have been in the wrong himself rather than convict Mr. Gladstone of inaccuracy.

"The embodied conscience of the House of Commons" I have called Lord Hartington; but the praise is insufficient. Why is it, I ask myself, that even I seem inclined rather to under-estimate Lord Hartington? Partly, of course, the reason is that Lord Hartington's qualities did not touch the emotions or catch the eye; they were not brilliant; they were, indeed, rather of character than of intellect; though, if I am not mistaken, his intelligence was very great. But he neither conquered nor conciliated you; he lived apart in a sort of proud isolation; his manners were unsociable; his power of speech paltry; his elocution stiff and halting.

Still, with all his shortcomings as a speaker and artist, and all his faults as a man, I regard him as second in original genius to Lord Randolph Churchill alone of the statesmen of the last thirty years, and far above all of them in disinterestedness and magnanimity.

More than any other man he proved to me by his deeds and being that Burke's noble eulogy of the race was not all imaginary. Burke spoke of "the ancient and inbred integrity and piety of the English people." Lord Hartington was the only Englishman I have ever met who deserved this extraordinary panegyric. There was in him "an inbred integrity and piety" which were very remarkable. It is for others to explain how his inferiors, both in intellect and character, were always preferred before him.

THE THEATRE

"LOAVES AND FISHES" AT THE DUKE OF YORK'S

"Ah! pour estre dévot, je n'en suis pas moins homme," said Tartuffe truly enough. But Mr. Somerset Maugham applies this truism to his Canon Spratte, who is neither devout nor bears the least resemblance whatever to any living or dead man. With something of that rather impish cleverness for which Mr. Maugham is famous, he has called his new play, "Loaves and Fishes," a satire. He did so with the obvious hope of throwing dust into the eyes of critics and playgoers. If he had labelled his play a farce, people would have been somewhat irritated, because nothing happens—no one sits on his hat, or falls through a conservatory, or performs any of the time-honoured and apparently irresistible English farcical tricks. To call the play farce would have laid Mr. Maugham open to the mild reproaches of his admirers, who regard him as the first writer of comedy of the day. To have called it a farce would have been just as inaccurate as it is to call it a satire. It is neither one nor the other. It is nothing more nor less than an extremely bitter and cruel caricature. From the Hon. and Rev. Canon Theodore Spratte downwards, all the characters in Mr. Maugham's play are drawn with the pencil of Mr. Max Beerbohm, and they are finished with the thin pen of Mr. Syme, which is always dipped in vitriol. So wildly are these characters treated, so distorted are they, that not one of them after the first ten minutes of the play has any interest for the audience. We laugh at their initial appearance, grow extremely irritated long before the fall of the first curtain, and remain to see the remainder of the play without any further curiosity than that which arises from a desire to see how the audience will take it.

We at once absolved Mr. Somerset Maugham from the charge of holding the Church up to ridicule. His Canon Spratte wears no more resemblance to a vicar than to a minister of Nonconformity. He is nothing less than a rather tiresome burlesque of Machiavelli, dressed in the orthodox costume of a clergyman. His brother, curiously called Earl Spratte, is just as unlifelike. We are asked to suppose that this person is a satirical character-study of one of the backwoodsmen of whom we hear so much. He is, however, much more like the drawing of a third-rate comic artist than a pen-picture by Mr. E. T. Reed, of Punch, which it was apparently the intention of Mr. Maugham to make him. And, as a matter of fact, this third-rate comicality was the note of all the other characters: the young curate; the wooden Lord Wroxham, dressed like a tailor's dummy—a city tailor's dummy; the tailor who advertises in the Tube; the long-haired, red-tied Socialist with the movable cuffs; the Lady Sophia Spratte; the brainless and dishonourable Winifred Spratte; the giggling and suburban Gwendoline Durant; the Peckham Mrs. Railing, and the Suffragist Louise Railing—all are painted with the same heavy brush, with the same glaring paint. The very names of the characters suggest the third-rate comic artist, and the wonder is that Mr. Maugham, with a new laziness which is to be deplored, did not go one step lower and call his characters by even more obvious names in order to save himself the trouble of making their natures apparent. After all, Theodore Spratte is little less jejune than Theodore Cunning or Theodore Self. Railing is only a little less obvious than Tub-Thumper, and Wroxham than Woodhead.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

So far as the dialogue goes the play contains several witty lines, but these are as water in the desert. For the most part it is of the easy, obvious type—the sort of dialogue which we are accustomed to find in the Christmas skits of the weekly papers—mere journalistic dialogue. In short, the play as a satire does not exist. It has none of the accumulating tragedy of farce, nothing of the humanity of comedy, and as a burlesque it is very feeble and rather distasteful. In sitting the play out we told ourselves, by way of making some excuse for Mr. Maugham, that "Loaves and Fishes" must be one of his very early plays rescued from the waste-paper basket. Since the first night we find that it is nothing more nor less than an adaptation of one of his youthful books called the "Bishop's Apron." From the way in which the play was received it is all too plain that Mr. Maugham is mistaken in his belief that he has acquired so strong a hold on the play-going public as to be able to palm off upon them anything that comes to his hand. We are of opinion that had this play borne the name of any author who had not succeeded in being produced before, it would never have been "presented" by Mr. Charles Frohman or any other manager. It bears all the evidences of immature work. In construction as well as in dialogue it is juvenile. It might easily have been written by an undergraduate on the staff of the "Isis" who had made a somewhat cursory study of the plays of the early eighteenth century. The only word that can be applied to it is amateurish, the worst of all words. We would therefore venture to offer Mr. Somerset Maugham, much of whose work we greatly admire, and to whom we look for entertainment and excellence, a piece of fatherly advice. Let him put aside his busy pen for twelve months. Let him study more closely the manners, customs, and aims of the men and women of to-day, and, above all, let him apply to his own work a keener sense of criticism.

It might be well, too, if he were to spend more time in front of the stage, so that he might discover first-hand what is the intellectual worth of the people who go to the theatre. He would then come to the conclusion that to be successful as a playwright it is necessary to provide audiences with plays in which there is less cynicism and more vraisemblance, less journalism and more humanity. If "Loaves and Fishes" achieves any measure of success at all, and this we doubt, it will be due to the admirable acting. Mr. Robert Loraine, certainly the most versatile and sincere of our young actors, made something of a tour de force as Canon Spratte. He played the part with a sense of humour which would have made his character a masterpiece had it been drawn less obviously and with some sort of likeness to life. Mr. C. M. Lowne, another admirable actor, certainly managed to bring the whiff of the stables across the footlights, although we could see no reason for his wearing a tuft of hair, Disraeli-like, on his chin. Miss Frances Ivor had very little to do as Lady Sophia Spratte, but her facial expression made up for her lack of lines. We found Miss Nina Sevening a little petulant and colourless, and Miss Viva Birkett a little too toothful. But Miss Mary Barton was altogether excellent as the Board-school educated type of Suffragist, full of the conventional shibboleths of her kind. Mr. Thomas Holding was well cast as Bertram Railing. His hair, his melodramatic intensity, his accent, and his tie were the real things. And Miss Florence Haydon saved the Third Act by her finished performance of the elderly Peckham woman. Her smile upon the mention of the word "gin" was a thing of joy. Miss Ellis Jeffreys was a little disappointing as Mrs. Fitzgerald. Her character was the one natural person on the stage, but Miss Jeffreys was glassy. She made too many eyes and laughed all too loudly. For all that, she looked extremely charming and well groomed. We should have preferred to see Miss Irene Vanbrugh in the part. Her sense of comedy would have made it a very pleasant thing, and it would have been a great relief after the long round of erotic and emotional characters to which Miss Irene Vanbrugh has been doomed in recent years—characters which are in absolute antagonism to this charming actress's personality and methods.

"BARDELYS THE MAGNIFICENT" AT THE GLOBE THEATRE

In this Mr. Lewis Waller makes a welcome return to the London stage. It is true that Mr. Waller has not been altogether absent from London. We had the inestimable pleasure of seeing him in the Forum Scene of "Julius Cæsar" a week or two ago, and his performance of Mark Antony was so full of dignity, beauty, eloquence, and imagination that to find him once more as the stereotyped Bravo in the conventional machine-made romantic comedy is disappointing. That he acquits himself with great gallantry, immense aplomb, and extraordinary sincerity goes without saying. There is no actor on the London stage who is so picturesque as Mr. Lewis Waller, or who can make the hyperbole and sky-bosh of romantic drama pass muster so well. In "Bardelys the Magnificent" Mr. Waller finds the part too much after his own heart. It would be better for him, and in the long run for his audience, if he liked these parts less and were to be plucky enough to break away from them and devote himself to those worthier of him. For all that, we found "Bardelys" a little less foolish than its many predecessors of the same school. The play has colour and something of the romance of Dumas—something, but not much. The picturesque note was struck at once on the rise of the curtain in the first Act. The magnificence of Bardelys was obvious from the bachelor splendour of his Paris hotel, where a collection of bravos and dandies were making free with his wine and telling us much about Bardelys which we had already taken for granted. The entrance of Marcel de St. Pol, Marquis de Bardelys, was timed with all the exactitude of this type of piece. He did not come up through a trap-door and say, "Here I am again," but he entered just at the moment when all his overlively guests had sprung to their feet to toast him.

The great weakness of the play lay in the fact that the whole of its action depended upon a very foolish and unconvincing wager made between Filippe, Comte de Castelroux, and Bardelys as to the wooing of a beautiful but unsophisticated young woman, Roxalaune de Lavedau, who lived in her father's house in a town some distance from Paris in the department of Languedoc. As in all these plays, Castelroux, the villain, is a far greater fool than Bardelys, the hero, and there is nothing whatever throughout the play to prevent the hero from outwitting the villain at every turn except a well-timed sword-thrust and a bullet-wound in one of those vital parts which seem to make heroes far more lively than ever. In all the similar productions under which we have recently suffered—"Princess Clementina," "Beau Brocade," and "Mr. Jarvis"—the authors have not known how to draw a villain who should give even a momentary thrill of excitement. Everything comes so easy to the heroes of these plays that we feel that it is hardly necessary to waste a whole evening in order to wait for a dénouement which is obvious from the first. In "Bardelys the Magnificent" Mr. Henry Hamilton and Mr. Rafael Sabatini have done a little better than the writers—they cannot be called dramatists—of the plays just mentioned.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

They perform their task too with a greater air, a wider swing, with more pomp and circumstance. They do not suffer from that cramping self-consciousness which brings about the fear of ridicule. They put into the mouths of their puppets long sentences of amazing hyperbole, far-fetched simile, and glowing words of love and passion, hatred, and contempt, and thus they manage to give a rather pleasant suggestion of robustness to their play which, but for its fundamental absurdity and weakness, would have been worth seeing. Then, too, they have been at some pains to provide a touch of comedy in the character of the heroine's mother. This character, in the inimitable hands of Miss Lottie Venne, whose walk, laugh, and facial expression would wring laughter from a sphinx, saves the piece from its monotonous pomposity. We have already said that Mr. Lewis Waller acts too well. We wish that we could say that the members of his company acted well enough. Apart from Miss Lottie Venne, who is a genuine artist in everything that she does, the rest are very feeble. We do not believe that the production of this play will repay Mr. Lewis Waller the money he has spent upon it.

MR. GRANVILLE BARKER AT THE PALACE THEATRE

Herr Schnitzler wrote a short series of one-act plays called "The Adventures of Anatol," and Mr. Granville Barker translated them into English, and has been playing them at the Palace Theatre. Anatol is supposed to be a very blasé and immoral young German, who falls in love with a different girl once a week. In the original these adventures possessed something of the epigrammatic cynicism of Oscar Wilde, and Herr Schnitzler drew in them the portrait of a typical German "blood." Mr. Barker's translation retains nearly all the excellence of the original, and the Palace Theatre has provided him with admirable and appropriate scenery. He has been assisted in their interpretation by Mr. Nigel Playfair, Miss Gertrude Robins, Miss Lillah McCarthy, and other very able actors and actresses, and there is little doubt that these sketches would have provided some amusement had Mr. Granville Barker not hi nself appeared as the amorous Anatol. Mr. Barker is as unlike the typical young German as it is possible to conceive any man being. He dresses and makes up for the part as though he were representing one of the members of the Young Men's Christian Association on a fortnight's holiday at Clacton-on-Sea. He is utterly unforeign in manner and appearance, and he plays Anatol with a smirk of self-consciousness which robs the part of all its meaning. We picture Anatol a rather fat, fair-haired, voluble person, with the proud marks of several duels upon his cheeks, dressed in the "Higlif" clothes of the fashionable German tailor with a branch in Paris and a collection of designs of an English tailor's artist. We picture him a man who inhales cigarette-smoke and exudes scent. But at the Palace Theatre we find him a person with a hard, dry voice, uncontrollable hair, dressed in clothes which look as if they had come off the peg.

Mr. Barker could not be blasé if he tried, and he appears to be merely a demagogue on the spree, a vegetarian dallying with a butcher, a propagandist posing as a novelist. In a word, Mr. Granville Barker was unsuited to the part. Mr. Nigel Playfair, on the other hand, was quite admirable as the Machiavellian tubby little man, quite capable of accounting for an unlimited number of Bocks without losing anything of his joie de vivre. The audience at the Palace Theatre have been puzzled, but unamused. The experiment was, however, quite worth making.

MUSIC

THE music made in the London concert-rooms last week was pleasant enough, but had no striking features. From the Société des Concerts Français one has come to expect a good deal. Their performers are so excellent, and the music they present, if not necessarily novel, is generally well worth hearing. But their concert last Wednesday was not one of their best. It consisted entirely of compositions by the veteran M. Saint-Saëns and of songs—fifteen of these—and some violin pieces by M. Ernest Moret. Now M. Saint-Saëns is a man for whom we in England have had a great respect for a long time. Before even the "modern French school" was heard of he stood as the representative of French musical culture, in strong contrast to Gounod, whose religious music, then widely popular over here, was felt by the judicious to be by no means elevating in style, even if it was not absolutely pernicious in its example. Saint-Saëns was known to be a man of immense learning, of extraordinary activity, brilliant in musical scholarship, endowed with fine taste, thoroughly French in his lucidity of style, and sometimes the composer of works not only attractive but having serious value. But like many another very prolific author, Saint-Saëns has written a good deal of music which, attractive as it may be because of its workmanship, says nothing very much. The Sonata for Pianoforte and Violin and the Pianoforte Trio (composed nearly fifty years ago) are pleasant enough in their way, undeniably clever, not without an agreeable sense of melody, and a power of building up noisy and effective climaxes; but if we did not know them to be by M. Saint-Saëns, should we be inclined to pay much attention to them? His Toccata for Pianoforte is a good piece of music—quite a good piece—and one that would generally be welcome in a recital programme; but all the skill of that admirable pianist, M. Yves Nat, could not disguise the poverty of "Cloches du Soir," or the tinsel of the difficult study "In The Form of a Valse." M. Nat is a player of the first class, and it was a disappointment to hear him in music so little worthy of his gifts. M. Maugeot, the violinist, is also a fine artist. The songs of M. Moret are so good up to a certain point that one rather impatiently wished they were better. In construction, in workmanship they have much that is interesting, and they were admirably sung by clever Mme. Blanche Marchesi, but we listened in vain for one that glowed with the divine spark.

The Classical Concert Society has played Beethoven's "Grosse Fage" for string quartett, and played it twice over for the benefit of the perplexed. It is a work of which we must all speak with respect, of course, but as for any pleasure to be derived from hearing it, most people, we fear, would think it a gift from that Pleasure of whom Baudelaire wrote so bitterly—"Plaisir, ce bourreau sans merci." Brahms' clarinet quintett, on the other hand, is one of those lovely things that everyone, surely, can appreciate. Happy are those organisers of concerts who depend mainly for their audience on their subscribers. They need not rack their brains to think what will "draw," what will be popular. They know what their patrons want to hear. Like the Classical Society, Messrs. Broadwood cater for an audience that likes what is good, what is refined, to be performed for them by artists of finished accomplishment. No wonder was it that there was hardly a vacant seat at the Broadwood Concert, for Miss Maggie Teyte was to sing a number of songs, and for "finish" and "charm," combined with undoubted musicianship, you would have to go a long way to find a singer more entirely pleasant to hear than Miss Teyte. Yet have we a little scolding for her and for Messrs. Broadwood. For such an artist all the songs were not quite worthy, were they? But she must never appear without her Méhal and her Monsigny, for she is enchanting in them, and, after hearing her in "Du bist die Ruh," we are eager to hear her again in Schubert. Dupere's fine "Le Manoir de Rogamunde" was very welcome, and, of course, Miss Teyte may sing as much Debussy as she will, for she can sing the much-attempted songs of that much-tried composer.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Mr. Percy Grainger, who shared the Broadwood programme with Miss Teyte, has many admirers, and it is impossible indeed not to admire a great deal that he does; but he is terribly unequal. Now he plays with perfect propriety and a singing tone (as in some Schumann and Brahms and Grieg), and now (as in some Chopin) he indulges in changes of time that we could almost call wicked, in a sentiment that suggests not honey but treacle, and not seldom in a vociferous clamour. We must, however, give him great praise for the concluding pages of Chopin's "Barcarolle." Would that all pianists realised, as Mr. Grainger does, that Chopin never meant the music that he wrote to be played with a deafening din and at railroad speed. Mr. Grainger's piety towards his friend Grieg no doubt led him to bring forward several pleasant but unimportant pieces by the amiable Norwegian. "Little footsteps lightly print the ground" in Music's domain as well as in the neighbourhood of the nursery, and we like to hear them sometimes, so we do not blame Mr. Grainger for bringing these innocents forwards. But some of the "little footsteps" were very little indeed, and while we could admire the enthusiasm with which the annotator of the Book of Words had written about them, we could not but question the justice of his judgments.

Mr. Lengyel, a youthful pianist, who was rightly acclaimed a few years ago as a prince among prodigies, has reappeared at Bechstein Hall, and proved that as a powerful executant he is likely to obtain high rank. He can already toss his chords about with the strength and ease of a leviathan at play, and though he did not always hit the right notes, such a peccadillo could be pardoned on account of the great spirit with which everything was attacked and all the redoubts were stormed. Experience will teach Mr. Lengyel not to take certain variations in Schumann's Études Symphoniques too fast, nor to indulge in ritardandi, which, without wishing to give offence, we can only call stupid. And he will learn, as he grows older, how to keep details in their right place, so that the whole may be harmonious. A technical point about his playing which should be noticed is that he is not sufficiently careful to make his crescendos equally with both hands.

Mr. Plunket Greene finished his course of lectures on the interpretation of song and the composition of recital programmes by singing a model programme, which he explained very carefully. His principles are of the soundest, and if he could be induced to publish a pamphlet on the subject of the making of programmes, we believe it would be found valuable and useful to a great many distracted artists.

The "Strings Club," another of the organisations which secure an audience by means of a subscription-list, has again given one of its pleasant concerts, with the aid of such experienced players of chamber-music as Messrs. Alfred Gibson, Reeves, Hobdey and Whitehouse, who were, of course, quite competent in Beethoven and Brahms. The quartett in B flat of Brahms, once so popular that it became almost "hackneyed," is an honest, homely work, and vigorous withal, but were it introduced in these days as a novelty it would hardly arouse the enthusiasm with which it used to be greeted. The Concert-goers' Club have given a first performance in London of a Pianoforte Trio by Komygold, the Viennese boy (he is only thirteen), who is said to possess undoubted genius. It will be wise to hear more of his music before deciding if the verdict of Vienna is justified.

WATER-COLOUR DRAWINGS AT MESSRS. AGNEW'S GALLERIES

Lovers of water-colour painting have had exceptional opportunities within a few weeks of studying its development during the last century. Representative exhibitions such as that at the Leicester Galleries, which has only been closed recently, and that now open at Messrs. Agnew's are full of interest for those who are glad of an opportunity of studying not only the true greatness of giants such as Turner, Cox, and De Wint, but the various methods of the lesser men—Leitch, Prout, Birket Foster. The work of these and many other artists, although of little artistic value, is of very great interest when dropped into its own niche as illustrative of the phases through which water-colour painting has passed. The collection at Messrs. Agnew's is not the less interesting because the various works of each master represented are by no means of equal beauty or worth. Those pictures described as "not of his best period" have a special significance for the painter, if not perhaps for most laymen. Such pictures, for instance, as David Cox's "Ancient Carthage" only enable us the better to appreciate the grandeur of such work as "Across the Common: Market Day" by the same artist. Turner's work can happily be studied best in our own public galleries, but the screen here devoted to eight or nine of his pictures illustrates in a very interesting way the development of the genius which produced at one period the "Old Abbey, Evesham," and ultimately "Dunstanborough Castle" and "Geneva." Another Turner—by no means one of the great ones—hangs on the south wall of the Gallery near Copley Fielding's "Summer Evening in the Highlands." Copley Fielding's work is widely represented here, but little beyond technical ability is disclosed. Two or three men are represented by single pictures, of which Weissenbruch's "Grey Afternoon" and "The Abbey, Middelburg," by J. Bosboom, may be mentioned. We would also call attention to one of the finest of De Wint's water-colour sketches—"A Lincolnshire Farm."

ASPECTS OF TRAGEDY

From the Beginnings to 1700.—I.

For the beginnings of drama we must look to the very morning of mankind. So soon as man first learned to love the narrative told of the day's hunting around the camp fire, we find the beginnings of primitive drama, for we observe to this day that an ordinary unemotional man, stirred up by the relation of a personal adventure, will rise from his seat and indulge in varied and illuminative gesture, such as would be foreign and repugnant to his usual nature, in illustration of the more vigorous passages of his tale. The most successful of these narratives—those most graphically told and best illustrated by appropriate gesture—were naturally demanded again and again; and when some maladroit spear-thrust or tusk of boar or bison removed the original narrator some one of his friends took up the oft-told tale and embellished it with wonders of his own invention.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Thus was the primitive drama already established, for this man represented a part—in short, pretended. The instinct for pretence and the love of it is innate in mankind; this protagonist of a great art was his own leading actor, and had for sole stage the clear space allowed him by the admiring circle of his friends. From such beginnings sprang at once lyric poetry, epic poetry, history, and the drama.

If man had never felt the impulse of vanity, he might yet have remained practically at a brutish level; the desire to make some record of his own fine deeds led at once to the rude paintings which he executed with such primitive tools as came to hand upon the walls of the cavern that formed his sleeping-place; and to the whole cycle of poetic legends, weird songs and perhaps beautiful, yet necessarily uncouth beginnings of literature which, being preserved only by oral tradition, have faded with him into the shadowy remoteness of the infinitely long ago. We can only conjecture of these things; and our first recorded drama, apart from the dramatic elements in religion, the observances and ceremonies performed by the priests in the temples, belongs to a comparatively late age, and is found in the records of a people already well advanced in civilisation.

The great empires of the Euphrates, Assyria and Babylonia rose, flamed, and fell; the sleepy-seeming, wonderfully gorgeous splendours of the Hindustani princedoms ascended to their tropical noon; the Eastern tyrant had his singing and dancing girls. We find no record of a written drama; but when Greece, glory of the early world, awoke into sentience, then from vague beginnings emerged a definite dramatic performance.

No one appears competent to deny the claims of Thespis to be hailed as a pioneer. He it was who first took upon himself to enact the part of a hero or a god, to speak to the chorus and to order the rhythmic fashion of their answers. An antic rout they were, these rude progenitors of the drama, as, their faces besmeared with wine-lees, they went the round of the villages in a wagon and varied the dance and song of the Dionysian revelry with their one-man tragi-comedies. From the first stage to the second in the inception of an art is often a mighty step. The blind gropings of Thespis towards a new art-form were succeeded almost in his lifetime by the magnificently open-eyed achievements of Æschylus, moving at ease in this form, and already daring to introduce more innovations. To him belongs the honour of introducing a second actor, whereby he transformed what had formerly been a lyric monologue, interrupted by choric odes, into a real dramatic dialogue.

Sophocles, contemporary with him as Jonson with Shakespeare, but unhappily without the same degree of mutual friendliness, introduced a third actor; both of them made various minor improvements, and left the stately and perfected Greek drama for the hand of Euripides to cherish and mould yet further into beauty. There is no law in any art which obliges inevitable progress, and by just so much as Euripides was a modernist and felt the strict bonds prescribed for him irksome did he fail to carry forward an art-form which, within the limits unalterably imposed on it by the severe canons of Greek tragedy, had already attained perfection. These two giants make, as it were, the Elizabethan age of Greek drama: after them there are no more great plays written in Greece.

To a reader compelled to judge between these masters by English versions alone it is extremely difficult to form a just impression of their respective excellences, and a profound debt of gratitude is due to Professor Gilbert Murray, whose Euripides sings in living verse.

He has, however, placed us in an unfortunate dilemma. Reading his free and lyric transmutation with Æschylus and Sophocles in the frigid and stilted versions that are obtainable, we are in some danger of thinking Euripides to be the greatest poet of the three. As a solution of the problem we can only beg Professor Murray to hasten and give us equally lovely renderings of the two elder poets, lest our judgment be perverted. We may see, however, taking, for example, the versions made by the three poets of the same story of Electra, the main divergences between the three.

It must be remembered that the Greek tragedy never concerned itself with invented stories, but retold the old tales of the gods and heroes. Consequently, the audience were perfectly familiar beforehand with every possible incident. We may compare them to a person of our day who goes for the first time to see a Shakespearean play acted. To its last days the Greek drama retained many of the old characteristics of a religious sacrifice, and the theatre was purified before every performance as if for a libation in the temple.

In Æschylus' version of the terrible and bloody story the mortals are no less superhuman than the immortals; the unalterable decrees of destiny pursue each character to his inevitably appointed end; and the gods walk the stage, glorified beings, merciful and wonderful, incapable of evil. The change from Æschylus to Sophocles is the change from the glorious unearthly splendour of the dawn to the placid beauty of the morning. With the widening of the Greek horizon by sea-voyages and increasing international commerce came the widening and humanising of their drama. The characters of Æschylus are demi-gods; those of Sophocles, elevated, full of dignity, are yet human beings.

Sophocles introduces a softening element. Instead of the too poignant figure of Cassandra, utterly forlorn in a stranger land, and tormented by a foreknowledge in which none of the victims she piteously endeavours to warn will place any credence, he gives us the earthily beautiful Chrysothemis, poor-spirited yet rather appealing foil to the hate-maddened figure of Electra.

Euripides, "our Euripides the human," in bringing the characters yet nearer to us, loses for ever that marvellous sense of remoteness, of high tragic dignity, which enveloped Æschylus and lingered about Sophocles.

To him the gods are not infallible; they are rather tempters, whose promptings man must resist or obey as his own understanding prompts him; and seen in this light, as an avoidable deed of private vengeance, the actions of Orestes and Electra assume a more sanguinary and awful, because a less inevitably ordered, aspect. The stern justice of Æschylus' Orestes and Electra bears almost the same relation to the vacillating, trembling, over-wrought crime of Euripides' brother and sister, that an old-time state execution bears to the hanging by lynch-law in some remote Western state of to-day.

Therefore, Euripides, constrained, it may be, by a dramatic sense superior to those possessed by either of his two earlier rivals, introduces the palliative urging of the old herdsman to nerve the two instruments of vengeance to their deed. Of the three Electras, Euripides', while the most closely studied—Æschylus, in particular, is far more interested in Clytemnestra—remains at once the most interesting and the most repellent of them all. The cold-hearted calculation of her scheme to entrap her mother to her death remains absolutely unforgiveable; yet when the play is over and the book closed we cannot but be glad that at last her feud is ended, and a season of sunshine promised to her withering springtide of womanhood in the love of Pylades; and that the harried, strangely sympathetic figure of Orestes is destined to forgiveness and ultimate happiness in exile. The lyrics sung by the promiser of these fortunes, the god-like Castor, are of extreme beauty; indeed, all of the choric utterances in this play are sufficiently lovely to enable us to overlook the fact that, so far from being integral parts of the drama, they are for the most part positive interruptions to the action.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

To conclude, then, Æschylus stands, a remote figure of god-like stature, lighted with the morning; Sophocles, next him, is, like Castor, half human, half divine: last, Euripides, wholly mortal, stands, neither quite accepting nor wholly rejecting the gods of his fathers, combating destiny, full of doubts, uncertainties, sympathies—full of the naked barbarity of that so-long-ago civilisation—a strangely modern and appealing figure. When we consider that the speaking characters on the stage at one time were positively limited to three, thus necessitating continual exits, the freedom and apparent ease with which the action moves forward is nothing less than marvellous.

The flower of Greek drama, having come to full perfection, withered and died, and every subsequent attempt to accustom it to an alien soil has hitherto failed.

Worshippers of beauty in all its forms, the Athenians abhorred physical pain and naked violence; so that, while all the murders and bloody battles are performed off the stage and narrated by messengers, the entire tragedy of two plays, "Philoctetes" and "Prometheus Chained," consists in the physical suffering endured by the hero To the northern races, inured to hardship, this does not seem to be sufficient motive for a tragedy; and this softness was eventually the cause of the downfall of that exquisite culture, once opposed to the brutal strength of Rome.

THE POET'S HOLIDAY

1.—The Philosophy of Travel

It may be said that a man is bound to the agreeable illusion of youth until he no longer expects to find something rather wonderful round the next corner. It is this youthful capacity for wonder that sends grown men laden with tinned meats to the North Pole; it is this that nerves the seafearing tripper to make forlorn excursions to Boulogne; it is this that induces small boys to thrust their heads into rabbit-holes. When we are disillusioned and realise that wherever we go on the round world we take our limitations with us, that it is only in our own hearts that wonder can be born, the desire to visit other countries becomes little more than the desire to escape from an environment of which we are weary. We cannot travel away from our passions—our thirst for song, our hunger for expression, our theory of joy that is one long pain. The man who is hard ridden by his desires will find peace no easier to win in the midst of the desert than by his own fireside. His body may travel ceaselessly between the two Poles; his mind and his heart are imprisoned still in their lifelong cells.

I think that there must be a spirit of childishness in most people that enables them to take pleasure in seeing new things without asking whether their novelty has any significance. It is this naïve curiosity that accounts for the extraordinary tediousness of the letters that we receive from friends and relatives travelling abroad. They describe churches and museums and picture-galleries, or it may be lakes and mountains; it would be more interesting if they would tell us how these marvels really impressed them apart from the tyrannous approbation of guide-books. As a matter of fact we know very well that it takes a great man to appreciate great works of art, and our tourists would be far more sincere, and therefore far more amusing, if they would write about the things that excite them, though it be only the queer little gooseberry tartlets they have for lunch. But there is a kind of emotional snobbishness that will not confess to the pleasure that is to be derived from trifles, though it is only the very exceptional man who derives pleasure from anything else. Those who possess this especial vanity had better stop at home, for wherever they go they will learn nothing of men and women, and, more important still, nothing new of themselves. For, when all is said, there is this one advantage in moving from one place to another: we shall never discover Arcadia or escape the anguish of existence, but in a fresh environment we may succeed in exploring some untrodden byway of our own natures. Whether a man goes to Margate or the Himalayas, he may not hope to discover more than that.

And yet there is the illusion of the marvellous which makes it difficult for any human being to pack a portmanteau without sharing in some degree the feelings of a merchant-adventurer fitting out an expedition to the islands of rubies and gold. It may be doubted whether any one ever wholly conquers this illusion, and for my part I confess that at such a time I find even a prosaic thing like a roll of collars or a cake of soap agreeably romantic. I feel compassion for the man whose soul is so dead that he can write labels for his luggage without a thrill of excitement. I remember how glad we were to do this at school when we were going home for the holidays, and even when it was a question of going back to school again. We were at pains, by aid of capitals and exclamation-marks, to impress the importance of our "tuck-boxes" on the railway mind. We lose something in later life by intrusting the carrying out of these trifling tasks to others; but repetition stales the adventure.

Well, our boxes are packed, either by ourselves or by some one else—our tickets are taken, and with a faint quickening of the pulse we prepare to set forth on our sentimental journey. Let us forget for once the philosophic truth that, after all the pains and discomforts of travel, we shall find ourselves exactly where we were before we started. Let us make-believe—any child can do it—that we are going to a place where the men are more kind and the women more beautiful than any we have known before—a place of young laughter and old song; above all, a place where we shall be masters of our own natures, and have peace at last from the wild unreason of our days.

The apples and flagons are in the rack overhead, and I have an agreeable companion, whose baggage chiefly consists of books of verse. There are people on the platform to see us off—Christine, still mindful of the wiles of Chloe, and a wise, sad little man who has made a great reputation as a wit by continually laughing at himself. For a painful twenty minutes we talk banalities, and I am reminded of a famous essay of Mr. Max Beerbohm's without being freed from the spell. Then the train starts, and relief gives us a fleet happiness.

It is three years since I last went to Brussels, and then I went on a cargo-steamer without any luggage at all. When we were within an hour of Antwerp I saw something which was a good example of the fact that the extraordinary is not always the wonderful. Within a hundred yards of our little vessel, in broad daylight on a calm sea, a great passenger-boat, the Montezuma, ran into a steamer fully laden with cargo and cut her nearly in two. There was no loss of life. The crew of the cargo-steamer had plenty of time to scamble up the sides of the Montezuma before the smaller boat sank. The whole business was oddly unimpressive. Somehow or other the calmness of the sea and the brightness of the sunshine gave the calamity an air of artificiality, and I have seen a far more convincing wreck on the stage of Drury Lane Theatre. There was only one strange moment in all those pregnant minutes. The deck of the cargo-boat was laden with agricultural implements, and just as she sank I had a brief vision of green and red ploughs standing among the salty meadows of the sea. After that we went down to breakfast.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

This time I crossed in a fog, and the air was full of the bleating of nervous ships. I walked up and down on the deck, and looked in the faces of my fellow-travellers, wondering why they, too, were at pains to journey from one place to another when everywhere on earth joy has a briefer hour than sorrow. I was going to visit Brussels and Amsterdam and Paris, and afterwards other places, perhaps; but wherever I went I should find men and women laughing, crying, hoping still. It is not necessary to travel in order to behold such miracles, but there is a distemper of the blood that finds tranquillity in wandering. Perhaps we were all suffering from the same complaint, and the vessel was in truth a hospital-ship. I recalled a poem of Ernest Dowson's, and murmured it to the fog between the lamentations of the myopic ship, "For I go where the wind goes, Chloe, and am not sorry at all." I doubt whether any one on the boat had a better reason than that for their pilgrimage.

RICHARD MIDDLETON.

INDIA: A SERIES

VII.—STRENUOUS REFORM THROUGHOUT THE ADMINISTRATION

CURZON OF KEDLESTON. 1899-1904-1905.—(Continued.)

FINANCE dominates every department in internal administration. After deficits and unstable exchange, an annual surplus was very welcome. When Sir Henry Fowler's Indian Currency Committee had reported, the Indian Government legislated in favour of a gold standard, the sovereign to be legal tender, and sixteen pence to be the legal rate for the rupee. Currency reform was subsequently completed when the profits of coinage were set aside to form a gold-reserve fund, so that a permanent guarantee for the stability of exchange was ensured. Countervailing duties were imposed on bounty-fed sugar. The salt-tax was twice reduced by Lord Curzon, and all possible care taken that the benefit of the reduction should reach the poor consumer. Much revenue was thus sacrificed, but increased consumption lessened the loss. The line of exemption from income-tax was raised. Besides the remission of taxation large grants were made for provincial and local purposes. These financial reliefs were afforded, although the country had suffered from severe famine in 1899-1900—perhaps the severest that India has ever known—which affected an area of 420,000 square miles and a population of sixty millions, in Bombay, the Panjab, Central Provinces, and Native States. Over six million persons were for weeks dependent on relief administration and charity. The total expenditure was very considerable, including a remission of land-revenue of £1,320,000. There was abnormal mortality in Guzarat and elsewhere; in British India there was an excess mortality of half a million, more or less attributable to famine conditions, and it was greater in the Native States. A Commission was appointed to inquire into the famine-relief operations, and suggest improvements in famine administration for the future. Irrigation was pressed forward; a Commission appointed to investigate future schemes presented a valuable report. Other Commissions were nominated, on the Police as well as on the Universities and Higher Education, and educational conferences were held; Technical Education and European and Eurasian Education were carefully examined. A serious effort was made to reduce the amount of report-writing, and to simplify the procedure in Government offices. A railway Board and a Member of Council for Commerce were appointed. An Agricultural College was established as a model for similar institutions in each Province to teach agricultural science. Plague continued to defy analysis, the efforts of medical officers, and all administrative plans for its extinction. But the people became more resigned, and less interference was enforced. A scientific Commission reported favourably of inoculation, which saved many lives. Some important legislative measures were passed, such as the Universities Act, the Official Secrets Act, the Indian Mines Act, the Ancient Monuments Preservation Act, the Co-operative Credit Societies Act, an Inland Emigration Act, the Panjab Land Alienation Act (which has since been extended to other areas).

On the death of her Majesty Queen Victoria, on January 22nd, 1901, deep public feeling was exhibited throughout India—the mourning was universal; shortly afterwards Lord Curzon initiated a project for a Victoria Memorial Hall to be erected at Calcutta; large subscriptions were offered by wealthy natives for this object, to which many others contributed. Lord Curzon's tenure of office was renewed after his absence for six months in 1904. One of his latest measures was the so-called Partition of Bengal, which involved the reduction of that Province by three divisions, containing many millions of inhabitants, and their transfer to Assam, to make a new Lieutenant-Governorship. Lord Curzon rejected the idea of an Executive Council for Bengal to relieve the Lieutenant-Governor; it has, however, since been created. The partition met with great opposition, some of which was possibly fictitious; meetings were held to protest against it and to boycott British goods. In military matters changes and improvements were required; the native regiments were rearmed, the artillery strengthened, and the British officers increased in number—Army expenditure always shows a tendency to rise in India. In 1905 the Government of India differed from a proposal of the Commander-in-Chief, Lord Kitchener, for the creation of an Army Department under himself, charged with the whole business of military administration. Lord Curzon objected to the abolition of the military member of Council. On the decision of the dispute by the English Cabinet, supporting the main proposal, he resigned. Lord Curzon's ability, as displayed in his writings and speeches, was undoubted; the stimulus he applied was often required; but the unceasing pressure which he applied universally and his severity rendered him unpopular, and left a legacy of political discontent.

CONCURRENT CONCILIATION AND REPRESSION

MINTO, 1905-1910

When Lord Minto became Viceroy, late in 1905, discontent had developed into active disaffection, tending to sedition and violence. After realising the situation, he initiated a policy of Constitutional reforms which, after consideration by a special Committee and the Government, found expression in a Parliamentary statute—the Indian Councils Act of 1909. Meanwhile Lord Minto had to cope with agitation and outrage. It became necessary in the spring of 1907 to deport certain agitators from the Panjab, under an old Regulation III. of 1818, occasionally used for political purposes, which was again utilised in December, 1908, for the deportation of nine Bengalis. Various murderous attempts and outrages occurred. A temporary Ordinance was converted in 1907 into an Act for the Prevention of Seditious Meetings, likely to cause disturbance of public tranquillity, the Act to be operative in notified Provinces and proclaimed areas. An Explosive Substances Act was passed on the lines of English law, to punish the criminal misuse of explosive substances.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The Newpapers Act was also passed, to make better provision for the prevention of incitements to criminal outrages in newpapers. It was confined to incitements to murder, to offences under the Explosives Act, and to acts of violence. As it failed to check the seditious utterances of the Vernacular Press, another more comprehensive measure was enacted in 1910, which, besides the incitements above mentioned, included matter likely to cause mutiny, sedition, religious or race hatred, intimidation, or interference with the administration of the law, or the maintenance of law and order. It included also a procedure for the deposit and forfeiture of security. This measure was accepted by the Extended Legislative Council, and has improved the behaviour of the Vernacular Press. By the Indian Criminal Law Amendment Act of 1908 provision was made for the more ready trial of anarchical offences and for the prohibition of associations dangerous to the public peace. A bench of three High Court Judges was constituted as the tribunal. Among other useful legislation a new Code of Civil Procedure, applicable to the whole of British India, became law in 1908. The special Acts enumerated indicate the repressive measures required to meet existing circumstances.

In England the Royal Commission upon Decentralisation in India was appointed and presented a report. The Council of India Act of 1907 made changes in the constitution of the Council and the tenure of appointments. Two Indian members were added to it. Under the Indian Councils Act above mentioned the maximum strength of the Legislative Councils was raised from 126 to 370, and the number of elected members from 39 to 135. An official majority was retained in the Imperial Legislative Council, but was dispensed with in the Provincial Councils. Special electorates were provided for Mahomedans, and arrangements made for nomination of representatives of particular classes. An Indian was appointed Legal Member of the Supreme Executive Council, the existing local Executive Councils were expanded, and an Executive Council was created for Bengal to admit of the appointment of Indians as members. Changes were made, giving great latitude in the discussion of the annual Budgets and matters of general public interest. Thus every effort was made officially and supported personally to conciliate the discontented elements by affording greater opportunities for the participation of Indians in public affairs. Lord Minto simultaneously conciliated the Native Princes by consulting them and relaxing the requirements of efficiency in their administration, which they had resented as interference. He received the Amir of Afghanistan, and made a friend of him. Other matters were not neglected. The military member of the Executive Council was abolished; a new member of Council and a Department for Education were established; the Railway Department was reorganised; an attempt was made to deal with malaria; improved measures were adopted against plague; the cultivation of poppy was diminished, and the supply of opium reduced, to co-operate with the opium policy of China. The visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales in 1905-6 aroused enthusiastic loyalty. The situation had shown signs of improvement before Lord Minto left India.

REFLECTIONS ON MODERNITY

THE cinematograph and gramophone have established themselves as familiar facts, almost as commonplaces, in our lives, with such singular swiftness, that we have perhaps missed the thrill of wonder that is their due, and the strange message that they bring to all thinking men and women. Marvels nowadays come so quickly one after another that modern man hardly stops to discern what it all means and where he is being led. He becomes blasé, and that which would have kept his forefathers gaping for a year assumes to him the aspect of a prosaic fact in a week.

In the darkness of one of London's innumerable Electric Palaces that have sprung up like mushrooms almost in a night let us try to shake ourselves free from the rather apathetic mesmerism of the performance, and detach ourselves with an effort from the fascinating adventures, and quietly think what is happening. We are listening to an impersonal voice, and we are looking at an impersonal play, both almost to the life, but without the living presence of actor or singer. What has done this?—primarily, powers of thought. Where our forefathers saw fleshly personalities we stand on the threshold of a new era; we are beginning to see thought-people and to hear thought-voices.

The world seems to be rising from its apparently established fetters in every direction, mind is overcoming limitations of time and space in ways that have never been even faintly imagined possible to man. Before the discoveries of the steam-engine, electricity, telegraphy, Marconigraph, motors, and aeroplanes all communication over distance depended on man personally carrying a message, and all movement depended on man's own legs or on those of animals to draw or carry him, except, of course, over the waters. It is always an evolution that one can trace from man's personality utterly dependent on himself, his bodily strength and muscles, to mind independent of personality carving out new methods of freedom and breaking away from the old limitations.

Look for a moment at another sign of the times. What game now claims the first place in the mind of the English-speaking game-playing upper classes? There can be no doubt that it is golf. "Ye anciente and Royal Game" has certainly come into its kingdom. Was it not declared in the august pages of the halfpenny paper that reaches—almost, we might say, dictates—the thought of millions of people daily, that a continuous game of golf could be played from Cornwall to John o' Groats, so surprising is the number of courses that have been made everywhere. What constitutes the especial charm of the game to this generation? Ask any golfer if he relies on his muscles, physique, or strength; he will tell you that they count for little—in fact, that if used as mere hitting force they will spoil any stroke in golf. Every stroke has its science and reason, and woe betide the golfer who uses only muscle and not his knowledge of the principle of the game. He will plough up much turf and may hit the ball hard along the ground, but nothing will send it whistling into the air, a straight 200 yards towards the hole, except the man's mind controlling the swing of his club every inch of the way. It is the most mental game that ever was played, and every golfer knows this, for herein lies its charm.

Look now in still another field of activity. What is going to be the result of the immense spread and development of the Daily Press? The daily newspaper, and particularly the halfpenny daily newspaper, is becoming a startlingly potent factor in the world's thought. Day by day all civilised places on the globe are presented with the news of the world for them to consider. Thought is now flashed swiftly from continent to continent, opening and enlarging the consciousness of mankind far beyond each personal circle or country, levelling prejudices and unifying the world's thought—for good or evil. The thought-force of the daily paper is indeed another of the mental giants of to-day, and one who as yet has hardly realised his latent powers.

It is not within the scope or purpose of this article to touch on religious matters. We can only glance for an instant at the noticeable and determined search that this age is making to find for itself salvation from all ills, whether of mind or body, far apart from the established methods that have long been considered orthodox. Every sort of attempt to discover new forces, or hitherto unapplied forces in mind is being made. Everywhere man is reaching out and trying to find and apply the laws of an Infinite Intelligence that he feels, however dimly as yet, to be the underlying Reality of all things.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

FOREIGN AFFAIRS: THE BALANCE OF POWER IN EUROPE

By Lancelot Lawton

During the past few weeks the conviction must have been growing upon the minds of all calm and reasonable men that were one-half of the sensational reports appearing with such unfailing regularity in the columns of the daily Press to possess the merit of truth, then the balance of power in Europe is completely upset, and, with dramatic suddenness, involving abrupt disregard for already contracted obligations, the diplomatic forces of nations are once more dividing themselves into rival camps as a preliminary to the long-expected conflagration which is to sweep the world to its four quarters. But as M. Pichon, then in office, and vigorously defending the Triple Entente against the blundering mischief-making of an irresponsible Press, recently observed, "diplomacy is not conducted in the public streets." Nevertheless, diplomacy does not always find it possible to conduct its business behind closed doors and drawn shutters, while in certain instances publicity, whether in candid revelation or cautious disclosure, becomes the very breath of wise diplomacy. When, however, due allowance has been made for these considerations, it must be confessed that the prevailing note of pessimism finds no justification in actual circumstance. A series of remarkable events of deep international concern has happened within a very short space of time, and consequently ample material has been provided upon which to build the unstable structure of speculation. The death of King Edward, whose noble work in the cause of peace had led him to be regarded everywhere not only as the first gentleman but also as the first diplomatist in Europe, and the pre-occupation of the nation in home affairs, undoubtedly spread a feeling abroad that the foreign policy of Great Britain had become seriously weakened. But it was not until the historic meeting of the Emperors at Potsdam that the least suspicion arose as to any change in the grouping of the Powers. All indications on the surface seemed to point to the fact that a definite understanding, which in spirit if not in letter was opposed to the aims and objects of the Triple Entente, had been concluded, and one well-known publicist, Dr. Dillon, boldly announced its sudden decease.

In France, as well as in this country, considerable criticism has been levelled at the conduct of foreign affairs, and, as a matter of fact, dissatisfaction with the Government on this score, arising largely from ignorance, has been contributory in bringing about the Cabinet crisis. And no sooner has the funeral oration of the Triple Entente been delivered than news comes that the Triple Alliance is in danger. Italy, who has never been an enthusiastic partner in the compact, finds cause for alarm in the warlike preparations of her "friend and ally" Austria; while the Kaiser's regard for the Vatican's susceptibilities has increased the difficulties of the situation. Yet another disquieting symptom of international concern is to be found in the proposals of the Dutch Government for the fortification of the Scheldt, proposals which, if carried out, will in the opinion of experts put an end to Holland's neutrality. If we are to accept all the ready-made deductions in the Press without careful discrimination, then it must be conceded that since the death of King Edward the balance of power in Europe has undergone a series of startling changes such as find few parallels in history. Thus, we are told that the Triple Entente is dead and the Triple Alliance dismembered; that the League of the Three Emperors has been virtually established; that Russia has deliberately torn up her Treaty of Alliance with France and wantonly ignored her obligations of friendship towards ourselves, and that all that remains to us amid the charred ruins of King Edward's magnificent peace-edifice is a lukewarm entente with France.

Were this story true it would indeed constitute a gloomy record of the collapse of British policy and British prestige. But a logical consideration of all the circumstances, in so far as we are permitted to peep behind the screen of diplomacy, will prove to us that no such disaster has happened, and that all sensational statements which have spread the contrary belief are merely founded upon irresponsible speculation. It is certainly not the Triple Entente that has suffered in consequence of recent developments. I have just returned from St. Petersburg, and I think I can say with confidence that the national sentiment of Russia was never more favourable towards Great Britain and France than it is to-day, and that it is the wish of the statesmen who are in power that this national sentiment shall continue to find expression in firm and unwavering adherence to the Triple Entente. It is urged by many critics that this entente has always been more or less shadowy; that it involves no clearly defined plan of action; that, stipulating no binding obligations, it ensures no tangible benefits, and that it has faded away because no longer does it possess any perceptible raison d'être. Publicists who indulge in these pessimistic reflections overlook the very positive results which have already been attained. For instance, all outstanding questions between Great Britain and Russia have been amicably settled, and it was due largely to the mediation of Great Britain that an early rapprochement between Russia and Japan became possible. Furthermore, it is known that France and Russia have definite arrangements of a military nature which would become operative in certain eventualities, that Great Britain has been admitted to their confidence in this matter, and that, moreover, what practically amounts to a military convention is in existence between Great Britain and Japan. These precautions imply no hostility to any other Power or group of Powers; they are merely the business-like outcome of the Triple Entente and its corollary, the Far Eastern Entente.

Time alone will show that so far from the Potsdam understanding having dealt a death-blow to the Triple Entente, it has revealed at once the vitality and the useful elasticity of that important compact; for it is not for one moment to be supposed that when Russia, France, and England agreed on broad lines to merge their destinies, any one of them consented, or was asked to consent, to the limitation of her individual activities to the point of self-effacement. Russia's activity on this occasion evinces a marked and far-seeing consideration of British interests where, but a decade past, she was universally suspected of harbouring covetous designs. Perhaps the surest guarantee of her continued loyalty to her partners—England and France—is to be found in the Tsar's passionate desire for peace. No longer surrounded by that powerful coterie of ambitious and militant empire-makers, of whom it is not an exaggeration to say that they were personally responsible for the sanguinary campaign in Manchuria of 1904-5, His Imperial Majesty realises that the prosperity and happiness of his countless subjects rest in the keeping of the peace of Europe. And who knows better than the Emperor of All the Russias that the peace of Europe depends upon that most exquisitely delicate of international adjustments—the balance of power?

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

We are really the most sublimely self-centred people in the world. We remain quite happy as long as our own immediate interests are not jeopardised. Last week we saw New York sharply shaken by a decision that was not only unexpected, but also disquieting; Paris was equally disturbed by a dangerous gamble in Maltzoffs, and a consequent liquidation. Yet because rubber rose to 7s. a pound we remain serene, optimistic, and genuinely bullish. The City does not altogether like this renaissance of rubber. It wants general business. It is a little jealous of Mincing Lane. It does not forget that when the last wave of excitement in the rubber market subsided it left many stranded upon the mud. Yet it looks as though all the savings that have accumulated during the past few months of trade prosperity would be invested in rubber. Even Home Rails are more or less neglected. Some of the new issues have gone well. The Mogyana was over subscribed; indeed, it deserved the honour. Roneo went well; it was sound and was also well advertised. St. Ivel scraped through. Alpha did not find favour. The Panama timber was a hopeless fiasco. This abortive issue should teach the timber people a lesson. Speyer Brothers carried through their St. Paul and Kansas City Railway Loan, and are ready with a tube issue which the good report of the Underground Electrics may cause to be over-subscribed. Sir William MacKenzie is interested in a Canadian company which we shall see out almost at once.

Money has been just a shade hard, but must gradually become cheaper until such time as the Bank of England decides to reduce its rate to 3 per cent. Yet those scribes who are sworn to support dear money look gloomy. This does not prevent the bill-brokers from bidding $2\frac{3}{8}$ for long-dated bills. The effort to keep up rates has failed.

Consols grow harder, and the public will soon realise that the price is too low. When the Bank Rate falls, as fall it must, we shall see a sharp rise in all gilt-edged stocks. The supply of fine Trustee Stocks is gradually becoming smaller each year, and the amount now available is not enough to go round.

Foreigners are so much under the control of Paris that no one expects any move. Russians are steady. I can say no more. Tintos are much too high as an investment, but if the Supreme Court decides in favour of Tinto we shall see a big move in all copper shares, and Tintos will rise. They are, of course, the great gambling counter on the Paris Bourse. The astounding rise in Maltzoffs has upset Paris operators, all of whom sold short and all have been caught. They now ask that the shares shall be denied the usual settlements. To an Englishman this seems very absurd, but the rules and regulations of the Paris Bourse are truly marvellous. Fancy our Stock Exchange banning an industrial share because the dealings in it were enormous, and all one-sided!

Home Rails.—After the exciting days of last week this market has become almost dull. If the railway companies would agree to issue stock to bearer they would find that it would increase speculation and improve the price. This is a most important matter for all companies. They issue stock to shareholders or to stockbrokers at a shade under the market-price of the day, and every ten-point rise means a considerable sum to a railway company. The modern tendency is in favour of bearer stock. The whole world has long since decided in its favour. England alone prefers the antique and cumbersome registration with its tedious transfer. If English Railways issued bearer stock they would get an international market. The French have enormous sums of money to invest. They would buy Home Rails freely if they could buy "bearer" securities. At the moment the market looks weak, but if the reaction goes further all the best stocks should be bought. North Easterns are cheap. Brums and Great Westerns are cheap. Lancashire and Yorkshire are very cheap. We shall wonder in a year's time why we let the chance slip by. The rise has not yet begun.

Yankee Rails.—The Inter-State Commerce Commission completely upset the plans of the bankers, and strong as Morgans and Kuhn Loeb may be, they will find the new conditions of the market somewhat difficult. The actual position of many of the railroads will be seriously affected. For example, New York Central has spent many hundreds of thousands of dollars fighting for higher rates. It hoped that the decision would add at least $3,500,000 to its income. It has to find $1,500,000 to meet its additional fixed charges. Last year it got a slice of melon from the Lake Shore. Its operating income has only increased two per cent. during the last seven months, and the company needs $4,000,000 increase on the year if it is to maintain its dividend, pay its increased charges, and carry forward as much as a year ago. At the moment this does not appear likely. Other lines will be equally hurt by the decision. But perhaps there is something in Brandei's contention, that all the big lines can save if they choose. We shall see. In the meantime the market, though well supported by the big houses, all of whom have huge finance schemes on hand, looks dull, and it is hardly the moment to buy. Now that the Kuhn Loeb people have bought out Gould, the Missouri Pacific should be watched. But I am told that the bankers consider the price too high, and that they do not expect to get the line into proper shape for another two years.

Rubbers are the fashion again. The public came in suddenly at the end of last week, and this week there has been good buying from the Continent. Mincing Lane has hung on to its shares, and the Stock Exchange not possessing any supply, the result has been a very sharp rise. Anglo-Malay are talked much higher purely upon market manipulation. The sales have been good, as indeed every one expected. We now read tales of wealth that must accrue to all the companies through the increase in price. But I distrust calculations in the rubber market. I remember the last boom and the fanciful figures upon which men hoisted their favourite shares. Yet no one should be misled in rubber, for the companies themselves do not mislead us; indeed all the Malay companies are absolutely honest. Their directors and managers are over-cautious, and all that is official is reliable. They may well cry "Save us from our friends!" The price of raw rubber is rigged, but not by the Lane. It is manipulated from Para and Manaos. How long the Brazilians will be able to hold the price depends upon the strength of their finance. A rise of 2s. per lb. means, of course, increased dividends for all the plantations; but we must wait and see how long the price remains at its present figure. Those who follow the market should not add more than 1s. per lb. to the profits for the current year, but even this is worth considering. Again I say: Only the best! Do not touch any outside shows. Leave African rubber severely alone. No South American company is worth discussion; many of the Ceylon companies are dangerous; Java should be scanned with caution—interplanting has here interfered very much with the growth of the rubber. The Sumatra companies appear to me overvalued. We are evidently in for a good rise, and at the moment there is no stronger market in the House.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

OIL.—The event of the week has been the official announcement that Sir Marcus Samuel does not consider himself justified in floating the Gemsah Oil-fields. I have been over these fields and I agree with Sir Marcus. Twenty years ago I discussed the oil-field with Sir Elwyn Palmer, who had the foolish opinion that the reason he could not find oil was that the Standard Oil Company prevented him. This sounded very pretty, but was only nonsense. The reason he could not find a payable field at Jebel Zeit was that there was none to be found. Nevertheless, he spent twenty-five thousand pounds, and died a firm believer in the future of Egyptian oil. That there is oil all down the Red Sea everybody knows. But that is no reason why it should be profitable to work. I have again and again warned people not to gamble in Egyptian oil. We may eventually be able to say definitely that there is a payable oil-field, but up to the present it is all too vague, and, in my opinion, little better than a Stock Exchange gamble. Black Sea Oil-fields are to be put up, and there is wild talk as to the price. They seem a reasonable gamble.

RHODESIANS AND KAFFIRS.—I lump these two markets together for the plain reason that neither of them is to-day of sufficient importance to require a separate paragraph. The best Kaffirs now show 7 per cent. after allowing for amortisation, and some people consider that this is an attractive level. Personally, I would prefer to wait; but I am compelled to report that many good judges consider the market has bottomed, Rhodesians are out of favour, and the options on Chartered tend to keep the market down.

MISCELLANEOUS.—I again repeat my advice of last week to buy Whiteley's Preference and Ordinary, for the meeting is certain to have a good effect on the market. Harrods will make a success of their new issue, and no one deserves a success more, for this company is managed with meticulous care and remarkable judgment. Maple's meeting was a great success, and here again I must congratulate the Board upon its management.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

HARROD'S STORES

The twenty-first Annual General Meeting of Harrod's Stores, Ltd., was held on Tuesday, February 28, on the company's premises, Brompton-road, S.W. Sir Alfred J. Newton, Bart., chairman, said: Having regard to the important resolutions which later on will be submitted to you, I do not proposed to dissect the accounts in the usual lengthy manner. They are presented to you on the lines with which old shareholders are familiar, and they contain all the information to enable everybody interested in the company fully to understand the various items under the heading of working expenses, provision for depreciation, sinking funds in respect of leaseholds, fixtures, etc., reserves, and, finally, the distribution of the profit. I am very specially desirous of drawing attention to the pension funds. That for managers and buyers now stands at £8,776, which has been jointly built up by the members of that fund and by the company. To refer briefly to the figures, No. 1 account shows an increase of gross profits of £67,469, but a diminution of £3,502 from rents received and receivable. The difference is accounted for by the fact that we converted certain flats into business premises, and from them, of course, we no longer receive fixed rentals. The working expenses, consequent upon the largely increased business, show an increase of £31,765 for the year. If you will turn to the report, you will find that the profit balance to dispose of is £225,274, or £15,181 more than last year. (Applause.) The method of distribution is set forth, and before I submit the resolution to you I shall be pleased to answer any question on the report and balance-sheet which any shareholder may wish to put. Having disposed of any other formal business, we shall proceed to deal with the special resolutions. If there is any other matter arising out of the report and balance-sheet which any shareholder wishes to be enlightened upon I shall be pleased to answer his questions. I now formally move: "That the report and balance-sheet be received and adopted."

Mr. Edgar Cohen, seconding the resolution, said how extraordinary was the development and increase of this wonderful business of Harrod's Stores. Personally, he had never expressed any great surprise. He had known the Stores ever since the inception of the company.

The resolution was carried unanimously.

The appointment to the board of Mr. H. K. Newton, M.P., was confirmed, and the retiring directors, Mr. Edgar Cohen and Mr. William Mendel, were re-appointed, and the auditors, Messrs. Hays, Akers, and Hays, were re-elected.

The Chairman: I have now to invite your attention to the steps we propose to take to secure the further expansion of this great enterprise. You will notice the concluding paragraph in the report, which states: "The trade of the company for the past year has increased to a greater extent than during any year of the company's existence. To meet the pressing necessities of the continual development of the business the company have acquired the leasehold interest in the premises 25, 27, 29, 31, 33, and 35, Hans-road, and in the public-house at the corner of Hans-road, known as 'The Friend at Hand,' of which latter they have also acquired the freehold, thus completing an island block of four frontages, measuring 1,651ft., the principal frontage facing the Brompton-road being 444ft. To provide for rebuilding this new acquisition—partly freehold and long leasehold—to redeem the balance—£95,900—of outstanding debentures, to furnish the necessary funds for increased stocks, to replace sums already expended on capital account, and to strengthen the company's financial position the directors recommend that the capital of the company be increased by the creation of 140,000 new ordinary shares, to rank pari passu with the present 360,000 ordinary shares." You will understand that it is not a figure of speech to say "the pressing necessities of the continual development of the business of the company," when I inform you that the actual increase in the company's business last year was £283,285, an increase utterly unparalleled even in the magnificent history of Harrod's. After protracted and difficult negotiations with leaseholders and freeholders of the adjoining premises in Hans-road we have succeeded in acquiring the whole of the property, enabling us to complete the island site now in the possession of the company. The importance of this acquisition cannot be exaggerated. As soon as the buildings are completed, on which we are already employed, Harrod's will unquestionably form the most complete self-contained, spacious, and elegant premises for carrying on its widely-spread and ever-growing trade that any one of us here has any knowledge of. This is a theme, however, on which I need not dilate; the evidences are before you on every side of ever-growing increase and prosperity. A tour of inspection will well repay any shareholder who is not familiar with our business. He will see great extensions of many departments. For example, during the past year we have very largely extended the furs department, which we anticipate will become of the utmost importance. This has been brought about by our managing director—Mr. Richard Burbidge—having, with the unanimous consent and approval of the Directors, accepted the invitation to join the Board of the Hudson's Bay Company, between whom and Harrod's the most cordial relations exist—relations which, in the future, will undoubtedly be of considerable and lasting benefit to both companies. You, as shareholders, are associated with a business which is not dependent on the sale of articles which require incessant advertising, and the demand for which may disappear as quickly as it came into existence, but you are partners in a business which caters for the daily wants of an ever-increasing number of customers, whose requirements are met, I think I may fairly say, to their entire approval. Indeed, we often receive from customers spontaneous and voluntary assurances of satisfaction and admiration of the way in which their orders are executed, as to price, quality, and delivery. Briefly, then, we are all fully justified in looking forward to the future in a very hopeful spirit, and in expressing the belief that this business must continue to grow far beyond the highly satisfactory position already attained. Since the last issue of capital, nearly three years ago, which brought in a sum of £258,500 into the coffers of the company, our net profits have increased from £172,837 to £225,274—an increase of £52,437 a year in net profits; but during this time considerable sums have been expended out of our current resources on the acquisition of leasehold and freehold properties and on buildings, plant, and fixtures, although, of course, a large portion of this expenditure has not yet become productive. It has therefore become necessary to place our finances in an absolutely impregnable position, and to secure this the directors recommend the proposed creation of new ordinary shares. The proceeds of the contemplated issue would cause a saving to be effected of £5,000 a year in interest on the debentures which would be redeemed, and there would be a further considerable saving in bankers' interest. He concluded by moving the resolutions.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Mr. Burbidge, the managing director, in seconding the resolution, expressed every confidence in the future of the company.

The resolutions were carried unanimously.

CORRESPONDENCE

HARRISON AINSWORTH

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—All weight must naturally be attached to the words of Mr. Isidore G. Ascher as a contributor to the two magazines which Ainsworth owned and edited. His kind words concerning the review of Mr. S. M. Ellis's truly admirable work, "William Harrison Ainsworth and his Friends," are also on that account the more appreciated.

One of the two points Mr. Ascher makes is: "The inference which you have drawn that, because Ainsworth's romances are only read to-day by young people, therefore they are not in vogue and unpopular, to my mind is not quite correct." But the inference is entirely Mr. Ascher's own. The review speaks of Ainsworth's "romances, which had, it is true, a great temporary, almost accidental vogue, and have since permanently sunk to the level of books which can hardly be greatly enjoyed by any but boys and youths." This is very different from saying they are not in vogue and unpopular. There was no intention whatever, on the reviewer's part, to make so absurd an assertion as that the romances in question are unpopular. I do not believe the popularity of some of the earlier ones has ever flagged much; and, indeed, I have written in this sense elsewhere when dealing with boys' books.

The word "vogue," perhaps, misled Mr. Ascher. By it was meant popularity among grown-ups, persons of education and literary taste. "Vogue," I submit, is hardly the word that would properly apply to books for juveniles; but it would properly apply to "works of permanent literary value," between which and Ainsworth's output a distinction was made.

Like Mr. Ascher, I have been interested in the comparative popularity of the older story-tellers. Investigations in several London Public Libraries have led me to the conclusion—so far as it can be drawn from the number of copies available—that Ainsworth, whilst much less popular than Dickens, Thackeray, George Eliot and Charles Reade, has considerably more readers than, for instance, Trollope. But the difference in the readers!

When Mr. Ascher states that "the Manchester Public Library contains no less than 457 copies of his [Ainsworth's] works, which to-day find numerous readers," he might have added the reason had he wished—because he must know. Ainsworth was born at Manchester; his father and family were well-known there; in several of his novels he made Manchester the centre of interest; he was very fond of his native town and expressed his fondness in various ways. Ergo, the Mancastrians are fond of him—to the tune of 457 copies. The fact, however, remains that, out of his innumerable tales, only from twenty to thirty-five on an average find places in the London Public Libraries, and there are seldom more than one to three copies of each of these, compared with the four to eight of his contemporaries' books.

Incidentally Mr. Ascher makes the suggestive remarks: "There is always a vitality in books that fascinate the youthful intellect. What appeals to the young is generally universal. The young mind longs to see its own vigour and freshness mirrored in romance." No doubt. But is it not noteworthy how astonishingly few of such books survive even a few years? And how can that be called universal which appeals only to the young? Is it not the absence of the need for using one's brain in its perusal that is one of the chief distinctions between a story that is truly universal and permanent and what is mere meat for babes? The qualities of juvenile fiction are few and monotonous. There is a speedy limit to one's pleasure in reading of simple bodily vigour and action, especially when there is but little literary charm.

In his second point—"There is positively no foundation in your remark that Ainsworth in his latter years was ostracised"—Mr. Ascher seems again to be drawing his own inference. It is not mine. The review speaks of Ainsworth's "ostracism from the republic of letters"—which is, by a long way, not the same thing as ostracism unqualified; mentions that he was "long dead to the world;" that one day he woke up "to find himself out of fashion, gradually dropped by former friends;" that "he manfully accepted his banishment from further literary success." Mr. Ascher has out of all this, rather wilfully, if I may venture to say so, construed an assertion on my part that Ainsworth was socially ostracised; whereas what was obviously meant was ostracism from the republic of literature considered as an art. He fell out of the front rank, was quietly ignored after a time, as all persons of no future inevitably tend to be.

Certainly Ainsworth had little or no art-sense. He had no power of self-criticism, and, like Mr. Rudyard Kipling on a different plane, produced, and, worse still published, good, bad, and indifferent stuff pell-mell, without the least restraint. Alas! that Ainsworth's imaginative progeny was so numerous!

One must needs admire the portentous industry which enabled him to continue writing "almost to the end of his life," as Mr. Ascher observes he did; but it is not possible to admire at all most of the writing he poured out in his later period, even though "his last novels fetched prices which many a budding novelist of to-day would be proud to receive." What Ainsworth would receive for them, if he happened to be a budding novelist of to-day, is a far more pertinent question.

Anyhow, Mr. S. M. Ellis is to be heartily congratulated on his brave attempt to construct an ideal writer out of a first-rate character and a second-rate talent.

THE REVIEWER.

THE INFLUENCE OF WOMEN

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I am afraid that Miss E. Money Coutts did not quite understand my article on W. Lyon Blaese's "The Emancipation of Englishwomen." The fault is to be sought, doubtless, in my own obscurity, so, perhaps, it will be as well if I restate my argument in the briefest and clearest terms possible. The case as formulated by me was this: popular politics degrade all who meddle with them; therefore it would be a pity to degrade women by bringing them into the political cesspool, more especially as we owe reverence to womankind as the source and inspiration of all art.

Miss Money Coutts says that if politics be a degrading business, it is high time that politics should be elevated through the influence of those who have inscribed "beneath every masterpiece of the world the words femina fecit."

So if there is a hole in the pigstye, we are to cram a Raphael into the crack, because the Raphael is a source of inspiration to all men?

The argument is an odd one; especially when we consider that the Raphael would not stop the crack well and would be ruined in the process.

A cathedral may be a source of beauty and of inspiration to many; but that is no reason why we should smash it to bits and throw the débris into a peculiarly offensive morass with a view of smothering the stench. The stones that once bore the great mark of beauty would be swallowed up and the smell would remain.

I don't think that women have any genius whatever for romance, though they are the cause of romance in others; but even if they had genius in romance, in poetry, in painting, in sculpture, and in music, this would be no argument for giving them votes and the balance of political power. There is, I think, no reason to suppose that England would fare better than now if it were ruled by a committee chosen from the Authors' Society, the Royal Academies of Art and Music, and the Royal Institute of British Architects.

Miss Money Coutts says:—

> You cannot have it both ways. Either the collective force of women's influence makes for good in this world, or else they "poison, corrupt and destroy." Mr. Machen seems at one moment to fear this and at the next to affirm the exact contrary.

Here Miss Money Coutts has misquoted, or rather, distorted my remark, which ran:—

> It seems a pity to poison and corrupt and destroy the source of all beauty and every art with the driest, dreariest of all the delusions with which the wretched race of men has been afflicted, &c.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

This is quite a different matter. I expressed no fear of women's poisoning, I expressed a fear of their being poisoned.

ARTHUR MACHEN.

THE FAR-EASTERN SITUATION

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In your last week's issue Mr. Lancelot Lawton succeeded in painting about as black a picture of British enterprise in the Manchurian El Dorado as human pessimism could conceive. If we are to accept as final his version of the situation, then all that remains to be cultivated by the statesmen, the financiers, and the pioneers of industry in this country is a philosophic resignation to the inevitable abandonment of one of the most profitable fields for exploitation to be found in the whole world. We are told that the Chin-chan-Aigun Railway scheme is "dead and buried," and the obvious inference must be, to all who appreciate the true significance of the project in its relation to the whole question of the open-door policy, that all future developments of the same or a similar character are doomed to be stifled at birth. This in itself is a startling and a sweeping assumption. But more is to follow. Mr. Lawton admits us, so it would seem, to diplomatic secrets of undoubted gravity when he explains the manner in which negotiations have been carried on in the past between Japanese and British interests. From all the circumstances it would appear that behind the scenes there has been a remarkable conflict between the various parties who have sought a share in the development of Manchuria. I myself am not altogether unacquainted with certain important phases of the question, and I think that it is due to all who are interested in the future of China that Mr. Lawton, ignoring diplomatic subtleties, should present a plain statement of what is really happening in Manchuria.—Yours, &c.,

"FURLOUGH."

"WHO" OR "WHOM"?

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I might leave your two correspondents to fight their battle, but must point out to the second of them that quotation of a sentence in which "whom" is correct does not justify another in which it is incorrect.

"To whomsoever Antwerp might belong, it would be of value," is perfectly correct; but "Antwerp would be of value to whomever may be its sovereign" is most certainly incorrect. There is the same difference as between "whom I expected to go" and "whom I expected would go"; the first is right, the second wrong. I see no ellipsis in either sentence. Ellipsis occurs when words are omitted but understood, as when I say, "the horse I rode was a good one," which being mentally supplied.

There is an ellipsis when Browning's Pope says:—

> I can believe this dread machinery
> Of sin and sorrow, would confound me else,
> Devised . . . etc.

The full meaning is: "I can believe that this dread machinery of sin and sorrow—which otherwise would confound me—was devised for a particular purpose." But there is no similar ellipsis in either of the sentences about Antwerp. "Whomsoever" is merely another way of saying "him to whom," and "whoever" (not "whomever") of saying "him who." "Whomever may be" is like saying "him whom may be."

A well-known line in the "Ingoldsby Legends" runs:—

> Regardless of grammar, they all cried "that's him."

Are we now to understand that the exclamation was grammatically correct as well as colloquially admissible because "that's him" is elliptical for "that is he of whom I spoke"?

In case any one thinks this criticism pedantic, let me observe that the pedantry is on the other side. In conversation we use "who" even when "whom" would be strictly required. When "whom" is printed it is in supposed allegiance to grammar. But when "Maradick at Forty" (p. 68) gives us "He doesn't seem to mind very much whom it is," or "The Silent Isle" (p. 206) has "whom I gather is a graceful writer," propriety is doubly outraged, since the sentences are at once pedantic and incorrect. I had imagined such slips due to printers; if authors are responsible, so much the worse for them.

Authors are, I fear, responsible for many solecisms that appear in contemporary books. One of the worst of these is "between you and I." Similarly the author of "First and Last Things" (Book IV., § 4) can write, "For he who has faith, death has no terror." And even Mr. Clodd could write, in the first number of T.P.'s Magazine, "There came an invitation to Allen and I." Is ignorance of elementary rules considered desirable nowadays? I expect next to be assured that there is nothing ungrammatical in the sentence with which I, again, apologetically subscribe this letter.

"THEM'S MY SENTIMENTS."

"FROM GREENLAND'S ICY MOUNTAINS"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Your correspondent's protest, though natural, may give a false impression as to fact. The hymn "From Greenland's Icy Mountains" was written by Heber in England some years before he went to India. In the posthumously published collection of his hymns "Ceylon's isle" was altered to "Java's isle," doubtless because he had discovered how the former name should be pronounced. For some reason, however, this collection has not found favour; most hymn-books still read "Ceylon's isle," compelling us to accentuate the first instead of the second syllable of the name.

T. S. O.

CARLYLE AND MR. FRANK HARRIS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I do not think it necessary to suppose that by work Carlyle meant a political appointment or place. I used to take Sunday afternoon walks with Carlyle, but I kept no memo of anything he said. I never remember his speaking of Parliament with anything but contempt, and certainly not that he desired place. I never regarded Carlyle as a philosopher, and I do not think him one now. His memory was splendid even then. I always thought him a Velazquez for a gallery of biographical figures, not a thinker on anything.

C. A. WARD.

Walthamstow.

BOOKS RECEIVED

FICTION

Following Feet. By E. Charles Vivian. Andrew Melrose. 6s.

The Kestrel. By Reginald E. Salwey. Digby, Long and Co. 6s.

Mothers and Fathers. By Mrs. Maxwell Armfield (Constance Smedley). Chatto and Windus. 6s.

A Little More than Kin. By Patricia Wentworth. Andrew Melrose 6s.

The Leach. By Mrs. Harold E. Gorst. Mills and Boon. 6s.

Captain Sentimental, and Other Stories. By Edgar Jepson. Mills and Boon. 6s.

The Green Curve, and Other Stories. By Ole Luk-Oie. William Blackwood and Sons. 1s. net.

Bardelys the Magnificent. By Rafael Sabbatini. Stanley Paul and Co. 1s. net.

The Lady of the Bungalow. By E. Everett-Green. Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.

Some Neighbours: Stories, Sketches, and Studies. By Charles Granville. C. W. Daniel. 6s.

Oil of Spikenard. By E. M. Smith-Dampier. Andrew Melrose. 6s.

Perpetua; or, the Way to Treat a Woman. By Dion Clayton Calthrop. Alston Rivers. 6s.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

MISCELLANEOUS

Appreciations and Criticisms of the Works of Charles Dickens. By G. K. Chesterton. Illustrated. J. M. Dent and Sons. 7s. 6d. net.

The Doctor's Dilemma, Getting Married, and The Showing-up of Blanco Posnet. By Bernard Shaw. Constable and Co. 6s.

Print Restoration and Picture Cleaning. By Maurice James Gunn. Illustrated. L. Upcott Gill. 6s. 6d. net.

Transactions and Proceedings of the Japan Society, London. Vol. IX. Nineteenth Session, 1909-1910. Part I. Illustrated. Kegan Paul and Co. Price to Non-Members, 10s.

Norwegian and Other Fish-Tales. By Bradnock Hall. Illustrated. Smith, Elder and Co. 5s. net.

The American House of Lords. Supreme Court Usurpation. By Morrison I. Swift. Supreme Court Reform League, Boston. U.S.A. 5 cents.

Vid Rhodesia: A Journey through Southern Africa. By Charlotte Mansfield. Illustrated. Stanley Paul and Co. 16s. net.

Shelburne Essays. By Paul Elmer More. G. P. Putnam's Sons 5s. net.

Letters from Fleet Street. Frank Palmer. 5s. net.

Studies in Language and Literature in Celebration of the Seventieth Birthday of James Morgan Hart, Professor in Cornell University. Henry Holt and Co., New York.

The Origin of Life: Being an Account of Experiments with Certain Superheated Saline Solutions in Hermetically Sealed Vessels. By H. Charlton Bastian, M.D., F.R.S. Illustrated. Watts and Co. 3s. 6d. net.

Aphorisms and Reflections from the Works of Thomas Henry Huxley. Selected by Henrietta A. Huxley. Watts and Co. 6d.

Saitō Musashi-Bō Benkei. (Tales of the Wars of the Gempei.) By James S. de Benneville. Two Vols. Illustrated. Swan Sonnenschein and Co. 16s. net.

THEOLOGY

Egypt and Israel: an Inquiry into the Influence of the More Ancient People upon Hebrew History and the Jewish Religion. And some Investigations into the Facts and Statements Made as to Jesus of Nazareth. By Willis Brewer. Illustrated. The Torch Press, Cedar Rapids, Iowa, U.S.A. $2 net.

The Onward Cry, and Other Sermons. By the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke. Portrait. Duckworth and Co. 6s. net.

The Book of Micah. A New Metrical Translation, with Restoration of the Hebrew Text and Explanatory and Critical Notes. By Paul Haupt, LL.D. University of Chicago Press, Chicago, Ill., U.S.A. $1.

The Book of Esther. Critical Edition of the Hebrew Text with Notes. By Paul Haupt, LL.D. University of Chicago Press, Chicago, Ill., U.S.A. $1.

The Authorised Version of the Bible and its Influence. By Albert S. Cook. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 3s. 6d.

EDUCATIONAL

The Nations of the Modern World: an Elementary Study in Geography. By H. J. Mackinder, M.A. Illustrated. George Philip and Son. 2s.

England's Need in Education: a Suggested Remedy. By Joseph S. Knowlson. A. C. Fifield. 3s. 6d. net.

Vocal Science and Art: being Hints on the Production of Musical Tone. By the Rev. Charles Gib. With an Introduction, Notes, and Diagrams by J. F. Halls Dally, M.A., M.D. Illustrated. William Reeves. 3s. 6d.

A Class-Book of Chemistry. By G. C. Donington, M.A. Macmillan and Co. 3s. 6d.

Manuel de Critique Verbale appliquée aux Textes Latins. By Louis Havet, Membre de l'Institut. Hachette and Co., Paris and London.

Roman Britain. By Edward Conybeare. Second Edition, Revised. With Map. S.P.C.K. 3s. 6d.

English History Illustrated from Original Sources: from the Earliest Times to 1066. By Sara Melhuish, M.A. Vict. A. and C. Black. 2s. 6d.

The British Isles: Geographical Diagrams and Land Forms, with Questions, Statistics, and Tables. By H. J. Snape, M.A. A. and C. Black. 1s. 6d.

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND MEMOIRS

Diary of a Refugee. Edited by Frances Fearn. Illustrated by Rosalie Urquhart. Moffat, Yard, and Co., New York. $1.25 net.

Sir William Butler; an Autobiography. By Lieut.-General the Right Hon. Sir W. F. Butler, G.C.B. With Portraits and Maps. Constable and Co. 16s. net.

VERSE

Baldur the Beautiful. By Grace Denio Litchfield. G. B. Putnam's Sons. 3s. 6d. net.

The Moonlight Sonata and Other Verses. By M. A. B. Evans. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 5s. net.

Wild Flowers. A Book of Verse. By Reginald Rogers. John Ouseley. 2s. 6d. net.

The Off-Wheeler. Ballads and other Verses. By "Mome." John Ouseley. 2s. 6d. net.

PERIODICALS

Fortnightly Review; Windsor Magazine; Papyrus; Popular Magazine; Revue Bleue; Literary Digest; Bookseller; Publishers' Circular; The Triad; Good Health; Tourist Magazine; Ainslie's Magazine; Girl's Own Paper and Woman's Magazine; Boy's Own Paper; Sunday at Home; Friendly Greetings; Everybody's Story Magazine; St. Nicholas; English Review; Nineteenth Century; Harper's Monthly Magazine; Blackwood's Magazine.

SAARBURG MOSELLE
GUTTA CONTRA GOUTTE

THE SAARBURG MOSELLE Co.
LIMITED

London Office:
28, KING STREET, ST. JAMES', S.W.

Cellars:
TRIER A/D MOSEL AND GEISENHEIM

Speciality
STILL AND SPARKLING SAARBURG MOSELLES

The Moselle Wines are grown on a dry, sandy soil: contrary to Clarets and Hocks, which are grown on chalk or slate. Therefore this Wine is recommended by the Medical Profession specially to those subject to Gout, and consequently forbidden to drink other Wines.

We can specially recommend the three following Wines: "White Label," "Mauve Label," and "Green Label," which are now in very fine condition.

Samples and Price List on application.

Supplied to all First-class Hotels and Restaurants.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE & BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC

OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO AND . . THROUGH CANADA. . .

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service vid Vancouver.

For further particulars, apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,

62-65, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON, E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street, Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE

TO

SOUTH and EAST AFRICA.

WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.

Viâ the SUEZ CANAL.

Calling at MARSEILLES and NAPLES.

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.

(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—

DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.

Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE PLEASURE CRUISES

LIVERPOOL

to the

MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC

by the

"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"

. . . Ports of Call . . .

CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS, MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA, ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME, ——PALERMO, NAPLES,——

• • •

For full particulars apply—

THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

George Odell,

31, KING STREET, ST. JAMES'. LONDON, S.W.

Ophthalmic and Mathematical Optician

Inventor of the Porter-Odell Patent Lens.

SPECTACLES AND EYEGLASSES

made to the individual facial measurements, thereby assuring accuracy and comfort. To enable the fitting of the innumerable variety of faces my different patterns have already run into the hundreds.

LORGNETTES in Gold, Metal and Tortoiseshell.

BAROMETERS. THERMOMETERS.

FIELD AND OPERA GLASSES.

The ODELL LUMEX PRISM BINOCULAR

pronounced by Naval and Military Officers to be the best (see testimonials).

P & O Passenger Services.

EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA, JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports

(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)

Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises

Throughout the Year, according to Season.

AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE, NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.

Programme on Application.

For Passage, Freight and all information apply—

PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,

122 Leadenhall Street, E.C., or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours

R.M.S.P. THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY.

(Royal Charter dated 1839.)

Fortnightly Sailings from Southampton to—

ARGENTINA & BRAZIL

via SPAIN & PORTUGAL.

WEST INDIES, BRITISH GUIANA, SPANISH MAIN, CENTRAL AMERICA, NEW YORK.

From LONDON to—

MOROCCO & CANARY ISLANDS,

EGYPT, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA & JAPAN.

(By Shire Line.)

For further particulars apply to

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY

18, Moorgate Street, E.C., & 32, Cockspur Street, S.W.

Printed and Published for the Proprietor by ODHAMS LTD., 25, Floral Street, Covent Garden, and 67, Long Acre, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE

No. 2027 [Registered as a Newspaper.] MARCH 11, 1911 PRICE THREEPENCE

CARNEGIE LIBRARY, THE PA. STATE COLLEGE STATE COLLEGE

THE ECONOMICAL

Sheffield Simplex

AN EXAMPLE.

Running Costs for One Year, covering 9,279 miles, at Half the Cost of a Taxi-cab.

Read the following from the owner of a luxurious 45h.p. 6-cylinder "SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX" Cabriolet Car :—

Northampton, January 29th, 1911.

"By the 1st February I shall have had my car 12 months. The distance I have run is 9,279 miles, and the cost 4·4d. per mile."

"SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX" are strikingly simple in design, exceptionally sound in mechanical principles, with which is combined the finest possible workmanship AND SPECIALLY CREATED SHEFFIELD STEELS.

MADE IN TWO SIZES—25h.p. and 45h.p.—BOTH 6 CYLINDERS.

Catalogues post-free on application to Dept. "A."

The SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX MOTOR WORKS, Ltd.

TINSLEY, SHEFFIELD.

London Depot: c/o MULLINERS, 132-135, LONG ACRE, W.C.

SCOTLAND :—Middleton & Townsend, 56, Belford Road, Edinburgh.
LANCASHIRE and CHESHIRE :—The Hollingdrake Automobile Co., Stockport.
SOUTH WALES :—George Ace, Ltd., Warren Street, Tenby.
AUSTRALIA :—Murray Aunger, Ltd., Adelaide, S.A. Moulder Brothers, Sydney, N.S.W.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

THE BIRTH

What time the pale moon slowly gathered light
And beamed with loveliness through bower and lane;
And countless stars in her resplendent train
Bedecked the trailing robes of odorous night;
When creeping vines sent forth their tendrils slight
To twine the stiffened trunk with leafy chain,
And Springtime northward pushed his flowery reign
Where happy nestlings spread their wings for flight,
Then Love was born, and with his dimpled hand
Reared his sweet empire in the human heart.
No tramp of armies sounded in the land,
No courts of justice gleamed with studied art,
But near his throne, a ministering sister-band,
Stood Peace and Sympathy and Joy apart.

W. F. P.

Cleveland, Ohio.

GOVERNMENT BY OVERSTRAIN

THE now constantly occurring physical failure of statesmen and politicians furnishes cause for thought. The interests of the State are entitled to primary consideration. We have had a long and close intimacy with political life, and we have observed phases varying with the methods of the times.

To go back still further, we easily gather from history that the triumphs of the Pitts were brought about in an atmosphere alien to that in which Ministers are now expected to conserve the vital interests of the Empire. Chatham could not have undergone the soul-destroying babble of Hyde Park orators pitchforked into the forum of the nation. In the quietude of his retreat at Hampstead he pondered on the needs of the nation, and was enabled to prescribe the measures essential to its salvation. At the last, when storm and stress could no longer be avoided, he expired in the gilded chamber expounding the policy which, if it had prevailed, would have consolidated an English-speaking Empire which would have dominated the world. Pitt, the son, brought about his wonderful European combinations which culminated in the overthrow of Napoleon, in an atmosphere of comparative tranquillity. Palmerston was in no sense a political cheap-jack, although towards the latter part of his career the tendency of politics had notably deteriorated. Disraeli, although burdened with long and mostly futile attendances in the House of Commons, had nothing of the demagogue about him, and his appearances on public platforms were few. Gladstone, less wise than Bright, was continually talking, with the result that what he said, and frequently what he did, was of very little value. In his first campaign in Midlothian he poured forth language which the Times could not report in less than forty-seven columns. We read the effusions to the lasting detriment of our eyesight and equanimity. If Mr. Balfour's half-sheet had been large enough it would have contained all the points which were of any value. If the copia verborum is to be the criterion of statesmanship, we are rather disposed to despair of the Republic.

Public utility and personal fitness are, we contend—perhaps it is a truism—interdependent. How is personal fitness to be preserved in an atmosphere of constant storm and ceaseless activity? Non tendit semper arcum Apollo. The nerves are laid waste, the brain snaps. The truth at last emerges. National interests and all that they involve have been entrusted to the safe-keeping of a broken man.

The exhibitions of petulance, the absence of restraint in language, the violent, foolish, and untutored excursions in legislation are, we find, not referable to malignity, but to overtaxed and failing powers. The care of an Empire, the administration of vast dependencies are entrusted to men who are on the verge of collapse. Is this a sane system? Is it not paltering with the heritage of generations to come? We see no possible answers but a negative answer to the first question, and an affirmative to the second. If the conclusion be conceded, should not remedial measures follow? We think so, and yet we have lately observed Mr. Belloc and Mr. Cecil Chesterton recommending changes which would intensify a hundredfold the evils to which we have pointed. We contend that more detachment, more leisure, less nerve-strain are essential for those whose responsibilities are national; that we should realise that we must cease to give to party what was meant for mankind.

Recall the decadence of the late Lord Salisbury, after a few years of the attempt to combine the offices of Prime Minister and Foreign Secretary and Leader of the House of Lords. Remember the collapse of Mr. Chamberlain, who, after incurring the responsibility of and mainly controlling a great war, worn with service in the House of Commons, undertook to convert the country to the fiscal system which he advocated. We cannot forget—it is too recent and too tragic—the fate of Lord Crewe.

To measure accurately the disasters and devastation of the House of Commons system alone we ought to compile a list of those of the rank-and-file who have gone under beneath the wrack of the most inane system of self-advertisement which has ever obtained. All-night sittings, constant autumn sessions, frequent General Elections—tension all. Where is to be found the individual possessing a digestive system, a nervous system, and vital energy equal to the strain?

We hold strongly that a remedy must be found in order that the service of the State may be efficiently performed. The English nation is fond of specious shams, but it cannot afford to accept the risks of being governed by men whose physical powers are strained to breaking-point.

CECIL COWPER.

THE ECONOMICS OF PREFERENCE

I.

STATES, even when international commerce is on a small scale, have always tended towards a certain economic policy. In the great majority of cases they have not only tended to that policy, but they have fully adopted it. The policy in question may be defined as follows: Freedom of exchange within the boundaries of the State coupled with a system of tolls levied on its frontiers.

We first note the phenomenon as a matter of history. Upon what kind of reasoning or economic instinct it is based we will discuss in a moment, but as a fact or happening the phenomenon is there.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

A city, when cities regarded themselves as autonomous, and attempted the highest degree of independence, permitted complete freedom of exchange within its walls, but levied a toll upon aliens desiring to enter its market. When a number of cities and countrysides merged into one great State centrally governed, the central government looked with jealousy upon these local tolls and ultimately caused them to disappear. It did not do so because universal freedom of exchange with all mankind was conceived of as the best economic principle, but because the conception of certain interests as alien or foreign had ceased to apply to cities within the boundary of the State, and had come to be applied only to producers and merchants foreign to the State and external to its boundaries.

The only example our race affords of a universal State—the Roman Empire—permitted what was in practicc free exchange everywhere throughout the civilised world; but then Rome would not admit that any part of the civilised world was free from the political control of its central Government. In periods of history when an exactly opposite condition of society prevailed, and when small territories were jealous of their independence, the areas over which complete freedom of exchange prevailed were proportionally restricted. As, during the last three centuries, the great modern States developed, exactly the same phenomenon reappeared. The United States are an excellent example. Here is polity created by a particular instrument and at a particular date. It is a federal polity in which the largest liberty was left by its original instrument to the various units of the commonwealth. And yet no toll might be levied by any one of these units against any one of the others, and the only tariff permitted by the Constitution was a tariff levied upon the international frontiers which surrounded and contained the whole federal body. Such a tariff was permitted, existed, and, as we know, has recently rapidly developed.

In the French Monarchy, a polity of very slow growth and not created by any one instrument at any one time, the tariffs of province against province lingered long; but as the nation became one such internal tariffs were more and more suspected, and at last, when complete unity was achieved at the end of the eighteenth century, they were swept away. The consistent political plan which produced the modern German Empire worked on the same lines, and, what is interesting, economic unity in this case actually preceded political unity.

It is, then, a fixed historical law that freedom of exchange within one realm is sought after, desired, and sooner or later achieved. It is a further fixed historical law that complete freedom of exchange over the frontiers of a realm has never been thought normal, and has, perhaps, never been attempted.

Here it is well to point out that the tariff levied at the frontier of the realm may have many and varied objects. It may be levied merely as a convenient form of indirect taxation; it may be levied to affect adversely the economic life of a political rival; it may be levied to foster internal industry; or it may be levied with a moral object, such as the prevention of the consumption by the inhabitants of some foreign substance, which consumption the State regards as an evil to be checked and reduced. The tariff may be based upon one or upon all of these principles: the point is that it always exists.

The Dutch, the Belgians and the English to-day (to quote three great commercial communities each largely dependent upon international commerce, and each very wealthy through its agency) have each adopted low tariffs, and in the case of one of them, the English, a special economic theory has been acted upon for a lifetime, by which no tariff may be raised for any purpose of fostering internal industry (though a tariff for revenue, and even to some extent framed with political objects, has been permitted).

Other countries, especially since the vast development of modern international commerce, have erected tariffs at the frontier with the special object of developing internal production, and of these the French and American republics and the German Empire are the most conspicuous and the most successful examples.

But whatever contrast we discover between the types of tariff erected at the frontiers of a State, the rule prevails to-day, as it has prevailed throughout history, that commercial exchange between the citizens of a State dwelling within its boundaries tends to be and usually is free, while foreign exchanges conducted with aliens over the frontiers of the State tends to be and always is in some way controlled, canalised and mechanically interfered with.

Now, having noted that historical phenomenon, let us see upon what economic reason it was based.

Men do not universally act in a certain fashion without some reason. The reason may not have been thought out, it may have been largely instinctive, but it must have been there; and when we seek for it we shall usually be able, if we examine closely enough, to analyse and to define it. It is not impossible to analyse and to define the reason that States have always had for erecting economic barriers on their frontiers and destroying them within.

Let us consider two owners (private individuals or corporations) possessed each of an article which has come to him either by his power of production or in any other fashion, and let the circumstances of the two owners be such that it will be of mutual advantage to them if they exchange each a portion of his goods against a portion of the other's.

A has iron ore, let us say, plenty of it; but no coal, or very little. B has coal, plenty of it; but no iron ore, or very little. Both A and B are acquainted with the use of iron, and the art by which men smelt iron, consuming for this purpose coal. One way or another, whichever of the two, A or B, goes in for smelting the iron, or even if both of them do there is a reason why they should exchange their goods; exhanging their goods will make each of them richer. If A had no coal and B no iron ore at all, and they did not exchange, the use of iron would be impossible to both. If A had a little coal and B a little iron ore, each could with great difficulty on a small scale, and therefore in insufficient amount and at a higher cost, provide himself with iron. But if there is no artificial restriction between A and B, and if each is acquainted with the other's economic advantage, full and free exchange will take place, and the maximum amount of iron producible by A and B and consumable by them will be smelted and converted to human puposes.

Now consider C, a third party. C has plenty of coal, and his coal is nearer the surface or nearer the sea, or nearer some other good means of communication, or for any other reason can be obtained by A more easily than can the coal of B. Or again, A is so much nearer C, or the communications between them are so much better, that C, if it is he who is going to smelt the iron, can give better terms in coal to A than B can. The advent of this third party, C, is obviously a bad business for B. C will command the market. The advantages that C commands compel poor B to put his coal at a lower price than he would otherwise have to do. If he wants A to take any of it he can only ask in exchange of A's iron ore as much as C is asking. If A, B, and C all belong to one political community, the attitude of the Government must be something like this: "I am very sorry for B, but it is my business to keep order and equity between all the citizens of my State, and by allowing free exchange between A, B, and C, by forbidding B, for instance, to attack C or to shut down his collieries by force, I shall permit the creation of the maximum amount of wealth in the shape of iron of which the community is capable. B may be a little poorer in future through the advent of C into the scheme, but A, B, and C, all taken together, will have more iron, the State as a whole will be richer, and that is the only thing I have to concern myself about."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

In general, the attitude of Government is this: "Free exchange within any given area tends to increase to a maximum the wealth produced and enjoyable within that area. I, the Government, am responsible for the well-being of a particular area, and within that area I insist upon free exchange, that the well-being of the whole may tend to its maximum and may not be restricted."

It would be a very pleasant thing, for instance, for the port of Havre if its town council had the power to pass a law that the port of Cherbourg should in future be forbidden to import goods. But the French Government cannot allow such partiality. It is not there to make Havre richer at the expense of Cherbourg, but to keep equity between the two, which are both subject to it, and to see that the maximum amount of commerce reaches all its ports in general. The East Coast route to Scotland would find it convenient no doubt were its directors permitted in their by-laws to forbid competition on the part of the West Coast route; but the English Government does not exist for the purpose of benefiting either railway. It exists for the purpose of keeping equity and order between the two, which are both subject to it, and for seeing that the greatest amount of facile communication and all that goes with facile communication shall exist within the area which it controls.

So much for the case when C is a fellow-subject of B and of A. But now suppose C, with his special advantage in coal over B, to be an alien; then, obviously, a totally new problem arises, and it is a misapprehension of the elements of that problem which has confused not only orthodox Free Traders, but their opponents as well, in numberless controversies.

Note first that if C is an alien the Government cannot give the reply we have just seen above: it cannot say, "I am here to hold the balance equal between A, B, and C, and my business is to see to it not that one of the three shall have an advantage, but that all three considered together shall have between them the maximum amount of wealth." If C is an alien the Government can make no such reply; it is not the Government of the human race, it is the Government of the country of A and B. The interests of C are at the best indifferent to it, and at the worst hostile.

Let us suppose under the circumstances that B, complaining to his Government of the loss of wealth which he suffers from the competition of C, that Government makes up its mind to tax C's coal so that it comes into the country handicapped, and B is able in future to make his old terms with A. B can then go to A and say: "As long as C's coal came in free it had such advantages over mine that for every ton of coal I sent you I could only claim two measures of iron ore in place of the three which I used to be able to get before from you. But now that C is carrying a handicap the old terms are restored, and you will have to give me three measures of ore in future for my one ton of coal."

A sees that the market is as B says, and it makes him grumble. He goes to the Government and says: "Look here! By your action in keeping out the coal of C you have made me poorer, and at the same time you have hurt poor C, with whom I used to do trade." To this the Government must answer, if it does its duty:

"I care nothing about C. I am sorry that my consideration for the whole community, controlling as it does my care for any one section of it, has affected you adversely; but I find that the advantage B receives under the new arrangement is superior to the disadvantage which you suffer. The total wealth producible between you is greater than it was in the days when I allowed the foreigner, C, to send in his coal without interference, and it is the total wealth that I have to look after, not the particular wealth of one of my subjects. Therefore, my dear A, though my policy compels me to make you a poorer man, as it compels me to make B a richer man, I do not do that with the object of controlling your respective fortunes, but only in order that your combined fortune, that is the total wealth of the State, may be greater than it was before. As for C, I am quite indifferent to his fate. I am not here to foster the interest of the human race, but of my subjects."

When the case is so put one might imagine that the orthodox Free Trade economist had no case against it; but he has a case, and a strong one. His case is strong not only in theory, but in practice, for many a State has grown rapidly in wealth by admitting a freedom of exchange with the foreigner almost as untrammelled as between its own subjects.

The error of the old Free Trade school was not a general one—that existing theories and their application were not necessarily wrong; its error lay in the affirmation it made that its theory and the application of it were universal, and this we shall proceed to show in the next article.

EUGÈNE FROMENTIN: THE PAINTER-WRITER

By Frank Harris

How rare are the masters in two arts! One hears much talk of the sonnets of Michelangelo, but as soon as one reads the wooden verses one realises that he was anything but a singer. Of course he was a master in sculpture as in painting; but sculpture and painting are sister-arts almost as closely allied as prose and poetry. Da Vinci, too, took the whole field of human knowledge for his domain, but his masterpieces are all paintings, and his writings are little more than teaching of the art he had made his own. The same criticism applies to the "Discourses" of Reynolds, the letters of Poussin, and the review-articles of Delacroix; they are all interesting; now and then even they reveal the personality of the writer; but they are too directly instructive to belong to literature.

Taken strictly, we have only Rossetti in England and Fromentin in France who show that it is possible for a man to do first-rate work both in letters and in painting. Of these two Rossetti was far the more richly-endowed nature, the more gifted genius; but just because he reached greatness in both arts very easily he is not so interesting as Fromentin to the student. Fromentin is more self-conscious; his achievement more wilful; he deliberately defines both arts and outlines their respective spheres; and while as a painter he never reminds you of the man of letters, as a writer he never uses the brush instead of the pen. I cannot help thinking that Rossetti was by nature rather a painter than a writer. There is vision in him rather than thought; the souls fleet past "The Blessed Damozel" like "thin flames." While Fromentin is rather a writer than a painter, his finest essence is of the mind, and not of the eye.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Before speaking of his work let me tell something of his life. His father, who was a doctor at La Rochelle, had lived in Paris and gone about a great deal with painters. Throughout his life he took more interest in the brush than in the lancet. But he had no idea of encouraging his son to become an artist, in spite of the youth's manifest liking for both poetry and painting. He sent young Eugène first to the College of La Rochelle, and then to Paris to study law. Eugène passed his examinations easily enough, but in 1844 (having at length won the reluctant consent of his father) he threw up the law finally, and entered the studio of Rémond, a landscape-painter of the academic type.

In 1852, when thirty-two years of age, he married, and spent a year or so in Algeria. In 1856 he published "Un Été dans le Sahara," and in 1858 "Une Année dans le Sahel" appeared in the "Revue des Deux Mondes..'

Both these books troubled the higher literary circles of Paris for something more than the usual nine days. They did not belong to the school of realistic description which had been founded by Balzac and was destined to hold the field for the next half-century. They were looked upon indeed as a sort of protest against the realistic method. Balzac, like Gautier, and like Zola and Flaubert afterwards, got his effects partly by analysis and partly by using new words. First of all he detailed the features one after the other of the man or scene he wished to picture, and then strove to render the effect by some striking and uncommon word. But the eye does not act in this way; the eye sees the whole first, an expression or an effect, and afterwards notices the particular features which combine to give the effect. In his Preface to the "Sahara" Fromentin puts the new faith clearly:—

> The writing up of my travel notes (he says) a long time after the experiences, did me good service. First of all the lapse of time forced me to seek for truth rather than exactness, and a likeness instead of a copy. . . .

"Exactitude," he affirms, "is almost a negligible quality in such a work of art. Sincerity is the first requisite and then a little imagination, provided always that memory has had time to play the artist by selecting the chief incidents, and putting them in highest relief while neglecting insignificant details."

As one might expect from such a careful yet bold critic, Fromentin's two books of travel and description are masterpieces of their kind. No one has caught and rendered in words the characteristic beauty of the desert, the charm of its vast spaces of sky and plain, as perfectly as he has done. These books of his stand alone even in French descriptive writing.

About the same time Fromentin came to his own as a painter. He always regretted his want of early instruction in this art. "His craftsmanship," he used to say, "was not equal to his conceptions;" but, as he was in love with the ideal and an indefatigable workman, his complaint appears rather to be founded in the nature of things. In point of fact his earliest successes were won as a painter; in 1847 he showed his first picture in the Salon; in 1849 an Algerian scene gained him a medal; in 1853 his talent is already in full flower. In the course of the next twenty years he produced a dozen pictures which have a place in French art. Among his best things are the "Chasse au Héron" of 1865, which was bought by the Duc D'Aumale, and his famous "Tribu en Marche dans le Tell." In the Universal Exposition of 1867 he was acclaimed as one of the masters, and several of his canvasses were bought for the Luxembourg. But his field in painting, as in letters, was limited to Algeria. In vain he travelled in Italy and Egypt, and brought back scenes from Venice and views of the Nile: he stands as the painter of Algeria and the great desert. We find the same method and the same unique charm in his pictures, whether in colours or in words. The immensity of the desert, in which man is but an incident, filled Fromentin with emotion, and this genuine thrill he is able to communicate to us.

There is no seeking after rhetorical effect in his work, no trace of mannerism or trick; in both arts he has the sincerity, the vision, the emotion of a master.

Again and again in Fromentin's life, as in his work, we are struck with proof upon proof of high intelligence. Not only does he understand the respective spheres of the two arts of painting and writing, but he knows his own powers as well, and his own limitations. He gives us two volumes of descriptive writing and not a word more; he gives a dozen masterly pictures, and hardly a poor or mistaken canvas. Now in the full midday of his powers, at the apogee of his singular and discreet renown, he enters a new field and dares a strange adventure. In 1862 the Revue des Deux Mondes published his novel "Dominique." It was written at Fontainebleau in six weeks, he tells us; but the period of gestation had been long, and the ease or difficulty of the birth is relatively unimportant. There is no trace of haste in the conception or in the writing—on the contrary, indeed. Yet "Dominique" fell flat—hardly a hint of praise anywhere.

A contemporary assures us that Fromentin used to tell how they discussed in the Revue whether they should go on with the publication to the end or cut it short and thus acknowledge defeat. And when published in book form "Dominique" had no better fortune. No one in the Press had a word to say in its favour, except Scherer. It had the honour of being condemned root and branch in an article by Sainte-Beuve. Was it, then, worthless or a masterpiece? Sainte-Beuve, we know, had an unhappy trick of marking his own limitations by sneering at his betters. Was "Dominique" then above his head, or had Fromentin, in spite of his high intelligence and his almost uncanny power of seeing himself from the outside, taken at length a wrong turning and misused his own talent? I should like, of course, to proclaim a masterpiece. It hurts me even to hesitate for a moment or to appear to side with the Sainte-Beuves and the journalists against a creative spirit like Fromentin, to whom I owe many hours of exquisite and unalloyed delight. And, thank goodness, I am not compelled to in this instance. If "Dominique" is not a masterpiece, it certainly is not a failure, much less "an inept mistake." There are a couple of secondary characters in it which remain in the memory; the love-interest in it is unique and personal; there are descriptions of singular charm; but—I break off because I should have to spend much ink in order to describe "Dominique" as it deserves and classify it properly. One thing, however, must be said for it: it is of capital importance to any one who wishes to understand Fromentin or measure his talent; for he has painted himself in it to the life, giving us his temperament in "Dominique" and his character in Augustin. But the two halves don't make a whole: the writer has told us at once too much and too little.

I must give just one passage from his description of

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Dominique, in which I feel certain Fromentin has painted himself. He notes:—

> A resolute concentration of mind, and intense and prolonged observation of himself and his mental growth; the instinct to rise higher and higher careless of cost and to win self-governance while keeping the memory of every successive transformation of spirit; the passion of love and its expression in poetry and artistic aspiration, and, finally, the calm which settled down on this stormy spirit, too ambitious, perhaps, and of a certainty too devoted to impossible ideals.

"Dominique," as I have said, is Fromentin's confession, and because he is a fixed star in the firmament of French letters, it will yet be appreciated far beyond its intrinsic merit as a work of art; though to me it almost proves that had he given himself wholly to this art, Fromentin might have written a great novel.

I now come to his masterpiece. In 1874 Fromentin made a long stay in Belgium and Holland, and in '75 he published a book of criticism on the Dutch and Flemish masters under the title "Les Maîtres d'autrefois." I need say little about this book; it is the best criticism of painting and painters in any language—unique and singular; above discussion or praise; to be accepted by all with gratitude. I must just take one brick to show the wonder of the building:—

> The aim of Dutch painting (he says) is to imitate reality and to make you love the imitation, by putting before you vividly simple and sincere sensations. . . . The first condition of this style is to be natural, familiar, individual; it is the result of a union of moral qualities, simplicity, patience, perfect honesty. For the first time, what one calls the domestic virtues are revealed in the practice of an art.

Did any one ever see the truth more distinctly or find for it a more vivid and perfect expression? This work of Fromentin is one of the half-dozen books which I always carry about with me and read and re-read with ever new delight. If I were called upon to mark any limitation in it, I should be inclined to say that his admiration of the great craftsman Franz Hals is excessive in comparison with his measured praise of Rembrandt. Yet, all deductions made, this is one of the few modern books which deserve the praise Thucydides gave to his own history—"a possession for ever."

FLOWER PAINTINGS

Messrs. Baillie and Gardiner are now holding their sixth annual Exhibition of Flower Paintings at their gallery in Bruton Street. The majority of the studies are in water-colour, and the fact that these are very much more successful than the oil-pictures exhibited tends to show once again that—apart from the varying merits of individual artists—water-colour can best express the delicate beauty of flowers. There is some rich colouring in Miss Katherine Turner's pictures, and a good deal of charm in Miss Margaret Waterfield's accomplished sketches of garden-borders, &c. Mr. Francis James's swift, clear treatment must, however, be judged the most successful, if only because it adheres most closely to its medium.

In the adjoining room at this gallery Mr. Frederick Carter exhibits a series of humorous drawings and etchings—"The Italian Comedy." There is some clever and original drawing as well as some fine, delicate work in these illustrations.

REVIEWS

PSYCHICAL RESEARCH

New Evidences in Psychical Research. By J. Arthur Hill. (Rider and Son. 3s. 6d. net.)

If one happens to be subject to that limitation which is known as Catholic Christianity there is always one great obstacle in dealing with that modern version of necromancy which is known as Spiritualism or Spiritism. The obstacle is simply this: that necromancy in any form is forbidden by the Church. The "reason why" of this prohibition is not clear, nor, so far as the writer is aware, has it ever been authoritatively declared. Obeying the commandment, one is not tied to this reason or to that; one is not bound to agree with Father Benson's explanation—that the spirits of the séance are in fact demons seeking whom they may devour. Neither is one bound to another theory—that the spirits are really the spirits of the departed, but only of those wicked and lost persons who endeavour, by possessing themselves of a physical body, to gratify in the world of the undying the lusts of their mortality. We are not tied to any theory whatever, but as Christians we are formally commanded not to evoke the spirits of the departed.

By the way, it may be said that up to the period of the foundation of the S.P.R. the prohibition seemed most amply justified by results. Spiritualism in America and England spelt evil in various modes, beginning with folly and ending with the utter degradation of the human personality. Mrs. Browning believed that Horne's phenomena were genuine, Mr. Browning thought the man an impudent cheat; but both Mr. and Mrs. Browning were agreed that, personally, he was a fellow of the worst character. Spiritualism, in short, stood for deliquescence, moral, intellectual and spiritual. It was rottenness, and, as has been said, the command of the Church was thoroughly justified.

But it must be acknowledged that from the foundation of the Society for Psychical Research the whole subject has assumed a different aspect. The new generation has approached the whole question of occult phenomena from a new standpoint. The old Spiritualists were the preachers of a sort of fanatical religion. The S.P.R. men and their friends tried, at all events, to be purely scientific, to investigate a certain group of facts with the method of Darwin and Huxley. And one cannot in fairness say that the followers of the new model have as a body exhibited any signs of decadence. How far they are justified in their research is a matter for the moral theologians. Having noted the point, we may pass on to the consideration of Mr. Hill's "New Evidences."

In brief analysis the book consists of an account of certain telepathic phenomena, of a number of "sittings with a clairvoyant," of hallucinations, automatic writing, and "cross-correspondences." It is written throughout in an entirely admirable spirit:—

> Public opinion [says Mr. Hill] is slowly but surely becoming educated; is gradually realising that it is unwise to come to conclusions in a hurry; that in this very complex world there is no telling what may happen, and that therefore it is unsafe to reject a statement as being necessarily untrue just because, to our prejudiced minds, it seems absurd. It is a question of evidence; let us defer decision until sufficient evidence has been accumulated. Like Plutarch, let us sit on the fence.

Nothing could be better than this. It is equally removed from the illogical drivel of the older spiritualists, who detected deceased aunts by the dozen in the medium's bag of conjuring apparatus, and found in the desolate blether and imbecility of so-called "inspirational" discourses the genuine and authentic voice from the seventh heaven. And, on the other hand, it is equally removed from the more deplorable attitude of the pseudo-scientists. More deplorable, because the Spiritualist, as a rule, was an ignorant person with all his intellectual furniture in a state of hopeless mal-equipment and disarray. His mind, such as it was, had in most cases been thoroughly debauched by some form of popular Protestantism, a solvent which from any high standpoint is sufficient to turn a granite rock into blanc-mange. The scientist, on the other hand, was at least educated in the technical sense of the word, if not in the real sense, and though Coventry Patmore declared that physical science, pursued as most pursue it, was as blinding to the eyes of the soul as a course of the most determined profligacy, it is yet extraordinary that any well-educated person should declare that "to talk to us of mind, feeling, and will continuing their functions in the absence of physical organs and visible organisms, is to use language which, to us at least, is pure nonsense." This extraordinary dictum is cited by Mr. Hill from a work by Mr. Frederic Harrison, oddly entitled "Philosophy of Common Sense."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The author of "New Evidences in Psychical Research" sits on the fence then, and surveys the field before him. In the first place, he will have nothing—or next to nothing—to say to "the physical phenomena of Spiritualism"—raps, movement of objects without contact, touches by "spirit-hands," materialisations, "apports," and the like. He is too philosophic to declare that these things can't happen, but, as he says, "the possibilities of conjuring" are great, and the cleverest layman is unwise to measure his capacity for detecting against the medium's capacity for deceiving. But Mr. Hill is inclined to lay considerable stress on a series of sittings with a "clairvoyant" medium named Watson; he is, on the whole, ready to believe that the series of communications which he relates do establish the fact that the spirits of the dead communicate with the living.

It would be impossible to analyse these Watson séances here; space would not allow of it. So, without arguing the question, the writer must be content to say that, bringing an open mind to the narrative, he is by no means satisfied with the author's tentative conclusion. Avoiding detail, and speaking on general grounds, it appears that in no single instance was there a communication received through Watson which transcended the knowledge, conscious or sub-conscious, of those present. In another chapter Mr. Hill, speaking of an instance of telepathic automatic writing, confesses that "this kind of thing makes it very difficult to exclude a mind-reading hypothesis in cases of alleged spirit messages even of an evidential character." Exactly; and on the great and sound principle of neu deus intersit it seems wiser to regard the Watson communications as an interesting series of mind-tappings. The fact is that telepathy—mind-tapping—which may be regarded as proven, is at once a great and most important discovery, and a formidable obstacle in psychical research. How are we to be scientifically convinced that any communication whatever is not a case of mind-tapping? If the experiment be made in thought it will be seen that it is difficult to conceive a message that would utterly exclude the agency of the living. And in the crucial and test case described in the chapters on cross-correspondences the experiment was an utter failure.

"Mrs. Verrall's script insisted that a passage from the 'Symposium' was enclosed in a sealed envelope which had been left with Sir Oliver Lodge by Mr. Myers." The envelope was opened; it contained nothing of the kind. On the whole, then, in spite of many interesting and curious bits of evidence, there is nothing in the Watson chapters which amounts to proof of communication from the dead to the living. But there is a singular tale under the heading "Hallucinations," which really comes very near to proof, though, oddly enough, Mr. Hill considers that "its evidential strength is not very great." Here (with necessary omissions) is the story:—

> A few years ago . . . Miss Smith was staying with her sister in the house of Mrs. Jones, in a tiny Northern village. One evening a messenger brought the information that Miss Smith's brother Tom, whose business was in a town a few miles away, had been hurt; but in his occupation slight accidents are common, and the girls were not alarmed. They retired for the night soon after nine o'clock. Just as the sister was getting into bed, and before Miss Smith had finished undressing, both of them heard a succession of sounds as of heavy blows struck on the wall. The part of the wall on which they occurred was an out-wall . . . and the outside of that part could be seen by looking out of the open window; further, the month being June, there was light enough not only to see, but also to recognise any human being or living thing big enough to cause the sounds. The sisters looked out . . . but nothing was discovered . . . the knocking continued until three o'clock in the morning, causing great terror. (The fright and the general tension brought on in Miss Smith's case an attack of brain-fever, though she is one of the calmest and most unemotional women I have ever known.) Early in the morning a messenger brought the news that Tom Smith had died at 8.45 the previous night—about twenty or twenty-five minutes before the noises began. A curious feature of the sounds was that they were not audible in the other rooms, though in this one room they seemed loud enough to be heard all over the house.

There is one point that we would have liked more clearly stated: did Mrs. Jones (who was called in by the two girls) hear the noise, or did she not? This apart, the story strikes one as most important. The objection that Miss Smith had heard earlier in the evening that her brother was hurt, and that, in spite of the commonness of slight accidents in his business, there may well have been a lurking anxiety in her mind predisposing to auto-hallucination, would have been formidable if the form of Tom Smith had appeared to Miss Smith, or if she had heard his voice calling her. But, using all caution, it is not credible that vague anxiety should translate itself into the wholly incongruous form of heavy knocks upon a wall; this objection, therefore, falls to the ground.

We have to note, then, that these sounds were heard about twenty minutes before the man died, and that they continued for more than six hours after his death. Then, again, the impression they made, taken in conjunction with the fatal news of the next morning, was so strong that one of the sisters was frightened into a brain-fever. It would seem, on the face of it, that a stranger proof of post-mortem existence and activity could hardly be demanded. The knocking sounds, though making a sensible impression, were not produced by sensible means. If they were not in some way or another the work of the dead personality called Tom Smith, whose work were they?

LADY HOLLAND IN SPAIN

The Spanish Journal of Elizabeth Lady Holland. Edited by the EARL OF ILCHESTER. (Longmans, Green and Co. 15s. net.)

THE impressions of private travellers, as they pass from city to city of a strange land, are often of more value—and occasionally of more interest—than the impressions gained by those who view affairs from high official positions.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Ambassadors and diplomats are apt to be somewhat isolated; their pinnacle of observation gives them an extensive field of vision, but they rarely rub shoulders, as it were, with the crowd, or take stock of a country's peculiar and intimate characteristics. Lord and Lady Holland, wandering through Spain in the troublous years immediately preceding the Peninsular War, were travelling for their own pleasure entirely, and the first half of this volume gives many fascinating glimpses of the Spain of the early nineteenth century. Lady Holland kept an intermittent account of journeys, events, and people, and her comments often betray her as the possessor of a keenly observant and humorous mind. Of the Marquis of Blondel, for instance, she remarks on November 25th, 1802:—

> The old veteran has taken a young wife who is reckoned a strange, whimsical lady, wearing ostensibly the breeches she of course wears metaphorically, as such merit and ought to be the fate of those who enter into disproportionate marriages.
>
> Dec. 1st.—Went to Barcelona. Evening, returned the visit to my singular neighbour; found her noisy, positive, vulgar, and not pretty, but with enough of youth and beauty (tho' the portion of each is slender, as she is the mother of an officer of 25) to captivate her mari octogénaire.

The objection of the Spaniards to foreign costume gave Lady Holland considerable inconvenience until she assumed as nearly as possible the national dress. She experienced what she "could never have believed otherwise—the extreme derision and scorn with which a woman is treated who does not conform to the Spanish mode of dressing. . . . Walking the streets was out of the question, not only from the danger of being exposed to meet a carriage in the streets, but from the certainty of being insulted owing to the dress." This was at Barcelona; at Valencia she wrote, on December 29th of the same year: "The intolerance of the Spaniards for those who do not conform to their costume makes it not only unpleasant but positively unsafe for a woman to appear without the basquiña and mantilla, a dress thoroughly inconvenient for the strong light of this glorious sun, the eyes being exposed to all its power."

Minor worries, rather than actual dangers, seem to have been the lot of the travellers—"wretched gipsy posadas and robbers in the shape of smugglers," who practically forced their victims to buy articles and contraband commodities at exorbitant prices. On April 5th, 1803, we find the entry: "Dined at Venta del Rey, a spacious and princely fabric; 600 horses, mules, &c., can be accommodated in the stables. The rooms are good, but there, as in all Spanish inns, when asked what they have to eat, the answer is, 'What yourselves have brought.'" Approaching Granada, "in the midst of a deep slough the coach broke in several parts; the whole road most abominably rugged." At the close of a quite poetical description of the view from her window in this far-famed city Lady Holland drops into prose in startling fashion:—

> Our house is situated at the extremity of the town, on the banks of ye Darro. Opposite to my window I see the fortress and palace of the Alhambra, which is placed upon a steep hill, the sides of which are covered with delightful trees, now putting forth their luxuriant foliage. The moon shone very bright, and just after the Angelus, being near the cathedral, I could not resist going into it. The feeble rays from the lamps burning before the altars made the building appear magnificent. Got the portraits of Ferdinand and Isabella well cleared of the cobwebs, that I might distinguish their features.

The artistic and the practical temperaments evidently were mingled in the case of Lady Holland—a notion which is supported by the extraordinary story Lord Ilchester gives in his Preface of the clever deception by which she persuaded Sir George Webster of the death of her daughter Harriet.

Of the theatrical art of Spain Lady Holland held a poor opinion, justified apparently by the specimens of it which she witnessed. At Valencia she says that "the theatre is, to a degree, a resource, as it is frequented by the most fashionable ladies, but I can scarcely add that it is much of an amusement:"—

> The prompter sits as in France—in the centre of the lamps—but it is not an exaggeration to say that he speaks louder than the performers. The actors are so indifferent to their art that they hardly endeavour to learn their part; therefore in addition to the prompter in front, one on each side of the scene stands with a book and a candle, by which means the performers never act to each other, always towards the prompter.

At Carthagena the subject of a play was English, and the chief character was a "Lord Roast-beef"! Some compensation for these enormities was probably afforded by an opportunity of seeing "Macbeth" in Spanish at Madrid, on November 23rd, 1803—although even then Lady Macbeth was represented with a son of six years old, "introduced for no other purpose than that of enabling her to run upon the stage with bloody hands, fresh from murdering him in his bed"! So can the art of one country be distorted for the pleasure of another.

The bull-fights, of which Lady Holland witnessed several, occasioned her utter disgust, yet she talks of Ximenes, the famous matador, and his "noble calling," in a way which rather puzzles the reader. Apart from the customs of the country, she met many famous people, among them Pellicer, the King's librarian and editor of "Don Quixote," and Mouravieff, who translated "The School for Scandal" into French. William Pinkney, American Minister to Madrid, who talked of the dispute between Spain and the United States "as he would of a difference between two of his neighbours," became quite a friend. He was quite as "cute" as a modern Yankee, for, when his tailor sued him for a debt, he argued: "The King of Spain owes the United States a considerable sum of money. I do the business of my Government here; it is therefore but fair that Soler, as the King's cashier, should pay this bill, and I will account with Madison when I get across the Atlantic."

We must leave any detailed discussion of the second portion of the book, which deals almost entirely with the early period of the Peninsular War; students of the European history of those exciting times will find it extremely interesting and valuable as a sidelight on the great struggle. Before concluding, however, we may quote a short paragraph from the diary, dated December 21st, 1803, which shows Lady Holland as a by no means negligible literary critic:—

> 21st.—Mouravieff, Lambert, and Falck dined. Received in the morning a small box, brought by Mr. Hunter from Lisbon, containing "Cowper's Life," by Hayley, and "Lady M. Wortley Montagu's Letters," published by permission from the family papers in Lord Bute's possession. The whole novelty are a couple of volumes of her correspondence with her husband and daughter. There is in the first (whilst lovers) on her part a mixture of cold reasoning and forward importunity that renders his hesitation far from surprising, but the vanity of possessing such a wit probably decided him. I devour it with the same eagerness one feels about a new and interesting novel, with this difference, that the novel excites curiosity merely for the story, whereas Lady Mary's wit and sarcasm form its excellence, and novelty makes one pause to admire its justness. Her picture, or rather view of human life, is not flattering but faithful.

The Earl of Ilchester, as editor, has aided his readers considerably by judicious arrangement, modification of the original spelling and punctuation, and by rendering uniform the Spanish names. A map of Spain and Portugal enables the student to keep track of the various journeys easily, the route being lined in red and blue inks, and a full-length portrait of Lady Holland in fancy dress as a "Virgin of the Sun," by Romney, reproduced by permission of Lord Iveagh, forms a striking frontispiece.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

THE ROOF OF THE WORLD

Across the Roof of the World: a Record of Sport and Travel through Kashmir, Gilgit, Hunza, The Pamirs, Chinese Turkestan, Mongolia, and Siberia. By LIEUT. P. T. ETHERTON, F.R.G.S. Illustrated. (Constable and Co. 16s. net.)

THE compressed account of his travels, in 1909, from British India to the Siberian Railway near Tomsk, given by Lieut. Etherton before a select audience at the Royal United Service Institution in November, has been quickly followed by this interesting volume, recording his experiences in complete detail. Lieut. Etherton's object was to travel through Hunza and the Pamirs, across Chinese Turkestan, to the Siberian Railway, and, incidentally, to enjoy sport in the Mian Shan and Altai ranges—happy hunting-grounds that of late years have become accessible to sportsmen.

Starting from his regimental cantonment in Gurwhal on March 15th, Lieut. Etherton, accompanied by his faithful orderly, Giyan Singh, travelled by the ordinary tourist and sportsman's route through Kashmir to Gilgit, where his last preparations were made for crossing the Indian frontier. To thcse who have never seen the Himalayas it may give some idea of the gigantic barrier that cuts off India from Central Asia to learn that in order to reach this jumping-off point occupied nearly a month's hard travelling. Leaving Gilgit, the traveller's route lay through Hunza, a terra incognita twenty-five years ago, but now brought within the circle of British Indian influence. The dark and precipitous gorges north and south of Hunza are well illustrated by the author's photographs, and explain how it was that for centuries Hunza has been a robber fastness bidding defiance to the outside world. The place of the old barbarous robber Mirs of Hunza is now occupied by an obliging and helpful Hindustani-speaking Mir, who gave all necessary assistance.

Nearly a month was spent on the Taghoumbash Pamir in pursuit of the great wild sheep, named after Marco Polo. Game was scarce and the weather abominable, so our traveller set his face for the plains of Chinese Turkestan. He now found himself committed to an extraordinarily difficult route, almost unknown, and at what is probably the worst season of the year to traverse such a country. Crossing the Illi-su Pass, 16,950ft., he soon discovered that what looks easy on the map is no guide in practical travelling at great elevations. Every day as the sun gathered power the melted snow came down and transformed the streams into impassable torrents. "No creature, animal or otherwise, could have lived in that boiling torrent, roaring and rushing through the gloomy canyons, and striking terror into the hearts of my Kirghiz, whose dismay was intense when I expressed an intention to try it." The Rashum Valley, as the head of the Yarkund River valley is called, is hard to get into, and harder still to get out of. Lieut. Etherton was therefore obliged to take to the mountains again, and cross two difficult passes before he at last reached the plain country. The Lotchkor Pass cost the author sixteen hours' hard walking with the loss of a baggage-yak, while his camp did not arrive till the following morning. A sudden storm might have cost the whole party their lives.

In Yarkund and Kashghar he was hospitably received and entertained by the Chinese officials; one feast given in his honour by the Amban of Yarkund being apparently more formidable than the Lotchkor Pass. The entertainment commenced at one o'clock in the day, with two courses; but the serious business did not begin till two hours later, when a perfect orgy of eating and drinking set in, and lasted for over three hours. After working through twenty-five courses it is not wonderful that the guest lost count of the dishes, especially as the liquid refreshment was strictly limited to Chinese brandy served hot. "Some strange tricks were played . . . one of them being to hand round a lighted match stuck in the end of a matchbox, and the unfortunate guest in whose hand it goes out has to quaff more brandy, the result in some cases being highly exciting." No doubt. From Kashghar the Lieutenant made his way through Ahsu and Kuchar to the grassy plains of the Yulduz valley. The great heat and the distance still to be traversed doubtless prevented him from trying for a tiger in the reedy swamps of the great plain he passed through after leaving Maralbashi. In 1873 some of Sir Douglas Forsyth's party enjoyed royal sport here, hawking gazelles, wolves, and foxes with the golden eagle. By the middle of August our traveller reached his shooting-ground in the Mian Shan ranges, and the next ten weeks were spent in hunting.

It is a characteristic of mountain sport that, although it lacks the profusion and variety of game animals to be found in the plains say of Africa, it is generally of the highest quality; and this may be said to hold good of the Mian Shan country in an exceptional degree. Our sportsman found ibex in numbers that sound almost incredible to those who have only hunted them in the Himalayas, and the account of the large heads he obtained would make the most experienced shikari's mouth water. The first three pair of ibex horns shot by Lieut. Etherton measured $51\frac{1}{2}$, $53\frac{3}{8}$, and $48\frac{3}{5}$ inches respectively, and a pair measuring 55 inches was procured later. Many a good Kashmir sportsman toils for several seasons without getting a pair equal to the smallest of these. The ibex-ground in the Mian Shan is apparently much easier to work over than that in the Himalayas, and the sportsman has the inestimable advantage of being able to pitch a permanent camp quite close to the stalking-ground. Here also is the home of the great Asiatic wapiti, one of the handsomest of the red-deer tribe, and Lieut. Etherton secured many grand heads. No finer mountain sporting-ground can be imagined than the Mian Shan country, with its wapiti, ibex, roedeer, wild boar, and bears, together with the wild sheep that are called Ovis Karelini. With the exception of an adventure with two bears that promised for one moment to have a tragic termination, the stalking and forest work presented no striking incidents. The opinion is suggested that, owing to the high price given by the Chinese for stags' horns in velvet, for medicinal uses, the herds of the wapiti are likely to be seriously diminished in future. It is open to question whether the numbers of any polygamous animal can be diminished so long as only males are killed. The extermination of game is more generally due to increase of local population and the use of improved firearms by native pot-hunters, who spare neither age nor sex, even in the breeding season.

From the Mian Shan Lieut. Etherton pursued his way north to Kulja, with the intention of reaching the Altai range. But winter was coming on, and the suffering of the whole party from the intense cold and the bitter winds that swept the Mongolian plains showed the hopelessness of the attempt. Passing Lake Ebi Nor a herd of wild horses was sighted, at too great a distance to do more than verify their existence.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Named after the Russian explorer Prejevalsky, who was the first to publish an account of them, they are now supposed to be the produce of domestic animals run wild. Abandoning all further attempts at shooting, the travellers made for the Russian frontier, realising when it was almost too late that "the journey had now reached a stage where it was no longer a matter of keeping warm, but a question of keeping alive." Owing to the intense cold and the terrible winds, the sufferings of the whole party at this stage became as great as anything experienced by Arctic explorers, and nothing but Lieut. Etherton's resolution in driving the party on in search of shelter prevented them from succumbing to cold and misery. It is evident that when they at last struggled in to the Russian outpost at Zaisau on January 8th, suffering from cruel frostbites, the limit of human endurance had been nearly reached. At Zaisau, a month's nursing and unstinted hospitality on the part of his Russian hosts restored Lieut. Etherton and his orderly sufficiently to allow of their continuing the journey. There still lay before them 800 miles before the railway could be reached; but under the excellent posting arrangements established everywhere in the Czar's dominions this part of the journey was performed in comparative comfort, and the long trek of 4,000 miles brought to an end at Novo Nicholaefsk. The book is profusely illustrated with photographs, and has a map.

So much has been written about the countries traversed since Shaw, Hayward, Ney Elias, Prejevalsky Rheintal, Semenof, and others wrote of them some thirty years ago that there is nothing new to be related by a casual traveller; but it is impossible not to be struck with the absolute security enjoyed by Lieut. Etherton during his whole journey among a nomad population, to whom his money and weapons must have presented great attractions. Kunjutis, Kirghiz, Kalmucks, Chinese Kazzaks, Mongols, and Sarts greeted him at all times with a hearty goodwill and ready assistance that smoothed away all difficulties. The mere withholding of baggage-animals and guides would have made his journey impossible; but not a single day's delay was caused on this account. The opening of the Trans-Siberian Railway is destined to make as great changes in these little-known countries as has been wrought by the Canadian Pacific Railway in North America. The extension of branch lines will in time give ready access to the Altai and Mian Shan mountains; but many years, it is to be hoped, must still elapse before the game that is now plentiful becomes too scarce to tempt the adventurous sportsman, and before the unsophisticated Tartar learns to view the stranger with suspicion, instead of yielding him cheery assistance as as present.

THE SONGS OF OUR ANCESTORS

English Melodies from the Thirteenth to the Eighteenth Century. One Hundred Songs, Edited, with an Introduction and Historical Notes, by VINCENT JACKSON. With Decorations by HERBERT COLE. (J. M. Dent and Sons. 7s. 6d. net.)

"MUSIC has charms to soothe a savage breast," and "the sound along the marching street of drum and fife" will, till the crack of doom, ever inspire patriots to perform deeds of derring-do for the land that gave them birth; but we must not forget that music is also "the food of love," though perhaps not so substantial as bread and cheese and kisses in a cottage with three acres and a cow. In this collection of English Melodies, representative of five hundred years of our national minstrelsy, Mr. Vincent Jackson has gathered together some of the best of those virile words and inspiriting tunes which are the backbone of our nation. Where would our history be if it were not for the bards of days of yore and their successors? "Imperial Cæsar, dead, and turned to clay, might stop a hole to keep the wind away;" and, so far as he is concerned, the famous Julius has been but a pawn in the game of recording history. True, he tells us how, when he first stepped on these shores, he found us, in his estimation, a race of savages with, more or less, "nothings on" and our bodies stained with "the juice of a plant called woad." But the aborigines of these islands could already boast of a history, familiar to the Phœnicians, which dated from long before Cæsar's time, and which was kept alive before and after by our bards.

These ancient legends savour very much, no doubt, of the mythical, so, instead of going back to the days of the Druids (and he might have found it very difficult to do so), Mr. Jackson, ignoring also the song of Taillefer at Senlac and the later Anglo-Norman minstrelsy, makes a start with the well-known rondel in praise of the cuckoo—"Sumer is icumen in," written a century before Chaucer, which offers an almost unique example of the English tongue slowly emerging to definite poetical utterance. It is interesting to note how many of the old songs and melodies given in this volume are still popular to-day, and will in all probability continue to be so as long as the language lasts. Take, for instance, the evergreen and ever welcome "Sally in our Alley," which was written close upon two hundred years ago. Some of the airs are taken from the famous and priceless "Fitzwilliam Virginal Book" (circa 1550-1620), notably, "Fortune my Foe," one of the most notorious hanging tunes, for, though beautiful and quite innocent in itself, it had the unique if unenviable reputation of being sung at public executions. As Rowley says in his "Noble Soldier:"—

> The King, shall I be bitter 'gainst the King?
> I shall have scurvy ballads made of me,
> Sung to the Hanging tune.

And again in the "Penitent Traitor:"—

> Sung to that preaching tune, "Fortune my Foe."

Mr. Jackson's selection is a fairly representative one. He gives us songs of love, songs of war, domestic, political, and patriotic songs, which are all representative of the five centuries of our national life which his compilation covers. We are disappointed, however, that he does not give us a single example of Shirley's verse. Surely the Restoration dramatist's noblest lyric—"the fine song which old Bowman used to sing to King Charles"—entitled "Death's Final Conquest," should have found a place in this volume. It was set to music by Edward Coleman, and is said to have been a favourite of the Merry Monarch. He was, perhaps, thinking of it when he apologised for being so long a-dying. We will quote the first verse, but there are two others equally as good:—

> The glories of our blood and state
> Are shadows, not substantial things;
> There is no armour against fate,
> Death lays his icy hand on kings:
> Sceptre and crown
> Must tumble down,
> And in the dust be equal made
> With the poor crooked scythe and spade.

One of Shirley's best songs, written at the time of the restoration of Charles II., begins:—

> Ye virgins that did late despair
> To keep your wealth from cruel men,
> Tie up in silk your careless hair,
> Soft peace is come again.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Now lovers' eyes may gently shoot
A modest flame that will not kill;
The drum was angry, but the lute
Shall whisper what you will.

It does not, however, figure in this compilation; and we also miss the anonymous "When this Old Cap was New," a black-letter copy of which is to be found among the "Roxburgh Songs and Ballads." Ritson says it was "sung to an olden tune, entitled 'I'll nere be drunk again.'"

Nevertheless, Mr. Jackson has presented us with a very welcome volume, which will bring joy to the hearts of all lovers of old English melodies. Not the least interesting part is his scholarly historical introduction, and the value of the book is further enhanced by many opportune and elucidatory notes. A word of praise must also be bestowed on the appropriate decorations by Mr. Herbert Cole.

SOME TUTORIAL SERIES

English History. Illustrated. From the Earliest Times to 1066. By Sara Melhuish. (A. and C. Black. 2s. 6d.)

Roman Britain. By Edward Conybeare. (S.P.C.K. 3s. 6d.)

The Story of England. Parts I. and II. By W. S. Robinson. (Rivingtons. 2s. each.)

Junior British History Notes. By William Edwards. (Rivingtons. 2s. net.)

Black's Literary Readers. Book V. Illustrated. (A. and C. Black. 1s. 6d.)

Great Britain and Ireland. By J. B. Reynolds. (A. and C. Black. 1s. 4d.)

The British Isles. Geographical Diagrams and Land Forms. By H. J. Snape. (A. and C. Black. 1s. 6d.)

A Class-book of Chemistry. By G. C. Donington. (Macmillan. 3s. 6d.)

Elementary Algebra Exercises. Book II. By A. E. Layng. (Blackie and Son. 2s.)

